

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Library of the University of Wisconsin

W. B. King

THE
GREEK TESTAMENT,
WITH
ENGLISH NOTES.

---

VOL. II.

LONDON :
GILBERT AND RIVINGTON, PRINTERS, ST. JOHN'S SQUARE.

THE
GREEK TESTAMENT,

WITH
ENGLISH NOTES,
CRITICAL, PHILOLOGICAL, AND EXEGETICAL, ESPECIALLY ADAPTED TO THE USE OF THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS, AND MINISTERS.

---

BY THE
REV. S. T. BLOOMFIELD, D.D.
OF CAMBRIDGE AND OXFORD, VICAR OF BISBROOKE, RUTLAND, AND HONORARY CANON OF PETERBOROUGH.

---

Fifth Edition.

---

IN TWO VOLUMES.
VOL. II.

---

LONDON:
LONGMAN, BROWN, GREEN, AND LONGMANS, PATERNOSTER ROW.
MDCCCLV.

320183

JUL 30 1927

CBP
1855

2

ΠΑΤΑΟΥ ΤΟΥ ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΟΥ

Η ΠΡΟΣ

ΡΩΜΑΙΟΥΣ ΕΠΙΣΤΟΛΗ.

I. <sup>1</sup> ΠΑΤΑΟΣ, δούλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, κλητὸς ἀπόστολος, <sup>a</sup> ἁ Ἀκτ. 9. 22. & 13. 2. 9. ἀφορισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον Θεοῦ, <sup>2</sup> (ᾧ δὲ προεπηγγείλατο διὰ <sup>b</sup> Ἀκτ. 1. 18. & 18. 26. Tit. 1. 2. Gen. 2. 15. & 22. 15. & 26. 4. & 48. 10. Deut. 18. 15. 3 Sam. 7. 12. Ps. 122. 11. Isa. 4. 2. & 7. 14. & 9. 6. Jer. 23. 5. & 23. 14. Ezech. 34. 31. & 37. 34. Dan. 9. 24. Mich. 7. 30.)

ON the APOSTOLICAL EPISTLES in general, and those of St. Paul in particular, and the various points connected therewith—a subject too extensive to be fully treated in a work of this kind—a few general remarks must suffice. Though the essential doctrines and precepts of Christianity are to be found in the Gospels,—yet a fuller and clearer statement of them was necessary,—considering the altered state of things to that which existed during our Saviour's lifetime,—and especially after the uprise of serious corruptions and dangerous errors, originating partly in misconception; but which required to be checked by a more explicit, and yet equally authoritative revelation. Now this was done by St. Paul and the other writers of the Apostolical Epistles; to which the Acts of the Apostles form so important an Introduction. As to the Gospels and the Epistles, they mutually illustrate each other. Consequently, though the latter were written, in some measure, for the immediate purpose either of refuting heresies, which had arisen from a blending of Christianity with Judaism, or with Gentilism, or of repressing corruptions, reforming abuses, and composing schisms and differences; yet, in point of fact, they became, and were considered as, commentaries on the doctrines of Christ, as delivered in the Gospels: and though originally intended for particular Christian societies, yet were adapted to, and intended for the instruction of, Christians in all ages. Thus, for example, even the decisions of cases of conscience concerning meats and drinks, and the other observances of the ceremonial law, and various points at issue with the Judaizing Christians,—even these are our surest guides in all points relating to Church liberty, and the use of things indifferent; especially as to the abstaining from things innocent in themselves, but likely to give offence to our more scrupulous brethren, or lead them into sin. On such deep points of conscience, see Bp. Sanderson's first and fourth Sermons ad Clerum.

VOL. II.

On the cause of the above less clear promulgation of the doctrines of Christianity in the Gospels, see Canon Townsend; and on the nature and extent of those clearer revelations contained in the Epistles, see Horne's Introd. vol. iv. Suffice it here to say, that in the Gospels the moral duties are more exactly specified, and more expressly taught, while of the Epistles, the general purpose was, I. to consider and decide various controversies, or refute errors, which had occasioned the writing of the Epistles; II. to enjoin the observance of those moral duties, which are binding on Christians in every age; espec. as regarded those virtues which the disputes or errors above mentioned might lead them to neglect. To advert to the subject-matter itself,—clear as the Epistles are in all material points, yet, from various causes, ably pointed out by Dr. Graves, and Abp. Whately, they are far more difficult to be understood than the Gospels. The principal reason is, that which applies to all epistolary writings, their being addressed to those who are supposed to be, more or less, acquainted with the matters on which they treat; and, therefore, their being not intended to be plain to others: in which respect they differ materially from a history or narration. Thus in an Epistle some things may well be omitted, or cursorily touched on, as being well known to the person or persons addressed; though to others, unacquainted with the circumstances, they cannot but be obscure. And if such was the case with those who lived in the age of the Apostles, how must it be with us who live at this distance of time to whom the language is a foreign one, and who can obtain no knowledge of the circumstances, except what can be gathered from the Epistles themselves? Moreover, the Epistles of the New Test. are occasionally answers to other Epistles, in which had been proposed questions, and without the knowledge of which the answers must be in a considerable degree obscure. But, besides these general causes of obscurity, which

B

c. ch. 9. 1—

22.

John 1. 14.

Ps. 132. 11.

Matt. 1. 1.

Ec. Luke 1. 22. &amp; 2. 22, 21. Acts 2. 20. &amp; 12. 22. 2 Tim. 2. 2.

τῶν προφητῶν αὐτοῦ ἐν γραφαῖς ἀγίαις.) <sup>3</sup> ° περὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, (τοῦ γενομένου ἐκ σπέρματος Δαυὶδ κατὰ σάρκα, are common to all the Epistolary writers of the New Test., there are some which are peculiar to St. Paul, as resulting from the character of his style and cast of mind. With an ardent temperament, and uncommon acuteness and readiness of thought, and fulness of mind, he must have been, from his 'care of all the Churches,' compelled to write with great rapidity, and, it has been supposed, though without sufficient proof, without bestowing much time in methodizing or digesting what he had written. And—not to say that method and orderly arrangement are seldom found in Jewish writers—Paul's mind seems to have been, from its very constitution, peculiarly averse to the trammels of regular composition. Hence the long and involved sentences, the abrupt transitions, the harsh constructions, the too sparing and imperfect management of the Particles, the perpetual parentheses (sometimes within parentheses, which then require great care to be disentangled, and nicety of exegesis), the frequent digressions and sudden returns to the original subject, without marking it out by Particles, the frequent changes of person, the speaking in the person of another, or as another would speak, by the μετασχηματισμός, or the κοινωνία; and, lastly, the propounding objections and supplying answers to them without any formal intimation thereof;—though, indeed, all these have been by some exaggerated, and by others, on very insufficient authority, ascribed to the haste with which it is supposed the Epistles were written. Indeed, a great part of what are called the peculiarities of St. Paul's style are only such as are found,—though in a less degree,—in the other writers of the New Test., springing mainly from the Judaical cast of mind, and in some measure common to all the writers of antiquity, at least before the Christian era. Thus, of ancient writers, THUCYDIDES possesses most of the characteristics of St. Paul's writings, and that in nearly as great a degree: and yet who ever ascribed the harshness and irregularities of that writer, the great Canon of Attic prose, to haste? which could not be thought of, when it is considered that he bestowed on the formation of a not very long history almost the whole of a lifetime of no ordinary duration. Hence we seem warranted to ascribe, in some degree, the irregularities and harshnesses (which I do not deny to be defects) of the one writer to very much the same cause as those of the other,—namely, to a sort of peculiar mental conformation; the minds of the two writers being, it should seem, cast in the same mould,—though, in temperament, it would seem, and character, they materially differed. In each the ideas poured in upon him faster than the expressions wherewith to clothe them suggested themselves; especially in the case of the Apostle, who was writing in a foreign language. Hence arose the brevity observable in both writers; by which, in some cases, one expression stands for a whole clause or even sentence, and sometimes the meaning is rather intimated than expressed. The same peculiarity is found, in nearly the same degree, in Theophrastus and Longinus; and, in some measure, in Aristotle and Tacitus; and in all those cases, more or less, from an idiosyncrasy of mind common to all. To the same cause may, in a great measure, be ascribed the too frequent employment of the asyndeton, and the far too sparing use, and, occasionally, misuse, of particles,—than which nothing tends more to obscurity. In the style of both Paul, and Thucyd., as far as regards his Orations, we recognise those characteristics, naturally resulting from an ardent temperament, which constitute what Longinus terms δυνάμις, as consisting in the use of the apostrophe, interrogation, and answer by the questioner himself. Both writers (especially St. Paul) abound in metaphor and imagery, and no other writers present so many examples of that συνάθροις, or assemblage of figures of speech, which Longinus esteems the great component of the sublime; and both writers, particularly Paul, make a frequent use of Paronomasia, which, when properly employed, has great force and beauty, but requires great judgment in the Expositor to ascertain the real weight of the expression. It is true that, in both these great writers, the matters treated of, however totally different in their character, are, in their different ways, so deep and intricate, that, especially to minds of an ordinary calibre, they must necessarily partake largely of obscurity. Indeed, that powerful reasoner and great metaphysician, Coleridge, pronounces the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans the most profound work that ever existed. The obscurity, however, in both those writers, as it could not be designed, so may it be greatly lessened by due care and attention on the part of the student. And since, as Coleridge observes, 'much of the difficulty in the Apostle's writings arises from the form in which the matter is presented, and which would doubtless have been quite different in a state of things so different as that at the present day,—so it may best be removed by representing to ourselves the ratiocinations in the manner they would now have assumed,—when the thoughts would have been more carefully evolved, and the parentheses thrown into notes; by which, and by other methods, the reasonings would have stood out more distinctly.' As to the excessive length of sentences, found in both these writers, it may be doubted whether that does not, to minds above the ordinary level, tend rather to abridge the labour of thought; for when many reasonings are thus linked together in a small compass, the respective bearings of each on the rest are more clearly perceptible. At any rate, this sort of pregnant brevity has always been considered characteristic of deep-thinking minds, such as were, especially, those of Thucydides, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Tacitus, and Paul, in whom this peculiarity is most observable.

Lastly, we may observe, as a striking coincidence between Thucydides and St. Paul, their occasionally diverging from the main subject, and then returning to it, and resuming the narrative or the reasoning, as if no interruption had occurred. In which view it has been, with equal truth of sentiment and beauty of expression, re-

4<sup>a</sup> τοῦ ὀρισθέντος Τίου Θεοῦ ἐν δυνάμει, κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγίον σύνης, ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν,) Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου

d John 10.
 30, 36.
 Acts 13, 26.
 Heb. 1, 2.
 2d 5, 6.

marked by Mr. Robert Boyle, Works, vol. ii. 271. 'As rivers are said to run to the sea, though oftentimes the interposition of land, or rising grounds, or other obstacles, force them to such winding meanders, that they seem to retreat from the ocean they tend to; to which, nevertheless, with an increased stream, they afterwards bend again their intermitted course, having watered and fertilized, by their passage, the grounds through which they seem to wander; so St. Paul, though he direct his course to his main scope, may, not only without declining it, but, in order to it, seem for a while, to abandon it, by fetching a compass to answer some express, or anticipate some implied or suppressed, objection—and afterwards, more successfully, resume his former considerations, now strengthened by the removal of the interposing scruples; having, ὡς ἐν καρίῳ, happily illustrated those subjects which his incidental excursions led him to handle.'

To advert, in a more general way, to the style and phraseology of St. Paul's Epistles generally, —if we consider merely the use of words and phrases, the structure of clauses, the rounding of periods, and such matters of, as it were, artistic skill, we meet with not the smooth polished sentences and nice proprieties of pure Greek composition,—but that sort of style, which we might naturally expect from one, like the Apostle, born and educated in a city where the Greek spoken was confessedly provincial, and far from pure; and who had been addicted from his boyhood to the close study of the Hebrew of the Old Test. in the Sept. Version, and the conversational use of the Syro-Chaldee. That we ought not to expect a perfectly Classical style, and native exactness of syllogistic form in reasoning, was acknowledged by the ancient Fathers, who freely admit that the whole character of Christianity forbids us to look for Classical elegance in the external form of Scripture: and Calvia himself, on Rom v. 15, remarking on some of those anomalous constructions which abound in St. Paul's Epistles, plainly says, 'Quæ sunt quidem orationis vitia, sed quibus nihil majestati decedit cœlestis Sapientia, quæ nobis per Apostolum traditur. Quin potius singulari Dei providentia factum est, ut sub contemptibili verborum humilitate altissima hæc mysteria nobis traderentur: ut non humanæ eloquentiæ potentia, sed sola Spiritus efficacia niteretur nostra fides.' We must, however, bear in mind, with Mr. Alf., that any concession as to the perfection in form of the Apostle's writings, must have its limits; for if we were to go so far as to grant that such imperfection of form amounted to what Tholuck ascribes, positivæ informalitæ, the subject matter itself would be involved in the surrender. Accordingly, we must assume, that the Divine thoughts have been, under a special inspiration, propounded in such a form as to secure an adequate representation of Divine truth; and also so expressed that, by the diligent use of all the requisite means, the true sense may, with whatever difficulty (and great it is), be satisfactorily established. However, considering the persons addressed, the idiom and style were the best that could have been adopted; inasmuch that had the Apostle possessed the purest Attic style, he would doubtless have preferred that, which might render his writings more acceptable and intelligible to the Jews and Jewish converts, whom he chiefly addressed. And further, if from manner we proceed to matter—from the shell to the kernel—and consider the general contour, the sublimity of the thoughts, the depth and richness of the conceptions, the boldness and richness of the imagery, we shall not fail to perceive all the marks of a true, however unadorned, eloquence—not that which (to use the words of Hemsterhusius in his Oratio de Paulo Apostolo) consists 'in flocculis verborum, et orationis calamistratæ pigmentis'—, sed in indolis excoles notis, in ponder rerum.' Accordingly, it was not without reason, that Longinus ranked Paul among the first-rate Orators; adding, however, that he appears to more advantage in persuasion, than in demonstration. Finally, as regards the power of reasoning so eminently united in the Apostle with divinity and force of eloquence, it has been well said, by one above all others qualified to judge on that matter, the profound logician Locke, that 'if any shall say that St. Paul is not a conclusive reasoner, it is a proof that they themselves understand nothing of reasoning.' Thus we have the best authority for maintaining, against the infidel writers, that Paul did not, alter the manner of empty enthusiasts, write down what he did not himself comprehend. Indeed, others, as well as Locke, including that great master of ratiocination, Thomas Aquinas, have recognised the same cogent consecutiveness in the Apostle's reasoning. I must not conclude this Section without noticing two or three minor characteristics of St. Paul's style, worthy of the student's attention,—(1) the frequent, and sometimes perplexed antitheses,—occasionally even in prepositions—;—which require great judgment and discrimination in the interpreter, since the different members of the antitheses are sometimes not to be taken in the same extent of meaning; and not unfrequently the literal and the metaphorical signifi. are interchanged, to the injury of perspicuity. The same may be said of the Subject and the Predicate,—of which the former may be literal, the latter metaphorical. (2) Accumulation of Prepositions, often with the same, or slightly differing meanings; thereby creating a difficulty not to be obviated without great judgment, so as not to assign a nicety of distinction beyond what the Apostle intended.

But to proceed to a brief consideration of the Epistle before us,—of its authenticity there has never been any serious doubt entertained; this being attested by the strongest evidence, both external and internal. As to the genuineness of certain portions, impugned by some German Theologians of the Rationalist School, the subject has been briefly discussed on the passages themselves. That the Epistle was written from Corinth, is evident from the contents of the composition itself (ch. xv.) as compared with 1 Cor. i. 14. 2 Tim. iv. 20. The time when it was indited, with great reason, supposed to have been towards the close of the Apostle's residence at Corinth, and when he was making preparations

e Rom. 12. 3.
& 15. 13, 16.
1 Cor. 16. 9, 10.
Eph. 2. 8.

ἡμῶν, ὃ (ο δι' οὐ ἐλάβομεν χάριν καὶ ἀποστολὴν, εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος αὐτοῦ for a journey from thence to Jerusalem, ch. xv. 24—27. Acts xx. 2, 3. This fixes the date to the very end of A.D. 57, or the early part of A.D. 58; the fourth year of the reign of Nero. As to the question, by whom the Gospel was first preached in Rome? we are destitute of any certain information from Scripture, or the early Ecclesiastical writers; but it is with great probability supposed that it was not founded by any Apostle, but first preached by some of the 'strangers of Rome,' who, as we learn from Acts i. 10, were at the feast of Pentecost, and were converted by the illustrious miracle of the gift of tongues. There is great reason to think, from the researches of Wieseler and others, reported by Davison, that, to use the words of Mr. Alford, 'Paul had proximately, at least, laid the foundation of the Roman Church; that it was originated by those to whom he had preached, who had been attracted to the metropolis of the world by various causes, and who had there laboured with success, and gathered around them an important Christian community.' On the whole, we may conclude, from the profound researches of Wieseler and others, that the Roman Church owed its origin partly, indeed, to believing Jews, who had been attracted thither in the first days of Christianity, but mainly to persons converted by Paul's preaching. Be that as it may, at the time when this Epistle was written, the Christians at Rome were numerous, and composed, as in other places, partly of converted Jews, or Jewish proselytes, and partly of converted Gentiles; which will serve to account for various peculiarities in its character and form.

As to the Object with which the Epistle was written,—the main purpose thereof is to be kept quite distinct from the immediate occasion which dictated its being written. On turning to the Epistle itself, the three distinctly marked portions thereof would seem to point at rather different occasions and purposes. The Doctrinal portion (i.—viii.) and the Practical (xii.—xvi.) combine well together, the one as the sequence of the other. As to the intermediate portion (ix.—xi.) it seems to have been written last, and placed where it stands, because it connects naturally in subject with the former, not the latter. The immediate occasion of drawing up the Epistle was, doubtless, the yet unsettled relations of the two great divisions of Christians,—the Jewish and the Gentile professors,—as to the yet undecided question (probably then much agitated at Rome, as well as elsewhere) as to their respective claims to favour in the sight of God. Accordingly, to adjust the question between the two contending parties seemed to call for the personal intervention of the Apostle. But, as that was at the present season impracticable, he decided on endeavouring to accomplish the object by written communication. Now the difficulties which thus called for the Apostle's interposition,—in order to compose differences, and cement union,—are evident from facts connected with the origin of the Roman Church. That Church being mixed, probably in almost equal proportions, of Jews and Gentiles, the relative position in God's favour of these two Classes respectively would be likely to occasion, as it did, continual occasions of mutual jealousy and bickering. Now these rival claims to preference could only be adjusted, and the false views which originated them effectually put down, by wide and comprehensive views of the universality of man's guilt, and of God's grace; and this seems to have formed the main purpose of the Epistle. And the vast importance of ROMANS, as the metropolis of the Gentile world, would naturally induce the Apostle, when writing, to accomplish more than he originally intended, and thus to present in this, beyond any other Epistle, a full representation of the Divine dealings, as well towards Jews as Gentiles, and formed on broad views as to the universality of man's guilt and God's justifying grace. Thus, although the Epistle was not, as some suppose, a regular system of doctrinal teaching in writing, to supply the want of oral instruction, yet, when we consider the vast importance of Rome and its Church,—inasmuch that an Epistle to the Romans was nearly like an Epistle to all the Gentiles from the Apostle of the Gentiles,—we can be at no loss to see why the Apostle expended far more of effort upon this than upon any other Epistle, throwing forth the whole power of his mind, and pouring forth, under the influence of the Spirit, his whole soul. No wonder, then, that the result should have been such a representation of Evangelical truth, especially as to man's guilt and unworthiness, and God's redeeming mercy, as not even Holy Scripture elsewhere presents; whereas the Apostle's original purpose was simply to guard the Roman converts against the attacks made on their faith by the Jews and the Judaizers; to confute the unbelieving, and confirm the believing Jews; to convert the unbelieving Gentiles; in short, to remove the prejudices, and compose the differences of both Jews and Gentiles. But Divine Providence was pleased to ordain that the Epistle should be the great instruction of the Church Universal to the end of time, and prove a κτῆμα ἐς αἶν.

To advert to the contents, the first five chapters exhibit Christ as the author of our Justification; the next three, as our Sanctification, and the author of our everlasting Consolation. And here terminates the doctrinal part of the Epistle. At ch. ix. the Apostle encounters the objections which might be made to the foregoing representations of doctrine. At ch. x. xi. he confirms his position, that the unbelieving Jews must perish; deducing, however, the cheering assurance, that it will be the occasion of salvation to the Gentiles. The rest of the Epistle is practical and hortatory, and meant to warn the Roman converts, both Jewish and Gentile, against falling into various errors, and indulging in sundry evil dispositions and practices, to which they were, in their peculiar circumstances, respectively exposed.

1. vv. 1—16 form the introduction to the Epistle, containing, 1st, a salutation, or inscription, by way of exordium, 1—7; 2ndly, a brief expression of some personal wishes in order to pave the way for the subsequent address at v. 18, which forms the grand theme of the Epistle, and is the subject of all that follows, up to the end of chap. v.

ἐν οἷς ἐστε καὶ ὑμεῖς, κλητοὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ,) 7 ἑ πᾶσι τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἀγαπητοῖς Θεοῦ, κλητοῖς ἀγίοις χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

I. 1—7. Address of the Epistle, stating Paul's calling to be an Apostle of the Lord Jesus.

1. δούλος Ἰ. Χρ.] At Phil. i. 1, and Tit. i. 1, we have δούλος Θεοῦ, ἀπόστ. Ἰ. Χρ. As to the term δούλος Θεοῦ, it was applied first to Moses and Joshua, afterwards to the Prophets, and lastly to the Apostles, and the Ministers of the Gospel in general, as 2 Tim. ii. 24: in both of which last uses it denotes 'one devoted to the spiritual service of Christ in his Gospel.' The term κλητός here denotes expressly constituted (as opposed to being self-appointed, or constituted by human authority) by the especial call of the Lord himself, recorded in Acts ix. 15, where he is styled σκευὸς ἐκλογῆς, with which comp. the ἐξελεξάμεν of the Lord himself at John vi. 70, comp. with Acts i. 2.

In the words ἀφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον Θεοῦ there is, as Hyper. remarks, an amplification of the preceding κλητός, denoting that he was not simply called to the Apostolical office, 'sed singulari Dei iudicio electum, imo selectum.' The phrase alludes to his being set apart for the work of the Gospel, not only by the Holy Spirit (Acts xiii. 2), but also by Christ himself, Gal. i. 15, οὅτι ἐξ ἀφορίσεως με ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς μου. So Acts xxvi. 17, ἐξαιρούμενός σε—ἀποστόλου. —εἰς εὐαγγέλιον Θεοῦ, 'for the announcing of the Gospel of God.' lit. 'the glad tidings sent to man by God, as his gift of grace.' See more in Theoph. and Theodor.

2. ὁ προεπηγγ. —ἀγίας] This is added to further display the nature of the Gospel; q. d. 'This gift of God's grace was no new thought in the Divine mind, but was long ago formed;' and after being announced through the Prophets by way of promise, was fulfilled in Jesus the ἔγχεος διαθήκης κρείττονος, Heb. vii. 22, and so Calvin, q. d. 'Christum non in terris subitum decidisse, aut novum doctrinæ genus et prius inauditum importasse: siquidem ipse cum suo Evangelio, promissus ab exordio mundi fuit, et semper expectatus;' and so Hyper., who remarks that this was meant as a pre-occupation of the objection of the Jews and Heathens, that Christianity was a novelty, and was intended to refute the calumny, that he undervalued Moses and the Prophets.

3. περὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ, &c.] 'concerning his Son;' for the words are best referred to ὁ προεπ. supra; q. d. 'which glad tidings in the Gospel he promised beforehand, intimating that it should be concerning his Son.' See Calvin, who characterizes the passage as 'insignis locus, quo decernitur totum Evangelium in Christo contineri: ut quisquis a Christo pedem unum dimoverit, ab Evangelio se subducatur.'

—τοῦ γενομένου 'who was born.' So John i. 14, σὰρξ γινόμενος, and Gal. iv. 4.

—κατὰ σάρκα] Notwithstanding what some recent Commentators urge, this must certainly have the sense assigned by the most ancient Fathers and Interpreters, and a majority of modern Commentators, 'according to his human nature,' incarnate state, as Acts ii. 30, infra ix. 5, ἔξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς τὸ κατὰ σάρκα (where see note), and 2 Cor. v. 16. There is evidently an allusion to his other and heavenly nature and origin. Thus the sense is, 'Christ, even as to his incarnate nature and condition on earth, was of kingly descent.' In the next verse, the Apostle adverts to the exalted and glorified state of Christ.

4. The sense, in this passage, is not very clearly expressed; and, accordingly, some difference of opinion exists as to what it really is. The difficulty turns on the expressions ὀρισθέντος ἐν δυνάμει and κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης. As to the former, the ancient Interpreters almost universally, and a great majority of modern ones, take ὀρισθέντος to mean 'marked out to be,' and, by implication, 'expressly declared to be,' δειχθέντος, or ἀποφανθέντος, as Chrysa. explains; which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version; an unusual sense of the word, perhaps a popular idiom. That it must be so taken here is certain from the context, in whichever way the expression ἐν δυνάμει is taken, whether as construed with Θεοῦ, or with ὀρισθέντος. The former construction is ably supported by Calvin and Hyper., and yields a sense agreeable to the scope of the passage; but seems not so well founded as the latter, according to which the sense may be expressed 'manifested with power to be the Son of God.' See Acts xvii. 26, 31.—As to the force of κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης, I am still of opinion, that the antithesis subsisting between the expressions κατὰ σάρκα and κατὰ πνεῦμα require the sense assigned by the Latin Fathers generally, and many eminent modern Expositors, according to which it denotes, 'the holy and blessed spiritual and Divine nature of Christ.'

5. δι' οὗ meaning the Lord himself, who conferred on him the grace to be what he was. Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 10.

—χάριν καὶ ἀποστ.] Augustin, Tholuck, Olshausen, and Stuart, keep the terms separate; and Stuart renders, 'grace, and the office of the Apostle.' But I continue to think that this cannot be approved of, as introducing a sense not likely to be the true one; and especially since the χάρις here must denote the grace wherewith he wrought in his Apostleship; as is clear from 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10, which is the best comment on this verse. However, there is not, what many Expositors say, a Hendiadys, but as Calvin, an Hypallage, by a sort of Hysteronproteron. He well remarks, that the two are named apart by the Apostle in order to intimate 'id totum Divinæ esse beneficentiæ, non suæ dignitatis quod cooptatus sit in ordinem Apost.' This is confirmed by Theophyl. (probably from Chrysa.), where, after bidding us remark the modesty of the Apostle, he says it is to say, οὐδέν, φησιν, ἡμέτερον, ἀλλὰ πάντα ἐλάβομεν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ μὴν διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος ἐλάβομεν τὴν ἀποστολήν, and, after referring to John xvi. 13. Acts xliii. 2, and 1 Cor. xii. 8, he adds, καὶ τί τοῦτο; τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Υἱοῦ εἰσι καὶ τὸ ἔμπαιον. And goes on to trace both the Apostleship, and the grace indispensable to discharge its duties, to the h Eph. 5. 90.

Heb. 12. 15.
1 Pet. 2. 5.
1 Thess. 1. 8.
1 Rom. 9. 1.
2 Cor. 1. 23.
& 11. 31.
Gal. 1. 20. Phil. 1. 8. 2 Tim. 1. 8.

<sup>8</sup> Ἡ Πρῶτον μὲν εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ μου διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ † ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν, ὅτι ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν καταγγέλλεται ἐν ὅλῳ
τῷ κόσμῳ. <sup>9</sup> Ἡ μάρτυς γὰρ μου ἐστὶν ὁ Θεός, ὃ λατρεύω ἐν τῷ

aid from on High, and he ends by saying, καὶ τὸ πείθειν ὅλον τοῦ Θεοῦ. The force of the next words is disputed, and it is easier to say what is not, than what is, the exact sense. The absence of the Article at πίστις here excludes the sense, 'the faith,' though found in Acts vi. 8; and to assign to πίστ. the sense of 'a principle of faith,' is doing violence to the words. The true force seems to be that assigned by Beza, Calv., Hyper., and the most eminent Expositors, 'to the obedience of faith.' 'Ut Deo obediatur per fidem Evangelio habitam:' it being, as Hyper. observes, the business of an Apostle 'ut homines ad fidem in Christo adducatur, atque ita salutem fide accipiant.' See Calvin's note, who bids us observe, that here 'observanda est fidei natura, quæ nomine obedientiæ ideo insignitur, quod Dominus per Evangelium nos vocat, nos autem vocanti per fidem respondemus.' This seems the genuine sense of the words, and thus explained they may well form an introduction to the subject of the Epistle.—As to the words ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, inter omnes gentes, they are most naturally connected with the words immediately preceding, in the sense, 'among all the nations,' Gentiles as well as Jews.—The next words, ὅτι τὸ ὁδοματὸς αὐτοῦ are variously referred, but best to the whole preceding clause, meaning, 'for the honour and glory of Christ, by the making known his name.'

6. ἐν οἷς ὁρᾶται καὶ ὑμεῖς—Χριστοῦ] Render: 'among whom are ye also called of Jesus Christ; in other words, 'among whom ye also are numbered, being called by Jesus Christ.'

7. This verse connects closely with ver. 1; thus 'the glad tidings of God—unto all God's believing children,' meaning both classes of those addressed, both Jews and Gentiles.—χάρις ὑμῖν—Χρ. connects with κλητοῖς ἀγίοις. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 2. The words χάρις—Χρ. may be rendered, 'Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.' See Calv., who shows that God is here represented as the great Giver of grace and peace, inasmuch as 'unicum felicitatis nostræ fundamentum est Dei benevolentia, et Christus as 'qui non modo paternæ erga nos benignitatis est administer et dispensator, sed omnia cum eo in commune operatur.'

8—17. Here we have the exordium, or Introduction, of the Epistle, distinguished by the usual characteristics of such portions in St. Paul, being commendatory, conciliatory, and especially appropriate, commencing with his thankfulness for their faith, his remembrance of them in his prayers, and his full intention, however hitherto frustrated, of visiting them, in order to ground them in the truths of that Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation to all who embrace it in true Faith; and this leads him to carry out the great purpose of his writing to them,—namely, to lay down the great doctrine of JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

8. εὐχαρ. τῷ Θεῷ μου—κόσμῳ] The Apostle first of all touches on the commendatory topic, and comes close home to their hearts by the mention of, and thankfulness for, their Christian faith and graces; and the turn τῷ Θεῷ μου renders both these topics more endearing and more impressive, inasmuch as, observes Chrys., the Prophets do the same, τὸ κοινὸν ἰδιστοποιῶμενοι. See more in Theophyl. and Theodor.

—The words διὰ Ἰησ. Χρ. convey an important point of Christian doctrine, importing that thanks, like petitions, are to be offered to God through and in the name of Christ (comp. Heb. xiii. 15), as being due to Him; see vii. 25, and note.—For ὅτι, MSS. A, B, C, D, K, and 10 cursives, have περὶ (1 add Lamb. 1183, and 2 Mus. copies), which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but external evidence is insufficient; and internal is not favourable, since it was more likely that ὅτι should be changed to περὶ by the ancient Critics, than περὶ to ὅτι by the Revisers; and περὶ comes from a quarter fertile in alteration,—the Alexandrine family. And though περὶ is shown to be a very ancient reading, yet not so ancient as ὅτι, for Jackson testifies that Origen so cites the passage; and it must have been so read by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Translators; though the latter wrongly renders by 'pro;' the former, 'on occasion (= concerning) you all.' Alford, indeed, remarks, that the words are so often confounded with each other by the scribes, that it is impossible to say which may have been confounded for the other. But that is the very reason why he should not have decided in favour of a reading supported by comparatively few MSS., and with no countenance from Versions. But it is not confusion by scribes, but alteration by Critics, that is here in question. Now it is frequent in the Alexandrine family for περὶ to be found where the copies at large have ὅτι; for example, Mark xiv. 24. John i. 30. Acts xii. 5. xxvi. 5. 1 Cor. i. 30. v. 7. 2 Cor. i. 8. Col. i. 3. ii. 1. 1 Thess. iii. 2. v. 10. Heb. v. 3; in all which passages περὶ is found in nearly the same MSS. as here. Besides, ὅτι is entitled to preference on account of its being the more difficult reading, and therefore more likely to be mistaken or altered. We can hardly fail to see that it was mistaken by the early Critics, since we find the recent Editors mistaking its sense. Thus Alf. makes it mean, 'that thanks were made on their behalf,' as if Paul were aiding them in giving thanks; whereas περὶ would import that they were the subject of his thanks. Of course between these two senses we could not hesitate to prefer the second. But ὅτι is capable of that very sense; for why should it not be taken for the Latin 'super' = 'de,' as often in St. Paul's Epistles, Rom. ix. 27. 1 Cor. iv. 6. 2 Cor. v. 12. vii. 4, et al. asp. See my Lex.; and so Hyper., Bul'ing., and Calv. render, and Est. explains by 'super.' The result of this investigation is, that this περὶ, which our Critics have embraced with both arms ('quasi nubem pro Junone'), was merely an easier reading, and a correction into more Classical Greek.

—ὅτι—καταγγ.—κόσμῳ] A strong form of expression, but hardly an hyperbole, since what πνεύματί μου ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, ὡς ἀδιαλείπτως μνησθῆναι ὑμῶν ποιούμεναι, <sup>10</sup> πάντοτε ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν μου <sup>h. ob. 15. 22.</sup>

 δεόμενος, εἴπως ἤδη ποτὲ εὐδοθήσομαι, ἐν τῷ θελήματι τοῦ <sup>22</sup> Θεοῦ. <sup>10</sup>
 Θεοῦ, ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς <sup>11</sup> ἐπιποθῶ γὰρ ἰδεῖν ὑμᾶς, ἵνα τὶ <sup>1 ch. 15. 20.</sup>
 μεταδῶ χάρισμα ὑμῖν πνευματικόν, εἰς τὸ στηριχθῆναι ὑμᾶς
<sup>12</sup> τοῦτο δὲ ἐστὶ, συμπαρακληθῆναι ἐν ὑμῖν διὰ τῆς ἐν ἀλλή- <sup>m. ch. 15. 22.</sup>

took place at Rome could not fail to be reported every where throughout the civilized world.

9. μάρτυς—ὁ Θεός, ὁ λατρ.] A solemn asseveration (like the Hebr. הוּדַת), used in cases where necessary, from the want of human witnesses. Λατρ. is to be understood of 'devoted services.' The terms ἐν τῷ πν. μου must, from the context, mean, 'in my spirit' = 'spiritually,' as opposed to the deadness of external and formal worship; 'cultu interno et spirituali, &c.:' so Estius, Calv., and Hyper., also Theophyl. and Theodor. after Chrys. And this view is confirmed by Phil. iii. 3, comp. with John iv. 23. The added phrase, ἐν τῷ εὐαγγ.—αὐτοῦ, denotes the kind of λατρία, 'cultus,' intended, meaning that which concerned the Gospel of the Son of God. The ὡς may depend on the preceding μάρτυς, and this seems more agreeable to the construction; but it may also be taken with the following ἀδίαλ., and thus it will yield a far stronger sense, and one quite as suitable to the context; see Calv.

10. εἴπως ἤδη ποτὶ εὐδοθῶ. 'if by any means at last I may be prospered so as to come unto you;' in other words, 'prospered on his journey by the Divine Providence ordering all things favourably to his visit to them.'—ἤδη ποτὶ is so rare a conjunction of Particles, at least followed by a Verb in the Future, that I know of no other example. There is something very like it as used with the Imperat. in Dion. Hal. vii. 5, since it may, as in the former case, be rendered tandem aliquando, 'some day or other.' Something like it is, in ὅψι ποτὶ, but the difference is, that in ἤδη ποτὶ, when followed by a Future, it is intimated that the future event is likely soon to take place. Comp. Jos. Antt. iii. 11. 1. τὴν μὲν ἤδη ἔχεα, τὴν δὲ ἤδη λήψισθα, with Thucyd. viii. 69, ἤδη ὑστερον, scil. χρόνῳ—εὐδοθήσομαι. The term means properly 'to be put, or brought into the right way to a certain point;' and figuratively, as here, 'to be prospered as to any course of action,' so as to be permitted to enter upon any course, or to accomplish any purpose. See examples in my Lex. in v. Of course ἰδοῦν is to be referred to εὐδοθ.

11. ἵνα τὶ. γὰρ ἰδ. ὑμ.] Render: 'For my great desire is to see you.' The purpose he has in view is not a purpose of his own advantage, but of theirs (see Theophyl. and Calv.),—namely, ἵνα μεταδῶ χάρισμα, by which is not meant the impartment of any supernatural power of working in the Spirit, but, as the following context shows, 'quas habuit vel doctrinæ, vel exhortationis, vel prophetiæ dotes, quas sibi ex Dei gratia provenisse noverat,' to use the words of Calvin. Thus it might include any benefit of a religious kind which the Apostle had the power to bestow. Yet the words following, ἐκ τῷ στηριχθ.—συμπαρακληθ. ἐν ὑμῖν, point at something special, springing from the Spirit of God, and imparted to the spirit of man. This many Expositors suppose something having for its purpose comfort and consolation.

— On the ἐκ τῷ στηριχθ. ὑμᾶς Calvin well remarks, 'Confirmatione enim indigentius omnes, donec in nobis Christus solidè adoleverit,' Eph. iv. 13. And the writer of this noble passage felt at once their need of such confirmation, and the fullness of his own power to bestow it.

12. The scope of this verse, so closely connected with the last in the same sentence, is, I apprehend, to explain what has been said, and to soften what might seem to savour of arrogance. Accordingly, it is introduced with a formula (τοῦτο δὲ ἐστὶ) serving to correction and explanation, that it may not be supposed he undervalues their spiritual condition. He therefore intimates that he does not mean to insinuate that the advantage will be all on their side; but that he himself hopes to derive spiritual benefit; inasmuch that, while he is communicating and they receiving these χάρισμα, the correspondent graces of the Spirit will be working on each side, and mutual edification and confirmation be attained; for such would seem to be the meaning of the disputed expression συμπαρακληθῆναι. Thus far in my former Editions; I now, on further consideration, add,—at any rate the interpretation 'consolationem,' though made the best of by Estius, is scarcely tenable. As to the sense 'cohortationem,' exhortation, assigned by Bucer and Calvin (which they justly prefer to 'consolationem,' as more suitable to the foregoing), it may be more difficult to understand its true meaning; though Estius admits that the sense is not to be disapproved, and is suitable to the modesty of Paul; q. d. 'ut mutue fidei communicatione invicem exhortemur,' referring to 1 Cor. xiv. 31. Hyper., too, thinks it may mean, 'ut communem exhortationem accipiamus, et in fide confirmemur.' But this involves so much harshness, that I should even prefer the sense, 'that I also may be comforted and strengthened.' That the two ideas do not blend well together,—and yet the terms στηρ. and συμπαρακλ., being placed in parallel, ought to do so,—is evident. In order, however, to effect this, nothing more is requisite than to take the παρακλ. in some such sense as will consort with the former; and in order to do this, we have only to retain our common Version, but in a sense often found in our old writers,—namely, 'comforted,' in the sense 'strengthened,' 'supported;' and παρακαλ. may well admit of that sense, since it is found in its derivative Παρακλητόν, as used of the Holy Spirit in John xiv. 16, where I have explained it, with Archdeacon Hare, not merely in the secondary sense, 'Consoler,' but in its primary one, 'Strengthenor,' or 'Supporter.' Such I believe to be the sense here, whether with any

n ch. 15. 23.
1 Thess. 2.
15.

o 1 Cor. 9.
10.
Acta 28. 2.
p Ps. 40. 10.
8 Tim. 1. 8.
1 Cor. 1. 18.
8 15. 2.

λοις πίστεως, ὑμῶν τε καὶ ἐμοῦ. <sup>13</sup> Ὁὐ θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, ἀδελφοί, ὅτι πολλάκις προθέμην ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς,—καὶ ἐκωλύθην ἄχρι τοῦ δεῦρο,—ἵνα † τινὰ καρπὸν σχῶ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν, καθὼς καὶ ἐν τοῖς λοιποῖς ἔθνεσιν. <sup>14</sup> Ὁ Ἑλλησί τε καὶ Βαρβάρους, σοφοῖς τε καὶ ἀνοήτοις ὀφειλέτης εἰμί. <sup>15</sup> οὕτω, τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ, πρόθυμον καὶ ὑμῖν τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελίσασθαι. <sup>16</sup> Ὁὐ

allusion to the Paraclete I would not pronounce. If it be said that we want an example of that sense in the verb itself, one may be found in 1 Thess. iii. 2, ἐπέμψαμεν Τιμ.—συνεργόν— αὐτὸ στήριξαι ὑμᾶς καὶ παρακαλεῖσαι ὑμᾶς περὶ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν: for though the sense there is usually explained 'to exhort you to perseverance in the faith,' yet that involves great harshness; and the sense I have proposed is far more suitable, and it is confirmed by 1 Pet. v. 10, καταρτίσαι ὑμᾶς, στήριξαι, σθενώσαι = παρακαλεῖσαι in the passage of Paul. And such may be the sense in 1 Thess. v. 11, παρκαλεῖτε ἀλλήλους καὶ οικοδομεῖτε. Indeed, I find I am not standing alone in this interpretation, since it was proposed long ago by the learned and judicious Expositor J. B. Carpz., in his work on this Epistle, where he remarks, 'Hoc in loco verbum παρακληθῆναι idem est ac præcedens στήριχθῆναι, suscitare et confirmare fidem. Rediteque omnis res ad mutuam fidei confirmationem.' The ἐν ἄλλ. and the συν. point at the help and edification being mutual.

13. What the Apostle says here, is, as Calvin, Hyper., and Bulling. point out, meant to anticipate the objection, 'Why, then, if you so greatly desired to see us, did you not come to us?' And this is introduced by a not unfrequent Pauline formula, intended to impress what is about to be said on the attention of those whom he addresses; for examples see my Lex. He says that the endeavour was not wanting, but the power and opportunity of carrying it into effect; because, as Calvin expresses it, 'a capto sæpe consilio impeditus (vel præpeditus) fuerit;' and that this hindrance had continued up to the present time. As to the hindrance,—that, Calvin remarks, is to be understood in no other way than because the Lord had cast upon him more urgent business elsewhere, which he could not omit without injury to the Church. In short, from chap. xv. 22, 23, we gather that the carrying out of his intentions had always been prevented by Providential circumstances, under which his intentions and wishes were overruled by intimations of the Divine will. And from v. 20 of the same chapter we may gather that he was partly prevented by his desire to preach the Gospel where it had not been preached before, rather than to build on the foundation of others. His purpose to come to them (he continues) was ἵνα καρπὸν σχῶ, where the καρπὸν cannot, according to its accustomed usage in the New Test., be thought to denote (as many suppose) personal advantage from his preaching to them, but, as Calvin, Hyper., and Est. ably show, that 'fruit' which the Apostles were sent to gather. See John xv. 16, and comp. with Phil. i. 22, and notes on both passages. The reading τινὰ καρπ. for text rec. καρπ. τινὰ, which I have received with almost all the recent Editors, on strong grounds, I find in all the Lamb. MSS., many Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16.

14. The connexion here is obscure, and diversely traced. One thing seems certain, that is, as Calvin and Hyper. are agreed, "Ratio ab officio Apostolico significat se ideo quoque diu desiderasse impartiri illis donum spirituale aliquod, quod propter officium Apostolicum ipsi id incumbere, utitur ea verborum forma, quæ declarat non posse hoc officium defugere, sed summo jure ad id præstandum obstringi;—'Debitor,' inquit, 'sum.'" Hyper. And so Calvin, 'Ab officio suo argumentatur, non esse sibi arrogantie dandum, quod aliquid docendis Romanis se valere confideret, utcumque et eruditione et prudentia et peritia rerum egregie excelleret: quoniam Domino viam esset, ipsum sapientibus quoque obligare.' Thus it is a developing of the idea in the preceding verses, as to his desiring to have some fruit among the Romans, as well as among other Gentiles. By his Apostolic office and duty he was 'a debtor,' and his wish was, to pay the debt, and by such change in the position he held by becoming a creditor, and thus be entitled to a καρπός. At any rate, ὀφειλ. εἰμ. cannot but denote, 'I am bound by my office, as Apostle of the Gentiles, to discharge my duty in that respect, and thus reap the fruits.' The term, as used both here and viii. 12, and Gal. v. 3, must denote one bound to the performance of any duty, by the power for its discharge being entrusted to him by Providence. Conf. Soph. Ajax 590. On the distinction between the two terms "Ἕλλησι καὶ Βαρβάρους" see Recens. Synop.; and on the origin of the latter appellation see the note at Acts xxviii. 2, 4. As to the question, here so warmly agitated by Commentators, whether by Βαρβάρους St. Paul meant the Romans to be included, it is a most frivolous one. The Apostle doubtless meant simply by "Ἕλλ. καὶ Βαρβ." to denote all nations, both civilized and uncivilized. So Joseph. Antt. xvi. 6, 7, τὸ δίκαιον δὲ πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις—λυσιτελέστατον ὅν Ἑλλήσι τε καὶ Βαρβάρους, and xviii. 1, 5. Thus the words following, σοφοῖς τε καὶ ἀνοήτοις (meaning, in the words of Pope, 'the savage and the sage') are added by way of explanation.

15. οὕτω, τὸ κατ' ἐμὲ, πρόθυμον] scil. ἐστι. The use of οὕτω here is very elliptical, and used as at Rev. iii. 16, οὕτως, ὅτι χλιαρὸς εἰ—μᾶλλον σε ἐμέας ἐκ τοῦ στόματός μου. 'Accordingly, so far as depends on me, it is my desire' (lit. 'there is to me a ready willingness, promptitude, alacrity').

16. οὐ γὰρ ἵπαισχύνομαι τὸ εὐαγγ.] This is not (what many have supposed) a mere Meiosis for 'I glory in the Gospel;' but, as Calvin observes, 'it is an anticipation of what might be said in objection to it;' suggested, we may suppose, by the association of ideas in writing the γὰρ ἐπαισχύνομαι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον [τοῦ Χριστοῦ]· δύναμις γὰρ <sup>g Hab. 2. 4.</sup> Θεοῦ ἐστὶν εἰς σωτηρίαν παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι, <sup>John 1. 36.</sup> Ἰουδαίῳ τε, <sup>ch. 2. 21.</sup> <sup>Gal. 3. 11.</sup> πρώτον, καὶ <sup>Phil. 3. 9.</sup> Ἑλληνι. <sup>Heb. 10. 32.</sup> 17 <sup>a</sup> Δικαιοσύνη γὰρ Θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ ἀπο-

words τοῖς ἐν Ῥώμῃ; q. d. 'I should not be ashamed of the Gospel of Christ even at Rome;' where riches, pomp, and glory are alone held in admiration, where the height of genius and learning are united with the grossest profligacy of manners; and where, consequently, the humbling doctrines of a religion, which demands severe self-denial, would be likely to excite derision, and might tend to make the preacher and professor of it as it were ashamed of it. The two γὰρ's refer, the former to his readiness to preach the Gospel at Rome, the reason of which was that he was not, as might be thought, ashamed of the Gospel even at the proud metropolis of the world; the latter, to his ready alacrity to preach it,—as it was incumbent on him to do, ὁφειλέτης ὢν,—every where, to all nations: and why? because it is the power of God unto salvation to every one of the human race that believeth, both to Jews and Gentiles. This fitly introduces the transition to the Apostle's grand theme—salvation to be obtained alone through faith in Christ.—The Χριστοῦ after εὐαγγ., absent from 6 uncial, and several cursive MSS., confirmed by the Pesh. Syr., Vulg., and Æth. Versions, and several Fathers, is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Internal evidence, too, is rather against it, for it may have been introduced as so often following εὐαγγ. But it may, as Matthæi suggests, have been removed because of the Θεοῦ following,—as if the Gospel of Christ were not the Gospel of God. However, from the next words, δύναμις Θεοῦ, it would seem that Paul here meant the Gospel, of which he speaks, to be viewed as the Gospel of God, and accordingly left τοῦ Θεοῦ to be implied. The expression εὐαγγ. τοῦ Θεοῦ is found supra i. 1, and infra xv. 16. 2 Cor. xi. 7. 1 Thesa. ii. 2, 8, 9. 1 Pet. iv. 17. Nevertheless, the paucity of cursives confirming the uncials—only 5 or 6 (for the alii multi of Scholz are of very little weight; and they are not absent from any Lamb. or Mus. copy, nor from Trin. Coll. B. x. 16) has forbidden me to follow the example of the above Editors.

—δύναμις γὰρ—πιστεύοντι] meaning (by Metonymy), 'For it is the powerful means appointed by God, as a field of agency to evince his power, for the salvation of all who believe and embrace it.' Thus the sentence comprehends two assertions; 1. of the complete efficacy of the Gospel to salvation; 2. of the extent of this efficacy, that it shall reach unto all who believe and obey it, without distinction of Jew or Gentile; i. e., as far as concerns the gracious design of God, alluded to in εἰς σωτηρίαν, it shall be universal. Those two form the great subjects treated of in the former part of this Epistle, in which all are proved to be under sin, and to need the righteousness of God (ch. i. ii. iii. 1—20); and the entrance into this righteousness is shown to be by Faith, iii. 20—v. 11. As to the δύναμις Θεοῦ, as regards its application not to εἰς κόλασιν, or ἀπολείαν, but, as here expressed, εἰς σωτηρίαν, as tending to and issuing in salvation, that is treated of at ch. v. 11—viii. 39.

17. δικαιοσύνη γὰρ Θεοῦ—πιστῶν] The difficulty found in fixing the sense of this verse has been occasioned by the brevity of the expression, and the extreme flexibility of the language; which seems susceptible of several senses, though only one can have been intended. One thing, however, is clear, that it being a confirmation, and fuller development, of the foregoing assertion, that 'the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation,' δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ must here mean the justifying righteousness which God bestows through Christ, as distinguished from that purchased by man's own works. This is clearly the sense intended by the Apostle; and hence to render it, as some have done, 'a righteousness of God's appointment,' is to weaken the force of the words, a passage in which the Apostle had for his purpose to propound, what forms the grand subject of the present Epistle, justification by faith.

—ἀποκαλύπτεται] The force of the term is either passed over, or perfunctorily treated, by most Expositors, though, considering that it ushers in a most weighty truth, it ought not to have been slurred over. It should seem that the Apostle employed the term with allusion to the deep mystery, unfathomable by man, revealed therein. The chief point, however, is, that the truth ushered in is promulgated from on High as a revelation from God, teaching men how God is pleased that the salvation of man shall be accomplished. The ἐν αὐτῷ evidently points at the Gospel, which, as Hyper. remarks, is considered as the 'instrumentum per quod Deus vult homines non modo institui in iis quæ ad salutem pertinent, verum etiam participes salutis aliquo modo fieri.' And Calv. well remarks, that this δικαιοσύνη, 'quæ fundamentum est salutis, revelatur in Evangelio: unde Evangelium dicitur potentia Dei in salutem. Ita a causa ad effectum ratiocinatur.' On the whole, the real sense of the phrase cannot, consistently with the context, be otherwise explained than, that justifying righteousness which God gives, as distinguished from that of our own works or deserts; and thus a meritorious, and even a saving excellence is revealed and promulgated by God as the sole ground of the sinner's acceptance, without reliance on any righteousness or merit of his own. In further unfolding the sense, no little difficulty meets us in the next words, ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν. In further tracing the sense, as carried out in the next words, the construction is uncertain; and among various senses which have been, and may be, assigned to the words (see Estius), there are few that have even a semblance of truth. It should seem that the reference of the words is to δικ. rather than to ἀποκ., though the two phrases seem meant for the two termini preceding, ἀποκ. and δικαιοσ.

Upon the whole, the most probable interpretation seems to be that of Theoph. of the ancient, and of the modern, Calv., Hyper., Melanct., Est., and others, by which it means, 'proceeding from faith, and going on to higher degrees thereof;' or, in other words, 'from faith imperfectly formed to faith fully developed, settled, καλύπτεται ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν, καθὼς γέγραπται· Ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται.

r Eph. 5. 6.

18 ἡ ἀποκαλύπτεται γὰρ ὁργὴ Θεοῦ ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ ἐπὶ πᾶσαν

and stable.' Theophyl. thus expresses it, ἐκ πίστεως ἦτις εἰς πίστιν πάλιν καὶ μείζων προκόπτειν ὀφείλει. Οὐ γὰρ ἀρκεῖ τὸ πρῶτως πιστεῦσαι, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς εἰσαγωγικῆς πίστεως δαὶ ἡμᾶς ἀναβαίνειν εἰς τὴν τελειωτέραν πίστιν, τὴν ἀμετέπειστον δηλαδὴ καὶ βαβαϊανίδρουν. Comp. 1 Pet. v. 9, στερροὶ τῇ πίστει, with 10, στήριξαι, θεμελιώσαι. And so (Ecumen.), according, at least, to the interpretation in which he finally acquiesces, ἐκ πίστεως τε ἀρχεται, καὶ εἰς πίστιν ὀφείλει λῆξαι. His other interpretation, ἀπὸ πίστεως ἀρχεται, καὶ εἰς τὸν πιστεύσαντα λήγει, is naught, since the last word is corrupt, and the true reading is probably πιστεύσαντα, founded on an ancient interpretation adduced by Thom. Aquin., 'ex fide præsens in fidem futuram,' i. e. 'in plenior visionem Dei.' However, the former is undoubtedly the true interpretation, and, besides that it is confirmed by the scope of the Apostle, it is quite agreeable to the context, and is confirmed by Ps. lxxiii. 7, πορεύονται ἐκ δυνάμει εἰς δύναμιν. Comp. Ps. cxliii. 13. Calv. well points out that εἰς πίστιν is added, 'quia quantum progreditur fides nostra, quantumque in hac cognitione proficitur, simul augecit in nobis Dei justitia, et quodammodo sancitur ejus possessio.' It is well remarked by Est., that 'the subjoined proof of what is said, drawn from the words of the prophet Habakkuk, shows that the above exposition is perfectly agreeable to the Apostle's intention in these words.' And he ably lays down the general sense of the words as follows: 'Vera justitia, quæ quis coram Deo justus est, in Evangelio, id est per Evangelii prædicationem, nunc passim omnibus revelatur, et clare annuntiatur: ea inquam justitia, quæ non ex lege, ut Judæi putant, neque ex viribus naturæ, ut Græci, sed ex fide comparatur, et ex fide continue nutriti, conservari, augeri et perfici debet. Hanc autem sententiam sic intellectam optime probat Apostolus per id quod sequitur.' As to the kind of proof, that will depend on whether the passage of Habakkuk was directly and literally prophetic of Christ and the Gospel, by, as it were, comprising the sum and substance of that Gospel in this sort of Axiom. Now Prof. Hoffm., vol. ii. 141, says much to prove this, especially in his concluding remark, 'faveat huic expositioni, tum quod impletio visionis, quæ Habbakuko obtigit, futura dicitur procul et in fine et tempore a Deo constituto, conf. Gal. iv. 4.' He further alleges, that the ancient Rabbinical writers interpreted the passage of the coming of the Messiah and faith in him. It might form such an Axiom as that above stated, since, as Hoffm. shows, from the Excerpta Gemaræ, the ancient Rabbins thought so highly of the passage that they said, that while David reduced the precepts of Moses to eleven, Isaiah to six, and Micah to three, and again Isaiah to two;—lastly came Habakkuk, and reduced them all to one, 'Justus fide sua vivet.' As to myself, I think it most prudent to acquiesce in the middle, and safe, view taken by Hoffman's erudite and able Editor Hengelmaier, expressed as follows:—'Sententia generalis est, quod, qui promissioni Divinæ fidem constanter habet, vivat: hanc propheta hominibus sui temporis applicat et Paulus repetit pari applicatione ad eos, qui promissioni Divinæ de justitia Evangelica fidem sint habituri. Immo a minori ad majus egregie argumentatur Apostolus: si fides in periculis temporalibus promissioni Divinæ adherens vitam servavit credentibus; quanto magis æternum vivent qui Evangelio Christi credunt, quæ potentia Dei est ad salutem omni credenti!' Nearly the same middle view is taken by Calv.; and, in fact, Hyper., who, though he adopts Hoffmann's view, yet concludes by remarking, 'Quocirca ad causam de salute per fidem Apostolus Propheta sententiam recte accommodat.'

18—XI. 36. Here we have the doctrinal Exposition of the above assertion,—that 'the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth in God; that its power lies in this, that it reveals the righteousness of God by Faith, teaches the doctrine of Justification by Faith.' As to the present Chapter, the sum of the argument is well laid down by Prof. Hodge, in the following analysis:—'The Apostle, having stated that the only righteousness available in the sight of God is that which is obtained by faith, proceeds to prove that such is the case. This proof required that he should, in the first instance, demonstrate that the righteousness which is of the law, or of works, was insufficient for the justification of a sinner. This he does, first in reference to the Gentiles, ch. i. 18—32; and then in relation to the Jews, ch. ii. iii. 1—20. The residue of this chapter then is designed to prove that the Gentiles are justly exposed to condemnation.' As to the connexion, somewhat disputed, the most natural one is with v. 17, 18, being, as Mr. Young supposes, 'a prefatory observation (introductory to the proof which follows of the inefficacy of the Law to salvation, in the case of the Gentiles) intended to show the reasonableness of the extension of the Gospel grace to them,—namely, because they must, in common with the Jews, stand before the judgment-seat of Christ.' It would, however, rather seem that this sentence was meant to serve as a connecting link between the general position at v. 17, and the proof at large of the necessity of this justification by faith only—from the inefficacy of the Law, whether of Moses or of nature, to save men; commencing with the latter. This connecting portion seems also meant to strike his readers with awe; by showing that in this revelation of salvation is included, by implication, one of destruction by Divine judgment to those who should not believe and obey the Gospel, and to intimate what would have been the case with all, had not the Gospel been promulgated.

18. ἀποκαλύπτεται γὰρ ὁργὴ Θεοῦ, &c.] This introductory clause supplies the reason for the foregoing assertion, that those only who were justified by faith could live; in other words, that no righteousness but that of God by faith could avail to man's justification; q. d. 'God is just;

ἀσέβειαν καὶ ἀδικίαν ἀνθρώπων τῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ
κατεχόντων. <sup>19</sup> Διότι τὸ γνωστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ φανερόν ἐστιν <sup>a Acts 17. 24.</sup>
ἐν αὐτοῖς· ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς αὐτοῖς ἐφάνερώσε <sup>b Ps. 19. 2.</sup> <sup>20</sup> (τὰ γὰρ ἀόρατα <sup>c Acts 14. 17.</sup>

men must be justified by faith; for the wrath of God (his righteous indignation against sin, and his determination to punish it) is revealed, i. e. promulgated. The expression ἀποκαλύπτεται is, however, not to be understood of revelation by the Holy Scriptures proclaiming the Law of Moses and of the Gospel; nor, perhaps, of that indirect revelation by the Law of nature, or the Moral Law, in the works of creation and providence, and in the conscience or moral sense, but, as appears from ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ, which is best conjoined with ἀποκ., denoting 'an open display of the purpose of God's providence revealed to all beholders, and as coming from heaven, open to the view of all; and also as a declaration, as it were, from the throne of God, and therefore announcing what must take place, and setting forth the punitive judgments of God to be exercised on the ungodly.' The main sense hence to be drawn being, (1) that God's providential purposes are revealed from on high, and therefore inevitable; and (2) that they are revealed in effect, by the punishments, judicially denounced against sin, taking effect in the condign punishment of the ungodly.

By ἀσέβειαν is meant 'impiety towards God,' lit. 'godlessness, living without God in the world,' by ἀδικία, 'injury and crime against men.' The former, as Hyper. observes, 'referring to sins against the first table; the latter, to those against the second;' as a proof of which the Apostle proceeds to enumerate in this very order the sins of the heathen world.

— ἀνθρώπων τῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ κατεχ. On the sense of these words two different views have been formed. Some, taking κατεχ. for ἔχοντες, suppose the meaning to be, 'having some knowledge of the truth, as far as holding it theoretically, but not living agreeably thereto, by carrying it out in practice.' Yet this, though a not inapt sense, is one not to be elicited from the words without straining them, especially by ascribing to κατεχ. a sense of which there is no proof that it ever existed. Accordingly, it is better to take κατεχ. with the ancient and many modern Expositors, as Hesych., Calv., Est., Carpz., and others, 'holding down,' 'keeping down the truth by hindering its development;' a use of the word found in Luke iv. 42. 2 Thess. ii. 6. 'Ἐν ἀδικίᾳ may be taken for ἀδικως, as Theophyl. of the ancients, and many modern Expositors, who regard it as a Hebraism; but that view rather tends to weaken and obscure the sense. It is better to retain the phrase in its full force. It may mean 'the practice of iniquity in our habitual evil-living.' But this is scarcely consistent with the foregoing ἀλάθ., and seems forbidden by the words following, which require that by τῶν must, as Hyper., Est., and Carpz. have fully shown, be meant the body of truth contained in natural religion, that portion of light which they held as rational agents, and which they wilfully, and therefore 'wrongfully' (ἐν ἀδικίᾳ, lit. 'by the practice of wrong and roguery') 'kept hid under a bushel.' How far, and in what way, the truth of natural religion had been 'kept down,' and prevented from being developed, by even those who had attained to them, has been ably shown by Hyper., Est., Cudw., Carpz., and Bp. Taylor, vi. 408, seqq.

19. διότι τὸ γνωστὸν—αὐτοῖς] These words form part of the same sentence, the Apostle commencing his proof of the heathen being justly chargeable, by showing that they have not the excuse of ignorance, seeing that they had a competent knowledge of the Divine character and attributes. Accordingly, he shows that they have sufficient evidence afforded them.

— τὸ γνωστὸν τ. Θε. may be rendered, 'what may be known,' lit. 'knowable,' of God, i. e. without the light of revelation, and solely by natural religion,—namely, the existence, nature, and attributes of God. This sense of γν. occurs often in Plato, and sometimes in Aristotle, and the other Philosophers; also in Soph. (Ed. Tyr. 361. Xen. Hist. ii. 3, 18; in Sept., Exod. xliiii. 16; and in the Greek Fathers. I see no necessity for the version which is propounded by Meyer, De Wette, and Alf., nor do I find it in Chrys. and Theodor., whom they allege. To render, 'what is knowable of God by the light of reason only, without revelation, is manifest in them,' is not 'asserting what was not the case,' unless the words are put to the torture of metaphysical sophistry. See Est., who assigns the above sense. In fact, the sense 'cognoscibilis' is required by the next step of the argument at τὰ γὰρ ἀόρατα αὐτοῦ, &c. So Hyper. explains τὸ γνωστὸν 'est illud Dei cognoscibile, nimirum quod de Deo sciri et cognosci potest, quantum denique homini est est, illis manifestum est.'—The words ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς α. ἔφαν. give the reason why it should be so,—'because God himself has manifested it;' i. e. 'made it manifest—evidently known.' See Est. Hyper. well remarks, that Paul adds ὁ Θεὸς—αὐτοῖς, lest any one should ascribe too much to human nature.

20. τὰ γὰρ ἀόρατα—θεϊότης] This is said by way of confirmation and explanation of the preceding. 'For as to his invisible (and spiritual) attributes, not discernible to mortal eyes;' q. d. 'These things, though otherwise invisible (see Wisd. xiii. 1—9,—a passage probably present to the mind of the Apostle), are yet seen, and ever have been from the creation of the world, by their manifestation to the world externally, and are sufficiently understood by the things which he hath created.' It is a fine remark of Aristotle, de Mundo, c. vi., πάση θεητῇ φύσει γινόμενος δειώρητος, ἀπ' αὐτῶν τῶν ἔργων θεωρεῖται ὁ Θεός: with which comp. Plato, p. 813, where God is termed οὐ βλεπόμενος, ὁ ἀόρατος, καὶ μόνῃ διανοίᾳ καταληπτός. Besides these, many other kindred sentiments of the heathen sages are adduced by Gataker on Marc. Anton. vii. 47, p. 277. It is remarkable, however, that neither he, nor, so far as I know, any others, have perceived the strong affinity of sentiment between this passage of St. Paul and that from the Wisd. of Sol. referred to above, xiii. 1—9, where, speaking of the heathens, as far as regarded the Fulgur, as opposed to the Philosophers, he says, αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου τοῖς ποιήμασι νοούμενα καθοράται, ἢ τε ἄιδιος αὐτοῦ δύναμις καὶ θεϊότης) εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτοὺς ἀναπολογήτους. <sup>21</sup> Διότι γνόντες τὸν Θεὸν, οὐχ ὡς Θεὸν ἐδόξασαν, ἢ εὐχαρίστησαν ἀλλ' ἐματαιώθησαν ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐσκοτίσθη ἡ ἀσύνετος αὐτῶν καρδιά. <sup>22</sup> Φάσκοντες εἶναι σοφοί, ἐμωράνθησαν <sup>23</sup> καὶ ἥλλαξαν τὴν δόξαν τοῦ

u Eph. 4. 7
v Deut. 4. 15,
&c.
Ps. 106. 20.
Wisd. 13. 23,
&c.
Isa. 40. 17,
18.
Acts 17. 20.

Μάταιοι γὰρ πάντες ἄνθρωποι φύσει, οἷς παρὴν Θεοῦ ἀγνοσία, καὶ ἡ τῶν ὁρμῶν ἀγαθῶν οὐκ ἴσχυσαν εἰδέναι τὸν ὄντα, οὐτε τοῖς ἔργοις προσχόντες ἐτέγγυσαν τὸν τεχνίτην, &c.—Ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου ἡ ἐκ ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου (Matt. xiii. 35), 'since the time of the creation of the world.'—Τοῖς ποιήμασι νοούμενα, 'being comprehended by the things which he hath created.' Comp. Wisd. xiii. 5, ἡ γὰρ μαγίστη καλλοῦσι κτισμάτων ἀναλόγως ὁ γενεσιουργὸς αὐτῶν (the original Creator of them) θεωρεῖται.—καθοράται, conspiciuntur, 'are discerned.'

—ἢ τε ἄιδιος—θεϊότης] This is said, by apposition, of τὰ δόρατα: and the meaning seems to be, 'his omnipotence, and the other attributes of his Godhead.' See Cudworth, Intell. Syst. p. 471.

—εἰς τὸ εἶναι α. ἀναπολ.] 'so that,' or 'wherefore, they are without excuse;' for, as Hyper. observes, we have an 'amplificatio acceptæ de Deo rebusque divinis cognitionis,' taking away the plea of ignorance. Comp. Wisd. xiii. 8, 9, πάλιν δὲ οὐδ' αὐτοὶ ἀσυγγνωστοί. Εἰ γὰρ τοσούτων ἴσχυσαν εἰδέναι, ἵνα δύνανται στοχάσασθαι τὸν αἰῶνα, τὸν τότε τῶν δισπότην πᾶς τάχιστα οὐχ εὖρον; How the Heathens were inexcusable, and how all natural religion, without revelation, can only render a sinner such, is shown in Dr. South's Sermon on this text.

21. The διότι here is co-ordinate with that at v. 19; and as at vv. 19, 20 we have the first proof of the Heathens hindering the truth concerning God by vice, so v. 21 presents the second proof thereof,—namely, that, with all their opportunities for obtaining a competent knowledge of the true God, they made no use of it, but were devoted to the basest idolatry: on this the Apostle treats at v. 25.—γνόντες must be taken with limitation, viz. 'knowing him (i. e. having the means of knowing him, John viii. 28) sufficiently to see his claim to be worshipped as God.'

—οὐχ ὡς Θεὸν ἐδόξασαν] The glorifying of God as God must consist in the thorough recognition of all his glorious attributes,—his eternity, power, wisdom, goodness, truth, justice, and mercy; and also in such a due consideration of all those attributes, in their various relations to us his creatures, as may induce us to render the homage of prayer and praise, faith and obedience. The words ἢ εὐχαρίστησαν are intended to point out the infinite obligations we owe by the infinite benefits we receive from the exercise of those attributes; consequently intimating to us the duty of rendering humble and hearty thanks; see Calvin, Hyper., and Est.

—ἐματαιώθησαν ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς, &c.] In ἐματαιώθησαν we have a very strong term, but one well suited to the purpose of the Apostle in this and the next two verses, which is by a yet further amplification on their folly and impiety, to show their utter inexcusableness.—ἐματ. means, 'they were befooled,' or 'infatuated;' the nature of sin, being not only to defile, but to infatuate. Comp. Eph. iv. 17. The latter clause is intended to represent the effect of what is denoted by the former; the meaning being, that as 'they entertained vain and degrading views of the nature and attributes of God and his worship; so, in consequence of this, and as its punishment (see ver. 28), their understanding, thus abused, became darkened.' So Dio Cass. p. 164, well says, "Ὅταν πάθημά τι τὴν ψυχὴν καταλάβῃ, θολοῦται, καὶ σκοτοῦται, καὶ οὐ δύναται καιρὸν ἐννοῆσαι. Theophyl. well explains, τοῖς λογισμοῖς τὸ πᾶν ἐπιτερεῖσαν, καὶ—μάταιοι ἡλίχθησαν, οὐ δυνήντων τῶν λογισμῶν πρὸς τὸ πέραν ἐξικίσθαι, meaning, in the words of our great epic Poet, 'Found no end, in wandering mazes lost.'

22. What is said in this verse is meant further to develop and explain the foregoing sentiment, and show the extent of that fatuity, and the cause of it, in the utter vainly and folly of their minds. Here the sense is, 'while arrogating to themselves the reputation of wisdom, they became befooled.' The Apostle seems to have had in mind Jer. x. 14. And as the passage of the prophet is especially on idolatry, so here there seems an especial reference to what was κατ' ἴσχιν, termed ματαιότης, namely, 'idol-worship;' see Acts xiv. 15, ἐμωράνθη πᾶς ἄνθρωπος ἀπὸ γνώσεως, a good rendering of the Hebr. עָרַב עָרַב לֵב עָרַב, the sense there being, as De Dieu has shown, that 'every man has become foolish, from the notion he has of his great knowledge and wisdom;' i. e. is made a fool by his [fancied] wisdom. The pretensions which the heathens made to wisdom will appear from the vain titles, as Wetst. and Kypke show, ascribed to those who were supposed to possess it; though they were not aware that its professors were too often only wise in vain speculation, and in their Ethical disquisitions, seeking virtue without finding it. Thus Hegesander ap. Athen. p. 162, speaks of the δοξοματαισοφοί and the ζηταρητιστάδαι.

23. καὶ ἥλλαξαν, &c.] meaning, 'they dishonoured the glorious nature of the incorruptible God, by representing him under the likeness of corruptible man, and birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things;' meaning, reptiles of every kind, not only serpents, but crocodiles and fishes, as in Egypt. A fine periphrasis of idolatry; in which, by a sort of climax, each successive term is stronger than the preceding, up to ἀρπατῶν. On the various particulars see Hyper., Calvin., and Est. The origin and progress of Pagan idolatry, which arose from men's proneness to ascribe the benefits they enjoyed rather ἀφθάρτου Θεοῦ ἐν ὁμοιώματι εἰκόνος φθαρτοῦ ἀνθρώπου, καὶ πετεινῶν καὶ τετραπόδων καὶ ἑρπετῶν. <sup>24</sup> Διὸ καὶ παρέδωκεν <sup>2 Pa. 12. 12. Acts 14. 16.</sup> αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς, ἐν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις τῶν καρδιῶν αὐτῶν, εἰς ἀκαθαρσίαν, τοῦ ἀτιμάζεσθαι τὰ σώματα αὐτῶν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς· <sup>25</sup> οἵτινες μετήλλαξαν τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν τῷ ψεύδει, καὶ ἐσεβάσθησαν καὶ ἐλάτρευσαν τῇ κτίσει παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα, ὃς ἐστὶν εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας! ἀμήν. <sup>26</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς εἰς πάθη ἀτιμίας. Αἷ τε γὰρ θήλειαι <sup>7 Lev. 18. 22. 23. Eph. 5. 11.</sup> αὐτῶν μετήλλαξαν τὴν φυσικὴν χρῆσιν εἰς τὴν παρὰ φύσιν. <sup>27</sup> Ὁμοίως τε καὶ οἱ ἄρσενες, ἀφέντες τὴν φυσικὴν χρῆσιν τῆς θηλείας, ἐξεκαύθησαν ἐν τῇ ὀρέξει αὐτῶν εἰς ἀλλήλους· ἄρσενες ἐν ἄρσεσι τὴν ἀσχημοσύνην κατεργαζόμενοι, καὶ τὴν ἀντιμισθίαν to the agency of such secondary causes, as fell within the range of their senses, than to that of a Supreme Providence, has been treated with a masterly hand by Perizonius professedly, and by Bp. Warburton incidentally in his Divine Legation. See vol. iii. p. 272, seqq.

24. παρέδωκεν—eis dk.] Several of the best Expositors, ancient and modern, are of opinion that this must signify 'permitted them to fall into' (see a similar passage in Acts vii. 42); meaning, that 'God gave them up to the gratifying of their lusts (they being so eager in the pursuit, as to listen to none of the warnings of reason and conscience), and to the dreadful consequences (pointed out in what follows) of such a course.' But that can hardly be permitted, either in correct Philology, or in sound Theology, as taught not only by Paul, but by the Evangelists. Prof. Stuart, indeed, is of opinion that the term παρέδωκεν 'neither denotes an active plunging them into sin, nor an inactive letting alone, but a leaving them to pursue their desires, without checking them by such restraints as he usually employs on those who are not yet hardened offenders.' But this middle view (purely gratis dictum) is liable to nearly the same objection as the former, in straining the plain import of the term. I see not how we can avoid coming to the conclusion, that the term is not merely permissive, but judicial, meaning that 'God not only permitted them to take their own evil course, but that he judicially delivered them over to the consequences, by withdrawing the restraints of his Providence and Spirit—gave them up to the dominion of their own wicked passions.' See Calv. and Est., who have ably treated this important topic.

25. This verse connects with ver. 23 (ver. 24 being, in some measure, parenthetical), and contains a repetition of the idea there found, but, as Hyper. remarks, further illustrated, being set in a stronger light by the antithesis between truth and a lie, the creature and the Creator.

—τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ Θεοῦ] Render: 'the true God'; abstract for concrete.—'Ἐν τῷ ψεύδει' is for eis τὸ ψεῦδος, 'into a lie,' i. e. a pretended God, an idol; for ψεῦδος, like the Hebr. קִשְׁפוֹ, denoted not only a lie, but any action which involved a lie. So in Philo, p. 678, is represented Moses, as, on seeing the golden calf, astonished to behold δσον ψεῦδος ἀπὸ θεοῦ ἀλη- θείας ἠπηλλάξαντο. Hence the term was very applicable to those lying vanities, idols; see Isa. xlv. 20. Jerem. xxiii. 14. In ισεβάσθησαν and ἐλάτρευσαν is designated every sort of religious worship and service, external and internal.—παρὰ τὸν κτίσαντα, 'to the neglect of (lit. to the passing by) the Creator;' preterito Creatore, as Hilary renders. To this the Apostle subjoins, what almost all Expositors term a doxology; as, they say, was usual with the Jews, on occasions where the honour of God was concerned; see Gen. ix. 26. xiv. 20. Gal. i. 5. Rom. ix. 5, et al. But doxology involves the idea of something too formal for the present occasion. At least where the honour of God is impeached, such words may rather be considered, with Hyper., Calv., and Gomar, as a natural outbreak of indignation, intended to set forth the heinousness of the offence, by contrast with the contrary duty.

26. As at ver. 25 we have a repetition and amplification of the sentiment at ver. 23, so in this and the next verse we have a repetition and amplification of the sentiment at ver. 24; in which, too, what was there said generally, is now drawn forth into particulars. And so at ver. 27 the Apostle again presents the idea, that this deep depravity of the heathen was the consequence and the punishment of their abandonment of God.

In addition to the evidence here adduced by Commentators from the Class. writers, as to the dreadful corruption of morals in the ancient world, it may be noticed that the disclosures lately made by the disinterment of Herculaneum and Pompeii, are such as fully to confirm and illustrate all that the Apostle says, or hints, on the tremendous abominations of even the most civilized nations of the ancient world. Indeed, the most civilized were those the deepest plunged into the mire of pollution; the barbarians being comparatively virtuous.

27. For ἀρρένες I now read, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., ἄρσενες, on strong authority, confirmed by nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and by internal evidence, as will appear from notes on Rev. i. 5, and Matt. xxvi. 35. It is unlikely that the Apostle would use both the forms in one verse; and considering that he has elsewhere used ἄρσ. only, why not here?

—ἀντιμισθίαν] 'retribution,' in the sense

ἦν ἔδει τῆς πλάνης αὐτῶν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἀπολαμβάνοντες. <sup>28</sup> Καὶ καθὼς οὐκ ἔδοκίμασαν τὸν Θεὸν ἔχειν ἐν ἐπιγνώσει, παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεὸς εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν, ποιεῖν τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα <sup>29</sup> πεπληρωμένους πάσῃ ἀδικίᾳ[, πορνείᾳ], πονηρίᾳ, πλεονεξίᾳ,

'penalty.' The word is rare, but found in Clem. Alex. and Justin Martyr. And we may compare ἀντίφρων in Æschyl. Ag. 39. By this ἀντιμισθίαν, considered as the penalty due to their πλάνῃ (or abandonment of the worship and service of the true God, and darkening that knowledge of his attributes and their own duties, which had been implanted by God in their minds and consciences), there is a reference to all the dreadful consequences, both physical and moral, which followed the practice of idolatry, and the abominations above adverted to, consequent on it.

<sup>28.</sup> καὶ καθὼς οὐκ ἔδοκίμασαν—ἐπιγνώσει] In the words ἔδοκίμασαν and ἀδόκιμον we have, as Calv. and Hyper. remark, an allusio or paronomasia, 'que æquam peccati et pene relationem eleganter indicat, et apte exprimit Divini iudicii æquitatem'; the sense being, 'As they did not choose to receive, or remain in, the knowledge of the true God,—God, in return, gave them up judicially to a perverse mind, which could no longer approve of any thing rightly.' Of this sense of δοκίμαζαι, 'to approve, care for, choose,' the most apposite examples are Jos. Ant. ii. 7, 4, τὰ δόγματα τούτων δηλῶσαι οὐκ ἔδοκίμασαν, and Phalar. Epist. p. 348, διότι οὐκ ἔδοκίμαζον δι' οὗ τοῦ πονηρίας λυπεῖν γῆρας πατέρες. The term, however, is then thus further developed, 'to have and keep God in their knowledge'; 'in other words, 'to retain the knowledge of the true God.' In short, the Apostle's aim is, to show their errors and sins to be voluntary, and consequently inexcusable. 'Wherefore (he says) God gave them up εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν, "mentem rejectaneam," "a mind judicially abandoned" to that depravity, which, however it may disapprove it, nevertheless, by God's preventing grace being withdrawn, it practices, being thus delivered to the evil which it had deliberately chosen.'

<sup>29.</sup> πεπληρωμένοι πάσῃ ἀδικίᾳ, &c.] Here follows an enumeration, κατὰ συναθροισμὸν, of the vices which were the natural fruits of the νοῦς ἀδόκιμος. In this list many Commentators trace, and others endeavour to introduce, either by change of position, or by forced interpretations and long parentheses, that regular order, in which they would have the whole expressed. But it should seem that the Apostle was here content to enumerate the vices of the Gentiles in a popular manner, as we find done in Wisd. xiv. 22—31; thus emphasizing and justifying the charges just made. On the practical importance of such enumerations Hyper. well remarks, 'in huiusmodi descriptionibus, in quibus præsertim plura enumerantur peccata, habet unusquisque speculum sibi propositum, in quo et sua vitia consideret et propriam imbecillitatem cognoscat, unde adlocatur ad implorandum Dei misericordiam, et peccatorum veniam propter Christum flagitet.' The difficulty found in ascertaining the exact sense meant to be expressed by the Apostle, arises from some of the terms being of considerable latitude, and from there being occasionally nothing sufficiently marked in the context to enable us to absolutely determine the sense by fixing it to one acceptation, to the exclusion of the rest; besides, that such ethical distinctions are difficult to manage, as being 'periculose plenum opus alicui;' yet we are to do our best, by the use of all the means which exact Philology and sound criticism can supply. 'Ἀδικία, with which the list commences, seems meant to denote iniquity in general; which is followed up by other terms more special. Πορνεία all the recent Editors cancel as not genuine, and arising from a var. lect. of the following word. But there is the authority of only sine MSS. and some inferior Versions and Fathers for its removal. And the evidence of Versions and Fathers is, in such a case as the present, of no great weight. Under such circumstances, internal evidence ought to be decidedly against the reading, to justify its removal. But that is not the case, since much may be said for as well as against the text. rec. It was likely that the Critics should stumble at the association of the two terms, where the former might imply the latter, and where a Class. writer would be very unlikely to use both. Nevertheless, the terms are associated by a Class. writer of the highest order, Æschin. c. Ctes. p. 84, where he mentions τὴν τοῦ Κτησιφώντος πονηρίαν καὶ πορνίαν. And why should we not suppose the combination adopted κατὰ παρανομίας, as a little after at φθόνον, φόβον—ἀσυνέτους, ἀσυνβίτους, and at Heb. xi. 37, ἐκράθησαν, ἐκπαράσθησαν, occasionally in the Old Test., Is. xxiv. 18, and the Class. writers, as Apul. Met. l. ix., 'mulier scæva, sæva; perversa, pertinax?' As to the change of order in some MSS., that might proceed from the endeavours of the Critics to introduce that regularity of plan which the Commentators are so fond of. However, internal evidence against the word must be admitted to exist, since it may have arisen from the Scholiasts, who might think this vice ought not to be absent from the catalogue; and hence brought it in from other passages; therefore I have placed the word in brackets. As to πονηρία, it is, indeed, obscure in sense. But if the terms which follow ἀδικία are to be regarded (as I still think they should) in the light of more special developments of the general idea, then it will be best to keep to the most comprehensive sense of which these terms are capable; in which case por. will be best explained after depravity of heart, Luke ix. 29, and kakia (like vitiositas in Latin) profigyacy of life, what is at James i. 21 denoted by περισσὴ κακίας. The intervening πλιν, denoting habitual rascality; as in Mark vii. 22. I Cor. v. 8, Menand. frag. xii. 8, and the above cited passage of Æschin., and is placed after πονηρ., exactly as in Luke ix. 39 it precedes πονηρίας in the similar words, γέμει ἀργαγῆς καὶ πονηρίας. As to κακία, it is susceptible of two senses.—either malitia, 'malignity,' as in Col. iii. 8. Tit. iii. 3. 1 Pet. ii. 1; or 'wickedness,' from depravity of heart, as issuing in lawlessness,—a term, κακία· μεστοὺς φθόνου, φόνου, ἔριδος, δόλου, κακοηθείας<sup>30</sup> ψι-

θυριστὰς, καταλάλους, θεοσυτείς, ὑβριστὰς, ὑπερηφάνους, ἀλα-ζόνας, ἐφευρετὰς κακῶν, γονεύσιν ἀπειθεῖς,<sup>31</sup> ἀσυνέτους, ἀσυν-θέτους, ἀστόργους, [ἀσπόνδους,] ἀνελεήμονας !<sup>32</sup> οἵτινες τὸ

Ἡσ. 7. 2.
Pa. 60. 12.

in that use, very fit to follow up the rest. The same use of κακία, as coupled with πονηρία occurs in 1 Cor. v. 8, and the terms seem taken exactly as here. Κακία also follows up some preceding terms denoting vices at Eph. v. 31, but in a different acceptation. 'Malitia' in the above sense occurs in the best Class. writers.

The next clause, μεστοὺς φθόνου—κακοηθείας, introduces another class of vices, consisting of evil dispositions. Of these the three first seem meant to form a group, φθόνου being placed in the middle, to point at the tendency of the other two; and the term μεστοὺς, on which see my Lex., is stronger than the πληρ., and is = to our vulgar term 'cram-full,' 'stuffed to the throat.' Render: 'stuffed up with envy and strife, even to murder.' As to the subjoined term κακοηθ., it may denote, as Kypke and Alf. think, and as I myself have thought hitherto, 'that evil disposition which,' according to Aristotle's definition, Rhet. ii., 'consists in viewing actions done by others in the worst light,' as opposed to εὐθυσία, 'unsuspecting candour.' But the notions of craft and guile, ascribed by Kypke, are not inherent in the term, nor to be found in the passages of Polyb. and Jos. cited by him. Besides, the term, so understood, does not well comport with the preceding terms. In short, I am induced to think, that the term was used (like ἀφροσύνη in Mark vii. 22, according to a probable interpretation) to give a colouring to the foregoing terms, intimating that evil dispositions are all blended with full purpose, and from an evil principle, yea, from the heart, the inner man. See Mark vii. 21—23, and note.

30. ψιθυριστὰς, καταλ. These terms are meant to be coupled (though wrongly separated by the verses),—the former, as Theophyl. observes, denoting 'secret,' and the latter 'open calumniators.' As to θεοσυτείς, it ought, according to Class. propriety, to denote 'hated by God;' but the Pesch. Syr. Version, and most modern Translators, render it 'haters of God,' which Calvin, with all the earlier modern Expositors, adopts, as being more agreeable to the context; and so Œcumen. thought. Yet the other is recognized by Theophyl., and is found in the Vulg. and Arab. Versions, and is probably, though not certainly, the true sense, as being called for by Philological propriety, and not unsuitable to the context. But it must not be confined to the calumniators, but extended to the other classes of profligate and abandoned persons, who were confessedly 'Deo odiosi.'

—ὑβριστὰς, ὑπερφ., ἀλαζ.

 These terms seem to form another group. They so far differ, that the first denotes insolence, as shown in gross abuse; the 2nd and 3rd, as evinced in contemptuous behaviour and contumelious words.

—ἐφευρετὰς κακῶν] This, we may explain, with Chrysostom, Theophylact, Theodoret, and Œcumen., 'persons who not only perpetrate all the known vices, but seek out and invent others.' So in 2 Macc. vii. 31, Antiochus is called πάσης κακίας εὐρετής: and Tacitus calls Sejanus 'facinorum omnium repertor.' As to the Virgilian 'scelerumque inventor Ulixes,' it is not to the purpose; nor the κακῶν εὐρεται of Philo, though quite akin to the Virgilian. The most important point is the fact, attested by Tacitus, Suetonius, and Plutarch, that there were in that age persons styled ἐφευρεται ἡδονῶν, who gained a livelihood by inventing new modes of producing sensual pleasure.

31. ἀσυνέτους is seemingly a Hebraism, to denote persons void of moral understanding, neglecting the true wisdom, and cleaving to sin, and so infra x. 19, quoted from Deut. xxxii. 21, with which comp. ἀφρων in Pa. xiv. 1. Job ii. 10.

In the terms which follow, ἀσυνθέτους—ἀνελεήμονας, there is some variety of reading, and much of interpretation. Many ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fathers have not ἀσπόνδους: which Griesb. thinks is very probably an interpolation; and Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel it. If that were the case, I should suspect ἀστόργους and ἀσυνθ. to be interchanged in position, which would keep the subject of disobedience to parents distinct from that of breach of contracts. And the omission in question may be ascribed partly to the scribes (ob homocoteleuton), and partly to the Critics, who thought the ἀσπόνδους useless after ἀσυνθέτους. But the words are not quite synonymous. Ἀσπ. may have reference to public, ἀσυνθ. to private life: or rather, ἀσυνθ. may mean breakers of covenants, and ἀσπ. those who enter into no treaties; i. e. inplacable, irreconcilable; and thus it will consort well with ἀνελεήμονας. However, I cannot but suspect that ἀσυνθέτους and ἀστόργους ought to change places; and although there be no direct authority in MSS. for this, yet there is indirect; since there is little doubt that in the archetypes of these very ancient MSS. which have not ἀσπόνδους, the word was written after ἀσυνθέτους. This also is countenanced by the very ancient MS. 17, and Theophylact. Besides, as ἀστόργους is so closely connected with γονεύσιν ἀπειθεῖς, ἀσυνέτους, it seems impossible to suppose that the Apostle would have taken the word out of its proper connexion, and inserted it between two other words, which are likewise closely connected, and by which there would thus arise an unnatural disruption.

Ἀνελεήμονας, pitiless, seems a step in the climax beyond ἀσπόνδους in the sense above inculcated. This the historians attest to have been the prevailing characteristic of the period in question all over the Roman empire. By ἀστόργους is denoted a want of the natural affection between children and parents respectively: of this the historians supply us with abundant evidence. And no wonder; for, as Bp. Sanderson observes, in his Sermon on Pa. xxvii. 10, 'although God has imprinted these natural affections in the hearts of men, in as deep and indelible characters as any other branch of the law of nature, yet, so desperately wicked is the heart of man, that if left to the wildness of its own corruption, it soon δικαίωμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐπυγρόντες, (ὅτι οἱ τὰ τοιαῦτα πράσσοντες ἄξιοι θανάτου εἰσιν,) οὐ μόνον αὐτὰ ποιοῦσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ συνευδοκοῦσι τοῖς πράσσουσιν.

a 2 Sam. 12.

Matth. 7 1.

II. 1 = Διὸ ἀναπολόγητος εἰ, ὃ ἄνθρωπε πᾶς ὁ κρίνων! ἐν ᾧ shakes off that also, and quite razes out all impressions of the law of nature.' See Calv. and Hyp. Most, however, of the later Commentators explain ἀστ. to mean inhuman, 'devoid of fellow feeling.' A view of the sense, which, though confirmed by Theophyl. and some ancient Versions, and however good in itself, seems not to be that intended by the Apostle. There is no need to desert the proper signification of the word, which is 'devoid of στοργή, or natural affection,' such as exists, or should exist, between parents and children; and, indeed, between all nearly related, either by consanguinity or by affinity, as husbands and wives. Thus the word is used to denote the being devoid of the στοργή existing between parents and children in Athen. p. 55, and of the being devoid of that which should exist between husbands and wives in Theocr. Idyll. xvii. 43. Plut. t. ix. p. 8. Upon the whole, I agree with Erasmi, Beza, Est., Grot., Koppe, and Benson, in understanding the term to denote 'those devoid, from being self-dissolved, of the feeling στοργή, or natural affection,' in its widest sense; and of the failure of the heathens in that respect there exists sufficient evidence. See Grot. and Justin Martyr Apol., cited by him. True is the remark of Augustin, de Civ. Dei, xiv. 9, that 'a good man ought to use the impulses of passion and affection as stimuli to the working of what is virtuous,'—especially considering that these are implanted in our nature in order to be used for that purpose.

With this description of the state of the Gentiles in the age of St. Paul may be compared the fine moral picture in Thucyd. iii. 82—84, of the state of society in Greece at the time of the Peloponnesian war, where see my notes; also in Philo-Judæus, p. 123, of the state of manners in the world during his age, both among Jews and Gentiles; where, among other particulars, he notices ἀσκήσεις ἀκρασίας, ἀφροσύνης μελέται· ἐπιτηδεύσεις αλαχρῶν, φθορά πανταλῆς τοῦ καλοῦ. See also Max. Tyr. Diss. xxvi. 2, Pausan. viii. 2, 2, and a very striking passage in Wisd. xiv. 23—26 (of the Gentiles), in which there are so many points of strong resemblance, that it seems probable that the Apostle had it in mind.

32. The Apostle now, as Alf. observes, 'advances to the highest grade of moral abandonment—the knowledge of God's sentence against such crimes with the contented practices of them.'

— τὸ δικαίωμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐπίγν. ] 'fully knowing the righteous sentence of God;' i. e. having it written by God on their consciences. By ἐπίγνόντες, the Apostle means 'such a sufficient knowledge of the great outlines of duty, as should render them inexcusable for neglecting it;' thus intimating that the crimes are not committed in ignorance, but with full knowledge; those who commit them being well aware of their turpitude, and that such crimes are forbidden, and the persons habitually committing them (for such is the force of πράσσειν.) liable to the highest penalty, like that of capital punishment. This is mentioned as an aggravation of their crimes: but another particular is subjoined besides, οὐ μόνον αὐτὰ ποιοῦσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ συνευδοκοῦσι τοῖς πράσσουσιν, where we have an amplification & minor ad majus; meaning, that they, not only,—hurried away by passion, and sudden temptation,—commit such sins, but that they are so devoid of all sense of moral virtue, that they even approve of the sins when committed by others, and like the persons the better for practising the same. 'Now,' as observes Dr. South (sermon on this text), 'it surely argues a higher degree of depravity to deliberately justify and applaud wickedness committed, than to commit it amidst the influence of violent passion. Therefore the guilt arising from a man's delighting in other men's sins, or (what is all one) in other men for their sins, is greater than he can possibly contract by a commission of the same sins in his own person.' A doctrine not unknown to the heathen sages. So Theophr. Char. Eth. xxix., in his fine sketch περὶ φιλοπονηρίας, first defines it 'the love of bad men and bad actions,—which implies the loving of the men for their bad actions,' and then, after vividly portraying this depraved taste, he concludes: καὶ τὸ ὅλον ἡ φιλοπονηρία ἀδελφὴ ἐστὶ τῆς πονηρίας. So also in Lysias, Or. p. 411, 6, we have τῶν αὐτῶν ἴσταιν ('it is a characteristic of the same persons') αὐτοὺς τε πάντα τὰ κακὰ ἐργάζεσθαι, καὶ τοὺς τοιοῦτους ἐπαινεῖν, 'and to approve of, commend such persons [as commit them].' The above view is, indeed, called for by the most exact exegesis of the term συνευδοκοῦσι, which, when used, which it very rarely is, as here, with a dative of person, signifies 'to approve of any action with another who commits it, to be pleased with it,' and consequently to like the person the better for committing it.

II. In this Chapter the position—that all are guilty before God, is proved concerning the Jews also, 1—16; and the first Section of it is occupied in carrying out the principle of ch. i. 18, thus developing those principles of justice, which commend themselves to every man's conscience;—1) That he who condemns in others what he doth himself, thereby condemns himself, v. 1. 2) That God's judgments are according to the true circumstances of every case, v. 2. 3) That the special goodness of God towards any people forms no ground of exemption from deserved punishment; but, being designed to lead men to repentance, it, when abused, only aggravates their condemnation, vv. 3—5. 4) That the grounds of judgment are the works, not the professions, of men, still less their external relations, as Jews, or Gentiles, vv. 6—11. 5) That the standard of judgment, is the light which men have severally enjoyed. In the first Section the practice of the Jews was only intimated (for the Apostle proceeds directly by gradually working on the Jew's conscience), but in the second Section, vv. 17—

γὰρ κρίνεις τὸν ἕτερον, σεαυτὸν κατακρίνεις· τὰ γὰρ αὐτὰ πρᾶσ-
σεις ὁ κρίνων. <sup>2</sup> Οἶδαμεν δὲ ὅτι τὸ κρίμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐστὶ κατὰ ἀλήθειαν ἐπὶ τοὺς τὰ τοιαῦτα πρᾶσσοντας. <sup>3</sup> Λογίζῃ δὲ τοῦτο, ὦ ἄνθρωπε, ὁ κρίνων τοὺς τὰ τοιαῦτα πρᾶσσοντας, καὶ ποιῶν
αὐτὰ, ὅτι σὺ ἐκφεύξῃ τὸ κρίμα τοῦ Θεοῦ; <sup>4</sup> ἢ τοῦ πλούτου <sup>b ch. 9. 23.
1st. 30. 18.
2 Pet. 2. 9.
16.</sup> τῆς χρηστότητος αὐτοῦ καὶ τῆς ἀνοχῆς καὶ τῆς μακροθυμίας καταφρονεῖς, ἄγνοῶν ὅτι τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰς μετάνοιαν σε ἄγει; <sup>5</sup> κατὰ δὲ τὴν σκληρότητά σου καὶ ἀμετανόητον <sup>c Dent. 32.
34.
James 5. 1.</sup>

29, there is a more direct reference to the Jews, in which it is shown that those who sin against higher degrees of knowledge imparted by revelation, must be more guilty than those who have offended merely against the law of nature; i. e. he plainly teaches the doctrine, that guilt is proportioned to the light that may have been manifested, and yet been abused.

1. διό] 'wherefore,' 'such being the case,' the conclusion comes out thus: 'Since it must be conceded that those who know the judgments of God against such vices as have been named, and still practise them,—yea, applaud others for doing so,—are worthy of punishment; it follows, therefore, that all who are so enlightened as to disapprove of such crimes, and who still commit them, are even yet more worthy of punishment.'

In τὰς ὁ κρίνων we have a mode of expression, in its indefinite form, well suited to the covert mode adopted by the Apostle, who chose to make the proposition general, though intended to be of particular application to the Jews.—ἐν ᾧ γὰρ, 'for wherein,' κρίνεις, 'thou sittest in judgment, pronouncing sentence' on τὸν ἕτερον, 'the other party;'—meaning the Gentiles.—σεαυτὸν κατακρίνεις. Such, indeed, Grotius observes, is a common law of all men. And this principle he illustrates from various Jurists, Historians, and Orators. Comp. the sentiment of Plato, p. 453, ἐν οἷς ἕτερον αἰτιάται, διαβάλλει ἑαυτὸν λήθην.—By παράσεις is meant, 'habitually committest.'

That the Jews did thus harshly judge the Heathens, is well known. See Tacitus, Hist. v. 5, cited by Wetst., and other authorities; and that the Jews were themselves defiled with the same vices as the heathens, on whom they sat in judgment, is proved by the testimony both of Josephus and Philo.

2. οἶδαμεν δέ] 'and yet we fully know.'—κατὰ ἀλήθ., 'according to true justice.' Comp. John iii. 21, and viii. 16; and see notes. 'The judgment of God according to truth and justice' is here adduced by way of glancing at the opposite, the inequitable, because partial, judgments of the persons in question; the Jews, who, while by summarily condemning others (the Heathens) excuse themselves: q. d. 'God's judgment is not thus partial, but true and unerring;' and, consequently, the sentence it passes cannot but be, as expressed in the next verse, inevitable; q. d. 'How can those escape, who commit the very things that they so harshly condemn in others?'

3. λογίζῃ δέ—τοῦ Θεοῦ:] The interrogation, ushered in as it is by λογίζῃ τοῦτο, is equiv. to a very strong negation. A forcible and animated and not unusual mode of speaking, in which an argument is pressed home, and grave expostula-tion is involved. So in Joseph. Antt. xviii. 6, 10, ἦπου λήσειμ με ὑπονοεῖς θανάτον τοῦ αὐτοκράτορος καταψινύσασμαι, ἀλλ' οὐ κεφαλῇ τῇ σῇ τοῦτον ἀναμαζάμηναι τὸν λόγον;

4, 5. Here the Apostle alludes to the common ground of security taken by the Jews,—that they were the seed of Abraham, 'the friend of God,' that they were God's peculiar people, and consequently he would not deal harshly with them. This might be proved and illustrated by various passages of the Rabbinical writers, and not a few from Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. The connexion is distinctly marked, and the objection forcibly put, by the Particle ἢ; q. d. 'Or, admitting the general principle, that those, who do what they condemn in others, are themselves exposed to condemnation; do you so abuse the Divine goodness, as to suppose it will afford impunity in sin, when its real design is to lead you to repentance?'

4. ἢ τοῦ πλούτου—καταφρονεῖς] 'H for as or an, as in 1 Cor. xi. 14. xiv. 36; introducing a new objection, as at iii. 29, et al. In τοῦ πλούτου τῆς χρηστότητος many recognise a Hebraism, for 'rich mercy.' Yet Grotius cites from Philo, ὑπερβολὴ τοῦ πλούτου τῆς ἀγαθότητος Θεοῦ, and Palairet., from Aristen., p. 10, ἀραιζομένην ὑπὸ πλούτου τῆς εὐσπλαγίας, and Simplic. on Epict. ὑπερβολὴ τοῦ πλούτου τῆς ἀγαθότητος τοῦ Θεοῦ. Thus there is no Hebraism; nor, indeed, any Hendiadyas; the sense being, 'the fulness,' or 'abundance of God's goodness,' as evinced in his forbearance and long-suffering.—As to καταφ., it denotes 'a reckless slighting of proffered mercy,' under the notion that it was not needed, inasmuch as no sin committed by any of the posterity of Abraham could finally deprive him of the divine favour.

—ἀγνοῶν] 'not knowing,' i. e. (as the context calls for) from self-produced blindness, and guilty ignorance. See Heb. v. 2, comp. with Hos. iv. 6. Τὸ χρηστὸν for χρηστότης: a very rare phrase, the nearest approach to which is in Eurip. Phœn. 1754, τὸ χρησίμων φρενῶν. The term here, ἄγει, should be rendered, 'is leading,' or 'drawing thee.' Comp. John vi. 44, where the ideas of 'leading' and 'drawing' are combined. The above interpretation is placed beyond doubt by Dionys. Hal. Ant. xi. 14, where Claudius, after a long and eloquent oration to the senate, has these words: πολλὰ—λέγειν ὀκνῶ. εἰ μὲν γὰρ ἐπὶ τὰ κρείττετα βουλευόμενα ὁ Θεὸς ἄγει με (Appian), καὶ πάλιν ταῦτα τῶν Ἰανῶν εἰρηκα· εἰ δὲ ἐπὶ τὰ χείρω, διακινῆς καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ ἔρω, where the present tense is employed with allusion to the counsel and purpose of God's Providence. See more in Calvin and Hyper.

d Job 34. 11.
Ps. 62. 12.
Jer. 17. 10.
N 22. 19.
Matt. 16. 27.
Rom. 14. 12.
1 Cor. 3. 8.
2 Cor. 5. 10.
Rev. 22. 12.
e Job 34. 12. 2 Thess. 1. 8.

καρδίαν, θησαυρίζεις σεαυτῷ ὀργὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ὀργῆς καὶ ἀποκαλύψεως δικαιοκρισίας τοῦ Θεοῦ, <sup>6</sup> δὲ ἀποδώσει ἐκάστῳ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ <sup>7</sup> τοῖς μὲν καθ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ, δόξαν καὶ τιμὴν καὶ ἀθάρασιαν ζητοῦσι, ζῶνι αἰώνιον <sup>8</sup> τοῖς δὲ ἐξ ἐρι-

At ver. 5 the Apostle argues, that such hardened neglect of God's long-suffering, by obstinate impenitence, would only serve greatly to aggravate their condemnation, by an accumulation of the grounds of punishment at the day of God's righteous wrath and vengeance. Comp. Zeph. i. 15 (a passage probably present to the mind of the Apostle), ἡμέρα ὀργῆς [ἴστων] ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη, &c., and ii. 2.—ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ὀργῆς stands for sic ἡμέραν ὀργ., an idiom found in Mark i. 16. iv. 18. John v. 4, and often elsewhere. Its use here is confirmed by all the ancient Versions, except the Vulg. and all the ancient Commentators; likewise every modern Expositor, until arose the novelty of taking it for 'in' or 'at the day,' broached by two or three German Expositors, and caught up, as something choice, by Mr. Alf., though it involves intolerable harshness. Even Est. directs the Vulg., 'in die,' to be taken for 'in diem,' which is read in the most ancient MSS., and may be the true reading. The words have been rightly referred by all Expositors, except a few recent ones, to θησαυρ., on the force of which see my Lex. The next words καὶ ἀποκαλ. δικαιοκρ. τ. Θεοῦ are exegetical of the preceding, and are a sort of periphrasis of, and characterizing the Divine judgment.

6—11. On the substance of this Section see the analysis, supra v. 1. But I would further remark, that this portion was intended not solely to describe the nature and ground of the judgment just mentioned, and show its justice; but was introduced partly in order to engraft on the description of God's impartial justice to individuals his impartial justice to nations, which is skillfully brought in at vv. 9—11.

6. δὲ ἀποδώσει—ἔργα]. 'Hoc est enim (says Est.) justum exercere judicium.' Of course, the τὰ ἔργα must mean 'opera omnia ejus, tam bona quam mala,' as Est. says, who adds, 'omnia quidem prorsus et bona et mala, quaecumque quis fecerit, in illo judicio proferentur in lucem, et (ut humano more loquar) examini subicientur.' As to the retribution, the Apostle is, as Alf. remarks,—and as Hyper. and Bulling. long ago saw,—speaking generally, i. e. of the general system of God's governing the world—the judging according to each man's work, punishing the evil, and rewarding the righteous. At any rate, no argument can ever hence be adduced to support the Romanist view, as to the merits of man's works; for, as Calv. observes, though the passage does say that good works will have a reward, yet it by no means pronounces 'quid valeant, vel quid illis debeatur pretii.' It was not necessary for Paul here to consider the point in question, since it is, further on, broadly asserted that 'by works of law no man can be justified before God.' The principle which in the preceding verse is stated generally, is in this and the next two verses applied particularly to the two classes—first, as here, to the righteous, of whom the present contains a designation of their character, and the retribution which God will, of pure grace, deal out to them.

7, 8. In these verses the principle stated generally in the preceding verse is applied specially to the two great classes of men,—the righteous and the wicked; the former of whom are designated at v. 7, the latter at v. 8; and here τοῖς καθ' ὑπομονὴν ἔργου ἀγ., construed with ζητοῦσι, stands for ἐφ' ὑπομονῇ ('by patient perseverance in') ἔργων ἀγαθῶν: the singular, as denoting the genus, being (as often) put for the plural; see ver. 15. infra xv. 58. 1 Thess. i. 3. 2 Thess. ii. 17. The terms δόξαν and τιμὴν are by most Commentators regarded as synonymous, but conjoined to strengthen the sense; of which several examples are adduced by Wets. from Thucyd., and other writers. But in them the two terms are not quite synonymous; the former denoting the honour and dignity assigned to any one; the latter, the glory thence resulting. Καὶ ἀθάρασιαν is added by way of raising the idea to its height: q. d. 'even immortality of honour and glory.' Thus the idea is raised as far above whatever this world can supply, as immortality exceeds the longest life; and thus fulfilling the most ardent wishes of man: for, according to the sentiment of an ancient writer, cited by Grot., ἀν τοῖς θεοῖς ἀθάρασιαν εὐχεται τυχέειν, τῇ ἀθανασίᾳ κρείττον οὐδὲν εὐχεται. It is, however, to be borne in mind, that such modes of expression as these are not to be pressed upon, as if the persons in question are to be supposed to seek for aught more exalted than to see God, and to be with God and Christ; but they are to be regarded (as Calv. and Hyper. suggest) in the light of periphrases descriptive of beatitude, accommodated to human views, feelings, and language, yet capable of salutary application to things spiritual and eternal.

8. τοῖς ἐξ ἐριθείας]. Supply οἱ, for τοῖς ἐρχοῦσι, i. e. ἐριστικοῖς; as in the expression οἱ ἐκ πίστεως and οἱ ἐκ νόμου, the sense being, 'to those who are stubborn and rebellious, disobedient to the truth; those who 'instead of obeying truth and holiness, yield obedience to unrighteousness and sin.' The sense, however, involves no little harshness; and I am half inclined to agree with Ruckert, Meyer, and Alf., that ἐριθεία is not derived from ἐρις, but from ἐρι-θος, 'a hired workman;' whence ἐριθύνω, whence ἐριθεία, properly 'to work for hire,' but metaphorically and generally, 'ambitum exercere,' used principally of official persons, who seek their own purposes in the exercise of their office; and hence ἐριθεία, 'ambitum,' 'self-seeking,' 'greed.' The above Expositors, indeed, adduce not an atom of proof (yet why not do something? Even 'poach in Suidas for unlicensed Greek'), and in point of fact as to the derivation and the sense they assign, they might have done so by reference to that Lexicographer, who explains ἐριθύνεσθαι by δακτύλιον, and ἐριθείαν by μισθαργίαν. And so Phavorinus, Eclog. p. 59, explains ἐριθύνω by δούλεω, 'serving for pay;' and ἐριθεία by δούλην, adding that it is derived from ἐριθος, 'a hireling,' and ἐριθος, for 'a hired workman,' especially 'weaving' or 'spinning;'

θείας, καὶ ἀπειθοῦσι μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, πειθόμενοι δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, θυμὸς καὶ ὀργή·<sup>9</sup> θλίψις καὶ στενοχωρία ἐπὶ πᾶσαν ψυχὴν ἀνθρώπου τοῦ κατεργαζομένου τὸ κακόν, Ἰουδαίου τε, πρώτον,

so Apoll. Rh. i. 917, ἡ χαρῆς ἱριθός, and so ἱριθίως occurs, and so Heliod. Ethiop. i. 5, p. 9, αἱ γυναῖκες ἱριθούσαι, 'are spinsters.' But we may well demand that some example of the figurative sense here propounded 'self-seeking,' 'greediness,' should be adduced. Alf., indeed, points to one in Ignat. ad Phil. § 8, where he opposes ἱριθ. to Χριστομάθεια. But that passage rather confirms the ordinary interpretation, the word Χριστομ. being formed on Col. iv. 20, ὑμεῖς δὲ οὕτως ὡς ἐμαθεῖτε τὸν Χριστόν, and the word ἱριθ. used with allusion to Phil. i. 16, ὁ μὲν ἐξ ἱριθείας, and ii. 3, μὴδὲ κατ' ἱριθείαν. Unless, indeed, Ignat. wrote Χριστοπάθεια, in tacit allusion to αὐτοπάθεια: and thus Ignat. may have used ἱριθ. in the sense which Alf. contends for, 'self-seeking' (and —μαθ. and —παθ. are perpetually confounded by the scribes); but it is more probable that the usual reading is the true one; and on the whole it would seem best to leave the interpretation here an open question. Conyb. adduces the use of ἱριθ. οἰκιστῶν, in Aristot. Polit. v. 3, for 'intriguing partisans.' But that passage rather confirms the sense found in 2 Cor. xii. 20. Gal. v. 20. Phil. i. 17. ii. 3. iii. 14, 16, and has nothing to do with the 'selfish cunning' assigned by Mr. Conyb. to the passage before us. That it bears any analogy to our word job is past my comprehension. By ἀλήθεια is here meant 'true doctrine,' embracing the truths both of natural and revealed religion; see sup. i. 18; for what is said in this verse is meant for Jews as well as Gentiles. It has, indeed, been disputed whether the expressions ἀπειθοῦσι μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, and πειθόμενοι δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ are to be understood of opinions, as Mey., de Wette, and Alf. think, or of dispositions and actions. The latter view is preferable; especially as being confirmed and illustrated by John iii. 21, and viii. 44. And thus ἀπειθεῖν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ will denote (with Calv.) 'to be indisposed to do what is lawful and right.'

At θυμὸς καὶ ὀργή what is supplied from the context ἵσταται (for ἀποδοθήσεται); though grammatically there is an anacoluthon. There is great force in the expressions θυμὸς—στενοχωρία, probably suggested by Ps. lxxviii. 49, Sept. ἐξαιτίσταις αὐτοῖς ὀργὴν θυμὸν αὐτοῦ, θυμὸν καὶ ὀργὴν καὶ θλίψιν. Calvin truly remarks, that 'of these four particulars the two latter are, as it were, the effects of the two former; and that in each pair the sense in the first term is intended to be heightened by the second; the import of the former being 'extreme anger;' of the latter, 'intense anguish.' I have only to object to the definition of the former pair, inasmuch as it proceeds on the common error of supposing a Hendiadys, and thus supposing that it involves a periphrasis; as if it were merely equiv. to θυμὸς τῇ ὀργῇ at Rev. xvi. 19; for even in that phrase, as Tittm. has observed (Syn. p. 132), the Genit. grammatically dependent on the former noun mostly 'rei describendi et amplificandi potius quam eidem motioni augendæ inservit,'—the very case here; for of the two nouns here in question, θυμὸς and ὀργή, they, although synonymous, yet essentially differ; not, however, in the way pointed out by the common herd of Grammarians, as Ammonius, whose dictum is, θυμὸς μὲν ἵστι πρόσκαιρος· ὀργή δὲ παλινχρόνιος μαθησιακία. Others, indeed, with some experience in the usage of the best writers, qualify the Canon, by admitting that the distinction is not perpetually observed. No wonder! because it is founded on error and falsehood,—the truth being that pointed out by Tittm. ut supra,—namely, that θυμὸς differs from ὀργή in this, that θυμὸς (ἀπὸ τῆς θέσεως καὶ ζήσεως τῆς ψυχῆς, as observes Plato) denotes 'the mind roused to anger;' but ὀργή 'the emotion of indignation, issuing in the desire to avenge oneself.' In which view Zeno, ap. Diog. Laert. vii. 113, well says, ἵστι ἐπιθυμία τιμωρίας τοῦ δοκούντος ἡδικῆσθαι οὐ προσκόντως. Here we may see how accurately, and even philosophically, the words are conjoined, and placed in the very position which exact propriety would require. But not so thought the Alexandrine Critics, who have been here busily employed, as in thousands of other passages, in improving the phraseology of the Sacred writers, and who, according to the knowledge they had derived from Ammonius, Phrynichus, and others, made the words to change their position by writing ὀργή and θυμὸς, as required by Ammonius' Canon and that found in Phrynichus; and accordingly they brought in ὀργή καὶ θυμὸς, which we find in A, B, D, E, G, and six cursives, confirmed by the Syr., Ital., and some other Versions, and some Fathers. Scholz, indeed, adds et alii, repeated by Tisch. and Alf. But the alii were purely imaginary. No others are on record, except one of Matthæi's copies, of mean note, f; and I cannot add one; for all the Iamb. and Mus. copies have the usual order, which, for the reasons above mentioned, can hardly fail to be genuine. I need scarcely add, that ancient Versions and Fathers, in a case like this, are of very little weight. Nevertheless, our Critical Triumphs, thinking themselves wiser than Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz, have unhesitatingly received the reading.—As to the phrase θλίψις καὶ στενοχω. it occurs in Artemid. On., and θα. καὶ ἀνέγκη in 2 Cor. vi. 4. 1 Thess. iii. 7. Of course, as in the former pair, the nouns are better kept apart; yet the distinction made by Meyer and Alf., that θα. signifies 'the outward weight,' or objective infliction, and στενοχω. the subjective feeling of the pressure, is, however ingenious, purely hypothetical. The simplest mode is to regard the second term as (by a climax) the stronger of the two, as is certainly the case in Artemid. i. 79. ii. 3, 37, 50. iii. 57, 59; and in Arrian, Epist. i. 25 and 28, αὐτοῖς θλίβουσι καὶ στενοχωροῦμεν. The terms differ as our English 'to be pinched by narrow circumstances,' and 'to be so straitened as not to be able to provide oneself.'

9. πᾶσαν ψυχὴν ἀνθρ.] A form of expression occurring in Sept. Deut. xxiv. 7. Lev. v. 1, 2. Num. xix. 11, 13, and infra xiii. 1. Acts ii. 1, 3, but used here for the sake of emphatic impressiveness.

—κατεργαζ. τ. κ.] The κατα is intensive; C<sup>2</sup>

f Deut. 10. 17. Gal. 2. 6. Eph. 4. 9. Col. 3. 25. 1 Pet. 1. 17. g Luke 12. 47. h Matt. 7. 21. James 1. 22. 25. 1 John 4. 7.

καὶ Ἕλληνας<sup>10</sup> δόξα δὲ καὶ τιμὴ καὶ εἰρήνη παντὶ τῷ ἐργαζο-μένῳ τὸ ἀγαθόν, Ἰουδαίῳ τε, πρῶτον, καὶ Ἕλληνι.<sup>11</sup> Οὐ
 γὰρ ἐστὶ προσωποληψία παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ.<sup>12</sup> ὅσοι γὰρ ἀνόμως ἤμαρτον, ἀνόμως καὶ ἀπολούνται· καὶ ὅσοι ἐν νόμῳ ἤμαρτον, διὰ νόμου κριθήσονται,<sup>13</sup> (ὁ οὐ γὰρ οἱ ἀκροαταὶ τοῦ νόμου and the literal sense is, 'worketh out,' 'bringeth about.' Comp. Lat. perpetro; and, like that term, is, when applied to actions, almost always used of what is evil (though in Plut. t. vi. 130, cited from Eurip., we have πλούτῳ ἀρετὰν καταργασίῃ), as we use our 'to commit.' But here, where the Present tense is used, denoting 'the habit' of the person, we may best render by 'practiseth.'

10. Ἰουδαίῳ τε, πρῶτον) 'first in order' (supra i. 16, and note), 'first in responsibility,' as resulting from his greater opportunities.

We have here the converse of the preceding verse, forming a sort of resumption of what was said at v. 7. But to δόξα and τιμή, there is here subjoined εἰρήνη instead of ἀφθ., as being better adapted to the antithetical expressions θλίψις καὶ στενοχωρία; while it yields the same sense; as denoting that peace and reconciliation with God, by which all other blessings are crowned; forming a foretaste in this life of that future state of felicity, 'where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'

11. In the weighty words contained in this verse the Apostle means not only to give a reason for what he has just said, but also to anticipate a latent objection on the part of the Jews, as if by so speaking he had given them no such advantage over the Gentiles, as they thought themselves entitled to. To this the reply is, that ['it is right so to do,] for there is no respect of persons with God.' Accordingly, the words form not only a confirmation of what has preceded, but serve as a transition to what follows. On προσωποληψία see my Lex. in v., also in πρόσσωπον.

12. ὅσοι γὰρ ἀνόμως ἤμαρτον, &c.] This verse is confirmatory and exegetical of the preceding, and that, as Prof. Hodge remarks, 'by the exhibition of the important principle evolved up to v. 16, that men are to be judged by the light they have severally enjoyed; the ground of judgment being their works, the standard of judgment their knowledge.' It is a question whether ἀνόμως means 'without law,' or 'without the law of Moses.' Most all Expositors adopt the former view; but the latter is maintained by the recent German Commentators and Alf. Of course the subsequent ἐν νόμῳ and διὰ νόμου must be taken as if ἐν τῷ νόμῳ and διὰ τοῦ νόμου were written, the word following a Proposition permitting it. The former view is maintained with his usual ability by Bp. Middleton; to whom the reader is referred. On a point of Philology with which the learned Prelate was so conversant, he was likely to be right; and, as far as the course of argument goes, it seems competently made out. And it is confirmed by the suffrage of Professor Hodge, in his analysis of the course of argument. Nevertheless, there is much semblance of truth in Mr. Alford's representation of the course of argument,—namely, that 'it is on that very undeniable assumption, that all who have had a law given shall be judged by that law,' that the Apostle constructs his argument, asserting it with regard to the Mosaic law in the case of the Jews, and proving that the Gentiles have had a law given to them in the testimony of their consciences. 'Besides,' he adds, 'these verses are no general assertions concerning men who have, and men who have not, a law revealed (for all have one), but a statement of the case as concerning Jews and Gentiles.' The reader must judge for himself on what I regard as an open question.—The two terms κριθῆς. and ἀπολ., both represent result; the former issuing in condemnation, the latter in condign punishment by destruction; not, however, as observes Professor Hodge, that any are doomed to perish, for the Apostle is not speaking of the destiny of either Jews or Gentiles by being judged, but of the rule by which men at large will be judged.

13. This verse is explanatory of the former, as assigning the reason for the declaration in the last clause; and the correct sense will depend on which of the two views propounded of the former be adopted. Mr. Alf. (with Lachm. and Tisch.) edits οἱ ἀκροαταὶ νόμου and οἱ ποιῆται νόμου, and yet renders 'hearers of the law and doers of the law;' and remarks in his note, that 'with the omission of τοῦ νόμου in both places, the whole elaborate and ingenious criticism of Bp. Middl. on its use falls to the ground.' Be it so; but surely it is reasonable to inquire on what authority the Article has been removed? Simply on the testimony of MSS. A, B, D, E (1st time), G, and 2 cursives,—31 and 46; to which Scholz adds et alii, repeated by Tisch. and Alf.; but, from what we have seen on former occasions, the good Professor's et alii cannot come into count. And, indeed, of the two cursives only, the principal, No. 31, (the Covell 2,) only omits the τοῦ in one of the two phrases; and all the Lamb. and Mus. copies have the τοῦ. So that, upon the whole, the external authority amounts to only 7 MSS., and of those two only omit one of the two times; very insufficient authority; espec. since internal evidence is in favour of the word; for the Article was far more likely to be omitted by the carelessness of the scribes, than to be inserted by Revisers or Critics. Accordingly, Bp. Middleton's elaborate criticism does not fall to the ground, except in the imagination of Mr. Alf.—But, to turn from verbal criticism to matter of fact, it is well observed by Professor Hodge, that 'though this verse, with the 14th and 15th, form a parenthesis, as is evident from the 16th, which requires to be immediately connected with the 12th, yet they are intimately related to what immediately precedes. The 13th is the ground of what is asserted in the last clause of the 12th, viz., that 'those who have sinned under a law shall be condemned by it;' and ver. 14, 15 are the ground of the assertion, that 'those who have sinned without a revelation shall yet be punished; because, though they have no [revealed] law, they are a law unto themselves.'" δίκαιοι παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ· ἀλλ' οἱ ποιηταὶ τοῦ νόμου δικαιωθήσονται.

 14* Όταν γὰρ ἔθνη τὰ μὴ νόμον ἔχοντα φύσει τὰ τοῦ νόμου ποιῇ, οὗτοι, νόμον μὴ ἔχοντες, ἑαυτοῖς εἰσι νόμοι· 15 οἵτινες ἐνδεύ-νονται τὸ ἔργον τοῦ νόμου γραπτὸν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, συμμαρτυρούσης αὐτῶν τῆς συνειδήσεως, καὶ μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων τῶν λογισμῶν κατηγορούντων ἢ καὶ ἀπολογουμένων,) 16 ἔν ἡμέρᾳ ὅτε κρινεῖ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ κρυπτὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου, διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

17] * Εἰ δὲ σὺ Ἰουδαῖος ἐπονομάζῃ, καὶ ἐπαναπαύῃ τῷ νόμῳ,

14. In this verse an objection is anticipated and overruled. It might be replied, that the Gentiles have no revelation, and therefore this cannot apply to them. To this the answer is, that the Gentiles have a law as really and truly as the Jews, written, though not on parchment, yet on the tablets of their hearts. (Stuart.)

—φύσει] meaning, by the instinctive sense of right and wrong, supplied by the light of reason and conscience, as opposed to the dictates of law. So Aristotle, Eph. v. 10, opposes the φυσικὸν to the νομικόν.—By τὰ τοῦ νόμου we are to understand 'the moral dictates enjoined by the Law.'—ἑαυτοῖς εἰσι νόμοι: meaning, 'they, by the dictates of reason and conscience, have a law supplied to themselves.'

15. οἵτινες ἐνδεύονται—ἀπολογούμενοι] These words are meant to establish and illustrate the foregoing assertion. Οἵτινες may be rendered, 'quippe qui.' Render: 'inasmuch as they evince the effect of the [revealed] law,' what it would have produced, what is tantamount to it. Comp. Aristotle, Rhet. i. 15, 6, νόμοι ὁ γαργεμμένοι οὐ ποιεῖ τὸ ἔργον τοῦ νόμου. Thus also Diogenes Laert., in his preface, says the barbarians have the ἔργον τῆς φιλοσοφίας, though destitute of the express form of it. Chrys. here enumerates three kinds of law, 1. the ἀγραφοὶ νόμοι of reason and conscience; 2. the νόμοι γαργεμμένοι, or the civil law of each country (see Arnold on Thucyd. iii. 37, 3), and the law ἐν ἔργοις, the same thing in essence, though without the express form thereof, as in the case of barbarous nations. The inward law here mentioned is evinced to be in the case of Gentiles, by their actions; and its existence is further shown by the testimony of their conscience confirming that of their actions. Conscience is here considered as a witness, bearing testimony for or against the deeds of the man, and in the latter case acting as accuser. Comp. Juven. Sat. xiii. 198, and John viii. 9, seq. with Wisd. xvii. 11.

By γραπτὸν is meant, 'deeply imprinted,' like the characters traced with the iron style on the waxed tablets of the ancients. The metaphor is found both in the Old Test. and the ancient writers in general. So Æschyl. Prom. 814, ἢ ἐγγράφου σὺ μνήσιν δέλτοις φρενῶν. In the words γραπτὸν ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, the Apostle had probably in mind Jer. xxxi. 33 (quoted by him at Heb. viii. 10), διδοὺς δόσω νόμον μου ἐν τῇ διανοίᾳ αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐπὶ καρδίᾳ αὐτῶν ἐγγράψω αὐτούς.

—συμμαρτυροῦσης αὐτῶν τῆς συνειδ., &c.] This is explanatory of what precedes, presenting two confirmations of what was before said, that the demands of the moral law are inscribed on the heart of man in a state of nature: the meaning (as Professor Stuart shows) being, 'that the voice of conscience, which proceeds from a moral feeling of dislike or approbation, and the judgment of the mind, when it examines the nature of actions, unite in testifying that what the moral law of God requires, is impressed, in some good measure, even on the hearts of the heathens.'

—μεταξὺ ἀλλήλων, &c.] The full sense is, that 'their reflections alternately, as occasion may serve, either condemning them [when they act contrary to the dictates of right reason], or acquitting and justifying them [when they act conformably to those dictates].'

16. ἐν ἡμέρᾳ, &c.] This is to be joined with κρινέσονται at v. 12; vv. 13—15, these words forming a parenthetical explanation, or confirmation, of v. 12.

The words ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ὅτε κρινεῖ—ἀνθρώπων form a fine periphrasis of the great day of final account, and one most apposite to the present purpose; with which compare a very similar one at 1 Cor. iv. 5.—By τὰ κρυπτὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων most modern Commentators understand 'the secrets of men's hearts,' as 1 Cor. xiv. 25, τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, meaning their 'secret counsels.' Others (as the ancient and some modern Expositors) take it to denote 'the secret sins of men' (see Ps. xix. 12. xc. 8); others, again, 'the secret actions.' It should rather seem, however, that thoughts and counsels are chiefly meant, yet so as to include their effects in deeds and actions. In this view we may compare what Thales said, who, being interrogated whether any action (meaning secret action) could escape the notice of God, answered, 'No, nor even any thought.'

17—29. This portion consists of two sections; 1) 17—24, containing an application of the principles laid down in the preceding section, 1—17, to the case of the Jews; 2) 25—29, a setting forth of the nature and design of circumcision. The main purpose, however, of that application is, to convince the Jews of sin, and show them that they are obnoxious to Divine condemnation and punishment. To do this it was necessary to overrule and set aside the plea, that they are circumcised, and may therefore claim a covenanted right to salvation. Instead, however, of doing this in the former of these sections, the Apostle does it in the latter; and in the former he only paves the way for it by considering the principal grounds of their de-

κ Phil. 1. 10. καὶ καυχᾶσαι ἐν Θεῷ, <sup>18</sup> καὶ γινώσκεις τὸ θέλημα, καὶ δοκι-
<sup>1</sup> Matt. 23. μάζεις τὰ διαφέροντα, κατηχούμενος ἐκ τοῦ νόμου <sup>19</sup> πέποι-
<sup>16</sup> John 9. 34. θάς τε σεαυτὸν ὁδηγὸν εἶναι τυφλῶν, φῶς τῶν ἐν σκότει, <sup>20</sup> παι-
<sup>40, 41.</sup> δευτὴν ἀφρόνων, διδάσκαλον νηπίων, ἔχοντα τὴν μὀρφωσιν τῆς
<sup>10</sup> Ps. 50. 16. γνώσεως καὶ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐν τῷ νόμῳ. <sup>21</sup> <sup>m</sup> Ὁ οὖν διδάσκων
<sup>23.</sup> Matt. toto.

pendence and boast, 1) their covenant relation to God, 2) their superior advantages as to knowledge, so as to be infallible guides and teachers of others. This he overrules by placing in contrast their disobedience to God, urging that all this, instead of extenuating, only aggravates their guilt; so that their condemnation will be no less certain, and far more severe, than that of the Gentiles. Their main plea—of circumcision—which might have been placed first, he considers in the second place, for the sake of greater effect.

I have now, in deference to the united judgment of the Editors, from Græcæb. downwards, adopted εἰ δὲ, for text. rec. ἴδε, from MSS. A, B, D, E, K, and about 300 survivors; I add Lamb. 1185, 1190, Mus. 16, 184, confirmed by the Syr., Ital., Vulg., Copt., and Æthiop. Versions. Internal evidence is rather in its favour, since it might easily have been changed into ἴδε by the carelessness of Scribes, or by Revisers, to remove the Anacoluthon; which, however, Alf. remarks, is only produced by the resumption of the thread of the sentence with οὖν, v. 21. The εἰ δὲ σὺ, as he adds, carries on the apostrophe from v. 5, since when it has been broken off by reference to the great day of retribution, and its rule of judgment. 'But what, if thou callest thyself a Jew,' &c.; the apodosis beginning with ver. 21.

17. ἵπταναι τῷ νόμῳ. The full sense is, 'thou restest on and confidest in the law [as fully able to save thee].' Comp. Mic. iii. 11, ἐπὶ τῶν Κύριον ἵπτανται οὐρα, and Arrian, Epict. i. 9, mentions a φιλόσοφος ἄλλοις θαρβύνοντα καὶ ἵπτανται μὲν, where, as here, it is used of false trust—καυχᾶσαι ἐν Θεῷ, meaning, 'thou boastest of thy knowledge of God, and that thou standest in a covenant relation to him, as thy God.' See Deut. iv. 7. Ps. cxlvii. 19.

18. The intent of vv. 18—20 seems to be, to first urge, and then amplify, the knowledge of God, and his will, whereof the Jews boasted. Accordingly, the Apostle has here adopted the kind of language which the Jews were accustomed to use of themselves, when claiming superiority over the Gentiles.

—γινώσκεις τὸ θεῖον.] scil. αὐτοῦ, i. e. τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is implied in the subject-matter.

—δοκιμάζεις τὰ διαφ.] q. d. 'Thou dost distinguish, and consequently canst decide between things that differ;' 'thou provest, by putting to the test, and thereby rightly estimating and appreciating things with different claims to preference.' Comp. Phil. i. 9, 10, ἐν ἐκτιμᾶσαι—εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα, where see note. A very rare sense of διαφ., occurring elsewhere perhaps only in Anacrid. p. 121, cited by Elmsler.

—κατηχούμενος, &c.] 'by being instructed from youth upwards out of the Law,—the Book of the Law and its contents.

19, 20. The four expressions here occurring, forming two pairs, of which the first has reference to the faculty of knowledge; the second, to that of communicating it by instruction. Ὁδηγὸν τυφλῶν, φῶς τῶν ἐν σκότει, παιδευτὴν ἀφρόνων, διδάσκαλον νηπίων, are specimens of the high-sounding titles applied by the Jews to the scribes and doctors, who, from ver. 21, 22, are here especially had in view,—titles, as appears from πίστωθας, confidently claimed by them—and the terms τυφλῶν, ἐν τῷ σκότει, ἀφρόνων, and νηπίων, are meant to set forth the arrogance of these ὁδηγοί, justly called by our Lord, Matt. xv. 14, ὁδηγοὶ τυφλοῦ.

Of the words ἔχοντα τὴν μὀρφωσιν τῆς γνώσεως, the literal sense is, 'having [in the law] the form and figure of true knowledge, or knowledge of the truth [marked out and prescribed by God]'; consequently a perfect rule of moral truth.—Μὀρφωσις properly signifies 'a sketch of the outlines of any figure with chalk, &c., on a plain surface,' as τύπος is 'the delineation of any thing by stamp.' Now as both are supposed to represent the true form of any thing, so they are both metaphorically applied (τύπος in Rom. vi. 17, and μὀρφωσις in the present passage) to denote 'an accurate knowledge' of any thing.

21. ὁ οὖν διδάσκων—διδάσκαι:] This appears, from the illustrations adduced from ancient writers, Classical and Rabbinical, to have been a common argumentum ad hominem. With respect to the heads of accusation which follow, there has been much learning and industry needlessly expended. There can be little doubt that these, and many other crimes, were committed by the different orders of the Jews, either in the full, or in a qualified sense. From the state of society in Judæa, as described by Josephus, theft and rapine must, and we find did, extensively prevail among the lower orders. See Joseph. Bell. v. 26. And there is no reason to doubt the existence of rapacity in the Priests, and the higher ranks in general. Adultery, too, seems to have defiled all classes, as indeed it had always done. See Jerem. v. 8. As to sacrilege, we have no historical evidence on which to sustain the charge, in the literal sense, of robbing temples; and therefore the expression here used is perhaps meant of other crimes, which partook of the nature of sacrilege; such as that of defrauding the Temple of God of offerings destined for him. Jos. Antt. xviii. 3, 4. Thus far in my former editions. I am now, however, of opinion, with Alf., that the contrast between ιερός, and βδελ. τὰ εἰδωλα points at the kind of robbery meant; so that the sense must be, 'Thou who abhorrest idols, dost thou rob their temples?' Comp. Jos. Antt. iv. 8, 4, where the law runs thus: μή σὺ λαὸν ἱερὰ ξενικά, μηδ' ἐν ἱερονομασίῳ ὄντιν Θεῷ κειμήλιον λαμβάνειν. This view I myself was induced to take many years ago, and promulgated it in my 'Supplementary Notes.' Indeed the view, so far from being a new one, derived from recent German Expeἐτερον, σεαυτὸν οὐ διδάσκεις; ὁ κηρύσσων μὴ κλέπτειν, κλεπτεις;

 22 ὁ λέγων μὴ μοιχεύειν, μοιχεύεις; ὁ βδελυσσόμενος τὰ εἰδωλα, ἱεροσυλεῖς; 23 ὁ ἐν νόμῳ καυχᾶσαι, διὰ τῆς παραβάσεως τοῦ ἁ Rom. 9. 4 νόμου τὸν Θεὸν ἀτιμάζεις; 24 Ὁ γὰρ ὄνομα τοῦ Θεοῦ δι' ὑμᾶς o 2 Sam. 12.
 βλασφημεῖται ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι, καθὼς γέγραπται. 25 Περιτομή 14.
 μὲν γὰρ ὠφέλει, ἐὰν νόμον πρᾶσσης· ἐὰν δὲ παραβάτης νόμου Isa. 66. 5.
 ᾖς, ἡ περιτομή σου ἀκροβυστία γέγονεν. 26 Ἐὰν οὖν ἡ ἀκρο- Ezek. 28. 28.
 22.

sitors, is as old as the time of Chrys. and Theophyl., and was long ago adopted by Est., Menoch., and Le Clerc. The comment of Theophyl. is almost wholly formed on that of Chrys.,—καὶ γὰρ εἰ καὶ ἰβδαῖσσαντο τὰ εἰδωλα, ἀλλ' ὅμως, τῇ φιλοχρηματίᾳ παρανοοῦμενοι, ἥκτορον τῶν εἰδωλικῶν ἀναθημάτων δι' αἰσχροκίρδειαν. The general term in Chrys., χρημάτων, goods, effects, has its explanation in the more special and usual term ἀναθήματα, votive offerings, as vases, tripods, &c. And Theophylact's expression ἄπτεσθαι, as applied to these, must have the sense found in our verb to touch, viz. to meddle with, 'lay hands upon,' 'take to one's self any property or effects.' Accordingly, the term here, ἱεροσυλεῖν, will signify 'to rob temples,' by carrying off and appropriating any of its χρήματα, or ἀναθήματα, consecrated articles, whether statues or images, or vases, tripods, &c. In the words used by Chrys., σφόδρα ἦ ἀπηγορευμένον τῶν ἐν τοῖς εἰδωλίοις ἄπτεσθαι, he had, I imagine, in mind Deut. vii. 15. Here, however, the reference is not only to what belonged to the images, espec. the gold or silver about them, but to the vases sacra generally. Certainly the words, Acts xix. 37, ἀνδρες τούτους οὕτω ἱεροσύνους, nor, as ye may suppose, robbers of your temples, seem to show that the accusation was occasionally made; and, doubtless, sometimes with justice. That this ἱεροσύλη was sometimes committed, we may infer from the formal prohibition by law in Josephus. As to any certain evidences of the commission of this offence by Jews, the deficiency of historical or other documents is such, that it would be too much to expect it; not to say that the writings of antiquity have not yet been brought to light so completely, or examined so carefully, but that some positive, or, at least, incidental proof of the thing may turn up. The thing is itself not improbable, and may have happened in the usual course of that petty traffic, which the Jews then carried on in all the civilized countries of the known world. It can hardly be doubted that among them there were thieves, as all along since, not a few receivers of stolen goods. And, considering that the guilt of him who receives is as great as that of him who steals, thus the Jews who received such stolen property might be said themselves ἱεροσυλεῖν. That the term ἱεροσυλεῖν had an especial reference to the abstraction of ἱερὰ ἀναθήματα, is certain from Artemid. On. iii. 3, ἱεροσυλεῖν καὶ κλέπτειν θεῶν ἀναθήματα.

24. τὸ γὰρ ὄνομα] Here the Apostle brings directly home the charge, at which he had before only hinted. The words headed by καθὼς γέγραπται, meaning 'the fact is so, as it is written in Scripture,' are not, properly speaking, a quotation of any one passage, but, while formed chiefly from Is. lii. 5, they have a reference also to Ezek. xxvi. 20—23. The full sense intended is, 'The foregoing charges are not without foundation; for to you may be applied the reproach occasionally cast on your forefathers by the Prophets. The name of God is by your means (i. e. on account of you) evil spoken of among the heathens.' For the heathens reasoned, 'What sort of a religion must that be which produces such a life?'

25. The words of this verse are meant to anticipate and reply to an objection, which the Jews might make to the whole of what the Apostle had said,—namely, 'Ay, but circumcision is surely, you will grant, a great thing, as being a seal of the covenant. Ans. True; circumcision is effectual, if, &c.; i. e. 'did you but live answerably to the obligations implied in this covenant-sign, it were well; otherwise the privilege to which you are entitled, as a Jew, will avail you nothing for salvation.' How deeply rooted was their notion of the complete efficacy of circumcision to salvation, has been shown by Grot., Lightf., and Schoëtgen. The Apostle takes for granted the superiority of the Jews over the Gentiles, and the efficacy of the Law to salvation, if its moral precepts (called τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου in the next verse) be but observed; otherwise, he intimates, the advantage would be lost. By νόμον, indeed, Bp. Middl. thinks is meant, not the Law itself, but moral obedience, or 'virtue,' such as it was the object of the Law to inculcate. And he directs νόμον to be so taken at v. 27. Yet there, as νόμον corresponds, by apodosis, to τὸν νόμον, it is clear that νόμον is equivalent to τοῦ νόμου. And this must decide the sense of νόμον in the kindred passage of the present verse. By νόμον we are to understand the Mosaic Law, moral as well as ceremonial.

In περιτομή here we have the sign for the thing signified,—i. e. the being a member of the Jewish Church, and entitled to all the privileges thence resulting. And so, in the next clause, ἀκροβυστία stands for the state of the ἀκρόβυστοι, or those not in possession of those privileges.

26. The Apostle, after having proved that the sins of the Jews must render them obnoxious to the Divine wrath, as well as those of the Gentiles, proceeds to demonstrate what he had said, vv. 7—10, that the righteousness of the circumcised Gentile must also render him acceptable to God, and rewardable by him, as well as the righteousness of the Jew.

—ἐὰν οὖν ἡ ἀκροβυστία, &c.] Here ἡ ἀκροβυστία is put for οἱ ἀκρόβυστοι; abstract for concrete. By τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου are

βυστία τὰ δικαιώματα τοῦ νόμου φυλάσσει, οὐχὶ ἡ ἀκροβυστία αὐτοῦ εἰς περιτομὴν λογισθῆσεται; <sup>27</sup> καὶ κρινεῖ ἡ ἐκ φύσεως ἀκροβυστία, τὸν νόμον τελοῦσα, σὲ τὸν διὰ γράμματος καὶ περιτομῆς παραβάτην νόμου; <sup>28</sup> Οὐ γὰρ ὁ ἐν τῷ φανερῷ, Ἰουδαῖος ἐστίν· οὐδὲ ἡ ἐν τῷ φανερῷ, ἐν σαρκὶ, περιτομή· <sup>29</sup> ἀλλ' ὁ ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, Ἰουδαῖος, καὶ περιτομή καρδίας, ἐν πνεύματι, οὐ γράμματος· οὐ ὁ ἔπαινος οὐκ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλ' ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

III. <sup>1</sup> Τί οὖν τὸ περισσὸν τοῦ Ἰουδαίου, ἢ τίς ἡ ὠφέλεια τῆς meant the moral requirements of the Mosaic Law, which the Jews so grievously neglected.

— οὐχὶ ἡ ἀκρ.—λογισθ. ] 'would not his uncircumcision be accounted as circumcision?' 'would he not be regarded as a circumcised person?' The interrogation with οὐχὶ involves a strong affirmation—'Certainly he would.' <sup>1</sup> Idem loco apud Deum quo circumcisia, particeps fœderis, particeps beneficiorum; nam Deus fidem intuetur, posthabita prosopopœia, as Carpz. remarks.

<sup>27</sup>. I am now induced to regard this, with many eminent Expositors, not as a continuation of the question, but put declaratively, and forming a separate assertion; the Apostle now openly affirming what he had at first only intimated,—that their neglect of the means of grace would bring condemnation upon them—and paving the way to the next verse.

— καὶ κρινεῖ ] 'he shall even rise up in judgment against,' indirectly; i. e. by his example and indirect testimony. Comp. Matt. xii. 41, seqq. Luke xi. 31.

— ἡ ἐκ φύσ. ἀκροβ. ] 'he who continues in his natural state of uncircumcision.'—τελοῦσα is for ἐπιτελοῦσα, 'by performing its injunctions.'

— διὰ γράμμ. καὶ περ. ] The διὰ is rightly rendered in E. V. 'by;' so that it be taken to denote 'under,' nearly = Latin 'per;' the Preposition denoting, as Heumann first saw, the state 'in quo Judeus Legis transgressor versetur;' i. e., as Alf. explains, the state in which the man is when he does the act regarded as the medium through which the act is done. By γράμμ. some understand the letter, as opposed to the spirit; others, the divine revelation given to the Jews in the Law of Moses, by a tacit opposition to the unwritten law of nature; q. d. 'If a Gentile should perform what the Law requires, would not this show, that you are worthy of condemnation who transgress the law, although you enjoy the light of revelation, and the privileges which a state of circumcision confers?' This latter sense (supported by Grot., Crellius, Estius, Wolf) is preferable, from its being (as Crellius has shown in a very masterly exegesis) far more agreeable to the context than the preceding one; which cannot be extracted from the words without some violence.

<sup>28</sup>. οὐ γὰρ ὁ ἐν τῷ φαν., &c. ] These words suppose the answer of the foregoing to be made in the affirmative; and the γὰρ has reference to a clause omitted; q. d. 'Yes, truly; for he,' &c. 'Ἐν τῷ φανερῷ is for φανερός, externally; and supply, from what follows, Ἰουδαῖος; meaning ὁ ὅστις Ἰουδαῖος. The full sense is: 'He is not so much the real Jew, who is only such openly, publicly, and externally (i. e. by birth, habit, language, &c.); neither is that circumcision, which is manifest and external, the true one.'

<sup>29</sup>. Here περιτομή must be taken twice, as was Ἰουδαῖος before: and by περιτομή is to be understood ἡ ὅτις περιτομή, meaning (as it is then explained) the spiritual circumcision,—namely, that of the heart, by cutting off evil affections. See Deut. x. 16. So a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wetstein, says: 'If a man believe as he ought, circumcision will not make him a Jew; but if he believe as he ought, he is a Jew, though he be not circumcised.'

— ἐν πνεύματι, οὐ γράμματος ] Many refer this to the Holy Spirit, and the precepts of the Law. But the context rather requires the sense assigned by others, 'in spirit,' or Calvin, 'in spiritu posita.' By γράμμ. is meant the external observance without piety; by πνεύμ., the end of the ceremony, which is spiritual. So in 2 Cor. iii. 6, the Gospel is designated as a ministration οὐ γράμματος, ἀλλὰ πνεύματος.

— οὐ ὁ ἔπαινος, &c. ] The general meaning is: 'Such an one aims not at the praise of men; but he will receive both praise and acceptance from God, who seeth not as man seeth, and who trieth the heart.' 'Its rursum,' observes Calv., 'hypocritas, qui se falsis persuasionibus deliniant, retrahit ad Dei tribunal;' those Pharisees, and Pharisaical Judaizers, who sought to gain the praise of men by their outward sanctimoniousness, which is here contrasted with that internal and real sanctity which seeks only the praise of God, the Judge of all. See the edifying remarks of Hyper.

III. In the present chapter the Apostle is chiefly occupied in refuting such objections to the preceding statements as might be supposed to occur to Jews; and the Chapter is divisible into three parts, I.) a brief statement and refutation of several objections to Paul's reasoning, 1.—8. II.) a confirmation of his doctrines from the testimony of Scripture, followed by a setting forth of his conclusion,—that by the works of the Law can no flesh living be justified before God, 9.—20. III.) an exposition of the Gospel method of justification, 21.—31. At vv. 1.—20 there are four objections made, or difficulties started, which are removed by the Apostle. The first, at v. 1, is this: 'If the circumcised and the uncircumcised be treated alike at the last judgment, and the Jews are equally guilty with the Gentiles; and if the external observance of the Mosaic Law will not avail to justification, of what advantage, then, such being the case (οὐν), can Judaism be?' To this the answer, at v. 2, is, that the benefit, of greater spiritual knowledge, was thereby conferred on the Jews, by their being entrusted with the oracles of God. I quite agree with Mr. Alf., that 'it is best to take the question here [and in very similar passages] not as coming from an objector, but as asked by the Apostle himself, anticipating the thoughts of his reader;' rather, the objections which may occur to a reader.

περιτομῆς; <sup>2</sup> Ἀπολὺ κατὰ πάντα τρόπον. πρῶτον μὲν γὰρ, <sup>a</sup> <sup>Dant.</sup> <sup>2.</sup> <sup>Ps 147 19,</sup> <sup>30.</sup> <sup>ch. 2. 12.</sup> <sup>2. 4.</sup> <sup>5 Num. 32.</sup> <sup>19.</sup> <sup>ch. 2. 6.</sup> <sup>3 Tim. 2. 12.</sup> <sup>Heb. 4. 2.</sup> <sup>2 Pe. 31. 4.</sup> <sup>2. 2.</sup> <sup>John 2. 22.</sup> ὅτι ἐπιστεύθησαν τὰ λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>3</sup> <sup>b</sup> Τί γὰρ, εἰ ἡπίστησάν τινες; μὴ ἡ ἀπιστία αὐτῶν τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Θεοῦ καταργήσει; <sup>4</sup> <sup>c</sup> μὴ γένοιτο! γινέσθω δὲ ὁ Θεὸς ἀληθής, πᾶς δὲ ἄνθρωπος ψεύστης καθὼς γέγραπται. Ὅπως ἂν δικαιοθῆς ἐν τοῖς λόγοις σου, καὶ νικήσης ἐν τῷ κρίνεσθαί σε. <sup>5</sup> Εἰ δὲ ἡ ἀδικία ἡμῶν Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην συνίστησι, τί ἐροῦμεν; μὴ

2. The expression πολὲ κατὰ πάντα τρόπον is a very strong one, and the answer is not to the first question of v. 1 only, but the second also, since it is included, by implication, in the first, for 'to be circumcised' is equiv. to 'being a Jew.'—κατὰ π. τρ. means, 'in every respect,' 'in every point of view.'—πρῶτον, 'first and foremost.'

—ἐπιστεύθησαν τὰ λόγια τοῦ Θεοῦ] 'were entrusted with the oracles of God;' meaning, the word of God in the Scriptures of the Old Test., all the revelation therein by God of himself; on which sense see my Lex. N. T. in v. λόγιον. On the Syntax in ἐπιστεῦθαι, see Matth. Gr., and also Winer's.—To advert to the matter itself. The Jews were not only entrusted with, but, as Paul admits by his silence, were faithful preservers of, Sacred Scripture. Their care and solicitude in that respect are adverted to, in various passages, by Josephus, and by Philo, p. 1022, D, cited by Carpz., where he well characterizes the Scriptures as Θεόχρηστα λόγια.

3. Here we have the second objection, namely, how the Apostle's views can be reconciled with God's faithfulness to his promises, made to the Jews? q. d. 'Supposing that many Jews have been unbelieving and disobedient, shall this make the pledged promise of God [to bless the seed of Abraham] of none effect?—Τί γὰρ; 'quid enim?' 'What, then?' Comp. Demosth., τί γὰρ, εἰ ἀδικεῖ Φίλιπποι;

—εἰ ἡπίστησαν] This seems equiv. to ἀπιστοὶ ἦσαν, 'were unfaithful' to the covenant contained in the λόγια entrusted to them; for I agree with Alf., that the sense 'did not believe' would be out of place here, where Paul is not speaking of faith, or want of faith, as yet, but of moral guilt, the ἀδικία of v. 5. However, this interpretation was long ago anticipated by Calv., to whose able note the reader is referred.

—μὴ ἡ ἀπιστία—καταργήσει] The interrogation (which is more pointed by the use of the μὴ, an? num?) involves a strong negation, which is more fully brought out in μὴ γένοιτο following.

4. γινέσθω—ψεύστης] The difficulty, which many have here found, may be obviated, by bearing in mind that the strong negation in μὴ γένοιτο contains, by implication, an assertion of the contrary; q. d. 'God is not proved unfaithful.' This, indeed, may prob. be intimated in the next words, γινέσθω, &c., of which the full sense seems to be, 'Let but God be found true and faithful [to his promise, as he assuredly will], though every man were proved to be a violator of the covenant.' On further consideration of this peculiar expression, I believe the sense of it to be, 'let God be held, or regarded, as voracious, though every man be counted for a liar.' In accordance with this is the exposition of Theodoret, who explains by δῶμιον λόγους, 'let us suppose it is so in words.' As to the Vulg. rendering est, the framer of that Version, Jerome, must have written esto, since, in his Comment to Titus, ch. i., he expresses the sense by fial, as does Ambrose. Calv., who has ably traced the scope of the passage, well observes, that the first member of this sentence contains the primary axiom of Christian philosophy. Why the second was added (taken from Ps. cxvi. 11), is well accounted for by Hyperius.

This assertion by implication is more plainly developed in the words following, ὅπως ἂν δικαιοθῆς, of which the sense seems to be, 'So that the result may be (to use the words of Scripture), that thou shouldst be justified, or brought in clear, when thou art called to account for thy dealings.' Here there is a forensic allusion: though the Deity is not considered as the judge, but as a party impleaded; and any defendant, who is brought in clear of blame, may be said νικᾶν, because he carries his cause. Thus the sentiment obtained by this accommodation of the words of David, may be expressed (in the words of Prof. Stuart) as follows: 'Whenever God speaks by way of reproving or condemning men, let him be accounted altogether just, and let him be fully vindicated.'

5. Here the Apostle anticipates another objection which might occur to the reader; q. d. 'If our unrighteousness display the righteousness of God (the mode appointed by God of becoming righteous by faith, i. 17), would he not be unjust, if he punished us for this unrighteousness?—συνίστησι.] On the sense of this disputed term one thing is plain, that the customary version 'commends' cannot be tolerated. Most recent Commentators—as Koppe, Rosenm., Stuart, and Peile—explain the word, with Erasmus, and Grot., declarat, 'renders conspicuous.' But I find no ancient authority for this interpretation.

All the early Versions, except the Vulg. (which is a free Version), render it confirms, establishes, proves. And though the foregoing Commentators endeavour to establish the interpretation from infra. ver. 8. 2 Cor. vi. 4. vii. 11. Gal. ii. 18. Philo de Mig. 394, c. τὴν σοφίαν αὐτοῦ συνίστησι (scil. ὁ Θεός) ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου δὲ δημιουργηκέναι, yet the learned Loesner, who fur-ἄδικος ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ἐπιφέρει τὴν ὀργήν; (κατὰ ἄνθρωπον λέγω.)

 6<sup>d</sup> Μὴ γένοιτο! ἔπει πῶς κρινεῖ ὁ Θεὸς τὸν κόσμον; 7 εἰ γὰρ
 ἡ ἀλήθεια τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν τῷ ἐμῷ ψεύσματι ἐπερίσσευσεν εἰς τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, τί ἔτι καὶ ὡς ἁμαρτωλὸς κρίνομαι; 8 καὶ μὴ (καθὼς βλασφημούμεθα, καὶ καθὼς φασὶ τινες ἡμᾶς λέγειν,) ὅτι ποιήσωμεν τὰ κακὰ, ἵνα ἔλθῃ τὰ ἀγαθὰ; ὃν τὸ κρίμα ἔνδικόν ἐστί.

1 Gen. 18.
 26.
 Job 8. 2.
 & 34. 17.

nished them with these passages, renders συμίστησι by demonstrat, comprobat, and subjoins four other passages from Philo, where the word has this same sense. In short, the interpretation they adopt can only be admitted compatently with the other,—inasmuch as he who establishes and proves a thing to be this or that clears up all doubts about its existence; and, in fact, Wets. long ago blended both senses, rendering, 'Demonstravit, et clara luce posuit'; and he cites many passages of ancient writers, proving that the term may be taken in this pregnancy of sense. Suffice it to refer to Susanna, v. 61.

At μὴ ἄδικος ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ἐπιφέρει τὴν ὀργήν; there is great delicacy in the wording; the Jew not meaning positively to deny the justice of God in punishing, but only to hint that it may be questioned. The full sense is, 'Is, or is not, God unjust?' A milder way of saying, 'Is not God unjust?' The phrase ἐπιφ. τὴν ὀργήν may be rendered, 'who visits with his anger'; i. e., by implication, punishes. The phrase has been found nowhere else, except in Polyb. xxii. 14, 8, and is synonymous with ἐπιφέρειν τὴν ποινήν, pœnam immittere, found in Jos. Antt. iii. 18. The Apostle, though he here speaks in the person of an objector, yet, to prevent any mistake of the words μὴ ἄδικος, &c., apprises his readers that he speaks in that quality. For the phrase κατὰ ἄνθρωπον λέγω is best explained to mean, 'I speak as men (meaning the objectors in question) are accustomed to speak in self-justification, and when thus circumstanced.'

6—8. In these verses the objection is removed, and that on grounds conceded by the objector himself.

6. ἔτσι—κόσμον 'since [if this be the case], how shall God judge the world?' viz. in righteousness, which is involved in the very idea of God's judging: a sense of ἔτσι found before questions implying a negation (as here and in 1 Cor. xiv. 16. xv. 29. Heb. x. 2), and before similarly hypothetical clauses. On the true force here of ἔτσι I have fully treated in note on 1 Cor. v. 10, adducing examples from Scripture. Suffice it here to adduce two similar examples from the Class. writers: Soph. (Ed. T. 390, ἔτσι—ποῦ σὲ μάντις εἰ; Anonym. ap. Butt. Gr. Gr. § 149, ἔτσι, πῶς δὲ διακρίνομεν αὐτό;

7. In this verse the sentiment of v. 5 is resumed and completed, and the words are from the supposed objector. See Calvin and Hyper.

The sense of the passage may be thus expressed:—'If the fact of the Jews having broken the covenant [by not believing in Christ] has been the cause that the promise of God has been extended (ἐπερίσσευσεν) to a still greater number of people, why are the Jews punished as sinners for unbelief? It would be enough for them to lose the privileges of the covenant; or rather, they should continue to live wickedly, because good redounds from it to the world at large.' To advert to a matter of Philology, ἐπερίσσευσεν means lit., 'has become superabundant, has redounded to more.' See my note on Thucyd. ii. 65, 4.

—ψεύσματι] means 'false dealing'; 'unfaithfulness,' by an idiom frequent in the Old Test. The term, as Mr. Locke justly observes, was here used in preference to ἀδικία, for the sake of antithesis to 'the truth, or veracity, of God.'

8. καὶ μὴ καθὼς—τὰ ἀγαθὰ]; 'Yea, why not say, as we are slanderously reported [to say], as some affirm that we do say? Let us,' &c. There is no difficulty in supplying λέγομεν from the following context; an irregularity, indeed; though one often found in Thucyd.

Of the many methods which have been proposed of adjusting the construction, and determining the sense, here, the only satisfactory one is that of Chrys. and the Greek Commentators, as also Zeger, Pisc., Crellius, and Stuart. The Apostle is here speaking in his own person, not in that of the objector, and the words are an answer to the preceding objection; not, indeed, a regular one, but meant to show its futility, by pushing the argument as far as it will go. With the μὴ we must repeat τὴν from the preceding. Thus the sense may be, 'And why [at this rate] may not we (as we are slanderously reported to do, and some say that we maintain) do evil that good may come?' Yet I prefer (with Grot., Hamm., Limborch, and Stuart) at καὶ τί μὴ to supply, from the λέγειν of the parenthesis, λέξομεν, and at βλασφημούμεθα, ὡς λέγοντες. The words following, καὶ καθὼς φασὶ τινες ἡμᾶς λέγειν are exegetical of the preceding, 'Why may we not maintain (as we are slanderously reported to do), let us do evil?' &c. This supplying of a word from a parenthetical clause is, indeed, an irregularity in composition, but occurs in the best writers, especially Thucyd. By the αὖ is meant we Christians; and consequently the τινες may mean non-Christian calumniators, whether Gentiles or Jews; and the whole passage may be freely translated: 'Why, then, may we not say (as some do actually, though slanderously, accuse us of saying), Let us,' &c.? By ὃν τὸ κρίμα ἔνδικόν ἐστί is simply meant, 'whose offence is such as justly to merit punishment [from God], i. e. they will be called to a strict account for this, and justly punished. The condemnation and punishment here adverted to are not of those who slandered the Apostle, but of those who adopted a maxim, or principle, which must expose them to the detestation of all good men, as well as to the judgment of God.'

9 * Τί οὖν ; προεχόμεθα ; Οὐ πάντως προηγιασάμεθα γὰρ ὡς οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι τε καὶ Ἕλληνας πάντας ὑφ' ἁμαρτίαν εἶναι 10 ἡ καθ- ὡς γέγραπται· ὅτι οὐκ ἔστι δίκαιος οὐδὲ εἷς 11 οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ συν- ὢν, οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ ἐκζητῶν τὸν Θεόν. 12 Πάντες ἐξέκλιναν, ἅμα ἠχρειώθησαν. οὐκ ἔστι ποιῶν χρηστότητα, οὐκ ἔστιν ἕως ἐνός. 13 Ἐτάφος ἀνεφγμένους ὁ λάρυγξ αὐ- Gal. 2. 12.
1 Pet. 2. 1.
Ps. 14. 2.
Ps. 53. 2.

9—20. 'The Apostle, having answered the objections to his argument in proof that the Jews, being sinners in the sight of God, are, as such, exposed to condemnation, draws, in v. 9, the obvious conclusion, that they have, as to the matter of justification, no pre-eminence over the Gentiles. He confirms his doctrine of the universal sinfulness of men, by numerous quotations from the Old Testament. These passages are descriptive of their depravity in general, vv. 10—12; and then of its special manifestations in the sins of the tongue, vv. 13, 14; and sins of conduct, vv. 15—18. The conclusion of all this reasoning, from consciousness, experience, and Scripture, is, that [the Jews have no ground of preference; but, as the Scripture saith, are guilty, as well as the Gentile; so that] "all the world is guilty before God." v. 19; and the necessary consequence is, "no flesh can be justified by the deeds of the law," v. 20." (Prof. Hodge.)

9. The Apostle now returns to the subject he had before been treating of, which had been interrupted by the above digression. (Calv.)

The words τί οὖν ; προεχόμεθα ; evidently contain another objection, which is immediately answered in the words following. It has, however, always been a disputed point among Interpreters whether we should point τί οὖν ; προεχόμεθα ; or τί οὖν προεχόμεθα ; In the former case, the sense will be, 'What, then? Have we any superiority [or not]?' In the latter, 'What, then, is our superiority?' A sense sufficiently good, but liable to this strong objection,—that the answer, οὐ πάντως, will not then be suitable; since that can only mean, No, certainly; as in Theophr. de Caus. Plant. vi. 25, οὐκ ἔστιν οὐ πάντως, and Aristotle, Metaphys. vi. οὐ γὰρ πάντως. &c.; whereas it ought to have been οὐδὲν, 'No! by no means.' And so οὐ πάντως! Demosth., cited by Winer. The other punctuation points to a satisfactory sense; but what that is will depend on the force of προεχόμεθα, which is variously expounded; though almost every interpretation is liable to greater or less objection; as has been shown by myself in Recons. Synop., and by Stuart and Alf. The least objectionable mode of taking the word, is to regard it (with several ancient Commentators, and, of the moderns, Calv., Beza, Grot., Bengel; and several recent Foreign Expositors) as not a Passive, but Midd. put for Active. Thus the sense is, 'Are we (Jews) better off (than they)?' 'Have we any claim of preference?' To which the answer, as above explained, is very suitable. Propriety, indeed, has been thought to require πάντως οὐ; but οὐδὲν πάντως has been adduced, in justification, from Hæc. v. 34. But that is scarcely sufficient. It would seem that οὐ πάντως has a stronger import than the other, and might best be pointed οὐ, πάντως, 'No! certainly not.' That the Apostle intended as strong a negation as possible, is clear from the context; q. d. 'No!! inasmuch as both parties were, as to justification, on a level; both being, as the Apostle proceeds to show, alike 'under sin', both as to its guilt and its power, and sinners exposed to the condemnation of sin.—The next words, προηγιασάμεθα γὰρ, ought not to have occasioned such perplexity to Expositors, since the context points to the only true sense, 'We have before (already) proved both (on good grounds) to be alike under sin.' No example, indeed, has been adduced of this sense; but how it arises has been ably shown by Crellius, who skillfully founds it on a sensus pragmaticus, in which the idea of proving is engrained on that of criminalizing; q. d. 'we have already, on well grounded crimination, proved.' Of the next words, ὑφ' ἁμαρτίαν εἶναι, the full sense is, 'are brought under, and liable to be [truly] charged with sin,' ἐνδοκίμοι (see ver. 19), implying 'liability to Divine punishment.' This weighty truth is then confirmed by several testimonies from various parts of the Old Test., part of them spoken directly of the Jews; part including, by implication, the Gentiles also. The quotations,—if they may be called such, which, from the δτι, may be doubted,—are made with some laxity, and occasionally ad sensum rather than ad litteram. Indeed, it should seem that the Apostle meant to express only the substance of the words of Ps. xiv. (Sept.), and then proceeded to advert to what follows, alluding also to other passages,—namely, from Ps. v. 9. x. 7. xiv. 1—3. xxxvi. 1. liii. 8. xli. 3. Prov. i. 16. Isaiah lix. 7. The alteration at ver. 14 of αὐτοῦ into αὐτῶν is merely adopted for accommodation sake.

11. ὁ συνὼν] meaning, according to the Hebrew idiom, 'he who is righteous and godly'; lit. 'is so wise as to fear God.' Here the expressions ὁ συνὼν and ὁ ἐκζητῶν τὸν Θεόν are not synonymous; but the latter is a stronger term than the former, and meant to further develop the idea contained therein.

12. ἠχρειώθησαν] This might mean, 'they have become useless.' But from the context it appears that there is here a Μαίωσις, by which the mild term useless is employed to denote 'what is positively bad and injurious.' Thus the sense must be, 'are become corrupt,' or 'depraved.' Ποιεῖν χρηστότητα is a Hellenistic phrase for ποιεῖν ἀγαθόν.

13. τάφος ἀνεφγμένους] Most Commentators refer this unusual metaphor to offensive and poisonous discourse, tending to corrupt morals, sent forth from the throat of the wicked, as noisome stench from an opened sepulchre. It is, however, more natural to regard it, with Calv., Grot., Crell., and others, as a description of the deadly calumny, by which the wicked destroy (figuratively, 'swallow up') their fellow-creatures. Thus ἀνεφγμένους is taken in the sense gaping, τῶν ταῖς γλώσσαις αὐτῶν ἐδολιούσαν ἰδὸς ἀσπιδῶν

 h Ps. 10. 7. ὑπὸ τὰ χεῖλη αὐτῶν <sup>14</sup> ὥν τὸ στόμα ἀρᾶς καὶ πιi Prov. 1. 16. κρίας γέμεν <sup>15</sup> ὁξεῖς οἱ πόδες αὐτῶν ἐκχέαι αἷμα.
 Isa. 59. 7, 8. <sup>16</sup> Σύντριμμα καὶ ταλαιπωρία ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς αὐτῶν k Ps. 34. 1. <sup>17</sup> καὶ ὁδὸν εἰρήνης οὐκ ἔγνωσαν. <sup>18</sup> οὐκ ἔστι φόβος
 l Ezek. 16. Θεοῦ ἀπέναντι τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν αὐτῶν. <sup>19</sup> Οἶδαμεν δέ,

as the grave, to denote their 'readiness to destroy them' (so Prov. i. 12, 'let us swallow them up alive as the grave'), as a grave seems ready for, and as it were expects, the dead, and 'cannot be satisfied;' see Hab. ii. 5.

— ἰδοιούσαν for ἰδοίουν; a Macedonian and Alexandrian form, said to be derived from the Boeotian dialect.

As the last clause was descriptive of that calumny, of the worst kind, by false accusation, whereby its victims are brought to utter destruction; so this and the next are, I apprehend, meant to designate that lower species of the same vice, which deals not in open false accusation, but in secret back-biting, and often disguises its purpose under glossing and deceitful speeches, to lure its intended victims. The second clause intimates the extreme noisiness of the slander, by comparing it to the deadly poison of asps; designating that virulent slander, which cankers the brightest reputation, and whose bitter biting speeches which sting even to death; see James iii. 8. The next clause, ὡν τὸ στόμα ἀρᾶς καὶ πικρίας γέμει, designates the opposite to this secret insidious slander,—namely, open and bitter expressions of hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness.

At ver. 15 the sins of the heart and tongue are represented as carried into action, and that eagerly and swiftly (ὁξεῖς); 'quick are they to carry into effect the mischiefs they meditate;' (they being, as Thucyd. says, i. 70, ἐπινοῆσαι ὁξεῖς καὶ ἐπιτελεῖν ἔργα δὲ ἄνυσιν.) where ὁξεῖς answers to the ταχυοί in Isaiah. In πόδες we have a highly graphic expression, as infra x. 15, and Acts v. 9. Comp. Appian, p. 873, who calls the murderers of Cæsar ἀνδρες ταχυνοῦντες καὶ φόνον πλῆρεις.

<sup>16</sup>, <sup>17</sup>. Here we have, in words derived from Is. lix. 7, 8, a fine representation, almost graphic, of savage ferocity, which, wherever it makes its attacks, spreads devastation and ruin. The next clause, ὁδὸν εἰρήνης οὐκ ἔγνωσαν, contains a further trait of evil. 'Peace never enters into their thoughts or cares; all their counsels being only evil continually, never to do good to any one.'

At ver. 17 we have the last touch of the picture; not, indeed, to show (as has been commonly supposed) that they are destitute of piety, and do what they list without any fear of God (see Luke xviii. 2): the words being rather meant (as Calv. suggests) to indicate the font-tain whence such bitter waters flow,—namely, the want of that fear of God by which alone men depart from evil (see Prov. xvi. 6). Compare Hesiod, Ἔργ. 183, where, after inveighing at considerable length on the vices of the men of his age, he thus concludes: Συγγάτοισι οὐδὲ θῶν ὅστιν εἰδότες. Also Thucyd. ii. 53, θῶν δὲ φόβος, ἢ ἀνθρώπων νόμος οὐδέτις ἀπείργε, 'restrained them from evil;' and so Lucret. : 'Nec jam religio Divom neque numina magni Pendebantur.'

<sup>19</sup>. οἶδαμεν δέ, ὅτι ὁ νόμος λέγει. In οἶδαμεν we have a popular expression, equivalent to 'it is well known, it must be admitted.' This is meant, as Hodge says, to prove that the above-cited texts are applicable to the Jews, since they occur in the Jewish Scriptures; so that the Jews cannot pretend that they refer to the Gentiles,—since, being found written in their own Law, and addressed to them, they must be considered as meant for them; though, indeed, for the Gentiles also, the expression being of universal application. By ὁ νόμος is meant 'the whole of the Scriptures of the Old Test.,' comprehending both the Law proper, and the Prophets and Psalms. See my note, 1 Cor. xiv. 21.—τοῖς ἐν τῷ νόμῳ, lit. 'to those in the Law;' 'within the circle of its professors.' In λαλεῖ there is a Hellenistic use of the word, found in John viii. 25, and other passages of the Gospel (see my Lex.); though, at the same time, it carries with it more of popular impressiveness than λέγει would have done; q. d. 'What the Scripture speaks concerning the characters of men, it must be understood to say of those to whom it is especially directed—the Jews.' In short, this was intended to anticipate the objection,—'these heavy charges were not directed against us.' To which the reply is, that they have reference to them; for what the Scriptures there say, is said with a reference to persons under the law, i. e. Jews, the elect people of God; see Calv. The argument, then, is, that 'as the Jews believed that the Heathens deserved the condemnation of God, and as their Scriptures represented the Jews as being all deeply guilty in the sight of God, so it may reasonably be concluded (as is done in the next clause) that both parties, the whole world, are to be regarded as liable to condemnation;' in ἵνα πᾶν σῶμα φραγῇ the conclusive Particle ἵνα means 'whence it follows that;' for, as Hyper. remarks (and so Calv.), the words ἵνα πᾶν, &c., form a conclusion to the whole of the first part of the confirmation. On this use of ἵνα with Subjunct., equiv. to ὥς, or ὅπως, lit. 'whereby should every mouth be stopped,' see an Article in the Class. Mus. No. vi. p. 343, referred to by Dr. Peile. Of this use of φράσσειν, 'to put to silence,' by leaving any one without any apology, see examples in my Lex. in v. There is, as Calv. points out, a forensic allusion; since, in courts of justice, a conscience-stricken silence is condemnatory. The πᾶς is emphatic, as put for ἅλος,—q. d. 'not the mouth of the Jew only, but that of the Gentile also' = 'the whole world.' Of ἵνα πᾶν σῶμα φρ. the sense is, 'so that [thereby] every mouth should be stopped;' in other words, 'all men be reduced to silence,' by being deprived of any excuse. Ὑποδ., 'has become subject to the judg-

ὅτι ὅσα ὁ νόμος λέγει, τοῖς ἐν τῷ νόμῳ λαλεῖ· ἵνα πᾶν στόμα φραγῇ, καὶ ὑπόδικος γένηται πᾶς ὁ κόσμος τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>20</sup> <sup>m</sup> Διότι <sup>m</sup> ἐξ ἔργων νόμου οὐ δικαιοθῆσεται πᾶσα σὰρξ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ διὰ γὰρ νόμου ἐπίγνωσις ἁμαρτίας.

m ch. 7. 7.
Gal. 2. 16.
R. 2. 11.
Ps. 142. 2.
Acts 13. 38.

<sup>21</sup> <sup>n</sup> Νυνὶ δὲ χωρὶς νόμου δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ πεφανέρωται, μαρτυρουμένη ὑπὸ τοῦ νόμου καὶ τῶν προφητῶν <sup>22</sup> <sup>o</sup> δικαιοσύνη δὲ Θεοῦ διὰ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, εἰς πάντας καὶ ἐπὶ πάντας n John 8. 46.

Acts 15. 11.
R. 2. 22.
ch. 1. 17.
o ch. 10. 12.
Gal. 2. 22.
Col. 2. 11.

ment of God; liable to his condemnation, and to punishment. It is a forensic term = the more Class. ἐπεύθυνος; thus it occurs in the later Classics, and once in Plato. The words ὑπόδικος γέν. τῷ Θεῷ may best be rendered (agreeably to the forensic allusion), 'become, on conviction, liable, or subject, to the Divine judgment, or condemnation.'

<sup>20</sup> We have here the weighty conclusion from the whole preceding course of argument; q. d. 'Because by works of Law shall no flesh be justified before him.' According to this view νόμου will here mean the moral law, whether written or unwritten, i. e. law in general, any law, whether applicable to Gentile or Jew, any rule which prescribes a duty, by obedience to which men might claim a promise of reward; and thus ἐργ. νόμ. will signify moral or ritual observances. Such, too, is the view of the sense adopted by every Expositor of note, especially Bp. Middl. and Dr. Peile; though not a few Expositors at all times have taken νόμου for τοῦ νόμου, the Mosaic Law. And this view is adopted by almost all the recent German Commentators, and Mr. Alf. Bp. Middl., however, urges, with great force, that 'any such explanation falls short of the Apostle's argument; it being his purpose to show, that no man whatever can be justified by the works either of the Jewish law, or of any other.' On the other hand, Mr. Alf. objects that 'no such general idea of Law seems ever to have been in the mind of the Apostle, but always the Law emanating from God, GOD'S LAW, whether in the partial revelation of it written in the consciences of the Gentiles, or in the more complete one given by Moses to the Jews.' And this view seems confirmed by the words at vv. 28, 29, χωρὶς ἔργων νόμου. 'H' Ἰουδαίων ὁ Θεὸς μόνον; Upon the whole, the point is a matter of doubtful disputation; and so much may be said for and against the latter interpretation, that it may justly be considered an open question.

In διὰ γὰρ νόμου ἐπίγνωσις αἰ. we have an argumentum à contrario; q. d. 'for by law, or by the law, is only the knowledge of sin'; q. d. 'so far from being justified, you only know that you are a sinner; of that sad truth you have a full and complete knowledge, arising from conviction.' Such is the full sense of ἐπίγνωσις. In short, the great doctrine which the Apostle is labouring to establish is (as Hodge well observes) this:—that the ground of the sinner's acceptance is not in himself; it is nothing subjective, no state of mind, no work of morality or form, nothing produced in him, or done by him, but something done for him, which he must accept, and on which he must rely.

<sup>21</sup> Having shown the utter insufficiency of human merit to attain salvation, the Apostle proceeds, vv. 21—30, to point out the method whereby alone men, whether Jews or Gentiles, can be justified; namely, the righteousness of God, or the justification by faith revealed in the Gospel, and through the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ,—whereby all boasting is excluded, since this justification, from its very nature, must be gratuitous. Thus all, both Jews and Gentiles, are placed on the same footing; and this doctrine is no other than that of the Old Test. also. First, then, the Apostle reverts to the subject he had touched on at i. 17,—namely, that by the Gospel alone is shown the way to salvation; which great truth he now proceeds more fully to establish.

—Νυνὶ δὲ—πεφανέρωται] Render: 'But now' (i. e. as things now are; so vii. 17. 1 Cor. xv. 20).

—χωρὶς νόμ., &c.] 'without (lit. 'apart from') Law, a righteousness [which is] of God (= God's righteousness) has been disclosed (comp. ἀποκαλύπτεται, supra i. 17), being borne witness to by the Law and the Prophets, constituting the body of Scripture, containing a recorded declaration of God's will.

<sup>22</sup> δικ. δι Θεοῦ, &c.] A continuation of the foregoing sentence, to which it is bound by the δι, which is exegetical, and may be rendered, 'and that, I say, or 'I mean' = 'namely': examples of which are adduced by Matth., Buttm., Kühn., Winer, and Hartung on the Particles. Render: 'a righteousness, to wit, of God, which is (appointed to be) through faith in Jesus Christ.'

—διὰ] denotes 'the instrumental cause;' as at vv. 24, 30 and Gal. ii. 16, where the death of Christ is said to be the efficient, and faith in Christ the instrumental, cause of our salvation. As to the force of the added words (so disputed as to their sense) αἰς πάντας καὶ ἐπὶ πάντας, I am still of opinion that pleonasm is not here to be supposed; but I now see reason to reject Prof. Stuart's view, according to which the ἐπὶ is understood to denote intention. That sense may rather be assigned to the αἰς, as signifying 'intended for all [without distinction of Jew or Gentile]'; though what is the exact meaning of the ἐπὶ I would not undertake positively to determine. Sufficiently apt is the sense assigned by Dr. Peile, 'realized unto, brought home to all,' viz., who truly repent and believe the Gospel; but proof is wanting that such a sense is inherent in the words. And, indeed, what is the precise sense that the Apostle himself meant to affix to the ἐπὶ, I would not venture positively to pronounce. I am now inclined to view this as constituting a pointed form of expression pregnant with meaning, such as may frequently be recognized in writers of great energy, such as Thucyd. and Demosth. To the passages I have already adduced from Thucyd. vi. 11, πᾶσι πλείστον καὶ διὰ πλείστον, I now add Plut.

p ch. 11. 32.
Gal. 3. 23.

q Matt. 30.
58.
Eph. 1. 7.
Tit. 2. 5, 7.
1 Pet. 1. 18.
2 Acts 13.
38, 39.
Col. 1. 30.
1 John 3. 2.
& 4. 10.

τοὺς πιστεύοντας· οὐ γάρ ἐστι διαστολή· <sup>23 p</sup> πάντες γὰρ ἡμαρτον, καὶ ὑστεροῦνται τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ· <sup>24 q</sup> δικαιούμενοι δωρεάν, τῇ αὐτοῦ χάριτι, διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ· <sup>25 r</sup> ὃν προέθετο ὁ Θεὸς ἰλαστήριον, διὰ τῆς πίστεως, ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι, εἰς ἔνδειξιν τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ, διὰ τὴν πάρεσιν τῶν προγεγονότων ἁμαρτημάτων <sup>26</sup> ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ τοῦ

Sympos. l. vii., ἡμεῖς αὐτοὺς χρῆσθαι συνειθίζομεν, ὡς ἐπὶ πᾶσιν ἔστιν καὶ πρὸς πάντας ἐξαγωγῇ, 'of which the divulgement to all and unto all is lawful'; though there, I admit, ἐπὶ may have the sense for, i. e. 'for their use and behoof,' as in Jos. Antt. xv. 9, 1, where we have χρήματα δαπανῆν πρὸς φιλοτιμίαν, 'for the purpose of munificence.'

23. We have here set forth the reason (and that, as Hyper. remarks, à contrario et per antithesin) why this was impossible; 'inasmuch as all have fallen short of the glory of God;' and, consequently, as salvation by works was impossible, it was necessary that this justification by faith should be manifested to all.

— Ὑστερεῖσθαι properly signifies 'to be left behind in a race;' but is here used in a figurative sense. What that υστερήσις is, will depend on the meaning ascribed to τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, which some interpret, 'the image of God, in which man was created;' others, more rightly, 'the glory and happiness of heaven,' as supra ii. 10. v. 2. viii. 18. Yet it should rather seem to mean (as Grot., Crel., Calv., Hyper., and Rosenm. explain) 'what will produce that,' namely, the approbation of God. The passage means, by Meiosis, they incurred his disapprobation. So at John xii. 48 we have ἡ δόξα τοῦ Θεοῦ opposed to ἡ δόξα τῶν ἀνθρώπων; and the Genit. is, in both passages, used as if ἐκ or παρὰ had preceded; as in John v. 41, δόξαν παρὰ ἀνθρώπων οὐ λαμβάνω, and at 1 Thess. ii. 6, οὐτὶς ζητοῦντες ἐξ ἀνθρώπων δόξαν, οὐτὶς, &c. Thus the expression υστεροῦνται will be very suitable; since, as υστερεῖν often signifies 'to come too late for any thing,' so it may mean 'to fail of attaining.'

24. δικαιούμενοι] scil. πάντες, on which the Particip. is dependent; the Participial sentence being, as Alf. observes, 'subordinated to the grand general statement of the insufficiency of all to attain to the glory of God.' This circumstance is to be attended to, since the words (as Hyper. remarks) form a 'propositionis generalis summa,' and, indeed, form the counterpart of the one just preceding; viz., that all who obtain this justification must obtain it δωρεάν, gratis, without reference to any merit, or desert, of their own. In the words following, τῇ αὐτοῦ χάριτι, we have an emphatical repetition; or rather (as Hyperius suggests) 'the Apostle meant by this to point at the principal efficient cause on the part of God in our justification; namely, his mere grace and favour.'

— διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως] denoting (as Calvin says) the material, or instrumental cause of our justification; namely, that 'by his obedience unto death Christ satisfied the justice of the Father, suffering in our stead, to free us from the tyranny of death, by which we had been held in bondage.'—ἀπολύτρωσις signifies properly, 'the act of redeeming any one' from death or slavery by paying the λύτρον, or price paid for ransom. It here denotes 'propitiation' (with allusion to the idea of 'ransom'), the method of redemption provided by Jesus Christ.

25, 26. ὃν προέθετο—ἰλαστήριον, &c.] 'This portion contains the ground of our deliverance from the curse of the law, and of our acceptance with God, and constitutes therefore the second step in the Apostle's exhibition of the plan of salvation. He had already taught that justification was not by works, but by faith, and entirely gratuitous; he now comes to show how it is that this exercise of mercy to the sinner can be reconciled with the justice of God, and the demands of the law.' (Hodge.) I know not why some Commentators, as Calv., Kypke, and others, should here render by 'fore-ordained, fore-appointed;' for πρὸ in composition has rarely the sense of ante, and never elsewhere with τίθημι. Hence I would retain the sense set forth, which is fully established by examples from the best writers; though the Apostle may have intended, besides the publicity of the appointment, to intimate, as Theophyl. says, ὅτι πάλαι προῤῥιστο ἡ διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀπολύτρωσις.—As to ἰλαστήριον, the best Expositors are agreed that it is (as in Dio Chrys. Orat. vol. ii. 184) an Adjective used substantively (like χαριστήριον, σωτήριον, &c.) to denote an expiatory victim, or a propitiatory offering, or sacrifice.—ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι ought not (as it has generally been) to be connected with διὰ τῆς πίστεως, but, as some of the best Expositors are agreed, with ἰλαστήριον. Thus διὰ τῆς πίστεως will be kept apart, as it ought to be; since it here denotes, as Hyper. remarks, the efficient instrumental cause, on our part, of our justification; or, as Alf., 'the subjective means of appropriating this propitiation;' while ἐν τῷ αἵματι denotes the formal instrumental cause thereof.

— προέθετο] Of the several senses assigned to this word, though that of 'set forth' deserves, as I have said, the preference, there may be a sacrificial allusion, as in Eurip. Iph. Aul. 1592.

— εἰς ἔνδειξιν τῆς δικ. αὐτοῦ] These words show the purpose of the setting forth above mentioned; namely, 'for a proof, or display, of his righteousness, the mode of justification which he proffers.' The next words, διὰ τὴν πάρεσιν, denote the instrument, or immediate cause; and may be rendered, 'by means of (or, through) the passing over, overlooking, the sins.' By προγεγονότων ἁμαρτ. are meant sins committed before the revelation of the Gospel.—ἐν τῇ ἀνοχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'by the forbearance of God.'

At ver. 26 we have a resumption and emphatical repetition of what had been before said (as supra 21, δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ—δικαιοσύνη δὲ Θεοῦ), the sense being, 'for a proof, or demonθεοῦ πρὸς ἄνδειξιν τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν δίκαιον, καὶ δικαιοῦντα τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ.

27 Ποῦ οὖν ἡ καύχησις; Ἐξεκλείσθη. Διὰ ποίου νόμου; τῶν ἔργων; Οὐχί· ἀλλὰ διὰ νόμου πίστεως. 28 * Λογιζόμεθα † οὖν, <sup>Acts 13. 39.</sup> <sup>Gal. 2. 16.</sup> πίστει δικαιόσθαι ἄνθρωπον χωρὶς ἔργων νόμου. 29 * Ἡ Ἰου-stration, (I say) of his method of justification.'—For ἰδεῖν, Laehm., Tisch., and Alf. edit from 4 uncial and a few cursive MSS., πρὸς τὴν ἰδ. But that reading is forbidden by the εἰς ἰδεῖν τῆς δίκ., found in all the MSS. at ver. 25; for it is not to be imagined that the Article would be omitted in one case, and employed in the other. Either is correct language; only, supposing the Article to be used, the sense will be, 'for the making known (i.e. for the purpose of making known), ad declarandum; ἰδεῖν being considered as a verbal noun, equiv. to the Latin gerund in dum. Alf., indeed, says that 'the Article distinguishes this ἰδεῖν from the former; as the fuller and ultimate object, of which that ἰδεῖν was a subordinate part.' But that is a view both forced and rapid. If the Article be adopted, it can only be justified in the way I have pointed out. However, internal evidence is against the Article, which was more likely to be inserted by Critics, who thought it necessary, than removed, or omitted, in all the MSS. except 7 or 8. 'In the clause εἰς τὸ εἶναι—Ἰησοῦ, the Apostle (says Stuart) looks back to the whole sentiment proposed in vv. 21—24; which is, that all men are sinners, and that a regard merely to the Law, i.e. a sense of justice merely on the part of God, or he being δικαιος merely, does not in itself permit justification by overlooking or setting aside the penalty of the Law; but the death of Christ is an expedient of infinite wisdom, by which the full claims of the Law may be admitted, and yet the penalty avoided, because a moral compensation, or equivalent, has been provided, by the sufferings of him who died in the sinner's stead.' Thus the satisfaction of the Redeemer has made the exercise of God's mercy consistent with his justice. And so, with reference to the four Divine attributes parted at the fall of Adam, having met at the birth of Christ, it is said, Pa. lxxv. 10, 'Mercy and Truth are met together; Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other.'

27. The Apostle now infers from what has been said, that all reason for boasting of their proper merits was excluded, both to Jews and Gentiles.

—διὰ νόμον πίστει] meaning, 'by the law which requires faith as the condition of justification, and refers every thing to faith alone, and the grace of God.'

28. We have here a repetition of the main proposition, again inculcated, both as a conclusion from the above premises, and to serve as a test whereon to adduce further arguments on the same subject.

—λογιζόμεθα οὖν, πίστει, &c.] 'We come, then, to this conclusion; that man (meaning men at large, both Jews and Gentiles) is justified by faith, apart from, and without reference to, the works of any law, and wholly in a gratuitous manner by faith in Christ. The being justified by faith is here plainly opposed to justifification by works, i.e. on the score of merit, or perfect obedience. Comp. supra, v. 24, and infra, v. 1. Gal. ii. 16. On these words it is remarked by Robert Hall (Works, vol. i. p. 334), 'When it is asserted that we are "justified by faith," I can understand it in no other sense than that we are justified by a penitential reliance on Christ's blood and righteousness, which as the Socinians have not, they cannot be saved.' That they are so to be understood is plain from another passage of this Epistle, v. 1 and 9; for, after saying, at v. 1, 'being justified by faith, we have peace with God,' the Apostle, at v. 9, subjoins, as equiv. to it, 'being justified by his blood' (ἐν τῷ αἵματι). We may, therefore, be allowed to combine the substance of both assertions, and we shall have the very definition laid down by Mr. Hall.

—For οὖν, A, D, F, G, and 9 cursives, read γάρ, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, and Alf., while Tisch. retains the text. rec.; rightly; since the authority for the change is insufficient; and internal evidence is not, as it had need be, entirely in favour of γάρ. Alf. thinks οὖν arose from misunderstanding λογιζόμεθα. But why should not οὖν have been a correction, from the same cause?—namely, by Critics who did not recognize a conclusion, and consequently accommodated the Particle to their view. As to Conybeare's reason for adopting γάρ,—that the argument seems to require it,—it is ill-founded, since it would only prove γάρ to be the more difficult reading, and therefore more likely to be genuine. Besides, Conyb. himself renders 'Therefore we conclude.' I mean not to assert that 'I conclude' is certainly the true rendering. The true sense seems to be, 'I reason.' So Calv., 'constituo;' and Hyper., 'arbitramur;' and a mighty master of logic (Calv.) says, 'Nunc principalem propositionem quasi indubiam colligit, addit etiam explicatione.' But what is reckoning, or reasoning, introduced by οὖν, but drawing a conclusion? It was because the ancient Critics did not understand this, that they altered οὖν into γάρ, though οὖν had been the reading as early as the time of the Peach. Syr. Version.

29. 'We have here the second result of the Gospel method of justification; it presents God as equally the God of the Gentiles and the Jews. He is such, because it is one God who justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith. He deals with both classes on precisely the same principles; he pursues, with regard to both, the same plan; and offers salvation to both on exactly the same terms.' (Hodge.) What is here said seems intended to anticipate an objection of the Jewish readers, who might lay hold on the term ἄνθρωπον in the generic sense, and ask, 'What, then, is God the God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews?' For that is, I conceive, the sense contained in the timidly expressed question, ἢ ἰουδαίων—μόνον; see supra vv. 8, 9, and notes. To this δαίων ὁ Θεὸς μόνον; οὐχὶ δὲ καὶ ἐθνῶν; ναὶ καὶ ἐθνῶν.

 30 † † ἐπεὶ περ εἰς ὁ Θεὸς, ὃς δικαιοῦσιν περιτομὴν ἐκ πίστεως, καὶ ἀκροβυστίαν διὰ τῆς πίστεως. 31 Νόμον οὖν καταργοῦμεν διὰ τῆς πίστεως; μὴ γένοιτο! ἀλλὰ νόμον ἰστώμεν.

a Isa. 51. 2.

IV. 1 Ἄ Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν Ἀβραὰμ τὸν πατέρα ἡμῶν εὐρηκέναι

the Apostle replies first by an interrogation, and then by a plain assertion, which is, in the next verse, supported by the reason,—namely, that one and the same God hath himself established this method of justification both for Jews and Gentiles, and therefore must be the God of the latter as well as of the former.

The words of v. 30, containing the inference from the preceding, are ushered in by ἐπεὶ περ, 'since, indeed'; a stronger form than ἐπει, and used by the best Class. writers; for which, however, εἰπερ is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, D<sup>8</sup>, and a very few cursives (to which I cannot make any addition), confirmed by some Fathers. And Alf. pronounces the text rec. to be 'a correction.' It may be such; for εἰπερ is sometimes used by Paul where we should expect ἐπεὶ περ in the sense 'if indeed' ('as is the case'), as at Rom. viii. 9. 2 Cor. v. 5. 1 Pet. ii. 3. But it can scarcely be supposed that the Apostle would use this refined Litotes in a case where the DIFFY is the subject of the words; and since εἰπερ and ἐπεὶ περ are elsewhere confounded by the scribes, so it may have been here; which is more probable than that all the copies except seven (for Scholz's et alii—repeated by Tisch. and Alf.—are nought). Besides, all the ancient Versions, except the Copt., confirm ἐπεὶ περ.

30. On the difference between ἐκ πίστεως and διὰ τῆς πίστεως, and why the Apostle should have used both expressions, and not been content with either one or the other, much has been said, but nothing determined. The Apostle, I apprehend, did not mean the very same sense in both, nor use the difference solely for the sake of verbal antithesis; but meant thereby to express a real, though minute, difference; but what that is, I would not undertake to say. His meaning may be, as Calv. thought, that the Jews would be justified out of faith [in the Gospel],—namely, by Christian faith being added to their Jewish faith; but the Gentiles solely through the faith [of the Gospel], without any part of the religion they had professed being left as a substratum. Mr. Alford thinks that 'the former phrase expresses the ground of justification, generally taken,—by faith; the latter the means whereby the man lays hold on justification, διὰ τῆς πίστεως, by his faith; the former is the objective ground, the latter the subjective medium.' The only remark thereon I would make is, that if the Apostle intended to express so far-fetched a sense, and to make so sophistical a distinction as that, could he reasonably suppose that any one of his readers would understand him? There is far more solidity in the view taken by Mr. Green, Gr. New Test. Dial. p. 300, who says that 'the Article appears to be prefixed to πίστεως in the second clause, in order strictly to identify the thing signified by it with that in the first; and that διὰ seems to be introduced for the purpose of further marking this circumstance by its peculiar precision and energy of signification; so that the resulting force of the expression is, that the uncircumcised are justified by the direct and unqualified instrumentality of the identical faith which operates in the case of the circumcised.'—Eligat lector!

31. Here again we have (as Hyper. observes) an anticipation of an objection on the part of the Jew; who might demur, that, if this were the case,—if faith were the ground of justification for all,—Jew as well as Gentile,—the law would be made void, and set aside. That this is not so, the Apostle proceeds to show; and thus the contents of the verse form the third result of this method,—that it, instead of invalidating, establishes the Law. Whether νόμον here means Law, or 'the Law of Moses,' is a much debated question, and 'adhuc sub judice lis est.' For my own part, I am now inclined to adopt the latter view. But, as in almost all the passages on which this controversy hinges, it comes to much the same thing whichever view be adopted. That in either sense the declaration is true, Prof. Hodge shows in the following words:—'If "the Law" means the Old Test. generally, then it is true; for the Gospel method of justification contradicts no one of its statements, is inconsistent with no one of its doctrines, and invalidates no one of its promises, but is harmonious with all, and confirmatory of the whole. If it means the Mosaic institutions specially, these were shadows, of which Christ is the substance. The Law is abolished, not by being pronounced spurious and invalid, but by having met its accomplishment, and answered its design, in the Gospel. What it taught and promised, the Gospel also teaches and promises, only in clearer and fuller measure. If it means the moral Law, which, no doubt, was prominently intended, still it is not invalidated, but established. No moral obligation is weakened, no penal sanction disregarded. The precepts are enforced by new and stronger motives, and the penalty is answered in Him, who "bore our sins in his own body on the tree."'

IV. Here commences Part II. of the Epistle (extending from hence to the end of ch. viii.), in which it is proved, that the Gospel doctrine of justification by faith, or gratuitous justification, does not make void any Law, whether natural or revealed, but is quite consistent with both. The Apostle had before evinced, 1. that justification and salvation are by faith only,—gratuitous, and not by works of law; 2. that to this the Gentile has an equal claim with the Jew. But there existed two prejudices in the mind of the Jew; one founded on their notions of the merit of circumcision, as entitling them to the favour of God (which would lead them to hold that justification is by works of the Law); the other founded on their birthright, as the children of Abraham, and heirs of the promise made to him. And this would lead them to deny that the Gentile has an equal claim to justification with the Jew. These two prejudices the Apostle now proceeds to encounter; the former, by adverting to Abraham, the father of circumcision; the latter, by examining the grounds of the covenant made with Abraham and his seed. He thus confirms both the above conclusions; proving, 1. that Abraham himself was justified by faith, and not by circumcision, since it was before he was circumcised that he obtained that justification (iv. 1—12); that therefore justification is by faith, i. e. is gratuitous, and not by works of law; and belongs to the uncircumcised Gentiles, no less than to the Jews: 2. That the believing Gentiles are part of the true seed of Abraham, intended in the promise (iv. 13—18); and that therefore the Gentiles, by faith in Jesus Christ, have equal claim with the Jews to justification, and all other benefits of the covenant.

κατὰ σάρκα; <sup>2</sup> εἰ γὰρ Ἀβραὰμ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη, ἔχει καύχημα· ἀλλ' οὐ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν. <sup>3</sup> <sup>b</sup> Τί γὰρ ἡ γραφή λέγει; <sup>d</sup> Gen. 15. 6. James 2. 24. Ἐπίστευσε δὲ Ἀβραὰμ τῷ Θεῷ, καὶ ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ

— τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, &c.] The οὖν is conclusive, with reference to νόμον ἰσχυόμεν,—q. d. 'such being the case,' granting this; 'the general sense being, 'What, therefore, shall we say that Abraham our father obtained [for justification] as to [any advantage from] the works of the flesh, or fleshly and external ordinances?'—Κατὰ σάρκα may be construed either with τὸν πατέρα ἡμῶν, or with εὐηκίαι. The former of these modes is preferred by several ancient, and many modern Interpreters. And the sense thus produced is not unsuitable; but a harsh transposition must thus be supposed, and the sense at εὐηκίαι will be left deficient; nay, perhaps be hardly such as can be borne out by truth. It is therefore better, with other ancient and most modern Commentators, to take it with εὐηκίαι, whereby the reasoning will be complete and apposite, as Alf. shows. Κατὰ σάρκα does not, as is commonly supposed, refer exclusively to circumcision; but extends also to the other external rites of the Law, as opposed to κατὰ πνεῦμα, viii. 4, 5, and denotes (as is said at Heb. vii. 16. ix. 10) such as are performed κατὰ νόμον ἐντολῆς σαρκικῆς. Thus σὰρξ sometimes (as at Gal. iv. 23. Rom. ix. 8) denotes what in man is external and corporeal, whence spring works, in opposition to what is internal and spiritual, the offspring of faith; see 1 Cor. x. 18. Phil. iii. 3. Gal. vi. 12. The interrogation implies, as often, a strong negation, which is supposed in the following formula, εἰ γὰρ, where we have a reason for the negation.

2. εἰ γὰρ—ἔχει καύχ.] Render: 'for if Abraham was justified by works, he hath whereof to boast'—'a ground of boasting.' See note on 1 Cor. ix. 17.—εἰ ἰδικ., 'if (as a matter of assumed fact) he was justified.'—ἀλλ' οὐ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, 'but not (at all) in respect to God' = 'in his sight.' Thus the sense may be expressed as follows: 'I grant that Abraham had advantages from his external privileges; he was, however, not justified by any works or merit of his own; certainly not in the sight of God [however he might of men]; for the Scripture saith,' &c. This the Apostle proceeds to prove from what we read of Abraham in the Old Test.

— πρὸς τὸν Θεόν] The τὸν is omitted in A, B, C, D, F, G, but not in a single cursive (not one of the Lamb. or Mus.); and the reading was thought so worthless by Griesb. and Scholz, that they left it unnoticed; though Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. have deemed it worthy of being received into the text; but on what grounds?—'because,' says Alford, 'the Article is inserted unnecessarily after πρὸς.' But that it should have been interpolated in all the copies but six, is incredible; and internal evidence is not for, but against, the removal; since, though the Article might be dispensed with after the Preposition, it is almost always used in the present phrase, as Heb. ii. 17, and v. 1, in all the copies; and so in Sept., Gen. xviii. 14, &c. And whereas in Rom. xv. 17, we have in a passage quite akin to the present in text. rec. τὰ πρὸς Θεόν, yet there Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from these very uncials, and two others, together with very many cursives (to which I can add all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), retain the τὸν, rightly; but it should seem in utter forgetfulness of their previous decision on the present passage, where it was more likely, that the πρὸς τὸν was omitted in those six MSS. through the carelessness of scribes, than inserted by Revisers in all the rest. Besides, it was more likely that Paul should have used the Article here, since he seems to have done it at xv. 17 and Heb. ii. 17. v. 1; and espec. since, though the Grammatical rule which respects the use of Prepositions, and their case (on which see Matth. Gr. § 272, and Winer, Gr. § 55), may either admit, or dispense with, the Article, yet in the case of Θεός the Article seems required κατὰ τὸ σιμῶν.

3. ἡ γραφή] i. e. 'the passage of Scripture.'—ἰσχυόμενος δὲ Ἀβρ. τῷ Θεῷ, i. e. 'implicitly believed in God's assurances;' and espec. as to what seemed, at the time of the promise, highly improbable—his having a numerous offspring.

— ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικ.] On the interpretation of these words some difference of opinion exists. By the ancient and early modern Commentators they are understood to express the doctrine of imputed righteousness; while others (consisting of the recent Commentators in general) take them (as did Grotius) to mean no more than this: 'Abraham believed in God, and his faith was accounted in him as righteousness, and, accordingly, he was gratuitously justified.' Such, too, was the view taken of the words by Philo, p. 493, who in the course of a copious explanation of the nature of this faith, says it was εἰς ἱκανὸν τοῦ πεπιστευκότος. And so also Chrysa. vol. i. 489, Savill. Indeed, St. James, ii. 23, applies the passage in this sense. Nevertheless, on carefully re-considering this difficult question, I do not well see how any other sense than that first mentioned can, consistently with the context, be ascribed to the words. But I am far from wishing to dogma-

o ch. 11. 8. εἰς δικαιοσύνην. 4<sup>o</sup> Τῷ δὲ ἐργαζομένῳ ὁ μισθὸς οὐ λογίζεται κατὰ χάριν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ [τὸ] ὀφείλημα. 5<sup>o</sup> τῷ δὲ μὴ ἐργαζομένῳ, πιστεύοντι δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν δικαιούντα τὸν ἀσεβῆ, λογίζεται d Ps. 71. 2. ἡ πίστις αὐτοῦ εἰς δικαιοσύνην. 6<sup>a</sup> Καθάπερ καὶ Δαυὶδ λέγει τὸν μακαρισμὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ᾧ ὁ Θεὸς λογίζεται δικαιοσύνην χωρὶς ἔργων 7 Μακάριοι ὧν ἀφέβησαν αἱ ἀνομίαι, καὶ

time on what may be considered an open question; and it cannot be denied that the second mentioned interpretation has been maintained with great ability; espec. by Dr. Macknight; who thinks that 'the meaning of the expression ἐλογίσθη εἰς δικαιοσύνην is sufficiently explained by the convertible terms at v. 8,' which we may translate either 'to whom the Lord shall not impute,' or 'whom the Lord shall not charge with, sinfulness' (or 'guilt'). In short, adds he, what has been termed 'imputed righteousness' is seen from a comparison of vv. 6, 7, 8, to be neither more nor less than 'non-imputed guilt.' Comp. 2 Cor. v. 19, Θεὸς ἦν ἐν Χριστῷ κόσμον καταλλάσσειν ἑαυτῷ, μὴ λογιζόμενος αὐτοῖς τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν. 'Inter hasce duas sententias dijudicet lector.'

4. τῷ δὲ ἐργαζομένῳ, &c.] We have here an illustration taken from common life; and the full sense is: 'Now to him who worketh for reward the reward is not counted, or accounted, (λογίζεται, for ἐλογίζεται) as a matter of favour, but in the light of a debt.' Of course it is implied that the work is done; for that is indispensable to the application, which is here, as often, mixed up with the illustration. Comp. Thucyd. ii. 40, οὐκ ἐς χάριν, ἀλλ' ἐς ὀφείλημα τὴν ἀρετὴν ἀποδίδωσιν, and Hdtan. ii. 11, 14, χάριν οὐκ ᾔδισαν' δόλημα γὰρ αὐτὸν ἀποτίνειν, ἀλλ' οὐ δωρεάν διανέμειν, ἐλογίζοντο. —By τῷ ἔργῳ, must here be meant, 'to him who performs all the ἔργα νόμου, who yields entire obedience to the precepts of the law.'—τὸ ὀφείλημα for τὸ ὀφειλόμενον, 'what is owed or due from the employer.' The Article τὸ has, indeed, no place in 9 uncial and many cursive MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. MSS., with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), and has been cancelled by Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and Alford. How it found its way into any MSS., Bp. Middl. thinks 'it is not easy to say or explain, except,' remarks Dr. Peile, 'on the supposition of its genuineness.' It was, I apprehend, the very difficulty of accounting for the Article that made the Alexandrian Critics omise it; for they did not see why the Article should have been used here, since it was not used at χάριν, and they thought fit to make the two passages square; and thus internal evidence is quite in favour of the word. As to Alford's way of accounting for the insertion, as 'agreeing better with the idea of an obligation incurred,' that is wholly gratuitous and improbable. Besides, the extreme antiquity of the reading attests its genuineness: for that it was read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator cannot be doubted, from his Version—'his wages are reckoned to him'—as that which is owing to him. Whence it appears that he took τὸ ὀφείλημα, as I have done, for τὸ ὀφειλόμενον; and this expresses the force of the Article better than the way adopted by Dr. Peile.

5. τῷ δὲ μὴ ἔργῳ.] This is to be explained from τῷ ἔργῳ, and must therefore mean, 'he who does not perform his duty thoroughly, and therefore has nothing whereof to boast, cannot pretend to have wrought all righteousness, and therefore cannot rest on it.'

The words πιστεύοντι δὲ—ἀσεβῆ, then, must be explained with reference to μὴ ἐργαζομένῳ. And hence Commentators have done wrong in limiting the sense to believing, since it seems to include abandonment of all claim to salvation on the score of works, and such hearty and entire acceptance of the plan of salvation through grace, as shall secure, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, such a fulfilment of the conditions on which justification and acceptance are suspended, as may through mercy be accepted. Now if this be the sense of πιστ., it will follow that τὸν δικαιούντα τὸν ἀσεβῆ must signify who justifieth the sinner; for it clearly appears from the context, that τὸν ἀσεβῆ is only a variation in phrase for τὸν ἐργαζόμενον, and is to be explained in conformity to that term.

To such a person, it is added, λογίζεται ἡ πίστις αὐτοῦ εἰς δικαιοσύνην, by which is meant, that 'his faithful though imperfect service (in many things μὴ ἐργαζόμενῳ, and therefore ἀσεβῆ) is accounted and reckoned for righteousness; or, in other words, he is treated as the ἐργαζόμενος; and hath, κατὰ χάριν, the μισθὸν assigned to him, as if it were an ὀφείλημα.' 'But to him who aims not at reward on the score of work done, but believeth, reposes his trust for salvation, on him who justifieth (i. e. holds blameless, not imputing transgression to) the sinner, his faith is counted (lit. put on count) for righteousness.'

6. Having adduced the example of Abraham, as being gratuitously justified through faith, the Apostle now goes on, in confirmation of the above assertion, to adduce the example of David, as serving to show (what he had before asserted at iii. 31) that he does not disannul the Old Testament Scriptures by setting forth the doctrine of gratuitous justification.

—καθάπερ καὶ Δαυὶδ, &c.] q. d. 'This mode of justifying men is agreeable to what David says, when he speaks of the blessedness, &c.—χωρὶς ἔργων, 'apart from works,' 'without any consideration of the merit of the works, and consequently by grace only.' From the mode in which the two words λογίζεται and ἀσεβῆ in the Psalmist are applied by Paul, it is plain that, to impute, or reckon, righteousness without works, is the same as to impute faith for righteousness; or, in other words, that 'the remission of sin' is taken as equiv. to 'the imputation of righteousness.'

ὧν ἐπεκαλύφθησαν αἱ ἁμαρτίαι. <sup>8</sup> μακάριος ἄνθρωπος
οὐ μὴ λογίσσεται Κύριος ἁμαρτίαν. <sup>9</sup> Ὁ μακαρισμός οὖν οὗτος ἐπὶ τὴν περιτομὴν, ἣ καὶ ἐπὶ τὴν ἀκροβυστίαν;
λέγομεν γὰρ ὅτι ἐλογίσθη τῷ Ἀβραάμ ἡ πίστις εἰς δικαιοσύνην.
<sup>10</sup> Πῶς οὖν ἐλογίσθη; ἐν περιτομῇ ὄντι, ἢ ἐν ἀκροβυστίᾳ; Οὐκ
ἐν περιτομῇ, ἀλλ' ἐν ἀκροβυστίᾳ. <sup>11</sup> * Καὶ σημεῖον ἔλαβε περι- <sup>Gen. 17. 11</sup>
τομῆς, σφραγίδα τῆς δικαιοσύνης τῆς πίστεως τῆς ἐν τῇ ἀκρο- <sup>Gal. 3. 7.</sup> βυστίᾳ· εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πατέρα πάντων τῶν πιστεούντων δι' ἀκροβυστίας· (εἰς τὸ λογισθῆναι καὶ αὐτοῖς τὴν δικαιοσύνην).
<sup>12</sup> καὶ πατέρα περιτομῆς, τοῖς οὐκ ἐκ περιτομῆς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ
τοῖς στοιχοῦσι τοῖς ἔχουσιν τῆς ἐν τῇ ἀκροβυστίᾳ πίστεως τοῦ <sup>Gen. 15. 6.</sup>
πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἀβραάμ. <sup>13</sup> Ὁ γὰρ διὰ νόμου ἢ ἐπαγγελίας τῷ <sup>Gal. 3. 12.</sup>

8. οὐ μὴ λογίσσεται. K. ἀμ.] This is equiv. to the foregoing phrase, and plainly shows what Paul means by faith being imputed for righteousness.

9. The Apostle has now prepared the way to refute the special allegation designed to be made by the question at v. 1. He has already shown that justification on the ground of merit is out of the question; since even Abraham and David were justified gratuitously, and not ἐξ ἔργων. He now proceeds to prove (up to v. 25) that the blessedness of justification without reference to works is not confined to the Circumcision (i. e. the Jews), but extends to the Gentiles also; which position is established, 1. from Abraham having been justified before he was circumcised (vv. 8—12); whence it is argued, that the Gentiles, therefore, who have the same faith as Abraham, will have it in the same way counted to them for righteousness. 2. This extent of blessing is proved from God's promise to Abraham.

— λέγομεν γὰρ—δικαιοσύνη·] 'for we say ('allege') that to Abraham faith was reckoned for righteousness.' The γὰρ is exegetical and resumptive; since Paul argues from the position already established; and there seems an emphasis on τῷ Ἀβρ.

10. πῶς οὖν ἔλογ.;] 'how then (under what circumstances) was it reckoned?' To which the answer strongly negatives the ἐν περιτομῇ,—for of course what was long subsequent to his justification (perhaps twenty-five, certainly at least fourteen years) could not be either the ground, or necessary condition, of his justification. See more in Mackn. and Peile.

11. 'As Paul had shown that circumcision was not the condition of justification, it was necessary to declare its true nature and design.' (Hodge.) The Apostle's meaning is, that though Abraham's receiving circumcision after he was justified was a proof that circumcision did not cause that justification, nevertheless circumcision was not without its use, it being a σημεῖον, nay, a σφραγίς,—for the latter term is stronger than the former, and by which far more is denoted, the word having reference, not to external signs, but to internal and spiritual effects;—a pledge and confirmation of the acceptance of his faith while yet uncircumcised, δι' ἀκροβυστίας for ἐν ἀκροβυστίᾳ. Comp. Gen. xvii. 5.

— λογισθ. καὶ αὐτοῖς τὴν δικαιοσύνην.] The καὶ has much force, the sense being, 'to them too,'—a sense, however, which the scribes not perceiving, inadvertently omitted the word, which accordingly is not found in the two most ancient MSS. and ten others, and has been cancelled by Lachm., and Tisch., ed. 1, but restored by Tisch., ed. 2.

12. τοῖς στοιχοῦσι τοῖς ἔχουσιν τῆς—πίστεως] lit. 'who walk by, follow the steps of,' &c. On the nature of the metaphor, see notes on Gal. v. 25, and 2 Cor. xii. 18. Comp. Philo, t. ii. 385, τοῖς αὐτοῖς ἔχουσιν ἑτακολουθῆσαι. The construction is as though the words had stood thus:—καὶ πατέρα περιτομῆς, εἰς τὸ λογισθῆναι αὐτοῖς τὴν δικαιοσύνην, τοῖς οὐκ ἐκ περιτομῆς μόνον, &c. The general sense intended is, that 'Abraham is the exemplar of all uncircumcised believers, as well as of those Jews, who not only carry the same external mark (namely, of circumcision), but exercise the same faith, as did their father, and the Originator of their Covenant.' The τῇ before ἀκροβ. is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. on the authority of 6 uncial and a few cursive MSS. But it is called for by the use of the same word at ver. 11, of which this is a repetition. The Critics, we may suppose, cancelled it because not used at ver. 10, which is no reason at all.

13. The Apostle now adduces another argument in refutation of the Jewish prejudice,—that the Gentiles, as not being Abraham's seed, could not be entitled to the promises. With respect to the promise of a heavenly inheritance, it did not rest upon legal observances, so as to include only the natural seed of Abraham, but upon the righteousness of faith (v. 13). If, indeed, it had rested upon the Law, God's faithfulness would have been void, and the promise of no effect, inasmuch as the condition could not have been performed (vv. 14, 15). It was therefore made to depend on the condition of faith, in order that it might be of free grace; and include all the spiritual seed of the great patriarch, who, in the sight of God, and in accordance with the Scriptures (Gen. xvii. 5), is the father of all the faithful (vv. 16, 17).

— διὰ νόμου] 'through law;' meaning, by obedience to a law of works, like the Jewish Law. Connect the words διὰ νόμου with τὸ

Ἀβραὰμ ἢ τῷ σπέρματι αὐτοῦ, τὸ κληρονόμον αὐτὸν εἶναι [τοῦ] κόσμου, ἀλλὰ διὰ δικαιοσύνης πίστεως. <sup>14</sup> Εἰ γὰρ οἱ ἐκ νόμου, κληρονόμοι, κεκένωται ἡ πίστις, καὶ κατήργηται ἡ ἐπαγγελία. <sup>15</sup> ὁ γὰρ νόμος ὀργὴν κατεργάζεται· οὐ γὰρ οὐκ ἔστι νόμος, οὐδὲ παράβασις. <sup>16</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο ἐκ πίστεως, ἵνα κατὰ χάριν, εἰς τὸ εἶναι βεβαίαν τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν παντὶ τῷ σπέρματι, οὐ τῷ ἐκ τοῦ νόμου μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῷ ἐκ πίστεως Ἀβραὰμ, ὃς ἐστὶ πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν, <sup>17</sup> (καθὼς γέγραπται "Ὅτι πατέρα

g ch. 2. 20.
 2. 13, 20.
 2. 7, 10.
 1 John 15. 22.
 1 Cor. 15. 44.
 2 Cor. 2. 7, 9.
 h Gal. 2. 16.
 16, 24.

1 Gen. 17. 8.
 Heb. 11. 12.

κληρονόμον εἶναι, interpret them by the opposite phrase διὰ δικαιοσύνης πίστεως, and translate, 'For not by any legal righteousness was it promised to Abraham or to his seed, that he [or they, as his seed] should inherit an universal dominion, but by the righteousness of faith.' With respect to the nature of the promise, τὸ κληρονόμον αὐτὸν εἶναι τοῦ κόσμου, some (consisting, for the most part, of the ancient and earlier modern Commentators) take the words in a spiritual sense; referring them to the universal extension of Gospel privileges, as comprehended in the promise, 'in thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed;' all believers being regarded as Abraham's children. See Gal. iii. 8. Others understand τοῦ κόσμου as equiv. to τῆς γῆς, 'the land of Canaan;' that being a type of a better country, even a heavenly (Gen. xvii. 7, 8. Heb. xi. 14, 16), promised to the sons of Abraham in every age; meaning those who, like him, practically believe the word of God. Hence τοῦ κόσμου, they think, refers primarily to the Land of Promise, and secondarily to the blessings vouchsafed to all believers. On carefully reconsidering this perplexing question, I am induced to embrace the former view; and thus "the inheritance of the world" will denote (as Alf. says) that ultimate lordship over the whole world, which Abraham, as the father of the faithful in all nations, and Christ, as the Seed of the Promise, shall possess; the former figuratively indeed, but the latter personally and actually. 'In this sense,' observes Hodge, 'the promise includes the universal prevalence of the true religion; involving, of course, the advent of Christ, the establishment of his kingdom, and all its consequent blessings.'

14. Here we have, as Calv. says, an argumentum ab impossibili, vel absurdo. 'For,' as Abp. Newc. says, 'if the observance of a positive law was the ground of the Divine favour, faith is of no avail (which is contrary to v. 5), and the promise is annulled;' or, as Bp. Terrot explains, 'if the promise be limited to those who can plead a meritorious obedience, then faith is set aside, and the promise itself rendered totally ineffective.'

— οἱ ἐκ νόμου] scil. οἱ δίκαιοι; meaning 'those who are righteous by performing injunctions of law, and who rest on it for justification.' Comp. οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, οἱ ἐκ πίστεως.

— κεκένωται, καὶ κατήργηται] These two terms differ as vanis and derogatis; the former signifying vanis, lit. 'non-working'; the latter, 'ineffective.' Render: 'Faith is made void, by being deprived of its virtue; and the promise has become nought and dead.' Comp. ἀργὴν λόγον in Cic. de Fat. 12, and James ii. 20, in Lachm. and Tisch. text is ἡ πίστις χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων ἀργὴ ἴστω, for text. rec. νεκρά,—but see my note. The reason for this inefficiency and virtual annulment is subjoined.

15. ὁ γὰρ νόμος ὀργὴν κατεργ. ] 'for the law (the Mosaic, or any other) only worketh out, or produces, penal wrath;' q. d. 'the tendency of law is only to make persons amenable to punishment for the violation of it;' inasmuch as laws give occasion to offences (which are but the breach of laws), and offences lead to punishment. Of this sense of ὀργή (to denote the punitive wrath of the law), examples occur in Rom. v. 9. Eccles. vii. 16, and Demosth. 628, 4. Reiske, τῷ δράσαντι δ' οὐκ ἴστω τὴν ὀργὴν—ἵταξεν ὁ νόμος.

— οὐδὲ παράβασις] We should, indeed, have expected οὐ γὰρ ἴστω νόμοι, &c.; and accordingly Beza would cancel the οὐκ. But this is unnecessary, as well as unauthorised; for (as it has been seen by PARUS and CROLL.) 'since the Apostle is arguing from the necessary connexion of causes and effects, the proposition is convertible, and contains, by inference, the affirmative one,—that where there is law there is transgression.' De Wette, indeed, accounts for the negative clause, by alleging that 'the negative refers to the time before the Mosaic law, when there was no transgression, and therefore no wrath;'—a most sophistical turn, and founded in falsity, through forgetfulness of the fact, that even before Moses there was, as in the case of the Heathens, the law of God written in the heart (which of itself brings in the knowledge of sin); so that there was the ἔργον τοῦ νόμου (as the Apostle says supra ii. 15) γραπτὸν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις αὐτῶν, συμπαρουρούσης αὐτῶν τῆς συνειδήσεως—τῶν λογισμῶν κατηγορούντων.

16. This and the verse following contain the conclusion from the preceding reasoning, and the argument here intended is: 'because, then, law can never justify, but only condemn, it follows that, if justification be at all bestowed on sinners, it must come in some other way than a legal one.' At ἐκ πίστεως, repeat ἡ ἐπαγγελία [γίνονται] from v. 13.

— παντὶ τῷ σπέρματι.] i. e. to both the kinds of Abraham's seed above-mentioned, not only to the Jews, but to those who were ἐκ πίστεως Ἀβραὰμ, followed the faith of Abraham, in consideration of which, they, though uncircumcised, are called Abraham's seed.—πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν, viz. by the descent of faith, and spiritually.

πολλῶν ἐθνῶν τέθεικά σε) κατέναντι οὐ ἐπίστευσε Θεοῦ, τοῦ ζωοποιούντος τοὺς νεκροὺς, καὶ καλοῦντος τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα. 18 Ὡς παρ' ἐλπίδα ἐπ' ἐλπίδι ἐπίστευσεν, εἰς τὸ γενέ- Gen. 18. 4 σθαι αὐτὸν πατέρα πολλῶν ἐθνῶν, κατὰ τὸ εἰρημένον Οὕτως Gen. 17. 17.
ἔσται τὸ σπέρμα σου 19 καὶ μὴ ἀσθενήσας τῇ πίστει, Gen. 11. 12.
οὐ κατενόησε τὸ ἑαυτοῦ σῶμα ἤδη νεκρωμένον, ἑκατονταετῆς

17. καθὼς γέγραπται] 'agreeably to what is written in Scripture.' Gen. xvii. 5, Sept. Of τέθεικά σε, the sense seems to be, 'I have [now] constituted thee, = I do hereby constitute thee, &c.; a promise of which the true and real fulfilment must be spiritual, and therefore belongs to the spiritual seed, of which Abraham is father in respect of faith. 'In fact, there is (as Stuart remarks) a double paternity assigned to Abraham. Many nations are to descend from him literally: his seed are literally to possess the land of Canaan. But he is also to become the spiritual father of many nations; and in him are all the families of the earth to be blessed.'

— κατέναντι οὐ ἐπίστ. Θεοῦ] The construction is, κατὰ. Θεοῦ, οὐ (for εἰς) ἐπίστουσι. Render: 'who (i. e. Abraham) is the father of us all in the sight of that God on whom he believed.' It is plainly a case of grammatical attraction, as in John ii. 22, et al., and the only strangeness is in the order of the words; which, however, has a parallel at Mark vi. 16. Acts xxi. 16.

— τοῦ ζωοποιούντος—ὡς ὄντα] The sense here has been disputed; some taking ζωον. in a physical, others in a metaphorical acceptation. The latter view involves considerable harshness, and is little accordant with the words following. Far more natural, simple, and satisfactory is the former, adopted by Theodoret, Estius, Elmer, Carpov, Loesner, Schleusner, Rosenm., Fritz., Thol., and Stuart, who are of opinion that the words, while alluding to the circumstances of Abraham and Sarah, adverted to at v. 19, and of Abraham being the father of many nations yet unborn, were, however, principally intended to express the unlimited power of God by examples especially illustrative of omnipotence,—raising the dead, and exercising almighty creative power. Far more difficulty is found in the next words, καὶ καλοῦντος τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα, chiefly, I agree with Alf., 'owing to the idea that this exactly corresponds to the former, as furnishing another example of God's creative omnipotence.' But, to produce this exact tallying, great violence must be done to the words, notwithstanding the endeavours of the above mentioned Expositors, who mostly adopt this view to evade it; and hence the passages which they adduce from Philo, p. 728, τὰ μὴ ὄντα ἐκάλειεν εἰς τὸ εἶναι, and Clem. Rom. Epist. 11. v. 1, ἐκάλειεν ἡμᾶς, οὐκ ὄντας, καὶ ἠθέλησαν ἐκ τοῦ μὴ ὄντος εἶναι ἡμᾶς, are very specious; but, when sifted, are found not to the purpose. I agree with Mr. Alf. so far as to see in this clause, not a repetition of the former, but a new attribute of the Almighty; not, however, I apprehend, of God's omnipotence and eternity, in the sense, 'who nameth things that are not, as being in existence,' but, by an expansion of the foregoing, i. e. 'of God's omnipotence and omniscience.' This I find confirmed by the suffrage of Prof. Hodge, who observes, that 'the passage may be considered, 1. As a description of the omnipotence of God. The promise made to Abraham seemed impossible of fulfilment; yet he believed in that Almighty God who quickens the dead, and calls (i. e. commands and controls) things that are not as though they were. 2. It may be explained more in reference to the Divine omniscience. God foresaw how numerous would be the spiritual seed of Abraham. He was declared to be the father of many nations in the sight of that God who sees the end from the beginning, who wakes up the dead, and before whom the future and the present, the non-existent and the already existing, are alike. Both these ideas may be united; the object of Abraham's faith was the Almighty and all-seeing God, who sees and controls the living and the dead, the future and the present, with equal ease.'

18—22. There is here a more particular description of Abraham's faith, as resting on Divine omnipotence. In order to do this, the Apostle states first its object—the Divine promise (v. 18); and then he illustrates its strength, by reference to the seeming impossibility of the thing promised (vv. 19, 20); he then intimates the ground of his faith, as the power and veracity of God (v. 21). At v. 22 is pointed out the result of that confidence,—namely, that Abraham was justified by his faith.

18. παρ' ἐλπίδα ἐπ' ἐλπίδι, &c.] An elegant Oxymoron, with which Grotius compares the apex insuperata of the Latin writers. Render: 'who, contrary to all grounds of hope, believed with a confident hope.' In this and the similar expression at Acts ii. 26, κατασκηνοῦσι ἐπ' ἐλπίδι, there is some Genitive understood at ἐλπίδι, which is supposed to be supplied from the context and the subject. Here it is ἐπαγγελίας, 'the assurance,' namely, that he should be the father of many nations, Gen. xv. 5.

— οὕτως—σου] 'as numerous as the stars of heaven,' which is to be supplied from the context of the passage in Genesis. Comp. Ps. cxlvii. 4.

19. καὶ μὴ ἀσθενήσας] 'and being not weak in faith.' An elegant Litotes for 'being strong in faith.' So οὐ διεκρίθη at ver. 20.—οὐ κατεν., 'did not heed, or regard,' namely, in the way of distrust. Comp. Heb. x. 21, 'did not heed the difficulty, and, because his faith overcame all demur, he ceased to regard,' &c. The reference is to Gen. xv. 5, 6, where the terms 'believed in the Lord' must, from the next words, be taken of implicit faith.

— νεκρωμένον] That Abraham forty years after had six children by Keturah, does not invalidate this assertion; for (as Whitby and Mackn. observe) since Abraham's body had been miraculously renewed, as also was that of Sarah (Heb. xi. 11), it might preserve its vigour long after.

1 Heb. 11. 15. που ὑπάρχων, καὶ τὴν νέκρωσιν τῆς μητέρας Σάρρας 20<sup>1</sup> εἰς δὲ τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐ διεκρίθη τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ, ἀλλ' ἐνεδυναμώθη τῇ πίστει, δὸς δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ, 21<sup>m</sup> καὶ πληροφορηθεὶς ὅτι ὁ ἐπ' ἡγγελται, δυνατός ἐστι καὶ ποιῆσαι. 22 διὸ καὶ ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην. 23<sup>n</sup> Οὐκ ἐγράφη δὲ δι' αὐτὸν μόνον, ὅτι ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ. 24<sup>o</sup> ἀλλὰ καὶ δι' ἡμᾶς, οἷς μέλλει λογίζεσθαι, τοῖς πιστεύουσιν ἐπὶ τὸν ἐγείραντα Ἰησοῦν τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν ἐκ νεκρῶν 25<sup>p</sup> ὃς παρεδόθη διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν, καὶ ἡγήθη διὰ τὴν δικαίωσιν ἡμῶν.

V. 1<sup>a</sup> Δικαιωθέντες οὖν ἐκ πίστεως, εἰρήνην ἔχομεν πρὸς τὸν

20. οὐ διεκρίθη] 'he staggered not,' 'wavered not,' for οὐκ ἰδίωται or ἐνδολεαί—is frequently, as here, used in the sense at. See Matt. xxi. 21. Rom. xiv. 23.

—δοὺς δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ] i. e. 'ascribing to God the glory due unto him,' by acknowledging his attributes of omnipotence and truth, whereby, as is added, 'he was fully persuaded,' &c.

21. πληροφ.] lit. 'full-filled,' 'fully persuaded.' See note at Luke i. 1.

23. Application of what was said, to the believers in Christ, and that by way of inference; q. d. that it is the true method of justification, inasmuch as the record was made in order to teach us this truth; in the words of Hodge, 'We are situated as Abraham was; we are called upon to believe in Almighty God, who, by raising up Christ from the dead, has accepted him as the propitiation for our sins, vv. 23—25.'

—οὐκ ἐγράφη—μόνον] 'Now it was not written on his account alone, that (his faith) was imputed to him for righteousness; but on our account too, to intimate to us the necessity of a like faith.' I find this interpretation confirmed by Calv., in an able and instructive note; also by Theophyl., who remarks that 'the words are an answer to a tacit objection;' q. d. 'What is that to us?—Ανεμ. Much; it was written on our account, so that we may obtain the like justification, if we have a like faith.'

24. τοῖς πιστεύουσιν, &c.] 'namely, to us who believe on him who raised Jesus from the dead;' thus intimating that 'those who believe in what God has done and said with respect to the Messiah will be justified through their faith, in like manner as Abraham was by his.'

The Apostle here concludes the Chapter with an animated description and commendation of Abraham's faith, showing the happy consequences of imitating it to all who profess to be disciples of Christ.

25. παρεδόθη] 'was delivered.'—διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν, 'for,' 'on account of,' 'in expiation of, our sins,' since our sins had made such an atonement necessary. See note on 1 Cor. xv. 3.

—διὰ τὴν δικ. ἡμῶν] 'on account of our justification,' i. e. in order that the work of justification might be completed; for if Christ be not risen, then our faith were vain; and thus the Apostle treats these two august events, the death, and the resurrection, of Christ, by the former of which he was made a sacrifice for sin, and in the latter led the way to justification unto life everlasting. Thus the Apostle introduces the grand subject of the next four chapters—Death, as connected with Sin, and Life with Righteousness.

V. Having established these two points; I. the efficacy of the Gospel to justification, for which end the Law had failed; and the extension of this grace to all, both Jews and Gentiles, through faith; the Apostle proceeds (as Calvin says) to illustrate what he had said on justification through faith, by adverting to its effects and fruits in the principal Gospel-graces, each in their order, as 1. Justification, or pardon of sins past. 2. Peace with God (vi. 1), which ensues immediately upon Justification, and is the same with Reconciliation (v. 10) and a State of favour (v. 2). 3. The Hope of glory (v. 2) or of the glorious inheritance of the sons of God in heaven; see 1 Pet. i. 3, 4. 4. The Gift of the Holy Spirit (v. 5), which is the seal of our adoption (viii. 15) and the earnest of our heavenly inheritance, Eph. i. 14. These are privileges freely conferred on us by God, upon our admission by Baptism into the Christian Covenant. Then comes, 5. Sanctification of heart and life, through the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit (vi. 2, 4, 6, 11, 14, 22. viii. 3, 4, 12, 13). This is the condition to be fulfilled on our part; upon which there follows: 6. A grounded Hope of a glorious resurrection (v. 11. vi. 5, 8, 22. viii. 14, 16, 17, 18, 23, 24, 25). 7. Salvation finally perfected in the everlasting possession of the heavenly kingdom (v. 9, 10, 11. vi. 22, 23. viii. 13, 17, 18, 19, 23).

To advert to the contents of the present Chapter, it is shown that being thus justified, 1. We have peace with God, and we enjoy, through Christ, free access to a state of favour with God, and thus are led to rejoice in the hope of future glory, vv. 1, 2. II. We are supported and comforted in all our afflictions during the present life; nay, we may even rejoice in them as the instruments of spiritual good to us, vv. 3, 5. III. All this good is rendered certain, and the hope of it ensured, by the fact, that Christ, having died for us while in a state of enmity and alienation, and having thus reconciled us to God, will not fail to perfect the work which he has thus begun, vv. 6, 10. IV. We may now rejoice in God (who is as truly our covenant God, as he had been that of the Jews), on account of the reconciliation which Christ has effected, v. 11. V. This state of reconciliation with, or filial relation to, God is now extended to all men (i. e. proffered to all, laid open for all, rendered accessible to all), in like manner as the evils occa-

Θεὸν διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ <sup>3</sup> δι' οὗ καὶ τὴν <sup>b</sup> John 10. a. <sup>c</sup> 14. a. <sup>d</sup> 1 Cor. 15. 1. <sup>e</sup> Eph. 2. 12. <sup>f</sup> 2. 13. <sup>g</sup> Heb. 2. a. <sup>h</sup> 10. 10. <sup>i</sup> 2 Cor. 12. <sup>j</sup> James 1. 2. <sup>k</sup> James 1. 8.

προσαγωγὴν ἐσχάκαμεν τῇ πίστει εἰς τὴν χάριν ταύτην ἐν ᾗ ἐστήκαμεν καὶ καυχώμεθα ἐπ' ἐλπίδι τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ.

<sup>3</sup> Οὐ μόνον δὲ, ἀλλὰ καὶ καυχώμεθα ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσιν <sup>4</sup> εἰδό-

sioned by the sin of our first parent have extended to all, vv. 12, 14. Yea, such is the greatness of Christ's redemption, that the blessings procured by his death far exceed the evils occasioned by the sin of Adam, vv. 15, 19; they even exceed all the evils consequent upon the sins of men, who live under the light of revelation, vv. 20, 21.

1. εἰρήνην ἔχομεν] 'we have reconciliation and friendship with God (as opposed to a state of alienation and enmity, vv. 9, 10) through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus.' The phrase εἰρ. ἔχ. represents the state of those spoken of supra ii. 10, as opposed to the state of those mentioned Jer. xvi. 5, ἀφίστακα τὴν εἰρήνην μου ἀπὸ τοῦ λαοῦ τούτου. Hence we see that this peace is the fruit of God's being reconciled to man.

For ἔχομεν, A, B, C, D, J, K, and 30 cursives, with some Fathers, have ἔχωμεν, which was edited by Scholz and Lachm.; but the text. rec. is retained by Tisch. and Alf.,—rightly; since external authority for the other reading is insufficient; especially as it is opposed by internal evidence, as Mr. Alford decidedly pronounces, on the ground that the hortatory form is inadmissible. This he shows on evidence superabundant. Suffice it to say, that the whole passage is declaratory,—namely, of the results flowing from Justification by Faith, which, of course, excludes exhortation. Besides, it is, as I have observed in my Supplementary note, called for by the course of reasoning, this having peace being the first of four consequences, laid down by the Apostle, of Justification by Faith. But, in doing so much (ἐκ περιστάσεως), to exclude ἔχωμεν, Alf. has left undone, what is very desirable when it can be effected,—to show how the false reading arose; in this case it was, I doubt not, from Itacism, by the confusion of e and o, which perpetually occurs in the most ancient MSS., especially the uncials, and in those cursives which were copied from them, and are of the same family. I can, however, only find one of the Lamb., Mus., and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, that has ἔχωμεν,—namely, Mus. 11,836, of the 11th century, which occasionally stands almost alone with A, B, D, E.

2. τὴν προσαγωγὴν] The word properly denoted approach, but was often used of the permission of approach to great persons; and thus, by an easy transition, might denote introduction to a state of favour and acceptance, χάρις.

—προσαγωγὴν ἐσχάκαμεν—ἐστήκαμεν] Render: 'through whom also we have obtained our admission (lit. 'the access we have') into this grace (state of grace) in which, by justification, we stand.' The forensic allusion which some Expositors trace in ἐστήκα, as if it meant stand justified, or acquitted, is not to be sustained, since it would introduce an incongruity of ideas. In the present context, by stand must be meant 'stand fast in faith and perseverance,' as in Eph. vi. 13, στήται. 2 Cor. i. 24, πιστεῖ ἐστήκατε.

Rom. xiv. 4. But the passages most parallel to the present are 1 Cor. xv. 1, γινώσκω ὑμῖν—τὸ εὐαγγέλιον—ἐν ᾧ ἐστήκατε (i. e. have stood and do stand in perseverance and faith), and 1 Pet. v. 12, ἐπιμαρτυρῶν ταύτην εἶναι ἀληθῆ χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ, εἰς ἣν (for ἐν ᾧ, which, indeed, has place in the Alex. and a few other MSS.) ἐστήκατε. In all these passages ἐστ. denotes the steadfastly persevering in the faith and practice of the Gospel, which is, in the last two passages, considered as a state of grace to be continued in. The other passages where προσαγωγή is used,—namely, Eph. ii. 18, and iii. 12, are of another kind, since it is introduction to a person, not access to a state, that is there meant; though the two ideas are closely connected, as it is in this case by introduction to the person that we obtain access to the state. Chrys., Theophyl., and Theodor. point to baptism (the washing of regeneration) in Christ's name as the appointed means of access to the Father, John xiv. 6, and consequently to the state of grace obtained through him.

—καὶ καυχ.—Θεοῦ] There is here a pregnancy of sense; q. d. 'we exult over, and rejoice in, the hope of the glory of God,' the hope of that glory which God will admit us to the participation. Comp. John xvii. 22.

3. οὐ μόνον δὲ, ἀλλὰ καὶ καυχ.—θλίψ.] There is here again a pregnancy of sense, which fully expressed will stand thus:—'And not only so (as to the future in hope), but we rejoice under, and exult in (as to the present) tribulations.' This is confirmed by the scope of the context, which is ably traced by Bp. Warburton, Div. Leg. vol. v. p. 139, thus:—'St. Paul, opposing the advantages which the Gentile converts had by Faith, to those which the Jews gloried in having by the Law, adds, in order to show those advantages in the highest superiority, that the Christian Gentiles could glory even in that which was an opprobrium among the Jews,—namely, tribulation. But the followers of Christ, who were taught that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God, had the same reason to glory in the roughness of the road, as the ancient AGONISTÆ had in the toils which procured them the victory.' The ground of the exaltation seems implied (so Chrys., ὡς κοινωνοῦντες τῷ Δισπότῃ τῶν παθημάτων), and is expressed in 1 Pet. iv. 13 (the best exposition of this passage), καθὼς κοινωνεῖτε τοῖς τοῦ Χριστοῦ παθήμασι, χαίρετε, ἵνα καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ χαρὴν ἀγαλλιάμενοι.

4. εἰδότες ὅτι—ἐλπίδα] A fine climax; as at ix. 29, 30. x. 13, seqq.; with which Schoettgen compares the following similar one in a Rabbinical writer: 'Industry leads us to innocence; innocence to purity; purity to holiness; holiness to humility; humility to fear of sin; fear of sin to piety; piety to the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit to the resurrection of the dead; the resurrection of the dead to Elias the Prophet.'

τες ὅτι ἡ θλίψις ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ δοκιμὴν, ἡ δὲ δοκιμὴ ἐλπίδα. <sup>5</sup> ἡ δὲ ἐλπίς οὐ κατασχύνει· ὅτι ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐκκέχυται ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν διὰ Πνεύματος ἁγίου τοῦ δοθέντος ἡμῖν. <sup>6</sup> Ὅτι γὰρ Χριστὸς, ὄντων ἡμῶν ἀσθενῶν, κατὰ καιρὸν ὑπὲρ ἀσεβῶν ἀπέθανε. <sup>7</sup> Μόλις γὰρ ὑπὲρ δικαίου ε Eph. 2. 1.

Col. 2. 12.
1 Pet. 2. 12.

— κατεργάζεται] ‘worketh out,’ ‘brings about;’ i. e. tends to do so, and, if borne with fortitude, does so.

— δοκιμὴν] Not probationem, with some, nor experientiam, with others; but (with an allusion to the δοκιμή, by which the goodness of certain articles was put to the proof) exactly as we sometimes use the word proof, to denote something approved, and shown to be excellent, by proof and test; a just estimate of ourselves, and of our real spiritual state, as the result of the self-examination produced by affliction. This view was long ago propounded by me, and has since been embraced by Bp. Terrot and Dr. Peile, who have confirmed and further illustrated the interpretation. Mr. Alford, however, interprets δοκιμὴν, ‘approval.’ But I find no support to this view in any ancient authorities,—nor, indeed, in any modern Expositor of eminence. As to Bengel’s note, cited by Alford, ‘δοκιμή est qualitas ejus, qui est δοκιμὸς,’ it does not appear to have proceeded from sufficient examination. It might be approved, if for qualitas were written status; and thus it will square with my interpretation, as adopted by Bp. Terrot, who well observes,—‘Christians in a state of comfort are apt to take for granted the extent and strength of their devotedness to God; but persecution or suffering calls it all into exercise, and enables them to judge of it accurately. And if upon this trial our devotedness be found strong, then have we a sure and reasonable hope that we are the children of God.’ The above view of the import of δοκ. I find confirmed by Theophyl., Theod., and Œcum., and also by Thom. Aquin., Calv., and Hyper., to whose notes I refer my readers.

5. ἡ δὲ ἐλπίς οὐ κατασχύνει] The full sense is, ‘Now the hope we thus obtain is one that does not (as human hope so commonly does) put us to the shame of disappointment (see Pa. xxi. 5); [and why?] because the love of God (our feeling of his love to us) is abundantly imparted to our hearts,—poured out, by the Holy Spirit given to us.’ The correctness of this representation of the sense is confirmed by Mr. Green, Gram. N. T., p. 262, who says that, ‘taken in conjunction with the words at ver. 8, συνίστησι δὲ τῇ ἐαυτοῦ ἀγάπῃ εἰς ἡμᾶς, the sense must be: “our hearts are, by an (rather, the) influence of the Holy Spirit, pervaded by a sense of God’s love to us.” Accordingly, the ground of our assurance is not in the strength of our purpose, or confidence in our own goodness, but in the love of God towards us.’

6—10. We have here a confirmation and illustration of what was just before said, of the power of Christian hope, as founded on the abundant love of God; and, by way of obviating any objection thereto, founded on desponding doubts and fears, by reference to the unworthiness of the objects, the greatness and freeness of the Divine love is set forth by an argumentum à majori ad

minus (or à fortiori) deduced from the unspeakable love of God already manifested in giving his Son for their redemption, when they were yet in the state of heathens and enemies; q. d. ‘Give not way to desponding fears; for if Christ hath already done the greater work for you by reconciling you to God, when ye were his enemies by evil works, will he not much more do that for you, when his friends.—nay, children.—which is far less difficult, by keeping you from evil, preserving you in his word and truth, saving you by his omnipotent grace,—so that his finished ransom and perpetual intercession may terminate in your finished salvation, by being, through his atonement and intercession, presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy!’

6. ἀσθενῶν] The term properly denotes weak, generally through sickness. Now, considering the effect of sin in depraving and weakening both the mental and moral energies (see Isaiah i. 5) it well expresses the helplessness—imbecility as to good, frailty as to evil, of sinners. Ἀσθενῶν, just after, seems used κατ’ ἐκτενέστερον, q. d. ‘when we were yet in a state of extreme spiritual weakness, nay, sinfulness, Christ,’ &c. The expression κατὰ καιρὸν signifies properly, ‘at any fixed or appointed time,’ and is so used by the Sept. in Job v. 26, and Ia. lx. 22. Here, however, from the context, it must denote ‘the time fixed in the counsels of God,’ and consequently ‘in due time,’ as in Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. § 24, ἰδωμεν τὴν κατὰ καιρὸν γινομένην ἀνάστασιν, and in Athen., p. 110, Α, οὐ κατὰ καιρὸν τὸ μαρτύριον—παράθεσθαι. Thus it is equiv. to τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου in Gal. iv. 4, where see note.

7. μόλις γὰρ, &c.] The magnitude of the benefit is now set forth by a popular mode of illustration, showing the difference between the voluntary sacrifice of Christ for sinners, and the possible case of any man dying for an eminently good and beneficent person, but scarcely so of one dying for a merely just one. Of the two γὰρ the first is meant to introduce the illustration, and may be rendered now; the second is exceptional, and meant to introduce a limitation; q. d. ‘[I do not say none] for, &c.’ It is strange that there should have been any difference of opinion on the scope of δικαίου and τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, which some take of things, not persons. But thus the Article would be required at δικαίου, and the force of the illustration would be much weakened. Both are undoubtedly meant of persons; and so far from there being, as some have thought, a tautology, the difference is marked; δικαίου signifying ‘one who is strictly just,’ ἀγαθοῦ, ‘one who is benevolent,’ χρηστός, implying beneficent. There is, indeed, a climax, or ascending gradation; the Apostle’s object being, as Bp. Jebb remarks, to illustrate the exceeding love of Christ, by a contrasted analogy, derived from human feelings. ‘Look around you in the world; where will you find a person ready to die for a just man? Is it more than a low degree probability, a mere perhaps, that you will find a person with magnanimity to die even for that rare character, THE GOOD MAN? [Rightly so rendered the Art. pointing to the circumstance of his being a benefactor to his fellow-men, and especially of the person who is ready to lay down his own life for him.] But not such was the love of Christ; he died for those who not only were not good, who were not even just; for the weak and frail, and the ungodly; for *sinner*s, and for enemies.

τις ἀποθανεῖται (ὑπὲρ γὰρ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ τάχα τις καὶ τολμᾷ ἀποθανεῖν) <sup>8</sup> <sup>f John 15. 13.</sup> <sup>h Heb. 9. 15.</sup> <sup>i Pet. 3. 18.</sup> συνίστησι δὲ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἀγάπην εἰς ἡμᾶς ὁ Θεός, ὅτι, ἐτι ἁμαρτωλῶν ὄντων ἡμῶν, Χριστὸς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἀπέθανε. <sup>9</sup> <sup>g 1 Thess. 1. 10.</sup> Πολλῶ οὖν μᾶλλον, δικαιοσύνες νῦν ἐν τῷ αἵματι αὐτοῦ, σωθисόμεθα δι' αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ τῆς ὀργῆς. <sup>10</sup> <sup>h 2 Cor. 5. 18.</sup> <sup>i Col. 1. 21, 22.</sup> <sup>j 3 Cor. 4. 10, 11.</sup> Εἰ γὰρ, ἐχθροὶ ὄντες, κατηλλάγημεν τῷ Θεῷ διὰ τοῦ θανάτου τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, πολλῶ μᾶλλον, καταλλαγέντες, σωθисόμεθα ἐν τῇ ζωῇ αὐτοῦ. <sup>11</sup> Οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ καὶ καυχώμενοι ἐν τῷ Θεῷ διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, δι' οὗ νῦν τὴν καταλλαγὴν ἐλάβομεν. <sup>12</sup> <sup>k Gen. 2. 17.</sup> <sup>l 2. 9.</sup> <sup>m ch. 6. 22.</sup> <sup>n 1 Cor. 15. 21.</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο, ὥσπερ δι' ἐνὸς ἀνθρώπου ἡ ἁμαρτία εἰς τὸν

— καὶ τολμᾷ] 'may even venture,' entreprenat, may bring himself. So Plato, Polit. i. δὲ ἂν μῆτις ἐν τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ, καὶ τολμήσειεν ἀπ' ἵχεσθαι τῶν ἀλλοτρίων.
— τάχα—μολίς] 'peradventure—with difficulty;' the latter Particle is meant to qualify and to limit the force of the former. τολμᾷ Present, for Fut., to correspond to ἀποθανεῖται.

8. συνίστησι δέ] 'whereas God sets forth.' See supra iii. 5, and note. The στ. should be rendered, namely that; as in x. 9. 2 Cor. v. 14. Phil. i. 27. ii. 22. Col. i. 19. 1 Thess. i. 5. ii. 14.

There is here a variation of position in the uncial MSS., of which D, E, F, G, J, and 2 cursives (to which I can make no addition), read ὁ Θεὸς εἰς ἡμ. for the text. rec. εἰς ἡμ. ὁ Θεός, while B omits ὁ Θεός altogether. Lachm. and Tisch. adopt the reading of D, &c.; while Alf. expunges the word; a course which he affirms 'Critical principles render necessary.' But, so far from that, Critical principles properly understood—by knowing how to apply the Critical Canon he alludes to—forbid it; because the omission in one MS. may be accounted for, without supposing interpolation. Indeed, if the Canon were to be applied in this ad libitum way, hundreds of words and clauses, which even our Critical Editors are pleased to yet spare us, would be cut out; for, in almost all cases of variety of position, a few copies, more or less, are found to omit; in which case I have often observed a vacant space left, which the Framers of the text meant to fill up, when he had made up his mind which to adopt of two or more varieties of reading, and then forgot to fill it up.

9, 10. These verses draw an inference from the greatness and freeness of God's love, as just set forth, that believers shall be ultimately saved. It is an argument a fortiori; if the greater benefit has been bestowed, the less will not be withheld. (Hodge.) The distinction between the two seemingly convertible terms δικαιοσύνες and καταλλαγίς is thus pointed out by Br. Terrot: 'the former term has reference only to what passes in the Divine mind, when God for just and sufficient causes acquits the sinner; the latter refers not only to this, but also to the change which takes place in the heart of the sinner towards God.'—σωθисόμεθα refers to the final result of present justification and reconciliation, namely, eternal salvation; which result the reconciled sinner is prevented from forfeiting by the assistance of the Holy Spirit. And this assistance is derived from Christ, who, in that life which he now lives at the right hand of the Father, maketh intercession for his people.

11. οὐ μόνον δέ] scil. τοῦτο. Chrysostom and the Greek Commentators rightly supply ἰσώθημεν from σωθисόμεθα at ver. 9, ver. 10 being parenthetical.

—καυχώμενοι] I am now inclined to think, with Dr. Peile, that this participle is to be connected grammatically with καταλλαγίς, as a further reason for our Christian hope,—that, through the continued mediation of our Redeemer, we shall ultimately be saved, seeing that not only have we had our sentence of condemnation (ver. 16) reversed, but more than this, seeing that, like his ancient people (Ps. xlv. 8), we make our boast in God as our covenant Father (comp. Isa. lxxiii. 16) through Jesus Christ, by whom, &c.

—τὴν καταλλαγὴν] meaning 'the reconciliation and atonement obtained by Christ's death,' as being the consequence of the atonement and expiation made by him, as is obvious from various passages of Scripture; see Heb. ii. 17. 2 Cor. v. 18, 19. Heb. ix. 26.

12—21. The design of this portion is to illustrate the doctrine of the justification of sinners on the ground of the righteousness of Christ, by a reference to the condemnation of men from the sin of Adam. Such is the scope of the passage, 1. from the context; 2. from the connection; and 3. from the course of argument.

12. διὰ τοῦτο] 'quæ cum ista sint,' 'such being the case,' 'there being this reconciliation'; as infra xiii. 6. Matt. xiii. 13. xiv. 2. xxi. 43.

In the words following, most Expositors are agreed, that 'the latter part of the comparison is left to be supplied from the subsequent verses; the sense being suspended, on account of intervening explanations and illustrations, till we come to verses 18, 19, and 21.' Hyperius thinks it was left so by the Apostle, in order that 'statim κόσμον εἰσῆλθε, καὶ διὰ τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὁ θάνατος, καὶ οὕτως εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους ὁ θάνατος διῆλθεν, ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον — 13<sup>k</sup> ἄχρι γὰρ νόμου ἁμαρτία ἦν ἐν κόσμῳ· ἁμαρτία δὲ οὐκ ἐλλογεῖται μὴ ὄντος νόμου. 14<sup>1</sup> Ἀλλ' ἐβασίλευσεν ὁ θάνατος ἀπὸ Ἀδὰμ μέχρι Μωϋσέως, καὶ ἐπὶ τοὺς μὴ ἁμαρτήσαντας ἐπὶ τῷ ὁμοιώματι τῆς παραβάσεως Ἀδὰμ, ὅς ἐστι τύπος τοῦ μέλ-κ ch. 4. 18.

11 Cor. 15.
21, 22, 45.

plura attexeret de peccati vi et effectu, per quas illustriora reddantur, quæ mox subjiçientur de justitia per Christum illata.' If completed, he adds, it would have stood thus: 'Quemadmodum per unum hominem (Adamum) peccatum in mundum introiit, et per peccatum mors, et sic in omnes homines mors pervasit, quatenus omnes peccavimus: ita per unum hominem, Christum, justitia in mundum allata est, ac per justitiam vita; et sic ad omnes homines vita pervenit, quatenus omnes credidimus.'

— εἰσῆλθε] 'was introduced.' A frequent idiom. So Thucyd. ii. 54, ἡ ὄσος—ἐκ Πειλοπόνησον οὐκ εἰσῆλθε. Διῆλθε, by the same idiom, signifies 'was transmitted,' namely, from generation to generation.

— ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον] Some recent Expositors objecting to the sense, inasmuch as, which has been ascribed to ἐφ' ᾧ, on the ground that infants, who have not sinned as yet, are liable to death, have proposed various other senses,—all unauthorized and unnecessary; since we have only to understand by ἥμαρτον (sinned) that they 'are treated as sinners,' are considered guilty in the sight of God; namely, on account of Adam's fall. Thus the expression will be equivalent to μαρτυροῦντο κατεστάθηναι at ver. 19. And ἐφ' ᾧ may be rendered because.

13. This and the next verse are meant to establish the proposition contained in the preceding one; and that by anticipating an objection; namely, that 'since, when there was no law, there was no transgression, death ought not to have been inflicted.' The difficulty in this passage is chiefly occasioned by extreme brevity, and a blending of the objections with the answers. The sense of the whole mainly depends upon the interpretation of ἄχρι νόμου, which Origen, and also some modern Commentators, render, 'during the law.' The signif. is however inadmissible, and indeed inapplicable: see the learned discussion of Tittman de Synon. p. 33, seqq. on the force of ἄχρι and μέχρι, which is intimately connected with the sense of this whole passage. However, I am now inclined to adopt that which Dr. Peile propounds (after Dr. Burton), rendering thus: 'For, so far only as there was law, so far only was guilt in the world; but men are not chargeable with guilt when they have no law [to restrain or guide them] (in other words, personal sin is not imputed to them): still, when men had, in a manner, no law [yet was there not the patriarchal law?] death had full sway even over such as had not sinned in the likeness of Adam's transgression.' See more in Dr. Peile's note, and, on the other hand, consult that of Professor Hodge, who defends the common interpretation with his usual ability, but not with his usual success. Both of them have treated too perfunctorily the term ἐλλογεῖται, which, from its importance as connected with the doctrine of imputed sin, merits more than ordinary attention. Suffice it to say, that the word is so rare, that it has only been found in this and another passage of St. Paul (Philém. 18), and in a Greek inscription occurring in Boeckh's Inscr. Græc. t. i. p. 850. In the passage of Philém. it is used in its proper sense, 'to reckon in' any thing, 'enter it' on any λόγοι, or account of debtor and creditor, or generally into any account of superficies or measurement of surface, as in the fore-mentioned inscription: μὴ ἐλλογουμένων ταῖς ματρῆσιν ἀπάσαι, μήτε ραίθρων, μήτε ὅσα (scil. μέρη) τραχία ὄντα καὶ μὴ δυνάμενα γεωργεῖσθαι. Now in the present passage the term is used figuratively, and the meaning intended must be, that 'sin is not taken into account as respects a person not living under any law, implying a liability to it.' But this will not weaken the case of those who maintain, as does Prof. Hodge, that the simple doctrine and argument of the Apostle is, that 'there are penal evils, which come upon men antecedently to any transgressions of their own; and that, as the infliction of these evils implies a violation of law, it follows that they are regarded as sinners on account of the disobedience of another.' It is remarkable, that in this passage, and that of Philém. 18, above noticed, Lachm. and Tisch. should read, from a few uncial MSS., ἐλλόγα, and Lachm. place in the margin here, as probably genuine, ἐλλογᾶται; for there is not the slightest vestige of any such verb as ἐλλογᾶω. And vain were it to adduce Lucian, Lexiph. c. 15, ἡ γλῶττα—λογᾶ; for that is no other than a term coined by Lucian, on the model of desideratives in ισω, to ridicule Lexiphanes. Both that, and the reading of A here, ἐλλογᾶτο, arose from the scribe's, through zeugma. Thus emended, the reading will be that found in a few very ancient cursives (I add Mus. 16, 184, and Cov. 3, 1, m, omitted by Mill) for ἐλλογᾶτο, which arose from an accusative spelling of ἐλλογεῖται for —ται.

14. ἑβασίλευσε] 'had exerted his uncontrollable force.' This is said by prosopopæia; of which examples are adduced by Wetstein from the Rabbinical and the Classical writers. Τὸς μὴ ἁμαρτ., 'who had not sinned;' meaning, as Bp. Warburton remarks (Works, vol. vi. p. 259), 'those who died before they came to the knowledge of good and evil,—namely, infants and idiots.' The words ἐκ τῷ ὅμ. τῆς παραβ. 'A. are to be connected with ἑβασίλευσε. Render: 'sinned by a transgression like that of Adam.'

— ὅς ἐστι τύπος τοῦ μέλλ.] scil. Ἀδὰμ,—namely, Christ. It has been shown, that in the Rabbinical writers, and even in Josephus, mention is often made of the first Adam, which, of course, implies a second Adam. By τύπος is here imported a general resemblance in certain λοῦτος. 15<sup>m</sup> Ἄλλ' οὐχ ὡς τὸ παράπτωμα, οὕτω καὶ τὸ χάρισμα. m. Isa. 53, 11

Matt. 20, 28.
& 22, 20.
εἰ γὰρ τῷ τοῦ ἐνὸς παραπτώματι οἱ πολλοὶ ἀπέθανον, πολλῶ μᾶλλον ἢ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ ἡ δωρεὰ ἐν χάριτι τῇ τοῦ ἐνὸς ἀνθρώπου, Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, εἰς τοὺς πολλοὺς ἐπερίσσευσε.
16 Καὶ οὐχ ὡς δι' ἐνὸς ἀμαρτήσαντος, τὸ δώρημα· τὸ μὲν γὰρ κρίμα ἐξ ἐνὸς εἰς κατάκριμα, τὸ δὲ χάρισμα ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων εἰς δικαίωμα. 17 Εἰ γὰρ τῷ τοῦ ἐνὸς παραπτώματι ὁ θάνατος ἐβασίλευσε διὰ τοῦ ἐνὸς, πολλῶ μᾶλλον οἱ τὴν περυσσείαν τῆς χάριτος καὶ τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς δικαιοσύνης λαμβά-relations and circumstances. Of the various points of similarity between the first and the second Adam, the principal one is that here adverted to by the Apostle; that, 'by the first Adam sia came into the world; by the second came righteousness.' And as all mankind were represented in Adam, as being the cause of their punishment; so were they all represented in Christ, as being the cause of their restoration.

15. Ἄλλ' οὐχ ὡς τὸ παρὰτ., &c.] Here strict regularity would have required the corresponding part of the comparison between Christ and Adam to have been resumed; but the Apostle, struck with a difference in some respects, again stops to remark this difference; i. e. advantageous difference, in three ways; and in this verse is introduced the first advantageous difference. The sentiment is very briefly worded, and consequently only to be understood by the context, in which it is intimated, that the cases, though parallel, are not exactly alike. 'It is (observes Hodge) more consistent with our views of the character of God that many should be benefited by the merit of one, than that they should suffer for the sin of one; q. d. 'If the latter has happened, much more may we expect the former [taking οὐχ οὕτω, with Dr. Peile, for ὡς οὕτω and ἀχρι at ver. 17]; yet not to the extent of the transgression does the forgiveness go, but much further.'

—εἰ γὰρ τῷ τοῦ ἐνὸς, &c.] The sense is, 'For, if (equiv. to 'what if, what though') by the transgression of the one the many have died, much more (= further, to a greater extent) has the grace of God, and the gift received by the grace of the one, abounded (doth abound, rebound superabundantly) to the many.' The Article is used in order to point the opposition between the two parties—the one (as it were representative) man Jesus Christ, as opposed to the many members of the human family thus represented. By ἐπερίσσευσε it is intimated, that the benefit of the free gift hath abounded to a far greater extent, πολλῶ μᾶλλον, than did the injury of, &c. The words of ver. 16 are to be explained on the same principle; q. d. 'And not as was the transgression which arose from the one [Adam], who sinned, not to that extent, so [is] the free grant of forgiveness; i. e. 'so far only does it go.'

16. Here there is adduced the second advantageous difference.

—καὶ οὐχ ὡς δι' ἐνὸς, &c.] The sentence has something elliptical, and anomalous in construction. Some verb must be supplied; whether ἔστι, or ἔχει, matters not; and also some noun;

though not, what some supply, ὁ θάνατος ἔλαθον, which is inadmissible by any rule of ellipsis; rather, τὸ κρίμα, as suggested by the words following, τὸ μὲν γὰρ κρίμα, &c. So in the subsequent clause, παραπτώματος is to be supplied at ἐνὸς, from παραπτωμάτων which follows. Moreover, in the διὰ is also implied ἔλαθον, or such like. Render: 'And not as was the transgression, which came through one (i. e. Adam) who sinned, so is the free gift.' The sentence, more plainly worded, would have stood thus: καὶ οὐχ ὡς δι' ἐνὸς, ἀμαρτήσαντος, τὸ κρίμα, οὕτω δι' ἐνὸς, δικαιούντος, τὸ δώρημα.

—τὸ μὲν γὰρ κρίμα, &c.] We have here the same kind of ellipsis as in the preceding words. The sentence fully expressed would have stood thus: τὸ μὲν γὰρ κρίμα, ἐξ ἐνὸς παραπτώματος ἐσλήθην εἰς τὸν κόσμον, εἰς κατάκριμα· τὸ δὲ χάρισμα, ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτωμάτων ἀναφέρει, εἰς δικαίωμα.

The ἐκ in ἐκ πολλῶν παραπτ. is adapted to the ἐξ of the antithetical clause, and therefore must not be too rigorously interpreted. We may render, 'on behalf of,' or, 'on the part of.' At its sub. ἐγένετο, 'issued in,' 'produced.' The terms δώρημα (free pardon) and χάρισμα, scil. χάριτι (gift of salvation), are equiv. and denote the δικαίωμα. The πολλῶν has great force; for, as Theophyl. observes, 'the pardon granted by God did not take away that one sin of Adam only, but all the sins which were committed in the world after it.' See note on Matt. xx. 28. The full sense of δικαίωμα here is 'the being pronounced just by verdict of acquittal.'

17. Now is introduced the third point of advantageous difference; and the meaning of the words is well laid down by Hodge thus: 'If, on account of the offence of one [the one] we are condemned, much more shall those who receive the righteousness graciously offered to them in the Gospel not only be delivered from condemnation, but also reign in life by one [rather, the one], Christ Jesus; in other words, be gloriously exalted in the participation of life and felicity with Christ, who is the author, or fountain of life, and in whose life do we see life, just as in the light (i. e. 'the favour,' see Ps. xliv. 3. Prov. xvi. 15) of God do we see and experience light, felicity, and glory.'

To advert to a few points of philology.—τῆς δωρεᾶς τῆς δικ. is for τῆς δικαιοσύνης δωρημένης, 'the justification granted by grace.' By ἐν ζωῇ βασιλ. is meant (as Macknight observes) 'that they shall have infinitely greater happiness in their new life, than they had misery and sorrows in the state into which they were brought νοῦτες, ἐν ζωῇ βασιλεύσουσι διὰ τοῦ ἐνός, Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.— 18 Ἄρα οὖν ὡς δι' ἐνός παραπτώματος εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπους, εἰς κατὰκριμα· οὕτω καὶ δι' ἐνός δικαιώματος εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώ-πους, εἰς δικαίωσιν ζωῆς. 19 Ὡς περ γὰρ διὰ τῆς παρακοῆς τοῦ ἐνός ἀνθρώπου ἁμαρτωλοὶ κατεστάθησαν οἱ πολλοί, οὕτω καὶ διὰ τῆς ὑπακοῆς τοῦ ἐνός δίκαιοι κατασταθήσονται οἱ πολλοί. 20 Ὁ νόμος δὲ παρεσιῆλθεν, ἵνα πλεονάσῃ τὸ παράπτωμα.

n ch. 4. 15.
 & 7. 8.
 Gal. 3. 19, 20.

through Adam's disobedience, expressed by the reigning of death in this verse, and in ver. 14. The term expresses 'height of felicity,' with an adjunct notion of 'exalted honour'; so 2 Tim. ii. 12, εἰ ὑπομένομεν, καὶ συμβασιλεύσομεν.

18. Ἄρα οὖν ὡς] Here the οὖν is resumptive, taking up the thread of reasoning, dropped at ver. 12, and summing up the argument; though the Particle does not lose its ratiocinative force. Render: 'So then as,' &c. Of course in this very elliptical construction κρίμα and χάρισμα must be supplied from the preceding context, v. 16. Of course θάνατος is implied in κρίμα (put for κατακρ.) as corresponding to ζωῆς. Death spiritual, like death natural, is represented as the execution of a sentence of condemnation passed on all men. So in Joa. Antt. xvii. 6, 2, death is spoken of as τὸ καταψυγισμῶν, scil. κατὰ τὴν ἀνθρώπων. So also Xen. Apol. 27, καταψυγισμῶν ἦν μου ὑπὸ τῆς φύσεως θάνατος. The words may be rendered thus:—'So then, as by means of one transgression judgment [came] upon all men unto condemnation (to death), so also by means of one [righteousness] the free gift (= 'forgiveness') came unto all men unto justification of life;' or, as Hodge, 'that justification which is connected with life,—of which life is the consequence.' As to the strongly debated question about the 'all,' see Hodge, who, as may be supposed, decides it in such a way as shall be agreeable to the system of Calvin; not aware, it should seem, that Calvin, in his Commentary, takes a very different view from that which he had adopted in his Institutes, written in early youth, where he annotates thus: 'Communem omnium gratiam facit, quia omnibus exposita est, non quod ad omnes extendatur re ipsa. Nam etsi passus est Christus pro peccatis totius mundi, atque OMNIBUS INDIFFERENTER Dei benignitate offertur, non tamen omnes apprehendunt.' 'So,' remarks Stuart, 'do men speak when they look away from system, and have thoroughly studied the Scriptures, as Calvin had done when he wrote this. In his early work, the Institutes, he has sometimes exhibited sentiments which differ from these.' There is reason, however, to think that occasional variations of sentiment in the mind of Calvin had commenced, and been going on very long before he wrote his Commentary. A most competent judge of such matters, the late Bp. Burgess, more than once assured me that, on comparing various editions of the Institutes which appeared during Calvin's life, he observed not a few changes of statements on doctrinal matters, all of them modifying the system adopted in that work, and agreeing with those in his Commentary.

19. This verse is explanatory of the preceding, and οἱ πολλοί should be rendered 'the many,'

which, as appears from the foregoing, is equiv. to πάντας: the main drift of the Apostle throughout this passage being to set forth the universality of the Redemption, as being co-extensive with the evil introduced at the fall, which it was designed to remedy. So Dr. Bentley, in his masterly Sermon on Popery, after quoting what is said at ver. 12, and the redditiō at ver. 15, remarks: 'Who would not wish that our Translators had kept the Articles in the Version which they saw in the Original? thus, "If through the offence of the one (that is, Adam) the many have died, much more the grace of God, by the one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto the many." By this accurate version, some hurtful mistakes about partial redemption, and absolute reprobation, had been happily prevented. Our English readers had then seen, what several of the Fathers saw and testified, that οἱ πολλοί, the many, in an antithesis to the one, are equiv. to πάντας, all, in ver. 12, and comprehended the whole multitude, the entire species of mankind, exclusive only of the one. So again, vv. 18, 19, our Translators have repeated the like mistake; where, when the Apostle has said, that 'as the offence of one was upon all men (εἰς πάντας ἀνθρώπων) to condemnation, so the righteousness of one was upon all men to justification,' 'for,' adds he, 'as by the one man's disobedience (τοῦ ἐνός) the many (οἱ πολλοί) were made sinners, so by the obedience of the one (τοῦ ἐνός) the many (οἱ πολλοί) shall be made righteous.' By this version the reader is admonished and guided to remark, that 'the many' in ver. 19 are the same as πάντας, all, in ver. 18.

It is not, however, to be understood as meant, that all mankind are actually 'made righteous'; but only that the benefit of this δῶρημα, or χάρισμα, or δικαιοσύνη ζωῆς, is held out to all; and if they do not reap the benefit of it, it is through their own fault; and that all who are justified must become so alone through Christ.—κατιστ. may be rendered, 'were constituted,' = 'fully and effectually became ipso facto,' and are so regarded in the sight of God; for I agree with Prof. Hodge, that, as in ver. 18, it is our being treated as sinners for the sin of Adam, and our being treated as righteous for the righteousness of Christ, that is the prominent idea, so here, ver. 19, it is our being regarded as such that is here made conspicuous.

20. νόμος δὲ παρεσιῆλθεν] It has been disputed whether by νόμος is here to be understood the Law of Moses, or the Law of nature, as Dr. Peile holds. The former seems called for by the preceding context (vv. 13, 14); but it would seem that the latter sense is to be excluded, but in a subordinate degree. This view is confirmed by Hodge, who annotates thus:—'Paul, having shown that our justification was Οὐ δὲ ἐπλεονασεν ἡ ἁμαρτία, ὑπερεπερίσσευσεν ἡ χάρις 21 ὥστε ἔβασίλευσεν ἡ ἁμαρτία ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ, οὕτω καὶ ἡ χάρις βασιλεύσῃ διὰ δικαιοσύνης εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν.

VI. 1 Ἄ Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; ἐπιμενοῦμεν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ, ἵνα ἡ χάρις a ch. 2. 8.

b 5. 30.
c ver. 18.

effected without the intervention of either the moral or Mosaic law, was naturally led to state the design and result of the renewed revelation of the one, and the superinduction of the other. The law stands here for the whole Mosaic economy, including the clear revelation of the moral law, and all the institutions connected with the former dispensation. The main design and result of this dispensation, considered as law, that is, apart from the evangelical import of many of its parts, was that sin, or offence, might abound.—παρισσῆσθαι I would not render, with Macknight and Middleton, 'secretly, or silently, entered.' The sense of the παρὰ is rather by the bye, i.e. indirectly, incidentally.—The Apostle's meaning being, as Prof. Scholefield observes, that 'when sin had entered, the direct and obvious method would have been to introduce the Gospel as its great counteraction and remedy; instead of which the Law came first, to answer a collateral end, viz. to aggravate the evil, and make it more manifest and desperate, that men might be most effectually prepared to welcome the blessing. Thus it was an indirect step towards the accomplishment of God's ultimate purpose.' This interpretation was no novelty of mine (in Roena. Syn., and Gr. Test. 2nd Edit.) or of the Professor, [it has since been adopted by Dr. Peile]; but is as old as the time of Chrys. and Theophyl., and was adopted by the most eminent of the early modern Expositors, as Calv., Hyper., and Est., whose notes well merit perusal. — ὥστε πλεονάζειν meaning, 'in order that it might be abundantly exhibited,' i.e. made to appear what it is; or, in the words at vii. 13, 'might become exceeding sinful.'

— ὅτι This may be understood both of time and place.

21. διὰ δικαιοσύνης] meaning, 'by justification, through the remission of sins.'

VI. On the scope of this and the two next Chapters there is much difference of opinion, chiefly arising from taking too confined a view of the intent of the Apostle therein. So that, if the two most generally adopted views,—which I have already stated,—be combined,—the former as subordinate to the latter,—we shall have the main elements of the body of truth contained in these Chapters; and thus we may suppose that the Apostle, while purposing to set forth the true nature and obligations to Christian holiness, chose to do it by counteracting two grand abuses, which had been made of his doctrines of free grace, and of the Christian's freedom from the Law.

Of the first two Chapters the following summary of the contents is presented by Prof. Hodge:— 'As the Gospel reveals the only effectual method of justification, so also it alone can secure the sanctification of men. To exhibit this truth is the object of this and the following Chapter. The sixth is partly argumentative, and partly exhortatory. In vv. 1—11 the Apostle shows how unfounded is the objection, that gratuitous justification leads to the indulgence of sin. In vv. 12—23 he exhorts Christians to a life agreeable to the nature and design of the Gospel; and presents various considerations adapted to secure their obedience to the exhortation.

8—11. The main idea in this Section is, that such is the nature of the believer's union with Christ, that his living in sin is not merely an inconsistency, but a contradiction in terms, as much so as speaking of a live dead man, or a good bad one. Union with Christ, being the only source of holiness, cannot be the source of sin. In v. 1 the Apostle presents the objection. In v. 2, he declares it to be unfounded, and exclaims at its absurdity. In vv. 3, 4, he exhibits the true nature and design of Christianity, as adapted and intended to produce newness of life. In vv. 5—7, he evinces that such is the nature of union with Christ, that it is impossible for any one to share the benefits of his death without being conformed to his life. Such being the case, he shows, vv. 8—11, that as Christ's death on account of sin was for once, never to be repeated, and his life a life devoted to God; so our separation from sin is final, and our life a life consecrated to God.

1. τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν:] A formula by which something that another might object to in a foregoing argumentation, or representation, is adverted to for the purpose of disavowing the sentiment imputed to it. So Arrian, Epict. p. 17 (cited by Wolf), τί οὖν ἐγὼ λέγω; ὅτι ἀπρακτὸν ἐστὶ τὸ ζῶν; μὴ γίνουτο! The formula often occurs in Paul's Epistles, and always with the ἐρ., considered as a Fut. Active; and hence Hamm., Whitby, and Mackn., wrongly render, 'What do we say?' for it is in vain to seek to confirm this from Phil. iv. 4, καὶ πάλιν ἐρῶ, χαίρετε, for there the Fut. is as suitable as the Pres.; and, at any rate, there the Verb does not form part of the formula. The sense here is, 'What inference are we to draw from the doctrine of the gratuitous acceptance of sinners, or from justification by faith?'

For ἐπιμενοῦμεν, A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and 20 cursives, with several ancient Versions, have ἐπιμένωμεν, which has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but without sufficient reason, as will appear from my note, infra v. 15, where the same diversity of mood and tense is also found. I find it only in Lamb. 1183, and Mus. 16, 184. However, internal evidence is rather in its favour; and it may be the true reading; and, if so, I would render, 'may we continue?'—a sense sufficiently appropriate. But that yielded by the Future, -οῦμεν, is more so,—since the full force of the interrogation is, 'shall we or shall we not?' which is more pointed and better suited to the popular phraseology than 'may we?' As for Alford's interpretation, 'Must we think that we may?'—the

b ver. 11.
Gal. 3. 14.
c Gal. 3. 17.
d 1 Cor. 9.
14.
Eph. 4. 22—
24.
Col. 2. 12.
4 & 5. 10.
1 Pet. 4. 1, 2.
e ch. 8. 11.
Phil. 3. 10,
11.

πλεονάσῃ; <sup>2</sup> μὴ γένοιτο! Οἷτινες ἀπεθάνομεν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ, πῶς ἔτι ζήσομεν ἐν αὐτῇ; <sup>3</sup> Ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε ὅτι ὅσοι ἐβαπτίσθη-μεν εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, εἰς τὸν θάνατον αὐτοῦ ἐβαπτίσθημεν; <sup>4</sup> Συνετάφημεν οὖν αὐτῷ διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος εἰς τὸν θάνατον
ἵνα ὥσπερ ἠγέρθη Χριστὸς ἐκ νεκρῶν διὰ τῆς δόξης τοῦ Πατρὸς, οὕτω καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐν καὶνότητι ζωῆς περιπατήσωμεν. <sup>5</sup> Εἰ γὰρ

deliberative Subjunctive, an idiom treated of by Kühner, Gr. § 46, who adduces examples from Eur. Ion 758, εἰπωμεν ἢ σιγῶμεν; and Med. 1275; there is no proof that the idiom was ever used by the Scriptural writers. As a proof how inapplicable is the idiom here, Alf. in his version is obliged to render, 'May we persist in sin that (God's) grace may abound?' I cannot help suspecting that ἐπιβύωμεν was an alteration of Crítica, who wished to make the two verbs in this verse correspond in mood. That the Fut. was read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator is certain. —But to turn from words to things; it should seem from what has gone before, v. 20, that a possible misapprehension might arise, nay, even, it seems, had arisen, as though an abundance of sin were the cause of a superabundance of grace; and therefore does the Apostle introduce the question, 'shall we continue, &c., which indeed any one might have been warranted in saying, if abundance of crime had been the cause of abounding grace, and not the occasion only.

2. μὴ γένοιτο!] It is well remarked by T. Aquinas, 'that St. Paul first puts a question arising from the premises; and solves it by a strong ἀπαγόρευσις κατὰ διάνοιαν, Abest! &c.' Paul's usual mode of expressing strong denial, even to abhorrence, arising out of some inference unfairly drawn from preceding data, and in itself at variance with godly reverence.

—Οἷτινες ἀπεθάνομεν, &c.] The full sense is, 'we who have died and are dead,' at least by profession. —In the words οἷτιν.—ἐν αὐτῇ; there is, as Calv. says, an argumentum a contrariis positione, q. d. 'How can good men be bad men, or how can the dead be alive?' As much as to say, 'It is a contradiction and absurdity, that those who are dead to sin should live in sin.' Elsner and Wetstein adduce many passages of the Classical writers, which show that to be dead to any thing or person denoted to have broken off all connexion therewith. But that does not bear on the present case, inasmuch as the ratio metaphoræ here subsisting is formed on a peculiar mode of speaking, by which the rite of immersion in the baptismal water, and egress from it, were used as a symbol of breaking off all connexion with the present sinful life, and giving oneself to a new and pure one. 'As therefore (observes Koppe) it was usual for those baptized to be, on that account, called both dead and buried, and raised again to a new life, hence the Apostle, according to his custom, applies this manner of speaking to the purpose of describing the cultivation of Christian virtue [and holiness] (to which every Christian had bound himself) under the similitude of death and resurrection.' The πῶς strongly represents the inconistency of such a course as the living in habitual commission of sin. Comp. Gal. ii. 19.

3. Ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε ὅτι ὅσοι ἐβαπτίσθη, &c.] Under the same metaphor the Apostle proceeds to show, from the nature of the baptismal covenant, that Christians have engaged to be conformed to the death and resurrection of Christ, by dying unto sin, and rising again unto righteousness.

'Ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε occurs also at vii. 1, and is equiv. to 'have you forgotten,' or 'are you not aware of, this truth?' Βαπτίζεσθαι εἰς τινα is equiv. to βαπτ. εἰς ὀνόματι τινος, and denotes, 'to profess oneself any one's disciple by baptism;' which was understood to engage the disciple to the profession of the doctrine promulgated by his teacher. Εἰς τὸν θάνατον αὐτοῦ ἐβαπτ. may be rendered, 'have been baptized unto his death.' And the sense is: 'we have bound ourselves by baptism to die unto (i. e. lay aside) all sin, as Christ laid down his life.' Εἰς here signifies 'in conformity to,' viz. to him in his death, that as he had died for their sins, so should they die unto, and have done with, all sin. Thus, among the heathens, the initiation into the Greater Mysteries was figuratively termed a dying unto a vicious life, by renouncing it.

4. συνετάφημεν οὖν] The οὖν is, as Hyper. observes, inferential, = 'so then,' or 'well then.' In συνετάφ., 'we were thus buried (in the water of Baptism),'—for the term has allusion to Baptism, according to that mode in which it was originally administered, viz., by immersion (see Bingham's Antiquities);—a mode especially intended to represent at once the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ (the body being thus hidden in the water as in a tomb), and so serving to signify the dying unto sin on the part of the baptized, the destruction in them of the power of sin, and their rising from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness. See Rom. vi. 4. Col. ii. 12. Accordingly our Church prays, that 'the old Adam may be so buried that the new man may be raised up in us,' &c.

—εἰς τὸν θάνατον] meaning, 'after the similitude of, or in conformity to, his death.' Supply αὐτοῦ from the αὐτῷ just before. Διὰ τῆς δόξης τ. Π., 'through the glory,' and, by implication, 'power of the Father.' Comp. Ps. lxxviii. 35, and Isa. xii. 2.—'Ἐν καὶν. ζωῇ is a stronger expression than ἐν ζ. καὶνῇ would be; for, as Alford observes, 'the abstract καὶνότητι is used to bring the quality of newness more into prominence.' Comp. 2 Thess. ii. 11. 1 Tim. vi. 17. The construction is highly elliptical,—there being, as Jaspis observes, only two members of the comparison, when there should properly have been four, omitting one in the prothesis, and another in the apodosis. The passage, in a complete state, he says, would be this: ἵνα ὥσπερ ἠγέρθη Χριστὸς ἐκ νεκρῶν, καὶ περιετέθη εἰς καὶνότητι ζωῆς, οὕτω καὶ ἡμεῖς συνεταφίσταμεν αὐτῷ ἐκ νεκρῶν, ἐν καὶνότητι ζωῆς περιπατήσωμεν.

5.—11. The main idea being thus introduced;

σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν τῷ ὁμοιώματι τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως ἐσόμεθα. <sup>6</sup> τούτο γινώσκοντες, ὅτι ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος συνεσταυρώθη, ἵνα καταργηθῇ τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, τοῦ μηκέτι δουλεῖν ἡμᾶς τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ. <sup>7</sup> ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας. <sup>8</sup> Εἰ δὲ ἀπεθάνομεν σὺν Χριστῷ, πιστεύομεν ὅτι καὶ συζήσομεν αὐτῷ. <sup>9</sup> εἰδότες

[Gal. 2. 20.
Eph. 4. 22.]

[1 Pet. 4. 1.]

[1 Tim. 2. 11.]

[Rev. 1. 18.]

the Apostle now proceeds to confirm what was just said, and to expand the thought, presenting it in a variety of costume, suitable to the nature of the case, in order to impress the whole on the mind of the reader.

ἡ. αἱ γὰρ σύμφυτοι-ἰσόμεθα] 'for if we have become closely united with, or assimilated to, him in his death, so we shall also be [assimilated to him] in the likeness of his resurrection.' In σύμφυτοι there is a metaphor taken from grafting; the literal sense of the expression being, 'grown together into one,' as man and horse in the fabled Centaurs. The term is oft. used of the closest union and most intimate friendship. The force of ἀλλὰ may (Alf. says it does) come under the use of the Particle pointed out in Hartung, Partic. ii. 40, by which ἀλλὰ after a hypothetical clause serves to strengthen the inference. But it is unlikely that Paul was acquainted with this refined Grecism.

6. Hodge regards this verse as either an amplification, or confirmation, of the preceding; and he inclines to consider it as the latter. But I rather agree with Hyper., who remarks, 'Plinius exponit confirmatque quas de moriendo peccatis, atque iterum vivendo justitiam, dici cepta sunt.' There is, as Thom. Aquin. shows, a further development of the foregoing thought, whereby Paul enforces this obligation to Christian holiness, from the engagement which every Christian comes under by baptism, of being conformed to the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, by crucifying the flesh, with the affections and lusts.

— τούτο γινώσκοντες] Many take this as a Participle for a Verb. But it is better to regard γινώσκ. as a Nominativus pendens, ἡμῖς being understood, from the foregoing ἰσόμεθα. Thus it is equivalent to a verb with ἡμεῖς. This use of γινώσκειν, 'to bear in mind,' occurs also in James i. 3. 2 Pet. i. 20. Soph. Antig. 188, τούτο γινώσκων ὅτι, &c. Antiph., in Alcestide: τούτο γινώσκων ὅτι.

6. ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος] meaning, the corrupt nature and evil disposition derived from Adam, and which belong to men in their unrenewed state; what is properly applicable only to the abstract, human nature, being applied (by a meton. of the subject for the adjunct) to the concrete, MAN. Thus Adam is called by the Rabbis the man of sin. To this παλ. ἄνθ. is opposed the new man, the holy disposition and character infused by the Holy Spirit, and required by the Gospel. See Eph. iv. 24, and Col. iii. 10.

— συνεσταυρώθη] As the death of Christ is considered emblematic of baptism, so the manner of his death is made to suggest the duty of crucifying our corrupt nature. Comp. Gal. ii. 20. The Apostle's argument in this and the foregoing verse is this: 'Such is the nature of our union with Christ that, if we partake of the benefits of his death, and are conformed to him in this respect, we shall be conformed to his life, because, after the likeness of his death, the power of sin in us is destroyed, by the body of sin being destroyed.' In this debated expression, τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, we have a peculiar phrase, further characterizing the old man, and of which the sense may be best expressed, 'the body in which sin energizes.' De Wette and Alford, indeed, deny that the body can be represented as the seat of sin; or, at any rate, that the principle of sin can be said to lie in the body, for it lies in the will. The latter objection may hold, but not the former, unless by the juggling of metaphysical sophistry. In fact, Alford himself, by explaining, 'in which sin is manifested,' virtually admits it. The interpretation which I have put forward above is confirmed by the term καταργηθῇ, 'might be destroyed,' viz., by being deprived of its power to hurt; like an enemy put hors de combat; or as a serpent is scotched, though not absolutely killed. The nature of the metaphor is, indeed, obscure; but it seems to proceed on representing sin, by a kind of personification, as a living body, consisting, like the human frame, of many members, the seat of various evil propensities, and all of them requiring to be (even as the members of a crucified malefactor were) nailed to the cross.

7. ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν-ἁμαρτίας] This assertion enforces the declaration in the foregoing verse (that when the old man is crucified, Christians cannot be devoted to the service of sin) by a simile drawn from physical death; though the expression itself, ἀποθανών, is to be taken figuratively, of 'one whose corrupt nature has been crucified with Christ;' q. d. 'He who is [thus] dead [to sin], is freed from its power;' δεδικαίωται being for ἡλευθέρωται, and signifying, 'is freed from its influence, or slavery.' In other words, 'As a man corporeally dead is freed from the authority of all those who in his lifetime had power over him; so he that is thus figuratively dead is freed from the power of sin, which formerly energized in him.'

8. αἱ δὲ ἀπεθάνομεν, &c.] Here the Apostle takes up the word ἀποθανών at v. 7, and resumes the sentiment of vv. 4, 5, for the sake of adding a new sentiment, by way of establishing his position,—namely, that as Christ died once for all, and therefore lives for ever a new life, so the believer dies once for all unto sin, when he truly dies to it, so that he must for ever hereafter live a new life, and no longer practise sin. (Stuart.) The full sense is as follows: 'Now, further, if we have [thus] died with Christ [by having our corrupt nature crucified with him], we fully believe that we shall also live with him.' Comp. 2 Tim. ii. 11, the best comment on this verse.

9. εἰδότες ὅτι, &c.] This is, Stuart (after Hyper.) observes, as much as to say, 'What I

ὅτι Χριστὸς, ἐγερθεὶς ἐκ νεκρῶν, οὐκ ἔτι ἀποθνήσκει· θάνατος αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔτι κυριεύει. <sup>10</sup> <sup>k</sup> δὲ γὰρ ἀπέθανε, τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ἀπέθανεν ἐφάπαξ· δὲ δὲ ζῇ, ζῇ τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>11</sup> <sup>l</sup> Οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε ἑαυτοὺς νεκροὺς μὲν εἶναι τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ, ζῶντας δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ [τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν]. <sup>12</sup> Μὴ οὖν βασιλευέτω ἡ ἁμαρτία ἐν τῷ θνητῷ ὑμῶν σώματι, εἰς τὸ ὑπακούειν [αὐτῇ ἐν] ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτοῦ· <sup>13</sup> <sup>m</sup> μὴδὲ παριστάνετε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν

k Luke 20.
25.
Heb. 8. 27.
35.
l Gal. 2. 19.
1 Pet. 2. 24

m ch. 12. 1.
1 Pet. 4. 2.

have now asserted must be true, inasmuch as you know that to be true from which my position is a necessary deduction.' But there is something further involved in what is said,—namely (as Hodge says), that the perpetuity of Christ's life is presented as the ground of assurance of the perpetuity of the life of believers; q. d. 'We shall partake of the life of Christ; for, as death has no more dominion over him, there is no ground of apprehension that our supplies of life shall be cut off; nor that the spiritual and eternal blessings of redemption shall be annulled; because he ever liveth to make intercession for us, and to grant us those supplies of grace which we need.' See ch. v. 10. John xiv. 19. 1 Cor. xv. 23, &c.

—θάνατος αὐτοῦ, &c.] These words are explanatory of the preceding; q. d. 'he not only will die no more, but can die no more; since death hath no longer any power over him.'

10. <sup>δ</sup> γὰρ ἀπέθανε—τῷ Θεῷ] Here we have an amplification and explanation of v. 9. Christ's life is perpetual, inasmuch as his dying unto sin (i. e. for sin, for its expiation; see 1 Thess. v. 10) was for once only; but, as he liveth, he liveth for ever to the glory of God. Comp. Heb. vii. 27. ix. 26, 28. See more in Calvin, who ably traces the connexion thus: 'Having before declared that by the example of Christ we are for ever freed from the yoke of death, the Apostle now accommodates what he had said to the sentiment intended to be inculcated,—that we are no longer subject to the dominion of sin; and this he shows from the final cause of Christ's death, namely, because he died in order to put down sin.'

—[ζῇ τῷ Θεῷ] i. e. 'being glorified by and with the Father; and also to, or for, God,' as 'being the brightness of his Father's glory.' Heb. i. 3.

11. We have here an inference from the preceding discussion, and, together with an application of it to the case of Christians, there is an earnest exhortation to realize in themselves this state of death unto sin, and life unto God with Christ. The sense may be thus expressed:—'Thus also regard yourselves as (persons) dead indeed unto sin, by having renounced it, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus; or, as Hodge explains, 'in virtue of your union with him.'—The words τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν, not found in many ancient MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have been cancelled by Griesb., Knapp, and Scholz; perhaps rightly; at any rate, internal evidence is against them.

12, 13. We have here the conclusion; q. d. 'From these considerations, then, let not sin reign,' &c.—By ἁμαρτία we are to understand, not peccatum, but vitiōsilas, that propensity to evil which exists in every man—the φρόνημα σαρκὸς spoken of in the Ninth Article of our Church. Here, by a bold figure, sin is personified as a tyrant, striving to hold mastery over men.

12. ἐν τῷ θνητῷ ὑμῶν σ.] Here θνητῷ is not (what some have maintained) a mere orōphos of ornament, but, from the body being the seat of sensuality, is used to intimate, 1. that the pleasures of the body are, from its liability to disease and death, very fleeting and temporary, and that therefore it is the more unreasonable to gratify corporeal appetites at the sacrifice of the soul; 2. that the labour of resisting temptations to evil is but of short continuance, and therefore the less formidable; 3. that they should be mindful of the near approach of that period, when the dominion of sin would work death spiritual and eternal. The expression τὸ θνητὸν σῶμα is so rare, that I find it elsewh. only in Dionys. Hal. Ant. 2187, 4, κλέος ἀθάνατον ἀντὶ τοῦ θνητοῦ σώματος (scil. κλέους) κατὰλαττε τοῖς ἰγγύνοις. But, to advert to a matter of Criticism as regards the text. At the latter part of the verse there is some diversity and confusion in the MSS., and consequent uncertainty of reading; so that Editors adopt different views. Wetst. and Matth. retain and justify the text. rec., which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. and Trin. Coll. copies, but Griesb. and Scholz cancel the words αὐτῇ ἐν ταῖς ἐπιθυ. αὐτοῦ, from some uncials and a few cursives; while Tittm., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel αὐτῇ ἐν, from A, B, C, and 6 cursives. The course pursued by Griesb. and Scholz is undoubtedly wrong, since it leaves the passage miserably curtailed and crippled. The text of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. is that which I adopted in the first and succeeding Edits. of this work; and it is strongly confirmed by internal evidence, and by the authority of all the ancient Versions of any weight. It is not probable that the words αὐτῇ ἐν were removed (as Matthæi thought) 'to clear the sentence; for even with them it is not over-loaded. The only objection to it is the extreme harshness it involves, for we no where else read of the lusts of sin, but only of the lusts of the flesh, or of the body; to remove which objection 4 ancient cursives (to which I add one Mus. copy) have αὐτῇ; yet it may here be tolerated, because sin might be personified as a tyrant,—just as supra v. 6, 7, it is considered as a master over a slave. Nevertheless, the state of the evidence, not a little confused in its details, evidently points to the last mentioned text as the genuine one; espec. since from it all the others may have sprung.

13. μὴδὲ παριστάνετε, &c.] We have here a continuation of the foregoing imagery,—in which sin is considered as a slave-master,—as ὅπλα ἀδικίας τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ· ἀλλὰ παραστήσατε ἑαυτοὺς τῷ Θεῷ, ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας, καὶ τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν ὅπλα δικαιοσύνης τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>14</sup> ἀμαρτία γὰρ ὑμῶν οὐ κυριεύσει· οὐ γὰρ ἐστε ὑπὸ νόμον, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ χάριν.

<sup>15</sup> <sup>n Gal. 2. 18.</sup> Τί οὖν ; ἀμαρτήσομεν, ὅτι οὐκ ἐσμὲν ὑπὸ νόμον, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ <sup>o John 8. 34.</sup> χάριν ; Μὴ γένοιτο ! <sup>o Pet. 2. 12.</sup> <sup>16</sup> Οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ᾧ παριστάνετε ἑαυτοὺς δούλους εἰς ὑπακοήν, δοῦλοι ἐστε ᾧ ὑπακούετε, ἥτοι ἀμαρτίας

introductory of a kindred admonition. For here I cannot, with Calv., Beza, and others, recognize a military allusion, however frequent such may be in Paul's writings; for, as I find De Wette has said, the comparison here is to servitude, rather than soldiery: nor need we call in the military allusion, since the ὅπλα may be taken (as indeed is its primary sense) to denote instruments, lit. 'tools'; as in Hdot. vii. 25. ix. 121. Herodian, vii. 11, and elsewhere. The meaning will thus be, 'neither yield up your members to sin, for him to use as organs, or instruments, of wickedness.' On the other hand, by ὅπλα δικαιοσύνης are denoted the various 'instruments of working the work of God in all holiness, righteousness, and truth'; and all this τῷ Θεῷ, 'unto the glory of God,' 1 Cor. x. 31.

—ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας] meaning, 'as those who, after having been spiritually dead, are now alive from the dead, by a new birth and righteousness unto holiness,' infra v. 19.

<sup>14</sup> ἀμαρτία γὰρ ὑμ. οὐ κυρ.] The Future κυριεύσει here cannot, by the context, be taken as predictive, still less as imperative, or hortative. It rather breathes the language of re-assurance (see John iii. 19), 'assuring their hearts,' that the surrender demanded in the last verse was possible. The γὰρ points at a possible demur; q. d. 'How can so great a difficulty be overcome?' To which the answer is, 'Fear not; for sin shall not (as you apprehend) have dominion over you (so as to prevent the surrender), for ye are,' &c. Thus they are encouraged to exert themselves in resisting sin, by the assurance of success; as Hyper., Crellius, Estius, and Grotius well point out. The next words adduce the grounds of this re-assurance,—namely, they are 'not under law, but under grace,'—meaning, as a system, a dispensation of grace. This view of the sense is required both by the absence of the article and by the context, according to the able analysis of its contents by Prof. Hodge; and indeed accords with the nature of the Gospel itself, considered as the means of deliverance, not from the yoke of ceremonial observances only, but from the obligation of any law of works, as a means of justification.

<sup>15</sup>—<sup>23</sup>. The Apostle now proceeds to argue, that the dispensation of grace vouchsafed to us, so far from encouraging sin, demands a service to righteousness, utterly inconsistent with any services to sin, which we renounced when we became servants of righteousness. To induce them to persevere in that renunciation, a strong contrast is drawn between the results of the service of sin—fearful, and even fatal,—and those of the service of righteousness—blissful and soul saving. A similar contrast is drawn between the works of the flesh and those of the Spirit, in Gal. v. 19—

<sup>15</sup>. τί οὖν ;—μὴ γένοιτο !] From his anxiety to avoid misapprehension, and show that freedom from the law does not at all involve freedom from moral obligation, Paul, for the second time, strongly denies that the liberty of the Gospel is, as the Antinomian heretics have averred,—a liberty to sin. The interrogation implies a strong negation, fortified by the μὴ γένοιτο, as supra v. 2. The question is put to anticipate a more than possible objection of Judaizing disputants: see note, supra v. 1.

For ἀμαρτήσομεν, several uncial and 30 cursive MSS. have ἀμαρτήσωμεν, which I find also in 5 Lamb. and 4 Mus. copies, and which has been received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; whether rightly, I doubt, for the reading has the appearance of being a mere correction. Some, it seems, thought the sense 'may we sin' preferable. But, though it is a softening of the sense, yet it by no means improves it; and the ancient Versions all support ἀμαρτήσομεν, which yields the more natural sense. The case is quite similar to that of ἐπιμενούμεν, supra v. 1, where what I have said in my note confirms the genuineness of ἀμαρτήσομεν here.

<sup>16</sup>. οὐκ οἴδατε, &c.] After earnest dissuasion, the Apostle resorts to serious admonition, by placing before them the alternative, that they must serve some master,—either sin, who will lead them to death; or righteous obedience, which will conduct them to justification. They who obey sin are the vassals of sin, and must receive the wages of sin,—DEATH. The ᾧ is by some rendered 'whatsoever'; but as ἀμαρτία was just before personified, so the ᾧ here seems put in the masculine, for accommodation to it.

—εἰς ὑπάκ.] = εἰς τὸ ὑπάκ., 'in order to be obedient.' The εἰς εἰς θάνατον and εἰς δικ. denotes event, result, or consequence, as Rom. v. 16, where εἰς κατάκριμα and εἰς δικαιοσύνην are similarly opposed. Θάνατος here mainly denotes spiritual and eternal death, the death of the soul, the awful δολιχὸν αἰώνιον ἀπὸ προσώπου τοῦ Κυρίου, 2 Thess. i. 9. Δικ. should not be rendered righteousness; since, as appears from the kindred passage at v. 16 (see also iv. 25), it is put, by metonymy, for the effects of righteousness, in the favour of God ('which is better than life'), viewed in its results,—life everlasting, as opposed to death, the state of misery induced by sin. Verses 17, 18, as also vv. 19, 20, are not so much meant by Paul to follow up the argument, as to impress his readers (of the Gentiles), by showing them that they are themselves examples of what he is declaring. As to v. 17, it is an application of the general truths stated in the preceding verse to his readers of the Gentiles, and therein, as Alf. remarks, 'the dilemma involved in the preceding is solved for them by

εἰς θάνατον, ἢ ὑπακοῆς εἰς δικαιοσύνην ; <sup>17</sup> Χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, ὅτι
 ἦτε δούλοι τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ὑπακούσατε δὲ ἐκ καρδίας εἰς ὃν παρ-ἔδοθητε τύπον διδασχῆς. <sup>18</sup> Ἐλευθερωθέντες δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ἐδουλώθητε τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ. <sup>19</sup> Ἀνθρώπινον λέγω διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκὸς ὑμῶν. "Ὡσπερ γὰρ παρεστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δούλα τῇ ἀκαθαρσίᾳ καὶ τῇ ἀνομίᾳ εἰς τὴν ἀνομίαν, οὕτω νῦν παραστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δούλα τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ εἰς ἁγί-ασμόν. <sup>20</sup> Ὅτε γὰρ δούλοι ἦτε τῆς ἁμαρτίας, ἐλεύθεροι ἦτε reference to matter of fact,' that though they were once the servants of sin, they had (God be thanked!) in receiving the Gospel, obeyed its requirements, and consequently were freed from the service to sin, and had become servants of righteousness.

17. In ὅτι ἦτε, &c. there is a difficulty (arising from the words seeming to express a sense the reverse of what the Apostle must have meant), which is not removed by supplying, as Beza and many others have done, μὲν. It is better to suppose (with Grot. and Koppe), that as the Participle is often put for the Verb, so here, by a Hebraism [or rather popular idiom], the Verb is put for the Participle, which would be equivalent to a Verb with καίπερ, although. A Classical author would have written, ὅτι, πρὶν μὲν ὄντας, &c.—νῦν δὲ, &c. In εἰς ὃν παρὲδ. τύπον διδασχῆς there is a well-known hyperallage, by the figure attraction (see Glass, Phil. Sac. 168), as in the Virgilian 'urbem quam statuo, vestra est.' Thus it is for ἵππη. τῷ τύπῳ διδασχῆς εἰς ὃν τύπον παρεδόθητε. The sense, probably by a metaphor taken from founding and coining, is, 'that form,' lit. 'stamp, or mould of teaching, unto which ye were delivered over by Jesus Christ to be impressed by it' (simil. μόρφωσις, supra ii. 20). Comp. Jamblichus, Vit. Pyth., p. 89, τὸν τύπον τῆς διδασκαλίας, with Arrian, Enchir. ii. 19, κατὰ τὰ δόγματα τυποῦσθαι. See more on the exact propriety of the expression in Calvin, Hyper., Beza, and Est.

18. ἐλευθερωθέντες δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμ.] i. e. 'being liberated from the bondage of:' sin being still considered as a slave-master. There is, however, an allusion, not (as some have supposed) to the manumission, but to the transfer of slaves (whether by purchase or otherwise) from the service of one master to that of another. The words ἐλευθ. δὲ ἀπὸ, &c., seem meant to be suspended in construction on the preceding sentence. In fact, ἐλευθ. δὲ is put for καὶ ὅτι ἐλευθ., 'and that being freed.'

—ἐδουλώθητε τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ for δούλοι ἦτε. By this the Apostle means to hint at their sacred engagement to serve God. The sense, however, of the expression is modified by the context. Obedience to God is properly not a slavery, but a service; or, at least, an θελοδουλία.

19. ἀνθρώπ. λέγω, &c.] The best Expositors are generally agreed that this form of expression was employed by way of softening the harshness of the term ἐδουλώθητε.—meaning to say, that 'in so speaking of Christianity as a bondage, he spoke with reference to human weakness and frailty, which is apt not to regard the yoke as easy, or the burden as light (so Plut. de Educ. § 17, εἰς, ταῦτα μὲν οὐκ καλὰ καὶ συμφέ- ροντα.' & δὲ μὲλλω λέγειν, ἀνθρώπινα,—meaning, such as human weakness may hope to attain to); q. d. (in the words of Calvin) 'I could, by a comparison of righteousness and sin, show how much more readily you ought to yield obedience to the one, than you have done to the other; but, considerate to the weakness of your flesh, I shall not enter into the comparison. Yet, while thus indulgent to you, this, however, I may reasonably require,—that at least you should not more coldly and remissly follow after righteousness, than before you gave yourselves over unto sin.' See also Hyperius and Estius.

—παρεστήσατε should not be rendered, 'have once yielded,' as is apparent from the words following, οὕτω νῦν παραστήσατε. Δούλα is here an adjective, signifying, 'serving in bondage,' as in Eurip. and other Class. writers.

—ἀκαθαρσία and ἀνομία are not, as they have been thought, synonymous; but as ἀκαθαρσία, in the signif. 'lasciviousness,' has at i. 24, been applied to these very persons, so that seems to be the sense here. Thus the word is synonymous with ἀσέλγεια and πορνεία. See Tittman, de Synon. p. 155. Compare 2 Cor. vii. 1.

From lasciviousness the Apostle now passes on to ἀνομία in general, meaning every kind of vicious and sinful conduct, as opposed to δικαιοσύνη. In εἰς τὴν ἀνομίαν and εἰς ἀνομίαν most Commentators take the εἰς to denote accumulation, i. e. 'vice upon vice,' from one degree of it to another. Of such a use, however, no sufficient proof has been adduced. It should rather seem that εἰς here denotes, as often, purpose, or effect. Thus the sense of εἰς ἀνομίαν will be, 'for the service of sin of every kind;' and that of εἰς δικαιοσύνην, 'for the promotion of holiness.'

20. The connexion and scope of this verse seems to be this: 'As you once served sin, so now you must serve holiness. Your present relation admits of no other conclusion; for when you served sin, you deemed yourselves free from all obligation to righteousness: [so now, serving holiness, count yourselves free from all obligation to sin].' (Stuart.)

To remove the difficulty occasioned by the rare usage of ἐλευθ., and the yet rarer construction of Dat. for Genit., we must observe that δικ. is not governed by ἐλευθ., but by ἐν understood; or the Dat. may be considered as one of reference. 'Free as regards righteousness,' viz. as to any dependence on it; exempt from any dependence on it, or obedience to it. So the word free is sometimes used in English, e. g. by Denham, cited in Johns. Dict. Thus 'freedom from righteousness' (which is meant to correspond to the particular just before, δούλα τῇ τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ. <sup>21</sup> Τίνα οὖν καρπὸν εἶχετε τότε, ἐφ' οἷς νῦν ἐπαισχύνησθε; τὸ γὰρ τέλος ἐκείνων θάνατος. <sup>22</sup> Νυνὶ δέ, ἐλευθερωθέντες ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, δουλωθέντες δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, ἔχετε τὸν καρπὸν ὑμῶν εἰς ἁγιασμόν· τὸ δὲ τέλος, ζωὴν αἰώνιον. <sup>23</sup> Ἐὰν γὰρ ὀφάνια τῆς ἁμαρτίας θάνατος· τὸ δὲ χάρισμα τοῦ Θεοῦ ζωὴ αἰώνιος ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν. VII. <sup>1</sup> Ἡ ἀγνοεῖτε, ἀδελφοί, (γινώσκουσιν γὰρ νόμον λαλῶ) ὅτι ὁ νόμος

Roh. 5. 2.
Gen. 2. 17.
1 Cor. 15. 21.
James 1. 15.
1 Pet. 1. 3.

δικαιοσύνη) is regarded as, in the sinner's estimation, a kind of advantage; which, however, the Apostle proceeds to show is of no value, and this he does by the forcible words τίνα οὖν καρπὸν εἶχετε, &c. There is, however, a yet greater irregularity in the sentence,—namely, that we have here (as occasionally elsewhere in St. Paul) an antithetical clause left to be supplied; as is done by Stuart. This is no novelty, having been seen by Chrys. and the Greek Commentators, and afterwards by Crellius and Grotius.

21, 22. In these verses Paul points at the different character, and contrast, as in Gal. v. 19—24, the works of the flesh and of the Spirit, the different results of the service of sin and of holiness, in order to stir them up to continued devotedness to God.

21. τίνα οὖν καρπὸν, &c.] The full sense is: 'What fruit, then, had ye at that time in respect of those things?' 'what solid advantage had you in sin, i.e. in the works of sin, to counteract its present consequences, one of which is shame; and its future, everlasting death?' A most forcible representation as to plain matters of fact; and in which the words 'ye are now ashamed' are a strong appeal to the conscience. See Calvin, and especially Bp. Taylor's 19th Sermon, on this text, entitled, 'The Apples of Sodom, or the Fruits of Sin.' Τέλος is here, as Wets. observes, for πλήρης μισθός; of which use Loëssner and Carpzov adduce several examples.

22. νυνὶ δέ] See note supra iii. 21. Δουλωθέντες, &c., 'engaged to the service of God.' So Apuleius, cited by Wets.: 'Da nomen huic sancula militis;—teque jam nunc obsequio religionis nostræ dedica, et ministerii jugum subi voluntarium. Nam cum coperis Deo servire, senties fructum tui libertatis.'—Εἰς ἁγιασμόν, 'unto holiness, sanctity of life, as the result of that service.' Comp. Plut. t. vi. 138, ἐκαρπὸς πρὸς ἀρετήν. The real sense, though obscurely expressed by ἔχετε, is, 'ye yield or bear forth fruits such as pertain to holiness, and produce it' (see my Lex. in ἐκαρπὸς, and my note on 1 Cor. xiv. 14), and accordingly the result of the service of God is represented as 'sanctification here, and eternal life hereafter.'

23. τὰ γὰρ ὀφάνια—αἰώνιος] This is a re-assertion of what was said at ver. 21, τὸ γὰρ τέλος—θάνατος, in order to introduce another circumstance, and to contrast death as the  wages of sin, and the desert of a vicious course, with eternal life as the free gift of God, awarded to faith and holiness, through Jesus Christ, and not as the reward of merit. We have here a military allusion; ὀφάνια being the regular soldier's pay, and χάρισμα the occasional donative given by the emperor.

VII. The Apostle here resumes, and continues the argument advanced at iii. 31, that the Gospel method of justification does not make void the moral law, much less give a liberty to sin; and in doing this he engrafts what he has to urge on what was said at vi. 14, 'for ye are not under the law, but under graces,' which implied the greater efficaciousness of the Gospel, for the sanctification he had just mentioned, than the Law of Moses, or any law. This he evinces in the present and subsequent chapter, showing the inefficacy of any law to sanctification, and how the grace of the Holy Spirit, under the Gospel, supplies that defect. So far from making void the Law, he proves that it is the only means of delivering men from the bondage of sin, to which they are subjected while under law, and further shows the nature and blessedness of that deliverance. The first six verses of the present chapter illustrate, by a popular image (not to be too much pressed upon) derived from the case of matrimony (which is only an obligation till the death of one of the parties), what was said at vi. 14, seqq.,—that we are not under the Law, but under grace; and at vv. 5 and 6 are shown the necessity, and the happy results, of this change in our relation to God. Accordingly, having before compared the condition of Christians, especially the Jewish Christians, to that of slaves, who have passed into the service of another master, the Apostle here compares the condition of those persons with that of a wife,—who, after the decease of her husband, may be married to another; evidently alluding to the abrogation of the Law of Moses, as being dead, and therefore no more to be observed than a dead husband is to be regarded by a surviving wife. The same applies, of course, to the law of nature.

1. γινώσκουσιν νόμον] It has been long a point disputed, whether by νόμον is meant the Law of Moses, or law in general. The former view is adopted by most Commentators, ancient and modern,—while the latter is maintained by Estius, Crellius, Schoëtgen, Koppe, Mackn., Wakef., Middl., Stuart, and Hodge, who explain, 'to persons who know the nature of law, divine and human.' The two interpretations admit, indeed, of being united; for we may suppose that the Apostle, while here and throughout this chapter, he espec. adverts to the Law of Moses, holds the law of nature in a combined, however subordinate, consideration. However, it would seem most probable that Paul refers to law generally, as to its principle. As to the clause ἐφ' ὅσον, it has been a debated question as to the subject of the verb ἔχ, which is referred by all the ancient and the early modern Commentators, as Hyper. and Bulling., to ὁ νόμος: q. d. 'quoad vixerit ea,' 'is in force.' And this form a 1 Cor. 7.

2, 10, 30.

b Mat. 5.
32.

c ch. 8. 2.
Gal. 2. 19, 30.
& 5. 18, 22.

d ch. 6. 21.
Gal. 5. 19.

κυριεύει τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, ἐφ' ὅσον χρόνον ζῇ; <sup>2</sup> Ἡ γὰρ ὑπανδρος γυνὴ τῇ ζῶντι ἀνδρὶ δέδεται νόμῳ· ἐὰν δὲ ἀποθάνῃ ὁ ἀνὴρ, κατήργηται ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου τοῦ ἀνδρός. <sup>3</sup> Ἄρα οὖν ζῶντος τοῦ ἀνδρός μοιχαλὶς χρηματίζει, ἐὰν γένηται ἀνδρὶ ἑτέρῳ· ἐὰν δὲ ἀποθάνῃ ὁ ἀνὴρ, ἐλευθέρα ἐστὶν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, τοῦ μὴ εἶναι αὐτὴν μοιχαλὶς, γενομένην ἀνδρὶ ἑτέρῳ. <sup>4</sup> Ὡς τε, ἀδελφοί μου, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐθανατώθητε τῷ νόμῳ διὰ τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ· εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι ὑμᾶς ἑτέροις, τῇ ἐκ νεκρῶν ἐγερθέντι, ὥτα καρποφορήσωμεν τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>5</sup> Ὅτε γὰρ ἦμεν ἐν τῇ σαρκί, τὰ

of ζ. occasionally occurs in the Classical writers. The latter view is ably maintained by Erasm., Grot., Est., and others, and recently by Dr. Peile, who observes that, 'tempting as at first sight it may seem to translate thus, because of τῷ ζῶντι ἀνδρὶ, and τοῦ νόμου τοῦ ἀνδρός, the collocation of the words, and the construction of κυριεύει, as seen in ch. vi. 9, 14, stand in insurmountable opposition to it.' On the other hand, Alf. argues that to take it of νόμος would introduce the irrelevant question of the abrogation of the law; whereas the whole matter in argument is the relation of the Christian to the law. 'Who shall decide when doctors disagree?' On carefully reconsidering this puzzling question, I would say (using the words of Dr. Peile) that 'tempting as at first sight it may appear' to refer the ζῇ to νόμος, it seems forbidden not so much by the reason (somewhat sophistical) alleged by Alf., as from its extreme harshness, and as resting on a sense of ζῇν not found in the New Test. nor in the Sept.; though there is as great a difficulty in referring it to ὁ νόμος, because, as Crellius remarks, 'thus the words will not correspond to the subsequent similitude;' and besides, as he observes, 'Nihil opus erit scientia legis ad id cognoscendum, legem in mortuos nullam habere potestatem; hoc enim ipsa ratio quæque monet. Verisimile tamen est, ad utrumque referri; ad proximum proprie, ad remotius per catachresin. Aperte autem non exprobat Apostolus ad utrum eorum id referri vellet, quia ad legis abrogationem et extinctionem potissimum respiciebat; sed id, ne odiosum Judæis videretur, cogitandum potius ex sequentibus reliquit, quam dixit.'

2. This verse is an amplification of the foregoing—ὑπᾶνδρος, 'one who is engaged (ὑπό) to obedience and fidelity to a husband.' At νόμῳ sub. ἐπί: thus = κατὰ νόμον. Τοῦ νόμου τοῦ ἀνδρός must mean 'the obligation laid upon the wife by the husband's right to her,' which, of course, must cease at his death. At κατήργηται ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου there is, as at Gal. v. 4, an hypallage, for κατήργηται ὁ νόμος τοῦ ἀνδρός, which means 'the law, or right, over her by her husband is annulled.' For a law is said καταργεῖσθαι when it ceases.

3. χρηματίζε[σθαι] 'she will be accounted,' lit. 'pass for.' See my Lex. In ἐὰν γένηται ἀνδρὶ ἑτέρῳ we have a common phrase, to denote 'cohabitation,' whether in matrimony or in concubinage, occurring in Lev. xxii. 12. Deut. xxiv. 2. Judges xiv. 20, and sometimes in the later Class. writers.

4. Now follows the application of this principle to the case in question. The sense of ὥς τε, is, 'and so' = 'so that;' serving to inference.

— καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐθανατώθητε τῷ νόμῳ, &c.] 'Ye also were slain to the law.' The most eminent Commentators, ancient and modern, suppose an hypallage, by which ἐθανατώθητε τῷ νόμῳ is taken as put for ὁ νόμος ἐθανατώθη ὑμῖν, 'the law has become dead to you,' meaning (as appears from the course of argument) 'ye are freed from the necessity of performing the works of the law in order to justification.' By this mode of expression, however different it may seem, yet the sense is the same; because the relation is dissolved, whichever of the parties be dead. But then, why, it may be asked, was it adopted? Not, as Taylor says, to avoid disgusting the Jews, or offending their prejudices; but rather (as in the case of a similarly strong term at Gal. ii. 19, seqq. ἀπὸ θανάτου—συνιστάμεναι) to recall the violent death of Christ,—in which, and after which, believers have been put to death as to the law and sin.

— The next clause, διὰ—Χριστοῦ, adverts to the means whereby this was brought about,—namely, through the crucified body of Christ; and εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι—ἑτέροις denotes passive,—'that ye should become another's,' lit. 'under the power of another, even of him who was raised from the dead.' The next words, ὥτα καρποφ. τῷ Θεῷ, are to be referred to the foregoing clause, and advert, as Hyper. and Calv. show, to the final effect which should arise from this new union with Christ,—namely, that we should bring forth fruit (that of holy obedience) unto God. The term καρποφορ. is by Chrysa., Hyper., and Grot., rightly supposed to be used with reference to καρπός, supra vi. 22, agreeably to the foregoing similitude; the offspring of marriage being its fruit. See Calv. and Hyper.

5. 'This verse is (as Stuart remarks) the theme of discussion throughout the remainder of the Chapter, with the exception of the next verse, the antithesis to this, which forms the theme of discussion at chap. viii. 1—11;' and that portion is, in a great measure, the antithesis of ver. 25. The course of thought in vv. 5 and 6 is easily traced by the Professor in the following statement of the general sense: 'I have said that you must be freed from the law, and united to Christ, in order that you may bring forth fruit to God. This is true; for the law is so far from accomplishing the great end of subduing and sanctifying the hearts of sinners, that it occasions just the opposite effect; i. e. it is the occasion of their becoming more deeply involved in guilt, παθήματα τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, τὰ διὰ τοῦ νόμου, ἐνῆργεῖτο ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ἡμῶν, εἰς τὸ καρποφορῆσαι τῷ θανάτῳ <sup>6</sup> οὐνὶ δὲ <sup>1</sup> καθηργήθημεν ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, * ἀποθανόντες, ἐν ᾧ κατειχόμεθα <sup>2</sup> ὥστε δουλεῖν ἡμᾶς ἐν καινότητι πνεύματος, καὶ οὐ παλαιότητι γράμματος.

7 Ἡ Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; ὁ νόμος ἁμαρτία; Μὴ γένοιτο! ἀλλὰ <sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup>

and of bringing them into more aggravated condemnation. It is the occasion of their bringing forth fruit unto death, and not unto God. But when we are freed from all reliance upon it as a means of subduing and sanctifying us, and, with a becoming sense of our guilt and helplessness, have betaken ourselves to Christ, and relied on him only as our sanctification and redemption,—then we are enabled to serve God with a new spirit, and not in the old way, of only a literal and external obedience.* This view is, I find, confirmed by the authority of Hyper,—in an admirable exegesis of this whole portion,—and mainly of Calv. and Bulling. Accordingly, the Apostle's discussion serves to show the necessity of the foregoing change, and its happy consequences.

— ἐν τῇ σαρκί] By this phrase many of the Latin Fathers, and most of the earlier modern Commentators understand, 'in the unregenerate state, under the dominion of fleshly lusts;' while the Greek Fathers, as also Calv., Hyper., Vortius, Hamm., Whitby, Locke, Carpan, and almost all the recent Expositors interpret 'under the carnal ordinance of the Law;' the phrase, they say, being frequently put in opposition to ἐν πνεύματι εἶναι, 'to be under the Gospel, and partakers of its spiritual blessings' (comp. infra viii. 2, 8, 9), as opposed to the carnality of the Law. This, however, is not clearly made out; whereas the former mode of taking the phrase is well based; and, accordingly, it is fully entitled to be adopted; especially if it be united, as it well may, with that laid down by Rückert, Fritz, De Wette, Meyer, and Alf., as an independent sense; for surely, in inculcating the sense laid down by the earlier Expositors, the Apostle may have meant to allude to the period before death with Christ; so that, as far as regards the allusion, ἐν τῇ σαρκί may contrast with the foregoing ἀναπαύεσθαι.

— ἐν τὰ παθήματα τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν we have a Hebrew phrase for τὰ πάθη τὰ ἁμαρτωλά, 'the sinful affections of the unregenerate state.' Πάθος is the usual term on this subject; as Rom. i. 26, πάθος ἀτιμίας. At τὰ διὰ τοῦ νόμου some Participle, as γεγονότα, must be supplied. Διὰ τοῦ νόμου should be rendered, not 'under the law,' but 'by the law;' i. e. by means of, it being the occasion thereof; intimating that these passions were generated by the prohibitions of the law, which rather excited a desire for what was forbidden. See notes at vv. 5 and 8.

— ἐνῆργεῖτο] 'wrought;' lit. 'energized.' See my Lex. The verb is here, as in 2 Cor. iv. 12, in Middl. Voice, though almost always elsewhere a Passive.—ἐν τοῖς μέλ., 'in our bodily organs,' the seat of sensuality. See v. 22. 1 Cor. vi. 15. Col. iii. 5, and James iv. 1.

— εἰς τὸ καρποφορῆσαι, &c.] 'for the bringing forth fruit unto death,' as both in its tendency and result.

6. οὐνὶ δὲ καθηγ.—νόμου] This verse presents a contrast with the preceding; q. d. 'our former state was one in the flesh; our present is one in the Spirit.' I have, with all the Editors from Weta. downwards, adopted ἀποθανόντες for text. rec. —τος, from most of the uncial, and many cursive MSS.; to which I add all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, and Cov. 3, omitted by Mill; and internal evidence confirms external, and espec. v. 4, where we have ἰθανατόθητα τῷ νόμῳ. Ἀποθανόντος arose from the scribes, who were led into error by the νόμου preceding. Alf. says 'It was a conjecture of Beza, from misunderstanding the text.' But that is impossible; since it occurs in several of the Codices Juniores, and in the Commentary of Chrysa. Scholz also testifies that it occurs in codd. plur.; in fact, in all but about 60. The construction is: οὐνὶ δὲ (opposed to ἔτι, at v. 5) καθηγ. ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, ἀποθανόντες [ἐκείνῳ, scil. νόμῳ] ἐν ᾧ κατειχόμεθα, which is, by Hypallage, equivalent to οὐνὶ δὲ ἀποθ. τῷ νόμῳ, ἐν ᾧ κατειχ., ἐλευθέρῳ ἴσμεν ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. Render, 'But now we have been released from the law, having died to that by which we were held in bondage; inasmuch as we are become dead to it; so that we must worship God according to a new and spiritual mode, not in the old and literal manner,' i. e. by the law of Moses. On the nature of the metaphor in κατειχ. see my Lex.

7. The Apostle now preoccupies two objections, which might be made by the legalist to the foregoing expressions; 1. On the tempting tendency or power of sin under the law. This he overrules at 7—12, by denying that what was said of the power of sin under the law, was to be understood as implying that the law was the cause of sin. He shows, on the contrary, that it only convicts men of sin, detects and prohibits it. 2. On the condemning power of sin, which is answered from ver. 12 to 25. See notes there.

— ὁ νόμος ἁμαρτία;] 'Is, then, the law the cause of sin?' q. d. 'Those motions of sins, which did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death, you said were by the law. Do you mean to imply by this that the law is the cause of sin?' The answer to which (as contained at vv. 7, 12) is: 'The law is by no means the cause of sin; on the contrary it detected and strictly prohibited sin; but it was made an occasion of sin by the evil propensities of our nature. These were excited and called forth by the prohibitions of the law, and first drew us into sin, and then, by sin, subjected us to death.' So Young. I prefer, however, to render, 'Is the Law (our Law) sin?' i. e. 'evil,' 'sinful.' I agree with Alf., that 'the question is asked, not by an objector, but by Paul himself, in anticipation of an

g ch. 4. 13.
8 v. 20.
Gal. 3. 19.
1 Cor. 15. 50.

τὴν ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔγνω, εἰ μὴ διὰ νόμον τὴν τε γὰρ ἐπιθυμίαν οὐκ ᾔδειν, εἰ μὴ ὁ νόμος ἔλεγεν Οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις<sup>8</sup> Ἐφ' ὅ-μην δὲ λαβούσα ἡ ἁμαρτία, διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς κατειργάσατο ἐν ἐμοὶ πᾶσαν ἐπιθυμίαν χωρίς γὰρ νόμου ἁμαρτία νεκρά.<sup>9</sup> Ἐγὼ objection.—ἀλλά, 'nay,' or 'but,' 'I had not known sin but by the Law.' By ἁμαρ. I would now understand, with Calv., Hyper., Mall., and Olsh., 'sin, in principle,' 'the principle of sin.' —τὴν τε γὰρ ἐπιθυμίαν οὐκ ᾔδειν, 'for neither should I have known anything of sin, if the Law had not said, Thou shalt not covet.'

—οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις] Here is, as often, an imperfect quotation (see infra xi. 26, 27. Heb. xii. 27), sufficient, however, to suggest to the mind the whole of the commandment in question. The γὰρ may be illustrative; but rather confirmatory. There can be no doubt that (as Hodge observes) the Apostle by ἐπιθυμ. 'designedly referred to an inward, spiritual sin, in order the more clearly to confirm his declaration. That certain outward actions are wrong, he and all other Pharisees knew, and were ready to admit; but that God took cognizance of the heart, and of its most secret workings, and even of its habits and dispositions, they were less disposed to imagine.' It is true, that some eminent Expositors maintain that the wiser Jews, and even Gentiles also, admitted the guilt inherent in ἐπιθυμία, 'lust,' of which they adduce many examples. Nay, that they admitted the guilt of sinful intention is plain from Eurip. Hippol. 317, where, among other confessions of guilt for such is this: χεῖρες μὲν ἀνῶται, φρήν δ' ἔχει μίσαντά τι: see also Orest. 1604. Yet even more of such instances would not invalidate the Apostle's assertion; since, as Crellius well observes, he is not speaking 'de sapientibus viris, quorum, ob summam paucitatem, ratio hac in parte non est habenda,' but of the bulk of mankind. Many Expositors are of opinion, as were some ancients, that the Apostle here, and up to the end of the Chapter, is not speaking in his own person, or of his own case (for that, they say, would be contrary to the whole scope of his discourse, and to what is said at viii. 2); but is personating the character of another, whether the Jew or the Gentile, by a μετασχηματισμὸς (as the Rhetoricians call it) found also at 1 Cor. iv. 6. Gal. iii. 18; but I rather agree with Prof. Stenersen, that the Apostle here, at any rate, used the first person, because 'ad ipsum haud minus quam ad omnes reliquos homines hoc pertinet;' as St. Ambrose well saw, who observes, 'sub sua persona, quasi generale causam agit Paulus.' See more in note on v. 8.

8. ἀφορμὴν δὲ λαβούσα ἡ ἁμαρτία] This verse is, as Prof. Hodge remarks, not to be connected logically with the last member of the preceding one, but is rather co-ordinate with it, and is a virtual answer to the question: Is the Law sin? i. e. morally evil; to which the answer is made by the strongest of negatives, μὴ γένοιτο! 'by no means!' and the Apostle proceeds to show, that on the contrary, it leads to the knowledge of sin; and then he adds, that it is not evil in itself, although incidentally the cause of sin.—ἁμαρ. here, as at v. 7, denotes 'the principle of sin,' 'sin in principle,' our corrupt nature, the old μακ, the φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός.

—As to ἀφορμή, it denotes not merely 'occasion,' but, as it were, 'the ground of attack;'—a use formed on the physical sense, 'a starting point, from which to make an attack.' See my note on Thucyd. i. 90, 2. It would seem, from the use of the Article in the first member of the sentence, that 'sin' is here meant, for greater force, to be personified, and thus action of the strongest kind (as denoted by κατειργάσατο) is ascribed to it.—Κατειργάσατο ἐπιθυμίαν must be understood with reference to that perversity of human nature, by which, as the Poet says, 'Nititur in vetitum semper, cupimusque negata,' and which verifies the saying of Solomon, 'Stolen water is sweet, and bread eaten furtively is pleasant.' The reverse is the case in the second clause, where it simply signifies the sinful disposition of the heart, and therefore the article is dispensed with. In the words χωρὶς νόμου ἁμαρτία νεκρά ('apart from law sin is dead within man, is not exerted or perceived'), we have, as Prof. Hodge remarks, two effects of the law in this declaration, the excitement of evil passions, and the discovery of them to be evil. Calvin makes the latter the more prominent particular, while the context would seem to require the former to be so made. Yet Calvin, 'mighty in the Scriptures,' was not likely to be wrong in such a matter, where bias could not distort his judgment. I would, with Bp. Terrot and Dr. Peile, place the latter on at least an equal footing with the former; though, of course, the two effects of law would vary in different persons. I agree with Prof. Hodge, that in vv. 9–11, which form an amplification and confirmation of the sentiment of vv. 7 and 8, showing more fully the operation of the law, St. Paul is describing his own Christian experience, and I quite assent to the remark of Dr. Peile, that 'that thus much may we gather from St. Paul's confession of the fault and corruption of his nature, that there lives not (nor has lived) the man whose conscience (if he deal truly with that law of God within him) has not, or will not sooner or later, have subdued him to say, O righteous Judge of all the earth, take my forfeit life, for I am not better than my first parents were!'

9. ἔγνων δὲ ἔχων—ποτέ] In this and the two next verses the Apostle expresses the same sentiment, only further unfolded, and in the amplification and confirmation thereof, showing more fully the operation of the Law. It would seem, too, that Paul is describing his own experience, not only because he uses the first person, but 'because,' as Hodge says, 'the exercises here detailed are more or less distinctly those of every true Christian, and consequently must have been those of the Apostle.' 'Ad suum ipsius exemplum,' observes Prof. Stenersen, 'provocat, non dubitans, quin quod ipse ob naturam suam depravatam accideret, id reliquis etiam, eadem depravatione laborantibus, accideret necesse esset.'—ἔχων, ὄντως ἔχων seems (by an expression similar to that of Hor. Epist. i. 10, 8, 'vivo et regno') to

δὲ ἔζων χωρὶς νόμου ποτέ· ἐλθούσης δὲ τῆς ἐντολῆς, ἡ ἁμαρτία ἀνέζησεν, ἐγὼ δὲ ἀπέθανον <sup>10 h</sup> καὶ εὗρέθη μοι ἡ ἐντολή ἡ εἰς <sup>h Lev. 18. 8. Ezek. 30. 11, 12. Neh. 9. 20.</sup> ζῶν, αὕτη εἰς θάνατον. <sup>11</sup> Ἡ γὰρ ἁμαρτία ἀφορμὴν λαβοῦσα, διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς ἐξηπάτησέ με, καὶ δι' αὐτῆς ἀπέκτεινεν. <sup>12 i</sup> Ὡστε <sup>11 Tim. 1. 8. Ps. 10. 3.</sup> ὁ μὲν νόμος ἅγιος, καὶ ἡ ἐντολή ἀγία καὶ δίκαια καὶ ἀγαθή. <sup>13 k</sup> Τὸ οὖν ἀγαθὸν ἐμοὶ γέγονε θάνατος; Μὴ γένοιτο! ἀλλὰ <sup>k ch. 2. 20.</sup> ἡ ἁμαρτία, ἵνα φανῇ ἁμαρτία, διὰ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ μοι κατεργαζομένη θάνατον, ἵνα γένηται καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἁμαρτωλὸς ἡ ἁμαρτία <sup>11 Tim. 1. 8. 1 Kings 21. 20, 22. Isa. 60. 1. 1 Mac. 1. 13.</sup> διὰ τῆς ἐντολῆς. <sup>14 i</sup> Οἶδαμεν γὰρ ὅτι ὁ νόμος πνευματικός

mean, 'lived at ease,' and to have reference to the security, and freedom from care, probably of men in such a state as is here described. This forcible language describes the state of Paul, from mere childhood to later boyhood, and perhaps further, before the Law began to work on his mind, being without a proper conception of the true nature and full extent of the Law, as 'exceeding broad;' see Ps. cxix. 96.

(— ἀποθνήσκου δὲ τῆς ἐντολῆς) 'but when the (foregoing) commandment came to me:' i. e. 'was brought home to my heart and conscience, by having true views of the nature and extent of the Law.' See Peile and Hodge.—The next words, ἡ ἁμαρτία ἀνέζησεν, ἐγὼ δὲ ἀπέθανον, may be well represented in sense by the words of Dr. Peile, 'then sin (which I had imagined to be dead within me) sprang up in fresh life and vigour (conf. ἀνιστάσθαι in Phil. iv. 10, and my note); and I found myself no better than dead;' 'ceased to live and flourish, as before' (see supra, ἔμω); or, as Hodge explains, 'fell into misery of mind, aware of the evil that was in me, and the danger to which I was exposed.'

10. καὶ εὗρέθη μοι—θάνατος] q. d. 'and the very commandment, whose end is life, was found (turned out) to me the cause of death.'

11. Here we have a repetition, with some variation in words, of the sentiment at ver. 8, the general meaning being, 'that our corrupt hearts made even the Law the means of causing us to sin.'

(— ἐξηπάτησας) 'lured and tempted me to sin;' e. gr. insinuating that the prohibitions of the law are unreasonable, and that the thing is pleasant and profitable, and will perhaps go unpunished by subsequent repentance: in short, using such sophistry as that by which the Serpent deceived Eve.

(— με—ἀπείκτ.) meaning, as before, in a metaphorical sense, 'brought me into a state of misery.'

12. ὅστε ὁ μὲν νόμος] 'so then (such being the case) the Law is holy, and &c.' The conclusion from the foregoing representation of the effect of the Law is, that it is not to be blamed for the evil which it incidentally produces; nay, 'the Law is, in every way, holy, and just, and good.'—ἅγιος is a term (like the Latin sanctus) properly applied to law; and signifying what justly claims our reverence and obedience, by enjoining personal holiness, or reminding of it by expressive rites. Of the distinction in the subsequent terms δίκαιος and ἀγαθός, see my Lex.

13. τὸ οὖν, &c.] The Apostle now considers the condemning power of sin under the Law. The sentiment is substantially the same as at v. 7; but here an objection is supposed; q. d. 'What, then, has this good law been the occasion of death to me? how can a thing deserve the appellation of good, if it tends to one's ruin?' To the negation which follows, the Apostle subjoins what may strongly establish that denial. The Apostle again denies that the Law is directly the cause of sin; but shows that our own corruption is the real source of the evil. The sense may be expressed thus:—'Hath, then, this good become death to me? By no means (but it was sin which was death to me), that it might appear to be sin, by working death to me by what is good, that sin might by the commandment be,' or 'become exceedingly sinful (i. e. heinous), so that sin might be comprehended in its true character, from its effects;' one of the surest tests by which the presence of evil is detected. 'Just as,' observes Theophyl., 'a disorder, which, when it has become worse, may be said to display, by means of the medical art, its extreme virulence, in not being removed even by that.'

14. 'Having exhibited the operation of the Law in producing conviction of sin, Paul proceeds to show its sure effect on the mind of the believer; it cannot secure his sanctification. The cause of this inability is not in the evil nature of the Law,—which is essentially spiritual (v. 14), but in the power of indwelling sin. 'I am carnal,' says the Apostle, 'sold under sin' (v. 14). As this, however, is not only a strong, but an ambiguous expression, Paul immediately explains his meaning. He does not intend to say that he was in the condition of a slave, whose acts are not always the evidence of his private inclination. His will may be one way, but his master may direct his actions another. So it is with the believer. He does what he likes, and omits to do what he approves.' (Hodge.) This is a correct popular analysis; but the Professor here overlooks, and in his subjoined Comment is quite in error as to, the οἶδαμεν, where the Plural is quite correct, having the same force as supra ii. 2. iii. 19, meaning, as Prof. Stenorsen points out:—'We,' i. e. 'all men know, that,' &c.; and he adds, 'Apostolus tanquam sententiam omnino cognitam atque indubitatam proponere potuit, quum nemo sana mente dubitare possit, quin lex, utpote ipsius Dei voluntatis revelatio, sc. imago, perfectissime sit et omnino celestis; nos autem, utpote parentum depravatorum liberi, depravati simus, atque ad omne bonum per nos ipsoe inutiles.' The γὰρ is not causal, nor, as Hodge supposes, transitive, ἐστίν· ἐγὼ δὲ † σαρκικός εἰμι, πεπραμένος ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν.

m Gal. 5. 17. 15 m δ γὰρ κατεργάζομαι, οὐ γινώσκω· οὐ γὰρ ὁ θέλω τοῦτο πρᾶσσω, ἀλλ' ὁ μισῶ τοῦτο ποιῶ. 16 Εἰ δὲ ὁ οὐ θέλω τοῦτο ποιῶ, σύμφημι τῷ νόμῳ ὅτι καλός. 17 νυνὶ δὲ οὐκ ἔτι ἐγὼ but exogetical, as illustrating the cases of sin and of the Law. As to the epithet πνευμ., when applied, as here, to any thing of which God, who 'is a Spirit,' is the origin, must derive its nature and character from that Spirit, and therefore when applied to a Law, must imply purity in those to whom it is promulgated.—Σαρκικός expresses the very opposite,—as opposite as Spirit and flesh, on whose works respectively see Gal. v. 19—23. As to the force of ἐγὼ, the ancient and later modern Commentators generally are agreed that the Apostle is speaking, not of himself, but of the unregenerate man; here, as before, using a μετασχηματισμός. Thus 'the Law,' Paul is meant to say, 'enjoins what is holy and spiritual; but, through the evil propensities of their corrupt nature, men sin against it, and are consequently subjected to death by it.' Other Expositors of the early modern, and a few recent ones of note, take what is said as meant to describe the actual state; while Alf., acting on the 'in medio tutissimus ibis,' accounts for the ἐγὼ as a 'keeping hold yet of the carnal ἐγὼ of former days, whose remnants are energizing in the renewed man.' But I still continue to prefer the first-mentioned view; and I am inclined to think it the best clue to the perplexities of this debated question here and supra vi. 17—20. It is, I agree with Conyb., impossible that the expressions at vi. 17—20, vii. 14, and viii. 4, can be meant of the same person at the same time; and it is not without reason he pronounces that the best Comment on this whole passage is to be found in the condensed expression of the same truths in Gal. v. 16—18.

Here, instead of σαρκικός, many of the most ancient uncials, several cursives, to which I add 1 Lamb. and 2 Mus. copies, and some Fathers, have σάρκινος, which is edited by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But the new reading is plainly a correction of the early Critics to a more Classical term; the Class. writers often using σάρκινος, but very rarely σαρκικός, and those only the later Greek writers.

— πεπραμένος ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμ.] A strong expression, suited to the foregoing image, and derived from the Old Test. (as 1 Kings xxi. 20, ἐπράθη ποιῆσαι τὸ ποσὸν, 'sold himself to commit wickedness.' Is. l. 1, ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν ἐπράθητε), weakened by those who merely explain it, 'devoted to sin.' In fact it may be called a phrasis pragmatis, compounded of two, i. e. 'sold to sin,' and, accordingly, 'doing its drudgery;' so meant to represent the unregenerate man as in some measure an unwilling instrument, and scarcely a free agent, labouring under the influence of the indwelling principle of sin.

15. This verse is intended to prove and illustrate the above πεπραμένος ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, 'the inability to do what one would.'

— οὐ γινώσκω] Many Expositors take this to mean, 'I approve not;' a sense, indeed, not unsuitable to the case; since, by disapproving what they act, contrary to the Law, they acknowledge that the fault is not in the Law, but in themselves. Yet of this signif. no sufficient authority has been adduced, and it is not quite agreeable to the following context. Hence it is greatly preferable to take it, with the ancient Versions, and some Fathers,—as Chrysa., Theophyl., and some modern Expositors,—as put for σκοτοῦμαι, συναρπάζομαι, denoting the acting blindly, as being hurried away by the dictates of another (and so σκοτοῦμαι is used in Plato, p. 506, οὕτω φῶμεν—σκοτωσάμενοι—τοὺς βελτίστους),—it being the effect of sin and the natural corruption of the heart thus to darken the understanding; so as to have no choice of action, or acting as præpeditus, hampered therein. So Chrysa. and Theophyl., οἷδα πῶς με συναρπάξει ἡ ἁμαρτία. And so Ecumen., σχεδὸν ἄβουλῳ τῶς συναρπάζομαι. 'Ἐπεισε (μοι) ἡ ἐπιθυμία αἰχμαλωτίζουσά με, &c. Moreover, κατεργάζομαι is not simply 'to do,' but 'to work out, effect.' So that the general sense is,—'For, as to what I am endeavouring to carry out, I am under blind obedience to the dictates of another,—the true mark of slavery.' The next words, οὐ γὰρ ὁ θέλω, are a further development of the bondage of the will, and evincing how blind is that service, and may be rendered,—'For not what I wish (that) do I effect; but what I like not that do I perform.' Here μισῶ is simply for ὁ θέλω (v. 19) = δυσχεραίνω. Thus μισῶ and δυσχ. are occasionally interchanged, especially in Plutarch. Thus the two semi-clauses, οὐ—πράσσω and ἀλλ' ὁ θέλω, present separate traits of the spiritual bondage of the unregenerate, the latter springing out of the former. With the latter Commentators compare several parallel sentiments in the profane writers; of which the most apposite are Arrian, Epict. ii. 26: Πάν διαρρηγμα μάχην περιέχει, ἐπεὶ γὰρ ὁ ἀμαρτάνων οὐ θέλει ἁμαρτάνειν, ἀλλὰ κατωρθῶσαι· δηλοῦν δτι ὁ μὴν θέλει, οὐ ποιεῖ, καὶ ὁ μὴ θέλει, ποιεῖ. Ovid, Met. vii. 19, aliudque cupido, Mens aliud suadet: video meliora proboque, Deteriora sequor.

16. Here the Apostle adduces an argument flowing from the foregoing admission, and such as the understanding of every unprejudiced person will ratify,—namely, that in so doing, even bad men acknowledge the excellence of the Moral Law, though they do not obey it; notwithstanding that, from the severe reproaches of conscience, they acknowledge their guilt, and have some faint purpose of obeying the Law.—The full sense of σύμφημι—καλός is, 'I speak with assent to the Law (or its prohibitions) acknowledging that it is good.'

17. νυνὶ δὲ οὐκ ἔτι ἐγὼ κατεργάζομαι] Render: 'Now then (i. e. in this case, under these circumstances) it is no longer I who commit (or practise) it, but sin, which dwelleth in me.' This must, of course, be taken with due limitations; intimating, that the man, thus acting in opposition to his conscience, best resolutions, and earnest endeavours, can hardly deserve the name of a free agent, but must labour under the influence of some fatal bias,—some inbred corruption, indwelling principle of sin; for in the latter clause, ἀλλ' ἡ οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἁμαρτία (containing the doctrine of indwelling sin), there seems to be an allusion to a disorder not arising from external causes, but inbred in the constitution of a man, and only requiring to be called forth by circumstances. The term οἰκῶ is so used in several passages of Aristotle that I have noted, one of which may suffice for example,—Tard. Med. Cur. v. p. 125, ἐνδοθὶ τοῦ σώματος ἀνθρώπου οἰκεῖται. Or we may say, with Whitby and Mackn., that the Apostle here, for the purpose of his argument, considers man as having two distinct natures, the spiritual and the carnal. The former he now speaks of as the real self, which he calls at v. 17, 19, and 25, ἐγώ, v. 22, τὸν ἰσὺ ἀνθρώπου, and v. 23, τὸν νόμον τοῦ νοῦ, and describes viii. 1 by κατὰ πνεῦμα: the latter is called ὁ νόμος τῆς ἁμαρτίας at v. 23, and τὸ σῶμα τοῦ θανάτου τούτου, v. 24. So Socrates, as Xen. records, used to say that 'he had two souls within him;' and in Xen. Cyr. i. 21, Araspus complains of 'two souls contending within him.' Whitby and Mackn. have well seen, that the ἐγώ here, which is emphatic, is equivalent to the ἰσὺ ἀνθρώπου at v. 22; and Mackn. thinks that 'the not bearing this in mind has led to the error in doctrine of the Carpocratians and others, who hold that the Christian is not responsible for the sins committed against his better judgment.' Whereas the language here used is, as Calv. observes, not the language of deprecation, and excuse of blame, but is merely a strong mode of representing the extent of the evil; and consequently, we are all fully responsible for the actions produced under the influence of indwelling sin.

κατεργάζομαι αὐτὸ, ἀλλ' ἡ οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἁμαρτία. <sup>18</sup> οἶδα <sup>Gen. 2. 25. & 3. 21.</sup> γὰρ ὅτι οὐκ οἰκεῖ ἐν ἐμοί, τουτέστιν ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ μου, ἀγαθὸν τὸ γὰρ θέλειν παράκειται μοι, τὸ δὲ κατεργάζεσθαι τὸ καλὸν οὐχ εὐρίσκω. <sup>19</sup> οὐ γὰρ ὁ θέλω ποιῶ ἀγαθὸν ἀλλ' ὁ οὐ θέλω κακὸν τοῦτο πράσσω. <sup>20</sup> Εἰ δὲ ὁ οὐ θέλω ἐγώ, τοῦτο ποιῶ, οὐκ ἔτι ἐγὼ κατεργάζομαι αὐτὸ, ἀλλ' ἡ οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἁμαρτία. <sup>21</sup> Εὐρίσκω ἄρα τὸν νόμον, τῷ θέλοντι ἐμοὶ ποιεῖν τὸ καλόν, ὅτι

18—20. The propriety and truth of this representation of the state of the believer, and of the influence of the Law, is here re-asserted and confirmed. At v. 18 there is a further development of the idea contained in ἡ οἰκοῦσα ἐν ἐμοὶ ἁμαρτία, 'For well I wot by experience of myself (v. 19), that there dwelleth not in me, i. e. in my flesh, aught that is good.'—παράκειται μοι, lit. 'is at hand,' 'is forthcoming;' for present use. The expression recurs at v. 21; but no where else in the New Test. As to the examples adduced by Alf., they are only of the physical sense. Of the metaphorical sense, as here (equiv. to πρόκειται, 2 Cor. viii. 2), no example has been produced; and I know of only one,—Dionys. Hal. Ant. viii. 41, 1599, 6, αἰετὶ ἡ μὲν εὐνοία ἡ πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα πάριστι, καὶ τὸ θελοῖεν σῶζεσθαι τοὺς πολλούς· ἡ δὲ λογὴ, καὶ τὸ δύνασθαι ποιεῖν ὁ θελοῖεν, ἀπιστι. The Apostle here depicts graphic the contest of sin and human corruption, while a man is struggling ineffectually, by his own strength, to obey the law of God.

The εὐρίσκω after οὐ is absent from A, B, C, and 3 or 4 cursives, with the Copt. and Armen. Versions, and two or three Greek Fathers, and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., and by Alf., who remarks, that the absence of the word in A, B, C, and the variations of γινώσκω and ἔχω are 'too strong presumptions of an interpolation to allow of its being retained.' But as far as regards the three uncials, the evidence is very incomplete; and, as to the two variations, they do not prove interpolation, since they seem to be merely two glosses on a use of εὐρίσκω so rare, that I have not been able to find elsewhere a single example; and consequently it was very unlikely to be known to a Critical Reviser. The removal of the word—as in A, B, C—was only another mode of getting rid of a word at which the Critics stumbled; espec. they saw that it might be dispensed with, by supposing παράκειται supplied from the preceding context; but they were not aware that of the οὐ thus used at the end of a sentence there are very few examples in the Class. writers; and, I believe, not one in the New Test. The Versions adduced are of very little authority; nor, indeed, are the Fathers, from their loose mode of citing; not to say, that they often drop a word not very intelligible. However, that it was read by Jerome is plain from the Vulg., and in the Arab. Version. The Pesch. Syr. Translator, as frequently, felt out the general sense in the context, and expressed by the free version, 'I am not able.'

19. οὐ γὰρ ὁ θέλω—πράσσω] This is a repetition, nearly totidem verbis, of v. 15, in which Paul re-asserts his inability to act up to his purpose and desire; here, however, representing it as a matter of fact, experienced by him; and, so far, it is an amplification of the last clause of v. 19.

20. The same conclusion from the same premises as at v. 17; where see note. At ἐγώ there is a very emphatic expression, pregnant in meaning; q. d. 'I in myself' (i. e. without the help of God).

21. εὐρίσκω ἄρα—παράκειται] Here there is somewhat of difficulty in determining the construction, and, as thereon depending, the sense. Many Expositors lay down the following construction: Εὐρίσκω [κατὰ] (per, by) τὸν νόμον, ὅτι ἐμοὶ τῷ θέλοντι ποιεῖν τὸ καλόν, ἐμοὶ τῷ κακὸν παράκειται. By τὸν νόμον they understand the Law of Moses. But this involves a very harsh ellipsis; and the Mosaic law has here nothing to do with the argument. Hence it is better, with others, to suppose τὸν put for τοῦτον, and to take νόμον in the sense of norma

o Pa. 1. 2.
2 Cor. 4. 10.
Eph. 4. 10.
p Gal. 5. 17.
ch. 6. 13, 10.

ἐμοὶ τὸ κακὸν παράκειται. <sup>23</sup> Συνήδομαι γὰρ τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον <sup>23</sup> ὁ βλέπω δὲ ἕτερον νόμον ἐν τοῖς μέλεσί μου ἀντιστρατεύμενον τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ νοῦς μου, καὶ αἰχμαλωτίζοντά με τῷ νόμῳ τῆς ἁμαρτίας τῷ ὄντι ἐν τοῖς μέλεσί μου. <sup>24</sup> Ταλαίπωρος ἐγὼ ἄνθρωπος! τίς με ῥύσεται ἐκ τοῦ

dictamen, 'a principle of action,' and of our constitution, called 'the law in our members' at v. 25. Thus the construction will be this: Εὐρίσκω ἄρα τὸν νόμον, ὅτι ἐμοὶ τῷ θέλοντι ποιεῖν τὸ καλὸν, τὸ κακὸν παράκειται ἐμοί; q. d. 'I find, then, this to be the law of sin in my members, or ruling principle of my nature, that when I am wishing to do good, evil presents itself to me.' Comp. supra v. 18, and note. This view of the sense is confirmed by Calv., Beza, Est., and others, including Hodge; and indeed the context at ver. 22 and 23 demands it, since there the Apostle explicitly points out what he here expresses not very clearly. The repetition of ἐμοί is not pleonastic, but makes τῷ θέλοντι more pointed. And the τῷ before θέλοντι is not unnecessary, since it strengthens the assertion, which may, suitably to the Apostle's intention, be expressed literally thus:—'I find this law with me—me, I say, whose wish it is to do good—that evil is (continually) at hand' (see note, supra v. 18). I agree with Dr. Peile, that while the Apostle in this Chapter "intended to record his own spiritual convictions and consolations as a Christian, he yet has mainly 'in a figure transferred these things to himself for our sakes; that we might learn by him not to think of ourselves above that which is written by example of' one who freely owns his insufficiency to save himself, only the more thankfully to avow (ver. 25) that 'his sufficiency is of God.'"

22, 23. The subject is here further developed, and the same desire is expressed more strongly; being drawn forth in a boldly figurative representation of the conflict supposed to exist. And here συνήδομαι τ. νόμῳ is a sentiment like σὺμφημι τ. ν. ὅτι καλὸς, at v. 16, but stronger; the συν. refers to ἐμαυτῷ, as in Eur. Hipp. 1281, τί πᾶσαι τοῖσδε (sc. ἐπὶ) συνήδῃ (sc. σεαυτῷ); comp. sim. constr. in Aristoph. Eq. 164, σύνουδ' ἐμαυτῷ τι καλόν. Besides, to ἀγροῦν is the office of the understanding; to delight in, that of the heart. On τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρ., see note supra ver. 17; and comp. 1 Pet. iii. 4. The expression occurs in Plato and Philo (indeed it had before been used by Pythagoras), and perhaps Philo borrowed it not so much from Plato, as from the theology of his own countrymen; since vestiges of it are found in Joseph. and the Rabbinical writers. But there it denotes merely the mental and reasoning part of man; whereas here it must, for four reasons well stated by Prof. Hodge, pre-suppose the person in question as in a state of Divine grace, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, before the assertion συνήδομαι—ἔσω ἄνθρωπον can be true. "As I," observes Hodge, "in the language of the Apostle, includes, as it were, two persons, the new and the old man, the flesh and the spirit, it is necessary to limit the proposition, whether he says, 'In me there is no good thing,' or, 'I delight in the law of God.' The former was true only as to his flesh; the latter only as to his inward man. What is here said," he observes, "of the 'inward man' and 'the law in the members,' is elsewhere said of 'the Spirit' and 'the flesh.' The conflict which is described here is depicted also in ch. viii. 13. Gal. v. 17. Col. iii. 9, 10; precisely the same things are predicted of the evil principle in all these cases, especially in the passage of Galatians. If, therefore, the contest between 'the flesh and Spirit' be peculiar to the renewed man, so is also that of which Paul speaks in this Chapter."

By ἕτερον νόμον is meant 'another principle of action, or impulse;' sometimes called the νόμος ἐν τῇ σαρκί, opposed to which is the νόμος τοῦ νοῦς further on, and νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος, at viii. 2.—ἐν τοῖς μέλεσι alludes to sensuality as seated in the various organs of the body. In ἀντιστρατ. and αἰχμ. we have metaphors derived from military affairs; and the two terms well designate the conflict between reason and passion. So Aristot. Ep. ii. 1, ἔρω ἀντιστρατεύειν τοῖς ὑπερφηροῦσι φιλαί.

24. ταλαίπωρος ἐγὼ ἄνθρ.] A most pathetic burst of feeling, drawn forth by a strong sense of the misery of the inward conflict, and the helpless and wretched condition of the person so circumstanced; involving a sort of death, while yet alive. He, in despair, exclaims, τίς με ῥύσεται—θανάτου τούτου; q. d. 'O wretched man that I am; who shall (who is there to) deliver me from, &c.?' Not, as several Expositors explain, wishing to be released from the body by death; for it is of the burden of sin, not of life, that the Apostle has been speaking; and consequently it is from this that he cries out for deliverance; just as at viii. 21 he expresses an ardent hope that the human creation ἐλευθερωθήσεται ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς. The body is considered as the burden of sin, weighing down the soul, and dragging it to corruption and misery. Accordingly it is equiv. to the φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός,—in constant opposition to the spirit and frustrating its wishes,—which is represented as dead weight, dragging the spirit down, as it were. In this point of view how interesting is the very similar confession of Socrates, introduced by Plato in his Phæd. p. 66, c: "Ἐπεὶ ἐν τῷ σώματι ἔχωμεν, καὶ συμπεφυκμένη ἡ ἡμῶν ἡ ψυχὴ μετὰ τοῦ τοιοῦτου κακοῦ, οὐ μήποτε κτησάμεθα ἱκανῶς, οὐ ἐκθυμούμεθα. The cry here is to be supposed uttered in full persuasion of the deliverance effected for the believer by Christ; so that his conflict will result not in the victory of sin and death, but in the principle of grace, according to the promise, 'Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace.' The assuring remembrance of this draws forth at v. 25 the burst of gratitude, expressed in εὐχαριστῶ—ἡμῶν and uttered in full persuasion of this deliverance by grace. The words require no laboured exposition, but merely to be rescued from the perversion of false Criticism. For text. rec. Lachm., σώματος τοῦ θανάτου τούτου; <sup>25</sup> Ἐὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ διὰ <sup>1</sup> Cor. 15.

 Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν!—Ἀρα οὖν αὐτὸς ἐγὼ τῷ
 μὲν νοῦ δουλεύω νόμῳ Θεοῦ, τῇ δὲ σαρκὶ νόμῳ ἁμαρτίας.

VIII. <sup>1</sup> Οὐδὲν ἄρα νῦν κατάκριμα τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ [μὴ <sup>a</sup> Gal. 5. 18.

Tisch., and Alf. edit, χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ, from B, and one cursive, No. 213 (to which I can make no addition). Of the other uncials, D, E, F, G, have ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ. C<sup>1</sup> is uncertain; C<sup>2</sup> has χάρις διὰ τῷ Θεῷ. That ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ (found also in the Vulg.) is an alteration of Critica, who thought the words an answer to the interrogation, is quite plain; yet it is not such; though strict propriety, and regularity of composition, might require it. In short, the text. rec. is a brief mode of expression, which, fully expressed, would have stood thus: ὁ Θεὸς, διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, &c., ᾧ εὐχαριστῶ. There is, however, more of energy in the other mode, inasmuch as brevity of this kind is closely connected with pathos, for it is a pious ejaculation of deep thankfulness (similar to another elsewhere, 1 Cor. xv. 57, τῷ δὲ Θεῷ χάρις τῷ δίδόντι ἡμῖν τὸ νίκαι διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), suggested partly by sympathy for the wretched person just described, but chiefly by that deeply thankful remembrance of his own deliverance from sin and Satan; q. d. 'Yes, I do thank God that I (and every person so circumstanced) am delivered.' There is no objection to the sentiment of the reading adopted by the fore-mentioned Editors, if, at least, it be not considered, with Alf., as an answer to the preceding question; for such it cannot be, any more than εὐχαριστῶ is; neither did the Critic who formed the emendation intend it to be, but only a polishing of the somewhat homely expression εὐχαριστῶ, and suggested to him by the fore-mentioned passage, 1 Cor. xv. 57. As to Alford's objection to εὐχαριστῶ, on the score of its slender authority, it is groundless, since it occurs in A and all the other uncials except B, D, E, F, G, and all the cursives except 10, for I find it in every Lamb. and Mus. copy. As to the χάρις διὰ τῷ Θεῷ found in C<sup>2</sup> and several cursives, it was only an improvement on that of B, in order to prevent the words from being taken as an answer to a question.

25. Ἀρα οὖν αὐτὸς ἐγὼ—ἁμαρτ.] Here we have a resumption of what the Apostle had been saying about the frailty and corruption of human nature, and, in fact, a summary of what was said more at large supra vv. 14—25. The terms νοῦ and σαρκὶ are here (as τὸ σῶμα and ἡ ψυχὴ) in strong contrast, as σὰρξ signifies 'what is corrupt in man,' so νοῦ must mean 'that nature as renewed.' 'In every believer (observes Prof. Hodge), and in no one else, there are two principles, grace and sin, the flesh and the spirit, the law in the members and the law in the mind; these are contrary the one to the other.' 'I myself,' says the Apostle, or 'I, one and the same man, who have been saying all this in disparagement of Law, feel both of these principles within me. With the one I serve the law of God; with the other, the law of sin, that is, sin itself, which, as a law in my members, essays to control me.' In fact this αὐτὸς may be considered, with Conyb., as the key to the whole passage, vv. 14—25. This contrast between the two states

(of bondage and deliverance) is happily expressed by Abp. Leighton thus:—'Is this he that so lately cried out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? that now triumphs, O happy man! who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Yes, it is the same. Pained then with the thoughts of that miserable conjunction with a body of death, and so crying out, "Who will deliver?" Now he hath found a Deliverer to do that for him, to whom he is for ever united. So vast a difference is there betwixt a Christian taken in himself, and in Christ.'

VIII. Having shown that all men—whether under the law of Moses, or of nature—so far from being justified before God, are convicted as sinners; and having thus evinced the inefficacy of the Law, or of any Law of works, to sanctification, from the want of that aid from above which can alone enable us to overcome the inherent corruption of nature; finally, having at ver. 25 pointed to the remedy provided in the Gospel of Christ, the Apostle now proceeds to develope and enforce the argument propounded at vii. 14 for Christian sanctification (founded on the superior efficaciousness of the means of grace afforded by the Gospel), and describes the nature and blessedness of this Gospel deliverance, by contrast with the misery of those who sought to justify themselves by their own righteousness, described in the latter part of the foregoing Chapter. The present Chapter exhibits the reverse of all this; namely, the nature and blessedness of the deliverance by the Gospel (inasmuch that several portions of this Chapter are antithetical to others at chap. vii.); and in treating this subject he leaves the field of logical argument, and enters on the more elevated sphere of joyous exultation.

1. οὐδὲν ἄρα νῦν κατάκρ., &c.] The full sense is, 'There is then' (an inference from vii. 25, 'because they delight in the law of God,' &c.)—as things now are—since the deliverance by grace from the body of sin effected by Christ—there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus;—meaning, the being intimately united to, ever incorporated with, him, in the way pointed out in Scripture;—namely, by having his Spirit dwelling in them; as is said infra v. 9, and in various parts of ch. vi. with which comp. 2 Cor. v. 17, εἰ τις (ἰστέ) ἐν Χριστῷ. Comp. John xv. 4, μένω ἐν ἐμοί. 1 John ii. 5. iii. 6.

—τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰ. μὴ κατὰ σάρκα, &c.] What I have said on the hypothetical sense to be assigned to these words, viz. 'if they do but walk,' so that they walk, &c., is, I find, agreeable to the view of the sense adopted by Hyper., Calv., Bulling., and, of recent Commentators, Dr. Peile. Hyper. renders, 'qui modo ambulans,' 'so that they do but walk,' showing, he adds, that the justification through Christ's death can only be made effectual by sanctification through his Spirit. And such is the view taken by Abp. Leighton, in his 19th Sermon. Thus, then, the

b ch. 6. 18,
22.
John 3. 26.
Gal. 3. 1.
1 Cor. 15. 45.
c 3 Cor. 5.
31.
Eph. 2. 14,
15.
Gal. 3. 13.
Heb. 7. 18,
19.

κατὰ σάρκα περιπατοῦσιν,] [ἀλλὰ κατὰ πνεῦμα.] <sup>2 b</sup> ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ ἡλευθέρωσε με ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου τῆς ἁμαρτίας καὶ τοῦ θανάτου. <sup>3 c</sup> Τὸ γὰρ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου, ἐν ᾧ ἡσθένει διὰ τῆς σαρκὸς, ὁ Θεὸς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ υἱὸν πέμψας ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, καὶ περὶ ἁμαρτίας, κατέκρινε τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἐν τῇ σαρκί· <sup>4</sup> ἵνα τὸ δι-imputation of Christ's righteousness is suspended upon men's personal holiness of life as its necessary antecedent condition. However, the words μη κατὰ πνεῦμα are omitted in MSS. B, C, C<sup>2</sup>, D, F, G, and some 4 or 5 cursives, and are cancelled by all the Critical Editors, except Matthæi, who adduces several reasons against their being expunged, which, added to the circumstance of external authority for their removal being insufficient, must warrant their being retained; unless internal evidence were decidedly against them; which is not the case. They may, indeed, have been interpolated from v. 4; but they may have been expunged, in order to remove the tautology with v. 4; I have thought that they seem called for by the reference to the preceding and following context, and that some limitation seems necessary. But Mr. Alf. pronounces that they are out of place here, 'because this moral element of those in Christ is not yet brought in; the present assertion is general, and is made good in detail further on.' It may be so. At any rate, I readily grant, that the words ἀλλὰ κατὰ πνεῦμα, absent both from the MSS. above mentioned, and also from others of nearly equal weight, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, were more likely to have been inserted than removed. Under these circumstances, I have double bracketed these words, and single bracketed the former. The proposition contained in v. 1,— 'There is no condemnation to those in Christ Jesus; they shall never be condemned and perish,—is proved from the following several reasons. (1) Because they are delivered from the law; all its demands being fulfilled in them by the mission and sacrifice of Christ, vv. 1—4. (2) Because their salvation is actually begun in the regeneration and sanctification of their hearts by the Holy Spirit. Those who have the Spirit of Christ have the Spirit of life, vv. 5—11. (3) Not only is their salvation begun, but they are the children of God, and if children they are heirs, vv. 12—17. (4) The afflictions which they may be called to endure are not inconsistent with this filial relation to God, because they are utterly insignificant in comparison with the glory that shall be revealed in them; and under these afflictions they are sustained, both by hope and by the intercessions of the Holy Spirit, vv. 18—28. (5) Because they are predestinated to the attainment of eternal life; of which predestination their present sanctification in effectual calling is the result, and, therefore, the evidence, vv. 28—30. (6) Because God has given his Son to die for them, and thereby to secure their justification and salvation, vv. 31—34. (7) Because the love of God is infinite and unchangeable, from which nothing can separate them, vv. 35—39.' (Hodge.)

2. ὁ γὰρ νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος, &c.] The Apostle (as Hyper. observes) here subjoins a

reason in proof of his foregoing proposition; not, however, one derived from the efficacy of the Spirit, as might at first sight appear, but from the power of Christ. Christ is mentioned, because the Spirit so given is said to be his Spirit; and yet at v. 19 we have Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ. But this seeming diversity is easily reconciled by the consideration that the Holy Spirit proceeds indifferently from the Father and the Son. Thus, at 1 Pet. i. 11, the Spirit is called 'the Spirit of Christ,' as having been sent by Christ from the Father. See John xv. 26. So here the renovating influence of the Spirit may well be said to subsist in Χρ. 'I., He being the medium of communication, by sending it from the Father; whose Spirit, however, it essentially, and in the highest sense, may be said to be. As respects the exact sense of the expression, ὁ νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς, &c., it may denote, as Dr. Peile explains, 'the law (meaning the Gospel) of which the life-giving Spirit is the author.' And thus the correspondent expression, ὁ νόμος τῆς ἁμαρτίας καὶ θανάτου, may mean (Dr. Peile thinks it does) 'the law of God,' so called because incidentally the cause of sin and death. "Thus (observes Prof. Hodge) the sense of the whole verse, as connected with ver. 1, is, 'There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, because they have been freed by the Gospel from that law which, though good in itself, is yet the cause of sin and death.'" This verse, then, assigns a reason for the declaration at v. 1, and the truth taught in ver. 2 is confirmed in ver. 3.

3. τὸ γὰρ ἀδύνατον, &c.] This is confirmative and explanatory of what was said at ver. 2, by a comparison of the power of Christ with the requirements of the Law; q. d., '[We are thus made free;] for what the law,' &c., lit. 'that part of the law which could not be fulfilled.' The construction is irregular, and regarded as involving an Anacoluthon, and a brevity of expression, to be filled up, by ἐκείνης, from the subject matter.—νόμου has the force of νόμος; 'which it was impossible for the law to do.'

—ἡθύνει meaning, 'was [too] weak to accomplish the desired end'; an idiom found both in the Class. and the Scriptural writers. So Thucyd. vi. 9, 3, καὶ γὰρ πρὸς τοὺς τρόπους τοὺς ὑμετέρους ἀσθύνει ἂν μου ὁ λόγος εἴη.—At διὰ τῆς σαρκὸς some Participle is left understood; the full sense being, 'acting through the flesh,' i. e. 'the fleshly nature of man;' and this as being enjoined τοῖς τὴν θνητὴν (read σαρκίην) περικειμένοις τὴν φύσιν. (Theodor.) In ἁμαρτίας there may be a Genit. of character, denoting what pertains to the word preceding.—διὰ τῆς σαρκὸς is best rendered, 'on account of the flesh.'

—κατέκρινε τὴν αμ. ἐν τῇ σαρκί.] On the sense here Expositors are not agreed. Many

καίωμα τοῦ νόμου πληρωθῇ ἐν ἡμῖν τοῖς μὴ κατὰ σάρκα περιπατοῦσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ πνεῦμα. <sup>5</sup> <sup>d</sup> Οἱ γὰρ κατὰ σάρκα ὄντες <sup>41</sup> <sup>Cor. 2.</sup> τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς φρονοῦσιν οἱ δὲ κατὰ πνεῦμα τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος. <sup>6</sup> <sup>e</sup> τὸ γὰρ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς θάνατος· τὸ δὲ φρόνημα τοῦ <sup>e</sup> <sup>ch. 6. 21.</sup> πνεύματος ζωὴ καὶ εἰρήνη. <sup>7</sup> διότι τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς

explain it, 'punished sin in the flesh,' meaning, in the body of Christ; an interpretation somewhat confirmed by what precedes, but involving too many objections to be admitted. The most probable interpretation is, 'put down,' 'cast out,' 'deposed, sin;': no longer suffering it to reign over man. Comp. John xii. 31, where of Satan it is said, ἐκβληθήσεται; and this is confirmed by Chrys., ἐνίκησεν αὐτὴν, καὶ τὴν δύναμιν αὐτῇ ἐξέλεως. And so Theodor. κατέλυσε. So, too, Hyper. explains the words; and Calv., who remarks that the Apostle adds, ἐν τῇ σαρκί, quo certior nostra fiducia, dum videmus peccatum et regnum peccati in ipsâ naturâ nostrâ fuisse devictum et abolitum; sic enim sequitur, naturam nostram vere fieri participem ejus victoriæ.' Thus there seems to be a sensus pragmaticus, in which the notions of putting down (as it were by sentence; as we say, 'crying down'), and triumphing over, casting out, are blended. Of course, Christ's triumph over sin is the Christian's, by his union with Christ, and participation in his Spirit of grace. In short, the best Comment on this passage may be found in Eph. iv. 8, ῥημαλώτευσεν αἰχμαλωσίαν, meaning, 'he led them—Death, Satan, and Sin—into captivity (after triumphing over and putting them down), who had triumphed over and led captive others.' See more in my note on that verse.

4. Ἰνα τὸ δικ.—πληρωθῇ ἐν, &c. 'In order that the ordinances of the law might be fulfilled in us.' These words express the design and result of the sacrifice of Christ. By δικ. seems meant 'the statutory requirements of the law,' regarded as a body of ordinances, marking out the substance of what the law demands.

5. οἱ γὰρ κατὰ σάρκα—φρονοῦσιν It has been disputed whether the γὰρ be causal, or illustrative. According to the former view, we have here stated the cause why this applies only to those who live κατὰ πνεῦμα. Both views, however, may be admitted; and the sentiment would seem to be both, as Hyper. says, illustrative and explanatory of the preceding clause, and causal, by assigning a reason why the benefit of Christianity does not show its efficacy except in those who walk after the Spirit; a reason derived from the contrary aims and actions of the flesh and of the spirit. See more on the logical connexion in Thom. Aquin., Hyper., and Est., from whose discussions it appears that the expressions κατὰ σάρκα and κατὰ πνεῦμα are the points of explanation.

—τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς φρονοῦσιν] There is no ellipse of πράγματα: but simply the use of the neuter of the Article put absolutely with a Genit. of subet., and thus denoting 'all that concerns it, or belongs to it;' as in Plato, p. 458, τὰ τῶν παρόντων, 'the interest, or concern of those that are present.' Comp. Hdot. viii. 75. So in Thucyd. viii. 35, φρονεῖν τὰ τῶν Ἀθηναίων, signifies 'to study, favour, the interests of the Athenians.' There is, however, a difference not unworthy of attention between the Classical and the Scriptural use of φρονεῖν τὰ τινος, that while, in the former, it denotes 'to take part with any one,' 'to mind his interest;' in the latter it signifies, by an idea transferred from what stirs the mind, to that which moves the affections, 'to set one's heart on, place one's affections on.' Yet I can adduce one example of this use from the Class. writers—one, too, where we should least expect it—Aristot. Ethic. x. 7, ἀνθρώπινα φρονεῖν. So that, upon the whole, I approve of Mr. Walford's interpretation of φρονεῖν, by which he understands it to express rather the affection of the heart than the intelligence of the understanding. But why he should have assigned to τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς at the next verse the sense 'the favouring of the flesh,' I am quite at a loss to imagine, unless that Bp. Terrot explains it to mean 'the natural propensities, so called because the bodily appetites have an undue influence over the mind and conscience.' That, however, is not a happily chosen term, since propensity is a word used not of the body (which is here not designated as the seat of the malady), but the mind and will. So Milton speaks of 'hearts propense to waver.' Not to say that φρόνημα, from its very origin, can only apply to the mind. In short, τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς can only signify τὸ φρονεῖν τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς, which expression I have already explained.

6. This verse is co-ordinate with ver. 5, being the Major Proposition of the argument preceding, and is, like it, an illustration of ver. 4; supplying another step in the Apostle's argument; traced by Stuart thus: ['The precepts of the Law are obeyed by those who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit:] but carnal men will not give heed to spiritual things, and their pursuits lead to death. While the spiritual mind, i.e. a mind conformed to the dictates of the Spirit, stands connected with life and peace.' Crellius, however, traces it more logically thus: 'Those who are after the flesh, they savour the things of the flesh. But to savour the things of the flesh is death. Therefore those who are after the flesh are subject to death, and cannot attain justification.'

Here τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς is equiv. to τὸ φρονεῖν τὰ τῆς σαρκὸς just before; meaning, 'the being devoted to the flesh.' By σὰρξ is here, as often in St. Paul, meant, not 'the animal propensities' only, but 'the carnal nature generally,' 'the seat of carnal appetites and affections,' whether physical or moral, 'the corrupt nature derived from Adam.'

7. διότι 'quippe,' 'since,' assigning the ground or reason why what is asserted at ver. 6 is so. The reason of the enmity is next subjoined, where δύναται (scil. ὑποτάσσεται) may well, as the best Expositors are agreed, be taken (as often) so as not to exclude man's free-

f1 Cor. 2.

14.

g1 Cor. 3.

16.

Gal. 4. 6.

Phil. 1. 19.

h1 Cor. 15.

45.

i Acts 2. 24.

ch. 6. 4. 5.

1 Cor. 6. 14.

9 Cor. 4. 14.

Eph. 2. 5.

Col. 2. 13.

ἐχθρα εἰς Θεόν τῷ γὰρ νόμῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐχ ὑποτάσσεται· οὐδὲ γὰρ δύνανται· <sup>8</sup> οἱ δὲ ἐν σαρκὶ ὄντες Θεῷ ἀρέσαι οὐ δύνανται. <sup>9</sup> ὅτι ὅτι οὐκ ἔστι ἐν σαρκί, ἀλλ' ἐν πνεύματι, εἴπερ Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν. εἰ δὲ τις πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ οὐκ ἔχει, οὗτος οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτοῦ. <sup>10</sup> ἢ εἰ δὲ Χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν, τὸ μὲν σῶμα νεκρὸν δι' ἁμαρτίαν, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ζωὴ διὰ δικαιοσύνην. <sup>11</sup> Εἰ δὲ τὸ will, but as merely involving a moral impossibility. This, however, would seem to be no proper place for debating the question as to the freedom of the human will; and δύνανται may here be taken in its strict sense; what is here meant being, that 'the carnal nature just spoken of being repugnant to the will of God, its very nature permits not that it should be subject to the will of God.' 'For how (says Austin) can snow be warmed? since when it is melted and becomes warm, it is no longer snow.' Even so is it with the carnal mind.

8. οἱ δὲ—δύνανται] 'But they who are in the flesh, under the influence of the flesh, as the governing principle of thought and action, 'cannot please God,' i. e. by Μεσότης, are the objects of his displeasure, as rebellious subjects.

9. Here the opposite character may be placed in contrast. But it is better, with Calv. and Hyper., to suppose that the general sentiment is accommodated to the persons addressed, per hypothēsin; what has been said being transferred to the case of their being renewed persons as put hypothetically. Accordingly, στὴν must mean, ex modo, 'provided that.' The next clause, εἰ δὲ τις—αὐτοῦ, 'but if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' I now see reason to reject the sense assigned by Bp. Middl. to Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ, 'a godly spirit,' equivalent to pious feeling. Vain is it that the learned prelate appeals to the context in support of this interpretation,—since that, properly weighed, is against his interpretation,—which is, indeed, no other than the gloss of the Socinians. See Croll. and Schliting. Prof. Hodge has satisfactorily shown, that the two expressions, Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ, and Πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ, can only with propriety be explained of the influences of the Holy Spirit, indwelling in the Christian. And it is, I think, rightly pointed out by Mr. Walford that the Apostle's purpose is to express the agent, the Holy Spirit, by his influence, who imparts and effects the temper or godly disposition in question, and not the disposition itself. The Article is not necessary to give the word that sense, because the word associated with it in regimen has it not. It is used without the Article again at vv. 14 and 15, in the manifest sense of the influence of the Holy Spirit.

—οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτοῦ is a strong expression, for the αὐτοῦ is emphatic; q. d. 'none of his,' but another's—Satan's; and the force of the Genit. points not so much to his being his by baptism, as to the far higher sense, of being united to him as being a member of his body, of which union St. John often speaks.

10. εἰ δὲ Χρ. ἐν ὑμῖν] Render: 'However, if Christ be in you, the body is (and continues) dead, on account of sin, but the spirit (your spirit) is life, on account of (by reason of) righteousness.' The expression ἐν ὑμῖν is briefly worded for οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν, which occurs just before and just after (and conf. 2 Cor. iii. 17).—'which,' as Prof. Hodge observes, 'shows that the manner in which Christ dwells in his people is by the communication to them of the Holy Spirit.' Νεκρὸν is best taken to mean 'spiritually dead,' i. e. in trespasses and sins, destitute of spiritual life, in a state of condemnation; and the meaning may be expressed, with Stuart, thus: 'If the Spirit of Christ dwell in you, then, although your bodies (i. e. you) are spiritually dead, i. e. are still the seat of divers carnal affections and lusts (ver. 10), yet you shall spiritually live; for the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead will subdue these forbidden affections and desires, and gradually make you entirely conformed to his will.'—By the πνεῦμα seems meant 'the human heart,' as acted on and influenced by God's Spirit. By δικαιοσύνην is, I agree with Mr. Alford, not meant 'the imputed righteousness of justification, but the implanted righteousness of sanctification of the Spirit.' It is a strong confirmation of this view, that, throughout this part of the chapter it is not the justification, but the sanctification of Christians, that forms the leading subject.

11. There is here, as Calvin and Hyper. point out, a confirmation, by amplification, derived from the efficient cause: 'quā asserit,' says Hyper., 'Spiritus non modo in animā posse tantas res efficere, verum, quod magis mirabile, sperandum insuper ut virtute ejusdem Spiritus ipsum quoque corpus, quod tempore peccatum manet mortis obnoxium, suo tempore gloriam amplissimam recipiat.' The δὲ is continuative, carrying forward the foregoing supposition. 'And further (or, 'moreover'), if, &c. The argument is, that, inasmuch as God, by his Spirit, had raised up Jesus from the dead, he would raise up his people also; since the resurrection of Christ secures the resurrection also of those who are his. Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 23. I am now of opinion that there is here not a periphrasis, as Hodge says (who compares Rom. iv. 24, &c.), but a stronger mode of expression, intended to bring into more prominence the operation of the Spirit; and to intimate that, as the Spirit is powerful over death, it cannot fail to render those in whom it dwells partakers of Christ's resurrection. I still continue to read τὸ ἰσχυρὸν α. Πνεῦμα (for text. rec. τοῦ ἰσχυροῦτος α. Πνεύματος), from B, D, E, F, G, J, and many cursives (to which I add 2 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by the Syr., Ital., Vulg., Sahid., and Arab. Versions, and several Fathers, confirmed by internal evidence; it being the more difficult reading, and the Syntax less usual. The true reading, however, after all, is not quite certain, and may be διὰ τοῦ ἐν—τος πν—τος: and the sense thus yielded is more

Πνεῦμα τοῦ ἐγείραντος Ἰησοῦν ἐκ νεκρῶν οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν, ὁ ἐγείρας
τὸν Χριστὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν ζωοποιήσῃ καὶ τὰ θνητὰ σώματα ὑμῶν διὰ † τὸ ἐνοικοῦν αὐτοῦ † Πνεῦμα ἐν ὑμῖν.

12<sup>k</sup> Ἄρα οὖν, ἀδελφοί, ὀφειλέται ἐσμέν οὐ τῇ σαρκί, τοῦ κατὰ <sup>k</sup> <sup>oh. a. 7, 18.</sup>
σάρκα ζῆν. 13<sup>l</sup> Εἰ γὰρ κατὰ σάρκα ζῆτε, μέλλετε ἀποθνήσκειν <sup>l</sup> <sup>Gal. a. 8.</sup>
εἰ δὲ Πνεύματι τὰς πράξεις τοῦ σώματος θανατοῦτε, ζήσεσθε. <sup>Col. a. 5, 6.</sup>

14<sup>m</sup> Ὅσοι γὰρ Πνεύματι Θεοῦ ἄγονται, οὗτοί εἰσιν υἱοὶ Θεοῦ. <sup>m</sup> <sup>Gal. b. 18.</sup>
15<sup>n</sup> Οὐ γὰρ ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα δουλείας πάλιν εἰς φόβον, ἀλλ' <sup>n</sup> <sup>Tim. 1. 7.</sup>
<sup>Gal. a. 20.</sup>
<sup>a. 4, 5, 6.</sup>

satisfactory, and more likely to have been intended by the Apostle. The other reading can only signify 'on account of,' or 'because of,' which Alford avers 'may imply the direct agency of the Spirit;' which, however, is more than I can see; and, upon the whole, both the reading and the interpretation seem an open question.

12—28. Here we have 'two additional arguments in support of the great theme of the chapter,—the safety of all who are in Christ. The first is derived from their adoption, vv. 12—17; and the second from the fact, that they are sustained by hope, and aided by the Spirit, under all their trials; so that all things work together for their good, v. 28. Paul had just before shown that believers were distinguished by the indwelling of the Spirit. Hence he infers the obligation to live according to the Spirit, and mortify the deeds of the body, v. 12. If they did this they should live, v. 13. Not only because, as previously argued, the Spirit is the source of life, but also because all who are led by the Spirit are the children of God. This is a new ground of security, v. 14. The reality of their adoption is proved, first, by their own filial feelings; as God's relation and feelings towards us are always the counterpart of ours towards Him, v. 15. Secondly, by the testimony of the Spirit itself with our spirits, v. 16. If children, the inference is plain that believers shall be saved, for they are heirs. Salvation follows adoption, as, among men, heirship does sonship. They are joint heirs with Jesus Christ,' v. 17. (Hodge.)

12. Ἄρα οὖν, &c.] These Particles have here a conclusive force, 'So then;' introducing an inference from the reasoning which occurs in the two foregoing Chapters, and up to ver. 11 of the present; pointing out the infinite obligation we Christians are under to a life of holiness and purity; since no less depends on the fulfilment, or non-fulfilment, of that condition, than eternal life, or eternal death.

—ὀφειλέται ἑαυτῶν] lit. 'we are under a constraining obligation,' like that of suit and service. See my Lex., and comp. Soph. Aj. 901, οὐδὲν ἄρκειν εἰμ' ὀφειλέτης ἔτι. Yet οὐ is not, as Koppe thought, put for οὐδὲν, but taken in its usual sense; and the following clause is to be supplied, as Grot. says, ex ratione oppositi, and from the context, i. e. ἄλλὰ πνεύματι τοῦ κατὰ πνεῦμα ζῆν. Theophyl. and Ecumen., after Chrysa., well supply the sense left implied.

13. The necessity of thus living is now enforced by an argument drawn from the opposite effects of the two different courses of action,—by a repetition of the fact announced supra 6;

and the strong antithesis points at the widely different results; and thus evincing the absolute necessity of 'holiness, without which no man shall see God.' The force of the terms ζῆν and ἀποθν. is strongly marked, and points at their full sense, as to both body and soul, for time and eternity. Their force is yet further strengthened by the term μέλλετε, which means, not 'will die,' as if simply predictive, but 'shall and must die;' as implying what is in accordance with the nature of things, and the Divine appointment. Thus, in the antithetic declaration, it is not μέλλετε ζῆσθαι, but simply ζήσεσθε, conveying the merciful assurance, announced, as it were from on high, 'Ye shall live.'—Πνεύματι means by the influence of the Holy Spirit, called in the next verse 'the Spirit of God,' as sent by Him. Τὰς πράξεις is put, by metonymy, for παθήματα, or τὰς ἐπιθυμίας, 'affections' or 'lusts,' which produce deeds; see Gal. v. 24. Thus, to 'mortify the deeds of the body,' is to 'crucify the old man with his lusts,' to forego those actions to which our carnal lusts incite us. Of course in ζήσεσθε is implied the enjoyment everlastingly of that life in happiness and eternal glory, of which the Holy Spirit is the Author.

14. Ὅσοι γὰρ, &c.] The γὰρ, as pointing at the reason for the assurance in ζήσεσθε, suggests a new argument in support of the leading doctrine of this Chapter,—namely, that those who are so led by the Spirit are, in that quality, 'sons of God,'—implying a higher degree than man's family membership,—i. e. as one born of God, and a partaker of his nature, adverted to in John i. 13. 1 John iii. 9. 1 Pet. i. 23. See more in Calv. and Hyper., Tholuck and Olah.

15. οὐ γὰρ ἐλάβετε πν. δουλ., &c.] This is, as Theophyl., Theodor., and Ecumen. observe, confirmatory of what was said of the Spiritual Sonship; and pointing out its nature, in order to evince to Jesus its high superiority over that of the Mosaic Law; and the argument is one a specialis effectus Spiritus, as Calv. remarks.—As to the interpretation of πνεῦμα, Expositors generally have got wrong by understanding the term exclusively of the Holy Spirit, or of a spirit, or disposition. The truth lies, as often, in medio, and hence it seems best to regard δουλ. as intended; so that it is not merely a spirit, or disposition, but, at least by reference to the πνεῦμα. νιοθεῖα. in the next clause, and αὐτὸ τὸ πνεῦμα at the next verse; so that the general meaning of the former clause may, by a sensus prægnans, be considered, with Prof. Hodge, as meaning, 'The Holy Spirit which ye received (at your becoming Christians) is not a spirit of bondage.'—The term δουλείας has reference to that ser-

o 3 Cor. 1.
23. & 5. 5.
Eph. 1. 13.
R. 4. 30.
1 John 5. 10.
p Gal. 4. 7.
2 Tim. 2. 11,
12.
Eph. 1. 11.
1 Pet. 1. 2.
Matt. 26. 54.
Heb. 6. 17.
q 3 Cor. 4. 9, 17.
1 Cor. 11. 23.
1 Pet. 1. 6.
r Acts 2. 21. 2 Pet. 2. 12. Isa. 65. 17.

ἐλάβετε πνεῦμα υἰοθεσίας, ἐν ᾧ κρίζομεν Ἀββᾶ, ὁ Πατήρ !
16 Ὁ αὐτὸ τὸ Πνεῦμα συμμαρτυρεῖ τῷ πνεύματι ἡμῶν, ὅτι ἐσμὲν τέκνα Θεοῦ. 17 Ἐἰ δὲ τέκνα, καὶ κληρονόμοι κληρονόμοι μὲν Θεοῦ, συγκληρονόμοι δὲ Χριστοῦ εἴπερ συμπάσχομεν, ἵνα καὶ συνδοξασθῶμεν. 18 Λογίζομαι γὰρ ὅτι οὐκ ἄξια τὰ παθήματα τοῦ νῦν καιροῦ πρὸς τὴν μέλλουσαν δόξαν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι εἰς ἡμᾶς. 19 Ἡ γὰρ ἀποκαρδοκία τῆς κτίσεως τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν vile spirit, which pervaded the whole of the Mosaic Law, which dealt in threatening and punishments, and required continual expiations of sin, partly by severe penances; consequently engendering in those subject to it the disposition of slaves, who abstain from offences not through love of their master, but 'metu crucis et pendentis habenæ.' Εἰς φόβον, lit. 'unto fear,' whose tendency and scope was fear. The Genit. υἱοῦ, is one of 'effect.' See Kuin. and Winer's Grammars.

— ἐν ᾧ (scil. πνεύμ.) κρίζομεν lit. 'in the power of which Spirit we (i. e. we Christians) cry out,' 'address the cry,' &c. I am still of opinion that ὁ πατήρ was not a mere explanation of κύριε, but it is not clear to me what was intended by this, probably customary, mode of uniting both terms, except it be as an expression of humble confidence and lowly familiarity; and this seems confirmed by the context at the parallel passage, Gal. iv. 6.

16. αὐτὸ τὸ Πνεῦμα] That this must mean, as I have explained, the Holy Spirit Himself, is, as Hodge points out, certain; (1) because of the marked distinction between it and our spirit; (2) because of the use of the word throughout the passage; (3) because of the analogy to other texts, which cannot be otherwise explained, e. g. Gal. iv. 6. Rom. v. 5. Thus the Apostle means to say, 'Not only do our own filial feelings towards God prove that we are his children, but the Holy Spirit himself (by his sanctifying influences) conveys the assurance of this to our minds, that we are the children of God.' See Bp. Terrot and Mr. Walford, of whom the latter truly observes that 'a rule is thus afforded by which the truly religious and Christian affections may be tried, and distinguished from the mere offspring of spiritual pride and enthusiasm,' or, we may add, that presumption which lays claim to the filiation by a direct revelation from on high of election to be a child of God.

17. εἰ δὲ τέκνα, καὶ κληρονόμοι] We have here an inference drawn (by what Calvin calls an argument ab annexis vel consequentibus) from the foregoing premisses, and consisting of several members rising by climax; q. d. 'But if sons of God here, then undoubtedly heirs hereafter.' 'For (as observes Taylor) the relation of children implies a portion and inheritance; and, being the children of God, we may expect an inheritance suitable to the ability and goodness of such a Father,—consequently one of glory and immortality.' 'Thus, then (as observes Mr. Young), the Apostle has attained the perfection of his argument, and shown that the Gospel of Christ is indeed, what he undertook to prove it, the power of God unto salvation.'

— εἴπερ συμπ., &c.] 'if so be,' 'provided that we [are ready to] suffer with him, in order that we [may also be glorified with him;] inasmuch as it was but just that they who wished to be partakers in his glory should be partakers in his sufferings. One may remark (with Dr. Taylor) the address with which the Apostle lets slip in the mention of sufferings; having, with great judgment, reserved it until he had raised their thoughts to the highest object of felicity,—the happiness and glory of a joint inheritance with the ever-blessed Son of God,—which would greatly soften the transitory afflictions of this world.

18. λογίζομαι γάρ, &c.] The γάρ has reference to the συμπάσχ., just before; q. d. '[Nor scruple at the sacrifice;] for, sure I am, the reward shall infinitely exceed the toil.' See Calvin. Λογίζομαι is a stronger term than οἶμαι would have been, intimating that the opinion he pronounces is the result of his own experience and full conviction of its truth,—namely, that the sufferings of the present season (of tribulation) are not worthy (ἄξια for ἀντ᾽ ἄξια), to be compared with, 'fit to be weighed against,' 'the glory which shall be revealed (at the παρουσία, or ἀποκάλυψις, of Christ).' Bulkley aptly compares a similar sentiment of Plato, de Repub., p. 336, that 'neither the happiness of good men, nor the sufferings of the wicked, are to be compared with that which awaits them both in another state.' Ταῦτα—οὐδὲν ἐστὶ πλεῖον οὐδὲ μεγαλὺ πρὸς ἑαυτὰ, ἀ τελευτήσαντα ἑκάτερον περιμένει.

19—23. ἡ γὰρ ἀποκαρδ. τῆς κτίσεως—ἀπικέδχ.] There is, perhaps, no passage of the Apostle on which the opinions of Commentators are more various than the present, vv. 19—23. The sense mainly depends on the meaning assigned to κτίσις, which the ancient and many eminent modern Interpreters (Luther, Calvin, Hyperius, Grotius, Dodd., Carpz., Michaelis, and Rosenm.) take to mean the whole visible creation, all animate and inanimate beings; this, by a metonymic allegory, or προσωποποιία (common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers), being represented as doing what is applicable only to man, i. e. groaning and mourning over the prevalence of sin and misery, and looking with anxious expectation for some deliverance; namely, such a renovation as pious Jews expected would take place in the age of the Messiah. The above view of the passage has, however, to others appeared, in its sublimity, unsuitable to the plain and didactic style of the Apostle. Accordingly, they propose interpretations which may avoid this difficulty. Some (as Hammond, Le Clerc, Wetstein, Nessellet, and Schleusner) take κτίσις not of a physical, but moral creation, understanding by it the Christians

τῶν νιδῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀπεκδέχεται. <sup>20</sup> Τῇ γὰρ ματαιότητι ἡ κτίσις ὑπετάγη, (οὐχ ἐκούσα, ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸν ὑποτάξαντα,) <sup>21</sup> ἐπ' ἐλπίδι, ὅτι καὶ αὐτὴ ἡ κτίσις ἐλευθερωθήσεται ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν τῆς δόξης τῶν τέκνων τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>22</sup> Οἶδαμεν γὰρ ὅτι πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις συστενάζει καὶ συνωδίνει ἄχρι τοῦ νῦν. <sup>23</sup> Οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτοὶ τὴν ἀπαρχὴν

s Ps. 88. 9.
ch. 7. 34.
1 Cor. 1. 7.
2 Cor. 5. 2, 4.
Gal. 5. 5.
Eph. 1. 14.
Tit. 2. 12.

Church, converted from Judaism or Heathenism. This, however, is liable to insuperable objections, well stated by Tholuck. Others steer a middle course between the two former. Thus κτίσις is supposed to mean all intelligent and sentient creatures,—the whole creation capable of feeling the passions above adverted to; i. e. the human race, of whom the Gentiles formed the great bulk. But this interpretation, however ably supported by Whitby and Ammon, is liable to nearly the same objections as the former. There is no necessity to abandon the ancient and commonly received one,—by which, to use the words of Mr. Greswell, on Parab., vol. iii. p. 588, 'all nature is represented, in its various parts, as sympathizing together in the sense of moral and physical evil to which it is subject in the present state; awakened to a sense of its condition, yet doomed to groan under the bondage of its own corruption, with nothing to relieve its sufferings but the hope of a future emancipation into the enjoyment of liberty worthy of the creature of God, and of a purification to come, for the recovery of its original likeness.' Comp. the noble passage of Max. Tyr. Diss. 13, 4, ὑπερφρόνει τῶν μὲν σαρκῶν αὐτῷ φθειρομένων, τῆς δὲ ψυχῆς ἰσότησις ὁρῆσις, καὶ παραδοκούσῃ τὴν ἀπαλλαγὴν τοῦ δυσχρήστου τούτου περιβλήματος. As to the objection founded on the too daring sublimity,—that can by no means be allowed; and he must have studied St. Paul to little purpose, or must be utterly destitute of all taste, who sees not that there is no kind of sublimity in writing to which the Apostle was not fully equal; nay, that he is just such a writer in whom we might expect the most daring as well as sublime imagery.

But, to advert to the interpretation of a few particular expressions in the verses. These are ushered in by γὰρ, introducing the reason why the whole creation waiteth—because it was made subject ματαιότητι, meaning, from the usage of the Sept., Ps. iv. 3. xxxviii. 4, 'emptiness,' 'transitoriness,' 'fragility.'—οὐχ ἐκούσα, 'not voluntarily,' but (by implication) by the will of Almighty Providence.

<sup>20</sup> ἀλλὰ διὰ τὸν ὑποτ. On again considering the disputed point as to the reference in ὑποτάξ., I am still of opinion that it is best made to God as the condemning Judge; the most probable sense being, that 'this subjection was not the result of the voluntary agency of the creation, but was effected by God.' See Theodor. and Thom. Aquin. It was, indeed, fully evinced by Calv. and Est., and has been since adopted by almost every Expositor of note. On the construction of the next words Expositors are not agreed. Almost all think there should be a Parenthesis, which some place at τῇ γὰρ ματαιότητι—ὑποτάξαντα, ἐπ' ἐλπίδι: being thus connected with ἀπεκδέχεται: while a few think it consists of οὐχ ἐκούσα—ὑποτάξαντα, merely connecting ἐπ' ἐλπίδι with ὑπετάγη. Others, again, are of opinion that there is no Parenthesis, connecting ἐπ' ἐλπίδι with ὑποτάξαντα. Thus the ὅτι will signify because. The first method is contrary to the laws of Parenthesis; and the third yields a feeble and unsuitable sense. The second is preferable; but, in fact, the whole portion at vv. 20 and 21 is, in some measure, parenthetical; the γὰρ at v. 22 being resumptive, and v. 22 a resumption of what was said at v. 19, which is then made to lead to another sentiment suspended on the μαται included in οἶδαμεν.

<sup>21</sup> ἐπ' ἐλπίδι admits of more than one sense, but its literal meaning here is, 'upon hope,' considered as a foundation for any thing to rest upon; as Acts ii. 22, supra iv. 18. Tit. i. 2, et al.; and in Class. writers, as Xen. Mom. ii. 1, 18, ἐπ' ἀγαθῷ ἐλπίδι ποιεῖν.

—ὅτι καὶ αὐτὴ—ἐλευθ. 'because that the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption' (by hypallage for 'bondage to corruption'). Comp. ἰσχυροὶ δουλείας, Heb. ii. 15. In ἐλευθ. ἀπό—εἰς there is a constructio praeponens, for the fully expressed ἐλ. ἀπὸ καὶ εἰσαχθήσεται εἰς. At the next verse the Hen-dialys need not, and here ought not, to be brought in, since it weakens the sense, which otherwise is, as Hodge explains, 'into the liberty connected with, belonging to, the glorification, a glorified state of the children of God,' to attain to which is the end and consummation of the work of redemption.

<sup>22</sup> There is here a re-capitulation, by way of confirmation, of the preceding representation; q. d. '(this is really the case) for well we wot (as a fact founded on both testimony and experience) that the whole creation συστενάζει and συνωδίνει, terms forming a metaphor (on which see John xvi. 21), taken from a woman in travail, to denote 'extreme agony, and great anxiety for deliverance.' So Eurip. Hel. 733, συνωδίνει κακοῖς.

—ἄχρι τοῦ νῦν] 'even from the beginning till now.' It is well observed by Mr. Conybeare that 'the Apostle here suggests an argument as original as profound. The very struggles which all animated beings make against pain and death show (he adds) that pain and death are not a part of the proper laws of their nature, but rather a bondage imposed upon them from without. Thus every groan and tear is an unconscious prophecy of liberation from the power of evil.'

<sup>23</sup> οὐ μόνον δέ, &c.] The full sense is, 'And not only so,—but even we ourselves possessing' = 'though possessing,' &c. By αὐτοὶ ἔχοντες are meant Christians, to whom the Spirit had been given as an earnest of their complete deliverance by the Spirit at their viobasia, for ἀπαρχήν, as opposed to viobasia, must denote that portion of grace already received, which is likened τοῦ Πνεύματος ἔχοντες, καὶ ἡμεῖς αὐτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς στεναζόμεν, νόθεσίαν ἀπεκδεχόμενοι, τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν.

13 Cor. 5. 7. 24 Ἐλπὶς γὰρ ἐλπίδι ἐσώθημεν. ἐλπίς δὲ βλεπομένη οὐκ ἔστιν
 13 Cor. 4. ἐλπίς· ὁ γὰρ βλέπει τις, τί καὶ ἐλπίζει; 25 εἰ δὲ, ὁ οὐ βλέ-Heb. 11. 1. πουμεν, ἐλπίζομεν, δι' ὑπομονῆς ἀπεκδεχόμεθα. 26 * Ὡσαύτως x Prov. 18. 8. δὲ καὶ τὸ Πνεῦμα συναντιλαμβάνεται ταῖς ἀσθενείαις ἡμῶν.
 Ps. 145. 19. τὸ γὰρ τί προσευξόμεθα καθὼς δεῖ, οὐκ οἶδαμεν ἀλλ' αὐτὸ τὸ Eccl. 12. 10. Matt. 20. 12. James 4. 3.

to the first fruits, as compared with the harvest. —τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν is in apposition with νόθεσίαν ('our adoption')—namely, the deliverance of our body from mortality and corruption, into the incorrupt and glorious body mentioned in Phil. iii. 21. The use of the expressive term ἀπεκδεχ. (which means 'to wait out for any thing, till it be fully come') intimates, as here used with νόθεσις, that that νόθεσις is considered not as supra 15, ἡλᾶβετα πνεῦμα νόθεσίαν, but as a further development therefrom, so as to become a fact accompli; for I still think, as when I wrote the note in my Recens. Synop., that νόθεσις here denotes the consummation therefrom, in full manifestation of the privileges and blessings thereof in actual fruition. After writing which I found the view confirmed by Photius, ap. Œcumen., who remarks that νόθεσις here denotes, indeed, the same as supra 15, only more perfectly manifested, and known by experience: for after the ἀπολύτρωσις τοῦ σώματος there comes the enjoyment of the promised blessings: then ἡ ἀνάστασις καὶ ἀθάνασις, the inheritance of the kingdom of Heaven; and finally all the νόθεσίαι γνωρίσματα καὶ ἀποτελέσματα. For now, in the hope of these things, we have received the adoption; or, as the Apostle more significantly expresses it, ἰσώθημεν, i. e. νόθεσ-
 13 Cor. 4. 7. 24 τῇ γὰρ ἐλπίδι ἰσώθημεν] The simplest and most satisfactory mode of considering the connexion of the words is, with Crellius and Grotius, to take the γὰρ as suspended on ἀπεκ-
 Heb. 11. 1. δεχόμενοι in the preceding verse, and at ἐλπίδι to suppose an ellipsis of μόνον; q. d. 'I say waiting for our adoption; for our final salvation is at present the object of hope only.' 'We have as yet attained salvation only in hope,' i. e. have attained only to a state in which a hope of it may be entertained.

The remainder of the verse is intended to show, in a popular mode, the unreasonableness of expecting from hope that full fruition, which is incompatible with the very nature of hope; as necessarily having respect to future, not present good, or actual possession.

By ἐλπίς βλεπομένη is meant hope that is realized in fruition by the attainment of its object; an allusion to sight, as being the realization of faith. So 2 Cor. v. 7, διαπίστεως περιπατοῦμεν, οὐ δια ὁδοῦ. In the words δὲ γὰρ βλέπει, &c., we have a general sentiment, of which the sense is: 'How can a man be said to hope for the vision or fruition of that which he at present beholds and enjoys?'

25. We have here, as Calvin remarks, an argument from antecedent to consequent, couched in a popular sentiment of universal application; because patience necessarily follows hope, as being indispensable to the attainment of the object hoped for. Hence is intimated, that 'if hope has reference to the unseen and the future, then, as salvation is a matter of hope, it is to be waited for, and, by implication, with patience and constancy.'

It is to be observed that by ὑπομονή here denoted not only a patient waiting for the blessing hoped for, but a patient endurance of the trials and tribulations to be encountered in this state of probation; whereby the future state, of peace and blessedness (see Heb. iv. 1—11), will be both enhanced by contrast, and increased in intensity, 'since we know that our labour shall never be in vain in the Lord.'

26. Here the Apostle suggests another motive of consolation, in the aid afforded by the Spirit to our infirmities.—ὡσαύτως δὲ καὶ, &c. Render: 'but likewise the Spirit also;' meaning, 'in like manner, in the same way as hope cheers and encourages us, so do the influences of the Spirit comfort and support us in all our distresses.' Some recent Commentators, indeed, rejecting the sense usually assigned to τὸ Πνεῦμα, 'the Holy Spirit,' as sent from the Father and the Son, take it to mean 'animus et sensus Christianus,' which they say is personified: an interpretation most harsh. The objection urged by the fore-mentioned Expositors, that the office of intercession with God belongs to our Saviour, not to the Holy Spirit, is utterly without force; for the intercession here meant, as will be shown further on, is of another kind.

By ἀσθενείαις are meant those 'infirmities and frailties of the flesh,' which disincline us to bear the trials of virtue, and indispose us even to discern our real good, or to form such prayers as may be acceptable to God; which particular is adverted to in the next words. The Apostle's words inculcate the great truth, of the absolute need of the Holy Spirit to strengthen our will both to work and to pray as we ought, implying, of course, man's concurrence and co-operation with the heavenly aid. Thus the general sentiment conveyed is parallel to that in 1 Cor. xv. 10, οὐκ ἰγὼ, ἀλλ' ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ σὺν ἐμοὶ (scil. ἐργαζομένη, ὁ ἀντικαθάρτουσα). Hence the next words, οὐκ οἶδαμεν, are emphatic; q. d. 'We know not of ourselves, but we need the aid of Him who knoweth all things.' So in the passage of 1 Cor. grace is said to work by helping the will, &c. See my note there.

—ἀλλ' αὐτὸ τὸ Πνεῦμα, &c.] Here from

Πνεῦμα ὑπερευτγγάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν στεναγμοῖς ἀλαλήτοις γ<sup>1</sup> Chron. 28. 9.
 27 ὁ δὲ ἐρευνῶν τὰς καρδίας οἶδε τί τὸ φρόνημα τοῦ Πνεύματος, 2 ch. 9. 11.
2 Tim. 1. 9.
 ὅτι κατὰ Θεὸν ἐντυγγάνει ὑπὲρ ἁγίων. 1 Cor. 2. 21.
2 Cor. 4. 15.
ver. 32.
 28 Ὅϊδαμεν δὲ ὅτι τοῖς Hos. 2. 18.
Prov. 16. 7.
 ἀγαπῶσι τὸν Θεὸν πάντα συνεργεῖ εἰς ἀγαθόν, τοῖς κατὰ πρό-

the ἀλλ' (imo) it is plain that something more is intended to be expressed, than what is contained in the preceding sentence; and as it is there said that the Spirit helpeth our weakness in prayer and otherwise, so here there is given an illustration by example of his help in prayer only,—namely, by his not only stirring us up to pray, and strengthening us in prayer, but suggesting to us what we should pray for, and how our prayers should be expressed. For all this is comprehended in the term ὑπερευτγγάνει, on which it is well remarked by Carpan: 'The intercession of the Spirit differs from the intercession of Christ as well in respect of person as of office; the former being that ἀλλος Παράκλητος promised by Christ, John xiv. 16. The points of difference are these: 1. That the Holy Spirit is our Paraclete, by virtue of his abiding and dwelling in the heart (v. 37) on earth; but Christ, by virtue of his office, as Advocate in heaven (Heb. ix. 24). 2. That Christ intercedes with the Father formally, as God-man, Mediator, and our great High Priest, by virtue of his own merit (Heb. vii. 25), but the Holy Spirit, sent by the Father and the Son to the faithful, intercedes effectively in the heart, as our Helper, by strengthening us through the efficacy of Christ's merits, and claiming it for us as our own by faith; by impelling us to pray, and suggesting to us how we ought to pray (Zech. xii. 10), by exciting in our hearts aspirations, unutterable by the tongue, to our heavenly Father (v. 26); finally, by himself praying, as it were, in us—for us; or rather, pleading in us and with us.

Here, for the sake of greater emphasis, the Holy Spirit is represented, per metonymiam, as doing for us what he does in us; for the words στεναγμοῖς ἀλαλήτοις ought not (as they have been by some) to be referred to the Holy Spirit, but to the persons themselves thus assisted in prayer: for the expression στεναγμοῖς would be little suitable to the former, while it is highly so to the latter. Render: 'by groanings unutterable;' by aspirations too deep to find vent in words. Comp. Jos. Bell. v. 1—5, φιμώμενοι δὲ τὰς πάθῃ, τῷ φόβῳ μυνόμενοι τοῖς στεναγμοῖς ἤβασανίζοντο, 'were tormented by groanings suppressed by fear;' where μυν. is well suited to φιμώμενοι, 'mute;' τὰς πάθῃ, 'as to the expression of their passions.'

27. The scope of this verse seems to be that suggested by Calvin,—namely, to confirm their confidence in prayer by the consideration that the prayers offered up to God by the Spirit shall be heard. The general sense is, 'He, the great Searcher of hearts, knoweth what mean these aspirations, however unspoken, of his children, thus excited by the Spirit. He knoweth and approveth what is the mind, or intent of the Spirit [thus suggested to the faithful]; for it is according to the will of God that he thus pleads for the saints.' The connexion depends on the ἀδ adversative; q. d. 'But although these aspirations cannot find vent in words, He who searcheth the heart can read them, though confined to the heart.' This view is confirmed by the authority of Archbishop Leighton (in his Exposition of the Lord's Prayer) as follows:—'The work of the Spirit is in exciting the heart at times of prayer, to break forth in ardent desires to God, whatsoever the words be, whether new or old,—yea, possibly without words; and then most powerful when it words at least, but vents in sighs and groans that which cannot be uttered.'

28. Here is suggested another source of comfort—from the consideration that 'all things, even (nay, especially) sufferings and tribulations, shall work together for the final and eternal good of true believers; it being a part of the Divine economy, in the great mystery of our redemption, to bring his sons to glory through sufferings, and thereby to conform them to the image of Christ, the First-born; first in suffering, then in glory.' See Heb. ii. 10. xii. 2. (Young.) As to the connexion, the ἀδ here is not, as the recent German Expositors and Alf. affirm, adversative, nor is there any opposition to v. 22; since, according to the logic of the context, ably traced by Calv., Hyper., and Crell., this presents the eighth argument for Divine Providence, and presented in the form of a conclusion. At the same time it contains an anticipation. 'Obstrept enim (says Calv.) hic carnis sensus: Minime apparere, quod Deus vota nostra exaudiat, quando eodem semper cursu procedunt nostræ afflictiones.' So, too, Prof. Hodge, who remarks that this may be regarded as virtually, though not formally, a conclusion, or inference, from what Paul had said concerning afflictions. In short, the ἀδ is continuative, though also slightly illative, like the Latin autem, or English 'now.' However, the term οἶδαμεν (used in the strong sense, supra ii. 2. v. 3. vi. 9. vii. 14. 18. viii. 22, 'of full knowledge from experience,' amounting to an assurance of faith) is thrown in to fix the conclusion, so as to cut off all doubt. Of course by πάντα is meant 'all events of this changeful scene,' especially, as the context points out, adverse. In ἀγαπ. is implied the result, in serving and obeying.—συνεργεῖ denotes the co-operation of all events, all circumstances, εἰς ἀγαθόν, 'for the bringing about of their good in the end,' i.e. as the context requires, 'their spiritual and eternal good.'

—τοῖς κατὰ πρόθεσιν κλητοῖς οὖσιν] This clause is intended to expand the sense contained in the foregoing expression, τοῖς ἀγαπῶσι τὸν Θεόν. Render, 'to the called according to his purpose,' = 'persons whose Christian call is in exact accordance with his purpose;' meaning, as Dr. Peile explains, 'in whom his purpose (already intimated, supra iii. 25, 26, as a scheme whereby, without any compromise of his justice, he should accept the sinner who pleads in the name of Jesus, and further described at Eph. i. 3—12,) "has free course, and is glorified."—And why,' adds Dr. Peile, 'does the Apostle assert this of those that love God? Because they love a Eph. i. 9, 11.

2 Cor. 2. 18.
1 Cor. 5. 49.
Phil. 3. 21.
Col. 1. 18.
b ch. 9. 24.
1 Cor. 1. 24.
1 Pet. 2. 9.

θεσιν κλητοῖς οὖσιν. <sup>29</sup> α<sup>ο</sup> Ὅτι οὗς πρόεγνω, καὶ προώρισε συμμόρφους τῆς εἰκόνος τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πρωτό-τοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς. <sup>30</sup> β<sup>ο</sup> οὗς δὲ προώρισε, τοὺτους καὶ
ἐκάλεσε καὶ οὗς ἐκάλεσε, τοὺτους καὶ ἐδικαίωσεν οὗς δὲ ἐδι-

him who "first loved them" (1 John iv. 19); they have made their election for him who before the foundation of the world made his election for them in Christ, to be holy and without blame before him in love (Eph. i. 4); they cleave unto the Lord with full purpose of heart (Acts xi. 23), answering unto that "eternal purpose which he hath effected (ἰσποίησαν, brought into operation) in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 11). Here, then, we have the key to those (in every sense of the word) mysterious and much controverted verses which follow.

<sup>29</sup>. προέγνω] Many Commentators here assign the sense 'fore-approved,' or 'loved.' So Young explains, 'those whom he regarded with especial favour, before the rest of mankind;' the same with those whom he chose in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph. i. 4); i. e. all Christians, all, of whatever nation, who should embrace the faith of Christ. And as, under the Law, the Jews were God's chosen and peculiar people, τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ ὃν προέγνω, as St. Paul styles them (xi. 2), 'his people whom he foreknew' (comp. Amos iii. 2, and see Deut. vii. 6—8); so, under the Gospel, Christians are God's chosen and peculiar people, οὗς προέγνω. Yet for this signifi. of the word no authority has been produced; nor is there any sufficient reason to abandon the usual interpretation, 'those whom he foreknew would be such,' i. e. 'lovers of God, faithfully obedient to him,'—such as would accept, and not reject, the gracious offers of salvation.' Finally, of the two expressions προέγνω and προώρισε, the former is to be understood of prescience of character; the latter, of predetermination founded on such prescience.

— συμμόρφους τῆς εἰκόνος τ. Υἱ.] Equiv. to συμμόρφ. τῇ εἰκόνι: in Phil. iii. 21, σύμμορφον τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ. But the Genit. after words compounded with συν is quite as good, nay even better Greek; being found in Lucian; also in Epiphanius. vol. ii. p. 69; on the rationale of which construction see Matth. Gr. § 379. And so ὁμοιος is used with one or the other. This μορφή is variously interpreted, and does not admit of being determined with certainty; but it seems to denote conformity of present moral character and of future destination as to glorification of body (1 Cor. xv. 40), and consequently sanctification of spirit, by being assimilated to Christ. Conformity to his image may also be included, as is plain from Phil. iii. 10, but only as an under sense.—The next words, εἰς τὸ εἶναι—ἀδελφοῖς, are best interpreted with reference to their scope, which partly was to further develop the idea in προώρισε, as pointing at the purpose thereof,—namely, in order 'that He (the First-born and Head) should be the First-born, the glorious Head, among many brethren,' pre-eminent among those who are, but only by adoption through Him, sons of God, and who will be accordingly joint partakers of his glory. That the Jews used this very expression, πρωτότοκος, of the Messiah, has been proved by examples from Philo and the Rabbinical writers. In the present and the next verses there are represented both the general plan of salvation and the several stages of it; and accordingly this has been well termed by Pareus, the golden and indissoluble chain of salvation, as exhibiting the order and connexion of the various steps by which God carries into effect His purposes for the salvation of man. And, accordingly, as Carpzov observes, at vv. 28, 29 we have mention of the Divine benefits before the creation of the world, i. e. from eternity. 1. The πρόθεσις, or 'determinate purpose' of granting felicity to those who should believe in Christ to the end of life. 2. The προέγνωσις, 'the prescience of God' (conjoined with his love), by which he foreknew all and each who would believe in Christ. 3. The προωρισμός, 'the determination' and 'decree' of conferring eternal happiness on all and each of them. At ver. 30 are enumerated the Divine benefits granted in time, i. e. in this life. 1. ἡ ἐκλογή, calling to faith, or 'an offering of grace,' which here comprehends actual conversion and regeneration; since God illumines the intellect of man by the Holy Ghost, sways the will, and confers faith on those who do not perversely reject his offer. 2. δικαίωσις, 'justification,' by which is meant 'the being declared just by God, and absolved from guilt and punishment.' 3. δόξα, 'glorification,' which takes its commencement in renovation and sanctification, and is perfected in life eternal.

Of these two important terms ἐκάλεσε and ἐδικαίωσε, the former does not merely signify 'calls,' namely, by the preaching of the Gospel, to embrace the offers of salvation through Christ; since it is plain that ἐκάλεσε must mean such a calling as proceeds from the foreknowledge and the predetermination of God, in respect to the objects of it (and consequently cannot but be effectual), and, accordingly, ἐδικαίωσε must denote the result of it, in justification, or, as many eminent Expositors strenuously maintain, pardon of sins, both first and final (if, indeed, there be two justifications), and final glorification. However, we must not fail to bear in mind, with Dr. Peile, that 'Inasmuch as the several steps, whereby God is pleased to give effect to his gracious πρόθεσις are on his part as determinate and unalterable, as the end to which he designs them to lead; we see now that those in whom, as invited guests arrayed in 'the marriage garment which he has required in holy Scripture,' that character is begun on earth, which his mercy, outstripping judgment, has long since accepted in heaven—that persons so called, and so chosen of God,—are indeed no other than those who love God (v. 28), and, that with entire devotion of the heart and life which true Christian ἀγάπη implies, 'walk humbly and confidently with him, in thankful improvement of all his proffered means of grace.' And thus we are brought to the practical use, which St. Paul makes of his doctrine of Predetermination, applying it, just as our Reformers in their Seventeenth Article did, solely 'for godly καίωσε, τούτους καὶ ἐδόξασε. <sup>31</sup> τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν πρὸς ταῦτα ; <sup>o Pa. 118. a. 9 Kings 6. 14 d Isa. 68. 57 John 2. 18. ch. 4. 26. 2. 5, 6, 9. 2 Pet. 2. 4. 2 Tim. 2. 13. o Isa. 50. 8, 9.</sup>

 εἰ ὁ Θεὸς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, τίς καθ' ἡμῶν ; <sup>32</sup> Ὅς γε τοῦ ἰδίου
 Ἰοῦ οὐκ ἐφέισατο, ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν πάντων παρέδωκεν αὐτόν.
 πῶς οὐχὶ καὶ σὺν αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα ἡμῖν χαρίσεται ; <sup>33</sup> τίς

comfort to godly men. That, as Mr. Walford observes, the Apostle did intend alone that practical use alone to be made of these high and mysterious doctrines we shall clearly see, if we do but attend to the conclusions immediately drawn from the preceding statements,—namely, that 'Nothing shall (or can) separate real Christians from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.' The Divine predetermination equally involves the means with the end; and sure we may be, 'that whoever earnestly and perseveringly employs the one will infallibly secure the possession of the other.' As to the difficulties that embarrass a passage which, above all others, contains things 'hard to be understood,' we must be content to receive Paul's Gospel (see Rom. ii. 16, comp. with 2 Tim. ii. 8) simply as it is presented to us in the chain which he lays down, tracing the κλήσις from the προθέσις, and that from the προσέσις, the predetermination of certain persons to be conformed to the image of his Son.' In the next link of the chain the persons thus foreknown, and predetermined, are represented as in the course of God's Providence not actually, but, in his eternal decree, implicitly, called and brought, through justification, to glory eternal. See 1 Pet. iv. 14. v. 1, 10. Upon the whole, after the most mature consideration, I come to the same conclusion, as to this matter, as does Mr. Alf.,—namely, 'that while, on the one hand, Scripture bears constant testimony to the fact, that all true believers are chosen and called by God—their whole spiritual life being from him—yet, on the other hand, its testimony is no less precise, that he willeth all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by wilful rejection of the truth. So that, on the one hand, GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY,—on the other, MAN'S FREE WILL, is alike plainly declared to us. Accordingly, to receive, believe, and act on both, is our duty and our wisdom.' That duty I have ever, according to the measure of light dealt out to me from the Fountain of all light, endeavoured faithfully to discharge; especially whenever either of the fore-mentioned grand truths was in question, so as never to sacrifice one to the other, but always taking my exegetical course (to use the words of Plato, p. 394), ὅπη ἔν ὁ λόγος (the Written Word), ἔσπερ πνεῦμα, φέρει.

31. τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν πρὸς ταῦτα ; 'What then shall we say to these things?' i. e. 'to these representations of the plans and purposes of God as to the redeemed through mercy?' The πρὸς does not mean simply 'in reference to those things,' or in the way of inference, but, as the context requires, 'what answer in the way of objection, or demur, from discouragement?'—The next words, εἰ ὁ Θεὸς—καθ' ἡμῶν ; 'If God is (as we see) for us, who (is there that shall be) against us?' q. d., in the words of Prof. Hodge, 'If God has delivered us from the law of sin and death, if he has renewed us by his Spirit which dwells within us, if he recognizes us as his children and his heirs, and has predestinated us to holiness and glory, who can be against us? If God's love has led to all the good just specified, what have we to fear for the future?' Further, none of the trials and troubles of life, none of the efforts of our spiritual foes, can avail to frustrate hopes founded on the everlasting Rock of God's truth. See the admirable exegeses of Chrys. and Calv.

32. Ὅς γε τοῦ ἰδίου Ἰοῦ οὐκ ἐφέισατο] Crellius ably traces the connexion thus: 'The Apostle has set forth the benevolence of God in the Divine decrees; which, however, being as it were hidden in God, he brings forward a palpable and indubitable proof of his love; as much as to say: 'He who gave the greater, shall he not give the lesser?'" That ground of confidence and security which includes all others is the Love of God; and that exhibition of Divine Love which surpasses and includes all others, is 'the gift of his peculiar Son,' υἱὸς μονογενοῦς by a tacit opposition to θετοῦ, implied in the foregoing context. Indeed the γε, which imparts emphasis to the clause, confirms the force of ἰδίου. There is great elegance in the ἰδιότης at οὐκ ἐφέισατο, which seems suggested by the similar words in Gen. xxii. 12, καὶ οὐκ ἐφέισατο τοῦ υἱοῦ σου τοῦ ἀγαπητοῦ (for μονογενοῦς) δὲ ἰμὶ. See also Isa. i. 8, 9, and Dion. Hal. v. 10, cited by Weta. The ὅτι here must have the full sense, denoting both 'in our stead' and 'on our behalf'; i. e. 'for the expiation from sin.' See Isa. liii. 6. Matt. x. 21. Rom. iv. 25. Gal. i. 4. In πῶς οὐχὶ—χαρίσεται there is great force (as in Matt. xvi. 11); but also a brevity of expression, which requires to be expanded thus, 'How shall it be supposed that he will not also, with Him, impart freely all things we need, both temporal and spiritual—the gift of grace and of glory?'

33. τίς ἐγκαλίσκει κατὰ ἐκλ. Θεοῦ ; 'Who will act the part of Accuser, &c.? by implication, 'No one.' It has been disputed who are meant by the accuser and the condemner. The ancient and earlier modern Commentators understand the Jews; the later Commentators, the Gentiles. It would seem that neither opinion ought to be held to the exclusion of the other, but that both may be admitted. The accusers might be both Jews and Gentiles, though on different grounds. On the punctuation of this and the following verse some difference of opinion exists. Some of the most eminent Editors and Commentators place notes of interrogation at δικαίων, ἀποθανόντων, ἐγερθῆναι, Θεοῦ, and ἡμῶν, q. d. 'Who will lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? will God who justifies them do it?' This, they think, has more of spirit, and is more in the Apostle's manner. Yet it is scarcely agreeable to the context; the intent of the Apostle, in this instance, being, not to remove fears of the mercy of God, but to place in parallel the love of God and the benefits obtained for the elect by Christ against all the hostility of man accumu-

f Ps. 37. 35.
 & 109. 31.
 & 110. 1.
 ver. 1.
 ch. 14. 8.
 Job 34. 30.
 Heb. 1. 3.
 & 7. 25.
 1 Pet. 3. 22.
 1 John 2. 1.
 g ch. 4. 25.
 & 5. 9—10.
 & 14. 9.
 Matt. 20. 28.
 John 14. 19.
 h Ps. 44. 23.
 1 Cor. 4. 9.
 2 Cor. 4. 11.
 & 11. 23.
 11 Cor. 15.
 57.
 2 Cor. 2. 14.
 1 John 4. 4.
 & 5. 4, 5.
 Rev. 12. 11.
 j Eph. 1. 31.
 & 6. 12. Col. 2. 15. 1 Pet. 5. 22. k Eph. 3. 15, 19. Exod. 9. 16, 17. Ps. 93. 3, 4. Isa. 10. 10—14.

ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ ἐκλεκτῶν Θεοῦ; Θεὸς ὁ δικαίων 34 ἴ τις ὁ κατακρίνων; ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ ἀποθανὼν, μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ ἐγερθεὶς, ὃς καὶ ἔστιν ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὃς καὶ ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν. 35 Τίς ἡμᾶς χωρίσει ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Χριστοῦ; Θλίψις, ἢ στενοχωρία, ἢ διωγμός, ἢ λιμός, ἢ γυμνότης, ἢ κίνδυνος, ἢ μάχαιρα; 36 καθὼς γέγραπται· Ὅτι ἕνεκα σοῦ θανατούμεθα ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐλογίσθημεν ὡς πρόβατα σφαγῆς. 37 Ἄλλ' ἐν τούτοις πᾶσιν ὑπερνικῶμεν διὰ τοῦ ἀγαπήσαντος ἡμᾶς. 38 Πέπεισμαι γὰρ ὅτι οὔτε θάνατος οὔτε ζωὴ, οὔτε αἶγeloι οὔτε ἀρχαί, οὔτε δυνάμεις, οὔτε ἐρεστώτα οὔτε μέλλοντα, 39 οὔτε ἰσχύματα οὔτε βάθος, οὔτε τίς κτίσις ἑτέρα, δυνήσεται lated for their harm;—the inference just after being, that no created power could really injure those in respect of whom all circumstances would be directed for final good. Moreover, the common punctuation, though it may have less of rhetorical δυνότης, has more of Apostolical gravity.

34. μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ ἐγερθεὶς] This is added for their consolation under present afflictions. And in mentioning these two joint grounds of our hope,—Christ's dying, and rising again,—the Apostle seems to lay the greater stress upon the latter. And not without reason; for by means of his resurrection Christ is enabled to execute his priestly office; and, having offered himself a sacrifice for our sins, is now entered into the highest heavens with his own blood, and 'ever liveth to make intercession for us.'

—ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν] i. e. 'is continually acting as our Mediator and Intercessor;' see Heb. vii. 25. It is well observed by De Wette, that in vv. 33, 34, all the great points of our redemption are ranged together, from the death of Christ to his still enduring intercession, as reasons for negating the question above. Of the truths thus brought together, see the admirable exegesis of Calv., who alone has seen why the last particular, ὃς καὶ ἐντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, was added, namely, 'lest the Divine Majesty should terrify us.' 'Quamquam ergo e sublimi solio pedibus suis omnia subjecta tenet, cum tamen mediatoris persona Paulus induit: ejus conspectum horre absurdum esset, quando non solum comiter ad se nos invitavit, sed coram Patre deprecator pro nobis apparet.'

35. τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Χρ.] This may mean either the love Christ bears to us, or the love we bear to him. Recent Commentators generally prefer the latter interpretation; but the former, which is supported by the ancient and most modern Expositors, as Beza, Grot., Est., and recently Thol. and Meyer, is far more agreeable to the context.

—θλίψις, ἢ στενοχ., &c.] Of these terms θλίψις and διωγμός seem modifications of misery arising from persecution. The latter is by far the stronger term; and perhaps the two which precede it represent, as it were, passive, indirect, and private persecution; διωγμός, active and public prosecution and persecution. The three next terms seem, in some measure, emprovements of the former; λιμός and γυμνότης, which denote want of the necessities of life, referring to στενοχωρία and θλίψις; and μάχαιρα, which denotes violent death, to διωγμός.

36. καθὼς γέγραπται, &c.] q. d. 'even though the words of Scripture (describing the fate of God's servants of old) should become applicable to us.' Θανατούμεθα may be rendered, 'we are being killed;' i. e. some are continually killed, and others daily expecting death. Πρόβατα σφαγῆς (answering to the Heb. עֲזֻזֵּי מָוֶת) literally signifies sheep of the slaughter, slaughter-sheep, sheep put aside for death.

37. ὑπερνικῶμεν] 'we are triumphantly victorious over the trials and tribulations which essay to separate us from Christ's love,' q. d., in the words of Prof. Hodge, they are not only deprived of all power to harm us, but they minister to our good, and thus swell the glory of our victory. So Socrat. H. E. iii. 21, νικῶν καλῶς, ὑπερνικῶν δὲ ἐπίθρονον, 'enviously-glorious.' However, the anticipated triumph was not to be effected by Paul's own strength and courage, but, as is intimated in the next words, διὰ τοῦ ἀγαπήσαντος, by the gracious aid of the Redeemer, through whose strengthening he says, 1 Cor. xv. 10. Gal. ii. 20. Phil. iv. 13, he 'can do all things;' and the love was a pledge of the impartment of spiritual strength.

38, 39. We have here, not, as Koppe says, the same sentiment expressed in other and more forcible words, but there is, as Crell. pointed out, a resumption, by way of amplification of the idea expressed in ὑπερνικῶμεν, and setting forth the reason why Paul expressed that sentiment,—namely, because he was persuaded that the victory was not over those things, but far beyond, 'Quod nulla plane sit res, quæ Divinæ charitatis effectum, nempe salutem nostram, possit præpedire.' In conveying this sentiment the Apostle heaps words together in the effort to adequately express the absolute inability of all created things, separately or united, to frustrate the purpose of God, or to turn away his love from those whom he has determined to save. It should seem that the most powerful things and persons are mentioned first. 1. Not any thing. 2. Nor any person, however powerful. The particulars are well stated by Hodge thus: 'Neither death—though cut off in this world, their connexion with Christ is not thereby destroyed. "They

ἡμᾶς χωρίσαι ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Θεοῦ, τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν.

IX. <sup>1</sup> Ἀλήθειαν λέγω ἐν Χριστῷ, οὐ ψεύδομαι, (συμμαρτυρούσης μοι τῆς συνειδήσεώς μου,) ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, <sup>2</sup> ὅτι λύπη μοί ἐστι μεγάλη, καὶ ἀδιάλειπτος ὁδὴν τῇ καρδίᾳ μου. <sup>3</sup> ἐνὶ χόμην γὰρ αὐτὸς ἐγὼ ἀνάθεμα εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ὑπὲρ

a 1 Tim. 2. 7
ch. i. 9.
Phil. i. 5.
b ch. 10. 1.

c Exod. 22.
22.
Gal. 1. 8.

shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." John x. 28. Nor life—neither its blandishments, nor its trials, ch. xiv. 8. Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers—no supernatural power, no angel, however mighty, shall ever be able to separate us from the love of God. Angels are simply mentioned, as being the most powerful of God's creatures. Ἀρχαὶ and δυνάμεις may denote, as some imagine, other orders of angels, of higher rank; see Eph. vi. 12. Col. ii. 15. Thus it is equiv. to, 'Angels; yea, even the most exalted in rank and power; and corresponding terms were in use among the Jews.—ὅτι ἐπεστ. ὅτι μὴ ἀλλ., meaning, as Hodge explains, 'nothing in this life, nor in the next; no present or future event, &c. Nor height, nor depth—nothing in heaven or on earth.' See Eph. iv. 9. Ia. vii. 11, 'Ask it either in the depth or in the height above,' &c.—ὅτι τις κρίσις ἰστέα, δευθεύεται ἡμᾶς, &c. Although the preceding enumeration had been so minute, the Apostle, as if to effectually exclude dependency, adds, 'no created being whatever exists in "rerum nature" which can separate us from the love of Christ,' which love is declared to be thus unchangeable only on account of our connexion with Christ, and therefore the Apostle adds, τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ—ἡμῶν. See Eph. i. 6. 2 Tim. i. 9.

IX. With the Eighth Chapter concludes what may be called the doctrinal part of the Epistle; the following chapters being employed,—I. in anticipating and removing such objections as might be made to the doctrines propounded ch. ix.—xi. II. in giving practical admonitions suitable thereto. As to chaps. ix.—xi., they form, properly speaking, one chapter; being (as Drs. Arnold and Peile have observed) a portion of the Epistle standing distinct from what precedes and follows it, and inserted only from peculiar circumstances existing at the time when it was written,—a portion moreover relating, as all the best Expositors are agreed, not to individuals, but to nations; not to rewards in heaven, but to privileges on earth. 'The scope of the Apostle in the present Chapter is,' as Stuart observes, 'to support, illustrate, and defend against objections the positions which have been laid down in the foregoing chapters. 1. He shows that, though the predestinated, called, justified, and glorified, are both of Jews and Gentiles; yet that that involves no breach of the promises made to Abraham and his seed; for the natural seed, as such, are not the specific objects of the promise. 2. That God hath always chosen the objects of his favour where he pleased, without regard to external privileges, advantages, or relations. Accordingly, examples of God's sovereignty are adduced of various kinds, some having respect to temporal advantages or disadvantages, and some both spiritual and temporal. Thus the Eighth Chapter is the key to the Ninth, where the Apostle shows that God, in calling, justifying, and glorifying, does only what he has a perfect right to do, which is analogous to the examples of his dealings in the Jewish Scriptures, and accords with the doctrines and predictions which they contain.' In order to remove the scruples of the Jews (whether Christians or not), we have, first, an anticipation of an objection, which Paul thought was necessary, that it might not be supposed that, having abandoned their religion, he had spoken against them from a hostile feeling (ix. 1—3, repeated in x. 1, 2). Then he proceeds to show that God had alone, of his good pleasure, chosen Jacob rather than Esau; and that therefore the Israelites had not by nature any superiority (ix. 4—33).

1. ἀλήθειαν λέγω ἐν Χρ.] A form of solemn protestation, partaking, in some degree, of the nature of an oath (similar to that at 2 Cor. i. 23. xi. 10. Eph. iv. 17. 1 Tim. v. 21), and of which the full sense is, 'I protest in Christ, (= in the presence of Christ,) as Judge of the truth of what I say, that I speak truth. I take the Holy Spirit, who knoweth my heart (see Acts v. 28), to witness that I lie not, my conscience "likewise" ('furthermore, οὖν) bearing me witness that,' &c. The words ἐν Χριστῷ are to be closely connected with συνιδ. μου (as ἐν Χριστῷ with λέγω), to intimate, as Est. points out, that the witness of conscience cannot err, it being confirmed (and enlightened) by the Holy Spirit.

2. Here is the subject of his solemn protestation—that great grief have I, and ceaseless pain at my heart. The cause intimated at the next verse, introduced by a γάρ, is the blindness, and the consequent rejection of the Jewish people.

3. ἐνὶ χόμην γὰρ αὐ. ἐγὼ ἀνάθεμα, &c.] The sense in this disputed passage turns on the words ἐνὶ χόμην and ἀνάθεμα, and the force to be ascribed to the latter term mainly depends on the view taken of the former. It would carry me beyond due bounds to recount, much less review, the multitude of interpretations which have been affixed to both of the above terms; so that here, if any where, one might say, with Porson, 'Citius quod non sit, quam quod sit, dicendum.' Among the senses ascribed to ἐνὶ χόμην one, first broached by Pelagius, and adopted by others, down to Stuart, that it means, 'I did wish, when I was an unconverted Jew,' is quite untenable, since, besides many other objections, it is excluded by the foregoing context, espec. v. 2. None of the interpretations which proceed either on straining the sense of ἐνὶ χόμην, or explaining away that of ἀνάθεμα, can be approved of. The only way to ascertain the meaning intended by the Apostle is to base the investigation on correct and enlightened principles of Philology. The true clue to guide us in the d Exod. 4. 22. τῶν ἀδελφῶν μου, τῶν συγγενῶν μου κατὰ σάρκα· <sup>4</sup> d οἱ τίνες

Deut. 7. 6.
Ex. 6. 2. 3.
Ex. 10. 16.
S. 147. 10. Isa. 60. 10. Gen. 17. 2. Deut. 30. 14. Jer. 51. 6. 22. ch. 2. 17. Eph. 2. 12. ch. 8. 2. Exod. 12. 25.

maze of inquiry, and the only key to unlock the difficulty, is that which I pointed out long ago in my Recens. Synop., and showed to be no novelty, being found in Photius ap. Eceumen., and probably borrowed by him from the early Greek Fathers, as Origen or Cyrill. In a masterly discussion,—to which I can only refer my Readers,—he adverts to the expression, as being far stronger than ἐβουλόμην, and then points out the expression as differing from ἐδοξαί. 'It is,' says he, 'ἐνδόμην, I was earnestly desiring;' and he adds, εἰ ἐπιχώραί, εἰ ἐνιδέχτο, evidently recognizing an important principle of Philology, probably borrowed from the Alexandrine School, and handed down from thence to our modern Critics,—Scaliger, Casaubon, Bentley, Hemsterh., and others,—by which the force of the Imperf. in such an expression, denoting unfinished action by the intervention of some obstacle, permits the supposition of some circumstance which prevented the completion of the action expressed by the verb. Thus the design is suspended on something hypothetical—intention, or wish. In fact, the action is represented as begun, but not completed, being interrupted by the interposition of some hindrance; as here, the reflection that it would not be allowable or permissible so to wish. Thus it resembles that force of the Imperf. Indic., by which is designated action attempted, but not completed; as in the expression δικάλωμεν, Matt. iii. 14; see Winer's Gr. Gr. § 41, 3. And so may be explained ἐβουλόμην at Acts xxv. 32, with which comp. ἔσχατιν c. Ctes. p. 53, ἐβουλόμην τὴν βουλὴν ὁρῶναι διοικισθαι. In all such cases it is now admitted by the best Grammarians, as Matth. and Kühner, and occasionally treated on by me in my Thucyd., that a quasi Optative sense is implied; q. d. 'I could have wished,' as at Acts xxv. 22, ἐβουλόμην αὐτὸς—ἀκούσαι (where see my note), where the αὐτὸς nearly answers to the αὐτὸς ἐγὼ in the text now before us, = 'I myself;' which involves great emphasis; q. d. 'I, the very person writing this.' Of course the Apostle's 'earnest desire,' or 'longing' (such is the sense of ἐνδύ.) here is suspended on something hypothetical or conditional, which may, or may not, occur; and, accordingly, the wish is not represented as actually formed; and this prevents the necessity, either of explaining away the sense of ἀνάθεμα, or of calling in some far-fetched sense. Indeed, on further consideration, I am induced to think, with Mr. Alf., that there is no other meaning which will satisfy the plain import of the term ἀνάθεμα εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, but the full meaning, 'to be accursed from Christ,' i. e. by being cut off, separated from him, in eternal perdition; accordingly, it must not be interpreted, with many, as a mere extravagance of hyperbole. 'It is not (Bp. Sanderson truly observes) merely a figure of rhetoric to give his brethren, by that hyperbolic expression, the better assurance of his great love to them; neither is it a hasty, inconsiderate speech from him as the abortive fruit of an over-passionate zeal; for then he would have corrected himself; as at Acts xxiii. But he speaks it advisedly, yet with an expression of sentiment carrying with it deeply impassioned feeling,—breathing affection of the deepest and strongest kind.' In this respect there is a strong affinity between this and the one at Gal. iv. 15, εἰ δυνατόν (where the conditional circumstance is expressed) τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ὑμῶν ἐξορύξαντες ἀνιδέκατι μοι. The foregoing representation of the force of ἐνδύ—which I so long ago pointed out,—has been recently adopted by Dr. Peile, and now by Mr. Alf., who well characterizes the sentiment as 'the wish of an affectionate, self-denying heart, willing to surrender all things, even, if it might be so, eternal glory itself, if thereby he could obtain for his beloved people that blessing of the Gospel which he now enjoyed, and from which they were excluded.' In comparing, as he does the similar passage of Moses, Exod. xxxii. 32, καὶ εἰ μὴ, ἐξέλειψόν με ἐκ τοῦ βιβλου, ἢ ἐγράψας, where Moses desires (the Imperat. by implication for Optat.) to be blotted out of God's book, meaning that he would prefer to be blotted out of God's book, rather than that the Israelites should be destroyed—there is a strong similarity, though not such as justifies Dr. Macknight in pronouncing Paul's expression an imitation of Moses; espec. since there is a material difference, for that of Moses is merely a strong mode of expressing that he thought his own life—and every thing in life—as not to be balanced against the preservation of the Jewish people from being cut off; whereas that of Paul was very different,—as much as to say, in the words of Mr. Alf., that while 'others express their love by professing themselves ready to give their life for their friends, he declares the intensity of his affection by reckoning even his spiritual life not too great a price, if it might purchase their salvation.'

4. To the deep sympathy he had expressed for his own people, Paul now subjoins his sincere respect for their high dignity or privilege, as the peculiar people of God, and their ancient glory. He does this to show his good-will to them, and to awaken their solicitude not to lose that divine favour, by which they had been so long distinguished.

—ὅτι ἡ υἰοθεσία] The Apostle, as Est. observes, does not mean the adoption he had spoken of in the preceding chapter,—and which was appropriate to sons of the New Covenant;—for this is said of the reprobate Jews, sons of the Old Covenant, whose blindness he here deploras; but what he means is the adoption by which God had chosen the sons of Israel (the other nations being passed by) for his own peculiar inheritance. See Exod. iv. 22. Deut. iv. 1. xxxii. 6. Isa. i. 2. Yet this adoption (continues Est.) was only a figure and a sort of shadow of that more excellent adoption to be bestowed in the New Test. by Christ, the Son of God by nature, so that he should be the First-born among many brethren.

—καὶ ἡ δόξα] Some Commentators take this to mean the glory of the adoption, and the exaltation consequent on it. That, however, would require the addition of ἐντρίψ, and then form an insipid additament. Others suppose it to mean

καὶ ἡ νομοθεσία, καὶ ἡ λατρεία καὶ αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι, ὃ ὦν οἱ πατέρες, καὶ ἐξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, ὃ ὦν ἐπὶ πάντων
ch. 11. 28.
Matt. 1. 1.
Luke 3. 32.
John 1. 1. Heb. 1. 8, 9.

the glory accruing to them from the miracles wrought by God, and the honour of the Divine presence. This, however, is far-fetched. Something more particular, and suitable to the context, seems meant; namely, either the ark of the covenant (see 1 Sam. iv. 21. Pa. lxxviii. 61), or, rather, the Shekinah, or symbol of God's glorious presence, which resided in Seth's family till the flood, and afterwards appeared occasionally to Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and others,—until finally it dwelt among the children of Israel from the erection of the Tabernacle to the destruction of the Temple, taking up its abode over the ark of the covenant, and is called by the Septuagint δόξα Κυρίου.

— αἱ διαθήκαι] The plural must not, as some say, be regarded as put for the singular, per enallagen; nor are we to suppose the covenant split into two parts, the legal and the typical; but we must suppose that the Apostle uses the plural to favour the complacency of the Jews, by accommodating himself to their mode of speaking, who, as we find from the Rabbinical writings, used to consider every renewal of the original covenant,—as those with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,—in the light of a new covenant.

— ἡ νομοθεσία] meaning, 'the giving of the Law' (i. e. the Law given) from Mount Sinai,—which, indeed, might be regarded as a new covenant with the whole Jewish people.

— ἡ λατρεία] the ἡ νομικὴ λειτουργία, the Levitical service, or ritual of worship, mentioned in Exod. xii. 26, and forming a part of the νομοθεσία.

— αἱ ἐπαγγελίαι] This refers to the various Divine promises, but especially to those of Christ and his kingdom, from Abraham downwards. See Gal. iii. 16, comp. with Heb. vii. 6.

5. ὃς οἱ πατέρες] meaning, 'whose ancestors are the Patriarchs,' i. e. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

— ἐξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς—αἰῶνας] 'of whom sprung Christ, as far as respects the flesh.' In interpreting a passage, the sense of which has been not a little controverted, even among orthodox Expositors, it is proper to proceed with the greatest caution. One thing is plain, even from the presence of the καὶ, that ὧν must be referred, not to πατέρες, but to Ἰσραηλῖται, and that ἔστι must be supplied from the preceding αἰῶν, and be taken in a popular sense for 'is, or was to be, born.' With this is closely connected τὸ κατὰ σάρκα (by ellipsis, for κατὰ τὸ κατὰ σάρκα μίστος), which words are emphatical, and allude to the other, or divine nature of Christ: a doctrine agreeable to what the Jews themselves expected from the Messiah; all of whom knew that he would be man, and the more enlightened maintained that he would also be God. See Schoettgen.

But to proceed to the next clause, ὃ ὦν ἐπὶ—αἰῶνας, these words attest so strongly the Deity of Jesus Christ, that it is no wonder every endeavour should have been used, on the part of those who deny that doctrine, to evade so irrefragable an evidence. These attempts have been made in various ways:—1. by cancelling Θεός; 2. by interpreting it in a lower sense, as put for Κύριος;

3. by altering the present reading on conjecture, transposing ὃ ὦν into ὧν ὁ; 4. by altering the punctuation, so as to make the words be predicated of the Father, thus forming a doxology; and that either by placing a comma after σάρκα (in the sense 'May God, who is over all, be blessed for ever!'), or by placing it after πάντων, in the sense, 'God be blessed for ever!' Now as to the cancelling of Θεός, few even of the Socinian Critics venture upon so desperate a course. I say desperate; for no portion of Scripture contains better evidence for its genuineness; it being found in all the MSS. hitherto collated (I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., except the Lamb. 1196; but that is only a Lectionary, and omits also ἐπὶ πάντων, not omitted in any other copy. And, accordingly, it would seem that all these words were left out through the carelessness of the scribe, in all the ancient Versions (of which the Pesch. Syr. is peculiarly strong and clear to the point), and all the Fathers, with a few slight exceptions, on which see Middleton; and also Matthæi, who has elaborately discussed the evidence alleged against the reading from the Greek Fathers, and has shown how very slender—next to nothing—is the countenance from that quarter; not to say that the word is found in almost all the best MSS. and Editions. In fact, the Socinians have seen the impregnable authority of the word, and have therefore generally assailed the passage in the three other ways, but with as little success. For, first, as to taking Θεός for Κύριος, that has been completely demolished by the powerful arms of Bps. Bull and Middleton, and by the able criticisms of Dr. Pye Smith, Script. Test. vol. iii. pp. 303, 306; 2dly, as to the alteration on conjecture of ὃ ὦν into ὧν ὁ, proposed by Crellius, and adopted by Whiston, Clarke, Taylor, and (alas!) Whitby: it is totally unsupported by MS. authority. Indeed, if admitted, it 'would,' as Bp. Middleton observes, 'introduce an argument improbable, and Greek impossible;' not to say that all the best Critics are agreed, that no mere conjecture excogitated to meet doctrinal difficulties is ever to be admitted against the consent of MSS. and ancient Versions of weight. The same applies to similar endeavours by new modes of punctuation (where MSS. have little or no weight, from the carelessness of scribes), espec. when running counter to the construction, and producing a sense at variance with the context. 3dly, as to the attempt made to evade the plain sense of the words by converting them, with a change of punctuation, into a doxology, that has even less to be urged in its defence, and, in both its forms, has been completely frustrated by Bp. Middleton, who has shown that doxology would here be out of place, and that, if it were admitted, the passage would require to be worded very differently. Both these grounds of rejection are carried out yet further, and others of no small weight are propounded, by Mr. Alf. In vain, too, were it to urge 'the irregularity of the Apostle's style,' since, however irregular, he is a law unto himself. That the context requires the words to be understood of GOD the SON, is manifest; and that no objection exists in the expres-

† Gen. 17. 7.
Num. 25. 19.
Isa. 55. 11.
John 8. 50.
ch. 2. 23, 26.
Gal. 4. 16.
† Gen. 31. 13.
† Gal. 4. 30. Heb. 11. 12.

Θεὸς εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας! ἀμήν. <sup>6</sup> Ὁὐχ οἶον δὲ ὅτι ἐκπέπτωκεν ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἐξ Ἰσραὴλ, οὗτοι Ἰσραὴλ. <sup>7</sup> Ὁὐδ' ὅτι εἰσὶ σπέρμα Ἀβραὰμ, πάντες τέκνα, sion εὐλογητὸς εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας being elsewhere applied to the Father, but rather that it is a confirmation of Christ's Deity, has been proved by Dr. Pye Smith.

Of those, however, who thus refer the words to Christ, all are not agreed as to their exact sense. Some ancient and several modern Expositors take ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων Θεός to be equivalent to ὁ ὢν ὁ μέγιστος Θεός, 'who is the supreme God'; thus making God the Son the supreme over God the Father: a doctrine not only not found in Scripture, but contradictory to what is there found (see 1 Cor. vii. 6. xv. 27, sq. 1 Tim. ii. 5. Phil. ii. 9): a doctrine, too, against which both the ancient and the most eminent modern Theologians alike contend. See Bp. Bull's Defens. Fid. Nic. § 4. That, therefore, cannot be the sense of the passage; to effectually exclude which, some eminent Critics (as Erasmus, Grotius, Schoëtig, and Whitby) have been led to give countenance to the Socinian methods of reading and expounding above adverted to. Others (and among them the authors of our common Version), place a comma after πάντων, taking ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων to signify, 'who is Lord over all,' as in John iii. 81, ὁ ἄνωθεν ἐρχόμενος ἐπάνω πάντων ἱστέι. Eph. i. 22, sq. Phil. ii. 9. Thus the sense of the passage will be: 'And of whom, as concerning the flesh (i. e. in his human nature), Christ is descended, who is [in that capacity] Lord over all [created beings], being indeed God blessed for ever.' For this punctuation, however, there is no confirmation in ancient authority, and still less any support from the usus loquendi; and, in fact, it does violence to the passage, by forcing out a sense at variance with the context, which requires the ordinary punctuation, and the sense it yields; for (as Mr. Alf. observes), having enumerated the historic advantages of the Jewish people, the Apostle concludes by stating one which ranks far above all,—that 'from them sprung, according to the flesh, He, who is God over all, blessed for ever.' Nor is there any occasion to change the common punctuation, if we only take care to keep out the objectionable interpretation just adverted to, which may very well be done; for the epithet supreme over all, as given to God the Son, will not imply any superiority over God the Father, but only be understood of all created beings. And although some early Christian writers, as Origen, Eusebius, Basil, and Gregory Nysa, are asserted by Socinians to have definitely appropriated the designation ὁ ἐπὶ πάντων Θεός to the Father, only and exclusively, yet (as Dr. Pye Smith observes) the learned Vonema has satisfactorily shown that those writers, in their endeavours to vindicate the distinct personality of the Father and the Son (against the Sabellians), were indeed accustomed to use the phrase in question as the current designation of the Father, but without any intention of denying its application to the Son; provided that He be understood as, in the order of Deity, and κατ' οἰκονομίαν, subordinate to the Father.

Thus, then, the real sense of the passage will only (as Bp. Pearson says) testify the identity of Christ's Deity with that of the Father,—namely (to use the words of Dr. Smith), 'the attribution to the Messiah of a superhuman nature, besides that in which he was descended from the Hebrew Fathers,—a nature to which the highest denomination and the universal dominion and honour of Deity properly belong,—over all, God blessed for ever.'

6. 'Quia vult sui fervore quasi in ecstasi raptus fuerat Paulus, jam ad suas docendi partes redire volens, speciem correctioris adhibet, ac si se ipsum ex immo dico cruciatu colligeret.' (Calvin.) The correction here spoken of was (as Hyper. remarks) employed for the purpose of meeting a tacit objection, that by the Jews, having become ἀναθίματα,—as was indirectly implied in the preceding verses,—the promises of God, of preserving the Jewish people by Christ, would be made void. To which the reply is: 'Even though I were to say that the Jews were ἀναθίματα, the promises of God would not fall to the ground.' The course of reasoning, indeed, is this:—'I do not say this as though I would insinuate that in the rejection of the Jews the word of God (i. e. the Divine promises) had failed of its effect. So far from that, it is rather confirmed. The rejection of the Jews is agreeable to God's former dealings with them; for all the descendants of Israel are not of the true Israelites, to whom the promises were made, God having limited them first to Isaac, vv. 7—9, and then to Isaac's son, Jacob, vv. 10—13, rejecting all the other children. Therefore he now acts in the same manner, by rejecting the unbelieving Jews, and accepting those who, by believing, are the true spiritual Israelites.'

—οὐχ οἶον ὅτι ἐκπέπτωκεν, &c.] In οὐχ οἶον the οἶον is for ὥς, and the phrase, which is highly elliptical, may be rendered in full, 'It is not so that,' or 'Not so would I reason, as that;' q. d. 'But what I have said does not imply that,' &c. To this we have the antithesis at ἀλλὰ in the next verse. Ἐκπίπτειν may be rendered, 'had failed of its effect;' lit. 'missed of its aim,' 'failed of its effect': there being here a metaphor taken from artery, as in Plutarch, vi. 240, λόγος ὑπηνέμιος ἐκπίπτειν, and Thucyd. viii. 81, ἵνα τῶν ὑπαρχουσῶν ἱππέων ἐκπίπτουσιν. See note on 1 Cor. xiii. 8. A similar use of ἐκπίπτειν occurs in the Sept. at Josh. xxi. 45. 1 Kings viii. 56.

7. οὐδ' ὅτι εἰσὶ, &c.] What now follows, up to ver. 13, illustrates the sentiment,—that the being endued with benefits from God does not depend upon birth and descent. To this purpose the Apostle adduces examples, to which the pride of the Jews (who boasted of their descent from Abraham) could oppose nothing; namely, as being drawn, 1. from the posterity of Abraham himself,—not all of whose descendants, but only the offspring of Isaac, experienced the particular favour of the Lord, to the neglect, in some degree, of the Israelites, the descendants of Keturah; 2. from Isaac, of whose children, not Esaus but Jacob, was, by the Divine dispensation, ἀλλ' ἐν Ἰσαὰκ κληθήσεται σοι σπέρμα. <sup>8</sup> ἢ Τούτέστιν, <sup>h</sup> Gal. 4. 28.

οὐ τὰ τέκνα τῆς σαρκὸς, ταῦτα τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀλλὰ τὰ τέκνα
τῆς ἐπαγγελίας λογίζεται εἰς σπέρμα. <sup>9</sup> ἢ Ἐπαγγελίας γὰρ <sup>1</sup> Gen. 12. 14.
ὁ λόγος οὗτος· Κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν τοῦτον ἐλεύσομαι, καὶ
ἔσται τῇ Σάρρᾳ υἱός. <sup>10</sup> ἢ Οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ καὶ Ῥεβέκκα <sup>k</sup> Gen. 25.
ἐξ ἐνὸς κοίτην ἔχουσα, Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν <sup>11</sup> μήπω γὰρ <sup>11</sup> ch. 4. 17.

the destined progenitor and founder of that nation hereafter to be so much favoured.

— ἀλλ' ἐν Ἰσαὰκ κληθήσεται σοι σπέρμα] Here we have a breuiloquentia common in the Jewish writers, to be supplied as follows: 'for thus was it said, these were the words: 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called': q. d. 'It is in and by Isaac that thy seed shall be named, and obtain celebrity.'

8. Here it is shown, that whatever difference might exist between Isaac and Ishmael, that was to be ascribed solely to the good pleasure and gracious promise of God.—τίκνα τῆς ἑκ. is for τίκνα ἐπαγγελίας: the sense being, 'those sons to whom pertains the felicity mercifully promised to Abraham.'

9. ἐπαγγελίας γὰρ ὁ λόγος οὗτος] Here we have the same sentiment confirmed from Scripture. The passage alluded to is Gen. xviii. 10, which agrees in sense, though not quite in words, with the Hebrew and the Sept. However, it may be doubted whether this can, strictly speaking, be called a citation from the Sept. Version of Gen. xviii. 10 and 14. It seems rather an allegation of the substance of the sense therein contained, both in the Heb. and also in the Sept. Version. Why the Apostle chose to render καὶ ἔσται τῇ Σάρρᾳ υἱός will appear from the note of Dr. Burton, who observes that the force of the allegation lies in τῇ Σάρρᾳ, and in order to this the Dative was more suitable than the Nominative. And, as the Apostle's object permitted him to omit ἡ γυνή, so did it eis ὄρα, or whatever else he read in his copy of the Sept., the true rendering of which I have pointed out in my note on Gal. ii. 5. At any rate, as it was not essential to his purpose, the Apostle chose to pass over the expression. As to the rendering of the passage, it may best be expressed, with Mr. Green, Gr. New Test. Dial., p. 267, thus:—'for this word (viz. the saying subjoined) is one of promise'; a rendering, as he shows, required by grammatical propriety, and quite agreeable to the context; the present verse being, as Professor Hodge shows, meant to explain the expression in the foregoing verse, τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας. Isaac might well be styled child of promise, because the words adduced, κατὰ τὸν καιρὸν, &c., are in character not only predictive, but promissive, as respected the birth of Isaac, to Sarah, τῇ Σάρρᾳ answering to ἔξει υἱὸν Σάρρα. And the construction in the next verse is so framed as though the nomina. Σάρρα had here been used; and the words οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ Ῥεβέκκα may be thus paraphrased (as they are by Dr. Burton): 'Nor was this the only restriction of promise, but there was a further limitation, when (Gen. xxv. 21, seq.) Rebecca had conceived.'

10. The Apostle now goes on to show, that not only did God make a distinction, κατὰ πρόθεσιν

αὐτοῦ, among the natural descendants of Abraham, but that even among the descendants of him who was 'the Son of promise,' he made a like distinction; and that, too, in a case where the respective merits of the two parties could not be the ground of distinction,—that this reception was determined on before the children were born; and consequently before they could have had any merit or demerit. But if God makes such distinction among the legitimate children of the 'Son of promise,' then the same God may choose, justify, and glorify those who are κληροὶ in respect to the heavenly inheritance. If it is not unjust, in the one case, to distribute favours κατὰ πρόθεσιν αὐτοῦ, then it is not in the other. (Stuart.)

— οὐ μόνον δέ, ἀλλὰ, &c.] The construction here falls under the head of anacoluthon, by which a sentence is commenced in one syntax, and is afterwards changed into another, the sentence being not finished as it was begun. Thus the proper construction would be: Ὁς μόνον δέ [τοῦτο], ἀλλὰ καὶ Ῥεβέκκα, ἐξ ἐνὸς κοίτην ἔχουσα ἡρμήθη—δτι, &c. Κοίτην ἔχουσα is, per metalepsin, for συλλαβούσα, 'having conceived.'

11. μήπω γὰρ γιννηθέντων—κακόν] Taken from Gen. xxv. 25, the words μηδὲ παρῆντων—κακόν being added, to show the Jews that Esau lost the honour of being the root of the people of God, on account of his profaneness in despising that honour (Heb. xii. 16); and thus all notion of individual merit in either, as to obtaining the Divine benefits, might be removed, and all occasion for objection on the part of the Jews cut off. (Koppe and Macknight.) It is plain from Gen. xxv. 23, 'two nations are in thy womb,' that Jacob and Esau are not spoken of as individuals, but as representing the two nations springing from them; and that the election of which the Apostle speaks is not an election of Jacob to eternal life, but of his posterity to be the visible church and people of God on earth, and heirs of the promises, in their first and literal meaning. Deut. vii. 6, 7. Acts xiii. 17. That this is the election here spoken of, appears from the following circumstances. 1. It is neither said, nor is it true, of Jacob and Esau personally, that 'the elder served the younger;' this being true only of their posterity. 2. Even if Esau had served Jacob personally, and had been inferior to him in worldly greatness, it would have been no proof at all of Jacob's election to eternal life, nor of Esau's reprobation. As little was the subjection of the Edomites to the Israelites, in David's days, a proof of the election or reprobation of their progenitors. 3. The Apostle's professed purpose in this discourse being to show, that an election, bestowed on Jacob by God's free gift, might either be taken from them, or others might be admitted to share therein with them, it is evi-γεννηθέντων, μηδὲ πραξάντων τὶ ἀγαθὸν ἢ † κακόν, (ὥσα ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις τοῦ Θεοῦ μένη, οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων, ἀλλ' ἐκ τοῦ ἐλάσσονι.) <sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> ἐρρήθη αὐτῇ· "Ὅτι ὁ μείζων δουλεύσει τῷ ἐλάσσονι· <sup>13</sup> <sup>m</sup> καθὼς γέγραπται· Τὸν Ἰακώβ ἡγάπησα, τὸν δὲ Ἑσαὺ ἐμίσησα.

<sup>1</sup> Gen. 25. 23.

<sup>m</sup> Matt. 1.

<sup>2</sup> 2.

<sup>n</sup> Deut. 22.

<sup>4</sup> 4.

<sup>3</sup> Chron. 19.

<sup>7</sup> 7.

<sup>Pa.</sup> Ps. 15.

<sup>14</sup> <sup>n</sup> τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; μὴ ἀδικία παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ; Μὴ γένοιτο!

dently not an election to eternal life, which is never taken away, but to external privileges only.

4. This being an election of the whole posterity of Jacob, and a reprobation of the whole descendants of Esau, it can only mean, that the nation which was to spring from Esau should be subdued by the nation which was to spring from Jacob; and that it should not, like the nation springing from Jacob, be the Church and people of God, nor be entitled to the possession of Canaan, nor give birth to the seed in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed.

5. The circumstance of Esau being older than Jacob was very properly taken notice of, to show that Jacob's election was contrary to the right of primogeniture, because this circumstance proved it to be from pure favour. But if his election had been to eternal life, the circumstance of his age ought not to have been mentioned, because it had no relation whatever to that matter. (Whitby, Taylor, and Macknight.) By the words μήπω γάρ γεννηθ. it is intimated that not only does the case of Isaac and Ishmael evince the sovereignty of God's choice, but that of Rebecca and her children does the same more strikingly; for the decision between her children was made previous to their birth, to show that it was not on the ground of works, but of God's sovereign pleasure.

— μηδὲ—κακόν] 'nor having done any thing good or evil,' viz., to warrant election or rejection. For κακόν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit φαῦλον, from MSS. A, B, and 8 cursives; insufficient authority; especially since internal evidence is divided; for, though κακόν may have been a substitution of a more usual word, yet φαῦλον too may have been a correction of the Alexandrine Critics to a more definite and more Classical term: the change could scarcely have been made, as Matthæi supposes, ex levitate. The same diversity of reading recurs at 2 Cor. v. 10, εἴτε ἀγαθὸν εἴτε κακόν, where Tisch. and Alf., only from C and 4 cursives, with strong support from internal evidence, edit φαῦλον; while Lachm. retains κακόν,—thereby admitting that κακόν had once been altered to φαῦλον by ancient Critics; which ought to have caused Tisch. and Alf. to have abandoned their hasty decision here. At any rate, there is plainly no ground for any change of reading, for which I cannot find any warrant in the Lamb. or Mus. copies; nor did Matth. in his.

— ὥσα ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν—μένη] The full sense is, 'This was said,' or 'done, in order that the purpose of God as respects election (i. e. in reference to the choice thus made) might stand, be established, stand forth in its true character, for conviction.'—Πρόθεσις is for προαίρεσις; and ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις is well explained by Stuart to mean a purpose, which proceeds from one's own free choice; moved by internal, not external, causes or motives. Thus the reasons of the Divine counsels are far from being represented as arbitrary, or ungrounded, but only as being such as are not disclosed, and pertain to God alone. 'Ἐκ τοῦ καλοῦντος, i. e. dependent on the will of the caller, chooser, or bestower.

13. καθὼς γέγραπται, &c.] The full sense is: 'An example of the foregoing truth may be seen in the passage of Scripture where it is written, Jacob,' &c. The best Commentators, both ancient and modern, are agreed, that in 'Ἰακώβ and Ἑσαὺ we are not so much to consider the two brothers personally, but rather as the founders, the one of the Israelitish, the other of the Idumean nation, and, in fact, as the nations themselves. They are also agreed, that the terms which indicate the disposition of God towards them are to be interpreted with an attention to the laws of parallelism, and to be understood comparatively,—namely, of greater or less favour and privileges. See Gen. xxix. 33, comp. with v. 32.

14. The Apostle, intending to show the liberty of the Divine choice, brings forward, more Judaico, every thing that can be said in the way of objection, with the answer subjoined. His meaning, then, may be thus expressed:—Objection: In having chosen the posterity of Isaac and Jacob for his people, and not the other nations, may not God be charged with injustice, ἀδικία? Ans. By no means; we must not even entertain such a thought. He then proceeds to prove the position, that God may freely choose a certain nation for his people, and reject the rest. This he shows, 1. from the testimonies of Moses, in which God claims to himself this supreme right, vv. 15, 28. 2. from the argument that God, as Creator, hath full power over the created, vv. 19—24. 3. from the predictions uttered concerning the Jews, vv. 25—29. (Schoëttg.) In not having bestowed on all the Israelites, but on some only, this blessing, of faith in Jesus Christ, the greater part being left in unbelief, the Apostle shows that God does not act unjustly; a truth which he had before set forth and established, and which he here again inculcates; 1. By laying down the general position, that whatever the Deity doth, that cannot of itself be unjust. 2. By showing that this was no other than the usual mode of God's acting (which he exemplifies by the case of Pharaoh), and that it would be both foolish and impious, on that ground, to call God to account (vv. 15—21). 3. That the unbelieving Israelites themselves could not complain of the grace of God being withdrawn from them,—since he had hitherto evinced himself so lenient and indulgent, in bearing with their unbelief and iniquity (v. 22). Finally, he shows that by their unbelief this very benignity of God,—namely, in bringing other nations in their place to the blessings of true religion,—is even more magnified, v. 23, seqq. See more in the notes of Dean Tucker in D'Oyly and Mant.

15 ὁ τῷ γὰρ Μωϋσῇ λέγει· Ἐλεήσω ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, καὶ οἰκτείρω. <sup>o Exod. 33. 19.</sup> ῥήσω ὃν ἂν οἰκτείρω. 16 Ἄρα οὖν οὐ τοῦ θέλοντος, οὐδὲ τοῦ τρέχοντος, ἀλλὰ τοῦ ἐλεούντος Θεοῦ. 17 Ῥ λέγει γὰρ ἡ <sup>Exod. 9. 1a.</sup> γραφή τῷ Φαραώ· Ὅτι εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο ἐξήγειρά σε, ὅπως ἐνδείξωμαι ἐν σοὶ τὴν δύναμίν μου, καὶ ὅπως διαγγελῇ τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐν πάσῃ τῇ γῇ. 18 Ἄρα οὖν ὃν

—τί οὖν ἱροῦμεν;] A customary formula of St. Paul, repelling doubt, or objection, or calumnious interpretation. It is here, Grotius observes, longinquè assertantis. Carpoz compares Philo, 99, c. τί οὖν λεκτίον; μὴ ἴσθιν ὑπαιτίον, τὸν Θεὸν ἰαντὸ μαρτυρεῖν;

15. Ἐλεῶσω ὃν, &c.] This has nothing to do with final salvation; the general sense being only, that 'God acts, in the distribution of his favours, according to his own pleasure.' The reasoning of the Apostle is this: 'God cannot be unjust because he distributes his favours κατὰ πρόθεσιν αὐτοῦ. He may surely do what he will with his own. Nay, your own Scriptures inculcate the same doctrine, where God is introduced as saying,' &c. Thus the meaning is, that in conferring privileges or favours, whether upon nations or individuals, God acts according to his sovereign pleasure; see Bp. Bull's Apolog. pro Harm. p. 55.

'Even in human judicature (says Dr. S. Clarke, in his Seventeen Sermons, No. 15, p. 346), should an unskilful spectator take upon him to find fault with the sentence of an able and upright judge, might not the judge well express himself in this manner? I will acquit whom I see fit to acquit; and I will condemn whom I see fit to condemn: meaning, not that he would do it arbitrarily, but that, as having the most perfect knowledge of the law and fact, his sentence ought not to be questioned by unskilful spectators.'

16. Ἄρα οὖν, &c.] The ἄρα is conclusive; q. d. 'Consequently it follows from what has been said, that favours are not obtained by him that willeth, or him that runneth, but through the mercy of God; i. e. (to apply a general sentiment to this particular case) God bestows his favours, not because they are first merited, or acquired by effort, either of strong desire or of strenuous action, but because he has mercy on those who are the objects of his mercy.' (Stuart.)

By θέλωντος is denoted strong desire; and by τρέχειν strenuous effort. So Anthol. Gr. iv. p. 134, πῶς καὶ εὐφραίνων· τί γὰρ αὐτῶν, ἢ τί τὸ μῆλλον; οὐδαὶ γινώσκει· μὴ τρέχει, ἢ κοπία. The same metaphor is found in 1 Cor. ix. 24, 26. Heb. xii. 1. Phil. ii. 16. iii. 14. Gal. ii. 2. The two terms are here united, to express such a strong desire as seeks to effect its object by every means. The general design of the passage is to intimate that man's salvation is to be attributed solely to the mercy of God, not to any merit of his own.

17. Here we have another example of the position laid down at ver. 15; and as the preceding one, taken from Moses, was of favour and acceptance, so is this of rejection and punishment. God raised up and preserved Pharaoh, not in consequence of any merit in him (for he was one of the most presumptuous sinners on record), but that his own Divine power might in the end be more signally displayed in him, and that the miracles wrought for the deliverance of the Israelites might spread the name of Jehovah throughout the whole earth.

—Ἐξήγειρά σε, &c.] This is by some understood of Pharaoh's being brought into existence; by others, of his being made monarch of Egypt; by others, again, of his preservation during the various plagues inflicted, especially that of the boils; which last-mentioned sense the LXX. have expressed by διατηρήσθαι, a free version of the Hebr. תְּחַיֶּה. It may be best to unite the two first senses, understanding, 'brought into being as king of Egypt.' So Ps. cxiii. 7, 8, Sept., ὁ ἡγίασεν ἀπὸ γῆς πτωχόν—τοῦ καθίσαι αὐτὸν μετὰ ἀρχόντων, and Jos. Ant. viii. 11, 1, βασιλεὺς γὰρ ἐξεγείρεται ὑπ' ἑμοῦ. On reconsidering the debated question as to the force of this much-disputed expression, it appears to me the diversity in its interpretation has been occasioned by too much limiting the sense;—which, so far from being restrictive, is evidently meant to be extensive. And the idea of preservation is so far from being, what some have supposed, the prominent one, that it cannot properly come in at all. The same objection applies to the sense continuing. The true and full import of the expression appears to be, 'I have brought you into being, and raised you to what you are.'

18. Ἄρα οὖν ὃν θέλει—σκληρύνει] The difficulty in this passage turns on the sense of σκληρύνει, which is, even by the ancient Commentators, variously interpreted. Basil, Origen, and Theophylact, think that God, in fact, hardened the heart of Pharaoh by his long suffering, and delay of punishment (whereby the κακία, or guilt of the offender was increased), in order that, on the measure of his iniquity being filled, the Divine justice in punishing him might be made more manifest. Œcumen. and many others interpret it, 'suffers to be, or grow, hard; thereby leaving him to the exercise of his own free will.' Gregor. Nyss. ap. Œcumen. explains, 'hardens himself.' One or other of which interpretations were adopted by the earlier modern Commentators, until, in the middle of the last century, an original one was proposed by Carpoz, and received by Ernesti and most Commentators down to Wahl; namely, that the expression is to be understood with reference to the antithetical word ἐλεῶ, and, by the lex oppositionis, is to be rendered, 'treats with less kindness.' But though this is agreeable to the context, the evidence for the signification is insufficient. Thus far in my former Editions. On more mature consideration, q Jer. 40. 19. θέλει, ἐλεεῖ ὃν δὲ θέλει, σκληρύνει. 19 Ἐρεῖς οὖν μοι Τί

 r 3 Chron. 30. 6. ἔτι μέμφεται; τῷ γὰρ βουλήματι αὐτοῦ τις ἀνθέστηκε;
 Dan. 4. 35. 20 Ἐμενούργε, ὦ ἄνθρωπε, σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ ἀνταποκρινόμενος τῷ
 s Isa. 45. 9. & 64. 8. Θεῷ; μὴ ἐρεῖ τὸ πλάσμα τῷ πλάσαντι, Τί με ἐποίησας οὗτος;
 Jer. 18. 2-10.
 Wisd. 15. 7.

I feel less inclined to adopt the view propounded by Grot. and others,—after Origen and Basil,—than to prefer that of Bp. Terrot, that God hardened Pharaoh's heart not positively, but negatively, by withdrawing the preventive checks of the Spirit, by which bad men are restrained in their sinful courses. Thus Pharaoh, having resisted the restraining grace of God, was given up to his own corrupt will; and it might be said, though in different senses, either that he hardened himself, or that God hardened him. In this view, Prof. Hodge, after an able discussion of the various interpretations here adopted, finally acquiesces. He is of opinion that the judicial abandonment of men to a reprobate mind, a positive withdrawing of the influences of the preventing grace of the Holy Spirit, and the giving them up to the uncounteracted operation of the hardening influences by which they are surrounded, are what is meant to be conveyed by, and is all that can fairly be supposed to be included in, this peculiar expression. Nearly the same view is taken by Estius, who represents Pharaoh as judicially (and altogether justly for his former sins) 'derelictus, et ita derelictus, ut tandem indurasceret in malo.' Calvin, too, in an able annotation, shows that mere permission cannot here be intended, but that it is a positive act that is here denoted, 'divina ira actionem, nam res omnes externas, quas ad induratiorem et execrationem reprobatorum faciunt, Dei irae sunt instrumenta.' whence it would seem that he thought the expression to be explained by a reference to that scriptural usage, according to which God is said to do whatever, indirectly and incidentally, results from his agency. Thus the Gospel is the cause, not of death only, but of insensibility, blindness, and hardness of heart to those who hear and disregard it. See 2 Cor. ii. 16.

19. The Apostle here anticipates another objection on the part of the reader, whether Jew or Gentile, viz., How, then, can this σκληροκαρδία be justly punished by God, God himself being the hardener? How can God feel wrath against sinners, since no one can resist his will? For if he hardens men, they are surely not to blame. Or, in the words of Hodge, 'If the fact that one believes and is saved, and the other remains in disbelief and impenitence and is lost, depends on God, how can man be blamed? Can he resist God's will?' We must, however, with Conybeare, observe, that Paul does not here explicitly refer to eternal happiness or the contrary. His main object being the national rejection of the Jews, and the above topics are only incidentally introduced. To this objection Paul returns two answers, thus stated by Hodge, 1) That it springs from ignorance of the true relation between God and men, as Creator and creatures, and of the nature and extent of the Divine authority over us, vv. 20, 21. 2) That there is nothing in his doctrine inconsistent with the Divine perfections; since God does not make men wicked, but from the mass of wicked men he pardons one and punishes another, for the wisest and most benevolent purposes, vv. 22, 23.

— τί ἐτι μέμφεται;] Here, we must supply, from the subject matter, σκληροκαρδίας, ἀπειθείας, or such like; the full sense being, 'Why (or with what justice) does he still find fault with us for unbelief and perversity?' Τῷ γὰρ βουλῇ, &c. 'For who resisteth his will?' (so the Syr. and Vulg., as Est. shows, rightly.) The full sense is, 'Who doth, or can, resist his will?' and consequently we have only fulfilled his will.' A common answer and excuse of men obstinate in wickedness.

20. The Apostle does not directly answer the objection, because it was one not proper to be proposed after the above, that God claims the sovereignty; yet he makes some reply to it in the way of reproof, 1. by showing that it is irreverent and presumptuous for men to canvass the dispensations of God (vv. 20, 21). 2. That though God has the same power over his creatures, as the potter over the clay, yet that He does not act capriciously or arbitrarily, but that his dealings with the Jews, as with all men, are consistent with his attributes of justice and mercy, vv. 22—24.

— μενούργε, ὦ ἄνθρωπε, &c.] Μενούργε has the force of a strong negation of any thing, with an affirmation of the contrary, 'Yea, then, rather!' thus glancing an indirect rebuke on the presumption, and the rebuke is pointed by the ἀνθρώπε, implying contempt, and being here in antithesis with Θεῶ, is = Latin, hominem! Hence the Greek Fathers and Commentators were right in supposing here (what modern Expositors overlook or reject) a reference to that weakness, fragility, and nothingness of Man, which utterly unfits him for comprehending his Creator's reasons for what he doth, were He even to condescend to state them. See more in Chrysa. Theodor.; also Calv.—ἀνταπεκρ. signifies 'to reply in a disputatious spirit.' Comp. Jer. xviii. 2—10, which passage throws much light on the present, from its evident reference, not to individuals, but to nations.

— μὴ ἔρεῖ τὸ πλάσμα, &c.] 'Shall the thing formed (meaning, the creature) say,' even to him that moulded it. By τὸ πλάσμα is denoted the figure formed by the ὁ πλάσων, or potter. So Aristophanes, Av. 587 (cited by Wetst.), calls men πλάσματα πηλοῦ, and other Classical writers use the phrase πλάσσειν πηλόν. So also in Plato, de Repub. l. ii. God is called ὁ πλάσων, where (as in the preceding passage) there is an allusion to the fiction (borrowed from the Scriptures) of Prometheus forming of clay the first man and woman.

These words are not (as they have been supposed) a quotation from Is. xlv. 9, nor even an allegatio ad sensum, but simply a declaration formed on that passage; and their intent is to stop the mouth of the objector, who leaves an implication of wrong on the part of God in bestowing blessings on some, which he withholds from others; q. d. (by a sort of argumentum ad

21 <sup>1</sup> * Η οὐκ ἔχει ἐξουσίαν ὁ κεραμεὺς τοῦ πηλοῦ, ἐκ τοῦ αὐτοῦ φερα- <sup>1</sup> 2 Tim. 3
ματος ποιῆσαι ὃ μὲν εἰς τιμὴν σκεύος, ὃ δὲ εἰς ἀτιμίαν; 22 ἢ Εἰ <sup>20</sup> δὲ θέλων ὁ Θεὸς ἐνδείξασθαι τὴν ὀργὴν, καὶ γνωρίσαι τὸ δυνατόν <sup>Jer. 18. 6</sup> αὐτοῦ, ἤνεγκεν ἐν πολλῇ μακροθυμίᾳ σκευὴ ὀργῆς κατηρητισμένα <sup>u ch. 2. 4</sup>
<sup>1 Thess. 5. 9.</sup>

hominem) 'Has the creature a right to call in question what is done by his Creator?' I must not omit to notice the signal ἀκριβία evinced by Lachm. and Alf. (also by Tisch. in his first Edit.) in changing the position at μίντοις and ἐνθρ. on the authority of A, B, and 3 cursives. In justification of this, Alf. pronounces the text rec. 'a correction' to suit the arrangement in Luke xi. 28. Rom. x. 18. Phil. iii. 16. 'Had,' remarks he, 'the μίν. been transposed in A, B, &c., to avoid placing it first in the sentence, the same v. l. would have occurred in the other places, which it does not.' But we can never safely reason from a v. l. not occurring; for nothing is more uncertain than its occurrence. Besides, at two of the three passages it could not occur, for reasons obvious to any real scholar; and that partly applies to x. 18: and, at any rate, a single passage will prove nothing. Tisch. probably saw this when in his 2nd Edit. he recalled the text rec. which is found, as far as I know, in all the MSS. except five, confirmed by internal evidence; since it was far more likely that the Alexandrine Critics should have altered the position to another, required by Class. propriety, than that the ὡ ἐνθρ. μινούσιν should have been altered by the Revisers in all the copies but five, from one solitary passage. The tampering of the Alexandrine Critics is quite plain, from their altering μινούσιν to μινούν in all the passages where it occurs. The absence of μινούσιν only attests another Critical expedient to get rid of the unclassical position of the Participle.

21. ἢ οὐκ ἔχει ἐξουσίαν—πηλοῦ, &c.] By ἐξουσία is denoted not so much power, as the right to use it; power resulting from perfect right, as in 1 Cor. viii. 9, and often elsewhere; an idea here peculiarly suitable, for surely the Creator must have a perfect right to dispose of his creatures in any way he pleases. From the very idea of a created being, the creature (as Hodge remarks) can have no claim on the Creator. 'Whether it exists at all, or how, or where, must, from the nature of the thing, depend on him,—be at his sovereign disposal. The illustration of this truth adduced by the Apostle is altogether appropriate.'—εἰς τιμὴν and εἰς ἀτιμίαν are to be taken comparatē, 'for more or less honourable use.' Comp. Wisd. xv. 7, καὶ γὰρ κεραμεὺς ἀγαθὴν γῆν θλίβει—κριτὴς ὁ πηλονργός, a passage evidently formed, as also, perhaps, Eccles. xxxvi. 13, on that of Jer. xviii. 4, 6, which must have been in Paul's mind (as also Isa. xiv. 9), and supposed readily to occur to every one of his attentive readers; the Apostle employing here the very same similitude, under which God there sets forth his power 'to plant and to pluck up nations, to regulate and to alter their condition, at his own sovereign will and pleasure.' The purpose of the words is to teach, that we ought not to set ourselves up as censors, or judges, of the dealings of God with man; for shall he not do what he will with his own? Here Chrys. shows that the sole point of similitude is to the perfect pliancy of the clay to the potter, no reference being had to conduct; so that it can have nothing to do with the question of free will. This is well shown by Dean Tucker, ubi supra, and Bp. Van Mildert, in his Bampton Lect., p. 381.

22. Here we have a second, and more direct answer to the objection at ver. 19; what had been said there being now applied to the present case of the Jews and Gentiles.

—εἰ δὲ θέλων, &c.] 'But what if?' I am now persuaded, that the best mode of dealing with this awkward and puzzling passage (where the irregularity of the construction makes it the more difficult to fix the interpretation) is to consider it as one of the passages, like Luke xix. 42, and Acts xxiii. 9, which fall under the class of those in which εἰ is used with an Indic. to introduce an Apoptosis, and where the Apoptosis is suppressed, in consequence of mental perturbation from strong emotion; thus rendering the Protasis more emphatic: examples occur even in the purest Class. writers;—thus the Philologists adduce one from Plato, Conv. p. 220, D; and a similar use of ἀλλ' εἰ from Soph. (Ed. Col. 590, ἀλλ' εἰ θέλωσιν γ' οὐδὲ σὺ φονεῖν καλόν; Thus here the suppressed clause is to this purpose: 'What, then, 'What, if it be so, that God δὲ θέλει ἔλασι, δὲ δὲ θέλει σκληρόναι, is that any impeachment of the rights of God?' The best mode of handling the construction is, with Hodge and others, to consider the second clause of v. 22 and the first clause of v. 23, as co-ordinate, or parallel, clauses,—both dependent on εἰ δὲ:—and thus the sense of the passage may be rendered, 'What if God, willing to show [forth] his wrath, and make known his might, bore with, in much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath fit for (ready for) destruction; and [what if this took place] that he might make known the riches of his glory towards the vessels of mercy, whom he fore-prepared for glory?—What then? What right have we to object, if God, for the display of his righteous justice, pardons the wicked; and, for the manifestation of his glory, pardons the vessels of mercy?' This mode of treating the passage yields a sense excellent in itself, and quite consistent with the context. Accordingly, this use of εἰ with Indic. before an Apoptosis, being a pure Class. idiom, is to be kept quite apart from another idiom, where the use of εἰ before an Apoptosis has this peculiarity,—that it is never found in the Class. Greek, but is purely Hebraistic, following the use of עַל in the Old Test. (as Gen. xiv. 23. Numb. xiv. 30. 1 Sam. iii. 14, et al. sæpe), and is used in oaths, and strong affirmations, as if under oath, the Apoptosis, containing an imprecation, being omitted.

—θέλων—ἐνδείξασθαι τὴν ὀργὴν] 'purposing to display his punitive justice against sin.' So ὀργή supra i. 18.

—σκευὴ ὀργῆς] 'These,—in the Apostle's reasoning here, the spiritual counterpart of Pharaoh,—represent the finally unbelieving and impenitent of mankind; who, notwithstanding

εἰς ἀπώλειαν <sup>23</sup> καὶ ἵνα ἠγνωρίσῃ τὸν πλοῦτον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ σκευὴ ἐλέους, ἃ προητοίμασεν εἰς δόξαν;—<sup>24</sup> οὗς καὶ ἐκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς, οὐ μόνον ἐξ Ἰουδαίων, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐξ ἐθνῶν <sup>25</sup> ὡς καὶ ἐν τῷ Ὠσηὲ λέγει Καλέσω τὸν οὐ λαόν μου, λαόν μου, καὶ τὴν οὐκ ἠγαπημένην, ἠγαπημένην. <sup>26</sup> Καὶ ἔσται ἐν τῷ τόπῳ οὗ ἐρρήθη αὐτοῖς· Οὐ λαός μου ὑμεῖς, ἐκεῖ κληθήσονται υἱοὶ Θεοῦ ζῶντος. <sup>27</sup> Ἦσαῖας δὲ

v Hos. 2. 23.
1 Pet. 2. 10.

x Hos. 1. 9, 10.
Isa. 43. 6.
John 11. 52.
2 Cor. 6. 18.
y Isa. 10. 20
—23.
ch. 11. 4—6.

the long-suffering of God towards them, and the methods which he has employed for their reformation, persist in their impiety and disobedience to the end; when his Divine displeasure succeeds his long-suffering, and his awakened wrath excites and arms his power against them, who thus by their crimes are fitted for destruction. (Walford, Cur. Rom.)

—κατηρτ.] If the Passive sense be retained, it may be explained, with Bp. Jebb, 'fitted by their own wickedness, concurrently with other causes—the world, the flesh, and the devil.' But the most correct view may be, to regard the Participle as used for an Adjective, like our fitted, for fit; and this view is supported by the authority of Chrysa, who takes it as put for ἱτοιμα. And this sense is conveyed by the rendering of the Vulg. apta, which, of course, implies fit as being self-fitted, agreeably to the explanation of Theophyl. and Theodor., ἀπηρτισμένα παρ' ἑαυτῶν καὶ οὐκοθεν. That the Pass. Part. may in such a case be used as an Adj., denoting what one has done for oneself, is plain from 2 Tim. ii. 21, ἐάν οὖν τις ἐκκαθάρῃ ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ τούτων, ἔσται σκευὴς εἰς τιμὴν,—εἰς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἠτομασμένον, where ἠτοιμ., as being joined with εὐχρηστον, evidently stands for ἱτοιμον. This sense is, as Hodge observes, to be preferred, on the ground that the Apostle, being here engaged in vindicating the Divine proceedings, would naturally speak of the objects of the Divine wrath as being fitted [rather fit] for destruction, in the sense deserving of it. So we should say ready, or ripe, for it by being self-fitted.

23. ἃ προητοίμασεν ε. δ.] The sense (somewhat disputed, and far from determinate) of προηρτ., seems fixed by that of ἀπηρτ. in the preceding verse, and thus shown to be 'whom He shall have afore made fit for glory,' προηρτ. being, as Dr. Peile points out, used in the place of the Futurum exactum, προητοίμασεν, as supra, viii. 30, προέγνω, προέβλεπε, ἐκάλεισε, ἰδικαίωσε, ἰδοῦσα, where see note. Here the full sense meant to be expressed is, 'shall have previously fitted and prepared,' 'prepared and fully qualified,' viz. by his Providence and grace for glory. So it is said, Prov. xvi. 1, 'the preparations of the heart are from the Lord.' It is well observed by Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. p. 369, that the terms κατηρτ. εἰς ἀπώλ. and προητοίμασεν εἰς δόξαν 'are more than simply antithetical: preservation, or deliverance, would have been a sufficient counterpoise for destruction: but the predispositions of God are infinitely bountiful; he prepares for glory.' Dr. Doddridge well remarks on 'the great difference of phrase, in which they who are vessels of wrath and they who are vessels of mercy, are spoken of; it being said simply of the former that they were fitted for destruction;

but of the latter that God prepared them for glory,—a distinction of so great importance, that I heartily wish we may ever keep it in view, to guard us against errors on the right hand or on the left.' In that wish I heartily concur.

25. The καὶ serves to introduce an illustration. The passage in view is Hos. i. 6—10, blended with ii. 23. 'The Apostle,' Bp. Horsley observes, 'first alleges two clauses, but in an inverted order, from the 23rd verse of the 2nd Chapter, which seems to relate more immediately to the call of the Gentiles; "I will call them my people," &c., "and her beloved," &c. And to these he subjoins, as relating solely to the restoration of the Jews of the Ten Tribes in captivity, that part of the prophecy of the first Chapter which affirms that "in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there shall they be called the children of the living God;" meaning, that after being rejected from the favour of God, they were to be again received into his favour. Of course the Apostle must have intended to allege the passage as presenting the general statement, that those who under the Old Dispensation were regarded as not the people of God would, under the new economy of the Messiah, become his people. St. Peter, too (1 Pet. ii. 10), refers the passage to the Gentiles. And certain it is, that the Ten Tribes in captivity were little better than heathens, from idolatry, or, at least, utter godlessness and sin; and consequently, what was said of one might be applied, by accommodation, to others in like circumstances, or of like character; or, what comes to much the same thing, the sentiment of the Prophet (as Hodge suggests) is to be taken generally,—a method of interpreting and applying Scripture both common and [rightly guarded] correct. A general truth, stated in reference to a particular class of persons, is to be considered as intended to apply to all those whose character and circumstances are the same, though the form or words of the original enunciation may not be applicable to all embraced within the scope of the general sentiment. Thus what is said of one class of heathen, as such, is applicable to all others; and what is said of one portion of aliens from the Old Test. covenant, may properly be referred to others.'

27, 28. The second part of the Apostle's conclusion (v. 24), is, that the Jews, as such, were not to be included in the kingdom of Christ, which of course is implied in all those predictions which speak of them as in general cut off and rejected. Two such passages Paul quotes from Isaiah. The first is from Isa. x. 22, 23:—'Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a remnant shall be saved; for he will finish the work and cut it short in righteousness: because a short work κράζει ὑπὲρ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ· Ἐὰν ἡ ὁ ἀριθμὸς τῶν νιῶν Ἰσραὴλ ὡς ἡ ἄμμος τῆς θαλάσσης, τὸ κατάλειμμα σωθήσεται. <sup>28</sup> λόγον γὰρ συντελῶν καὶ συντέμνων ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ· ὅτι λόγον συντετμημένον ποιήσει Κύριος ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. <sup>29</sup> Καὶ, καθὼς προεῖρηκεν Ἡσαΐας· Εἰ μὴ Κύριος Σαβαὼθ ἐγκατέλιπεν ἡμῖν σπέρμα, ὡς Σόδομα ἂν ἐγενήθημεν, καὶ ὡς Γόμορρα ἂν ὠμοιώθημεν. <sup>30</sup> Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν; ὅτι ἔθνη τὰ μὴ διώκοντα δικαιοσύz Gen. 19. 24.

Isa. 1. 9.
& 13. 10.
Jer. 50. 40.
Lam. 5. 22.
& 4. 6.
Ezek. 16. 40.

will the Lord make in the earth.' This passage is nearer the LXX. translation than the Hebrew. The general sense is the same in both, and also in the Apostle's version,—'However numerous the children of Israel might be, only a small portion of them should escape the judgments of God.' This being the case, it is evident that the mere being a Jew was never considered sufficient to secure the Divine favour. The portion of the prophecy contained in v. 27 is the principal point.—'Only a few of the Jews were to be saved.' What is contained in v. 28 is an amplification, or states the converse of the preceding proposition,—'Most of the Jews should be cut off.' The passage in Isaiah, therefore, is strictly applicable to the Apostle's object.

— κράζει is not a mere Jewish form of citation, as Schoettg. and Wets. regard it. The expression (signifying palam prophetarum) is used with allusion to the loud and authoritative tone which Prophets were authorized to assume. See note on John vii. 28.

— ὡς ἡ ἄμμος τῆς θαλάσσης] So great, that it cannot be numbered. So Hor. Od. i. 28, l. 1, 'numerosa carentis arena.'

— τὸ κατάλειμμα] 'the residue [only];' implying that only a small number of them [as compared with those who had perished] will return to the Lord. The Article is not redundant, but means, as Bp. Middl. says, 'the remnant, or [small] portion, of the Israelites reserved by God for the purposes of his promises;' probably with allusion to the name given to the small portion of dough reserved as leaven for the next bread-making, τὸ κατάλειμμα.

28. λόγον γάρ, &c.] Λόγον is by some interpreted account; by others, matter, like the Hebr. דבר. It would seem that both senses were in the mind of the Apostle, and that he meant, 'would make a short reckoning, and cut short the account.' There is thought to be a reference to Isa. x. 23.

29. 'The object of this second quotation (from Isa. i. 9) is the same as the preceding,—namely, to show that being Israelites was not enough to secure either exemption from Divine judgments, or the enjoyment of God's favour. The passage is perfectly in point; for although the Prophet is speaking of the national judgments, which the people had brought upon themselves by their sins,—and by which they were well-nigh cut off entirely,—yet it was necessarily involved in the destruction of the people for their idolatry and other crimes, that they perished from the kingdom of God. Of course the passage strictly proves what Paul designed to establish,—namely, that the Jews, as Jews, were as much exposed to God's judgments as others, and consequently could lay no special claim to admission into the kingdom of heaven.' (Hodge.) Bp. Lowth and Koppe think there is here a reference to some invasions of Judæa, made by Resen and Pekah, at the latter end of Jotham's reign. Others think it descriptive of the times of Ahaz, when Judæa was invaded on all sides; by the Syrians and Israelites from the North, by the Edomites from the South, and by the Philistines from the West, 2 Chron. xxviii. 5—19. Whether the sense of the Apostle be an accommodation of that of the Prophet (as most recent Commentators maintain) may be doubted; for it is certain that the Prophets had often a twofold view; and that under an esoteric sense, referring to political prosperity or adversity, was couched, καὶ ὑπόνοιαν, an esoteric and spiritual one. And as in κατάλειμμα there is a metaphor taken from bread-making, so in σπέρμα there is one from sowing; since it denotes the small remnant left, in the fertile countries of the East, for seed;—an agricultural metaphor, found also in Jos. Antt. xi. 5, 3, παρεκάλει τὸν Θεὸν σπέρμα τι καὶ λείψανον ἐκ τῆς τότε συμφορᾶς αὐτῶν περισσάντα, and Antt. xii. 7, 3.

In ὠμοιώθημεν there is a blending of two modes of expression, which are kept separate in a fine parallelism of Ezek. xxxii. 19.

30—33. The οὖν which introduces this portion is resumptive (see my Lex. in v.), and expresses an inference, or conclusion, from the preceding vv. 6—29; and the formula τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν serves to introduce a further carrying out of the argument; and, proceeding on the fact, that the people of Israel, as a body, were rejected, shows the ground of their rejection, and how it came to pass that their own attempts to attain to righteousness never succeeded,—because, v. 32, they sought it by endeavouring to obtain a righteousness of their own, to a rejection of the righteousness by Christ. The course of reasoning, throughout the context, is thus traced by Mr. Young: 'The rejection of the Jews being vindicated, in ch. ix. 6—29, against the objections of the Jew, which would represent it to be contrary to the Divine veracity and justice, the Apostle proceeds, ch. ix. 30—33, and x. 1—3, to inquire into the cause both of the rejection of the Jews, and the adoption of the Gentiles to be God's people in their stead; commencing, as usual, from an objection of the Jews, τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν, &c.; his reply being understood to this effect: 'However strange these things may appear, yet so they are;—and the ground of the acceptance of the Gentiles to God's favour (viz. their embracing the condition of justification under the Gospel, which is faith in Jesus Christ) being briefly hinted in those few words, thrown in, as a ch. 10. 2.

 & 11. 7.
 b 1 Cor. 1.
 33.
 ch. 4. 10.

ην κατέλαβε δικαιοσύνην, δικαιοσύνην δὲ τὴν ἐκ πίστεως.
 31 Ἰσραὴλ δὲ διώκων νόμον δικαιοσύνης, εἰς νόμον δικαιοσύνης οὐκ ἔφθασε. 32 Διατί; ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐξ ἔργων

it were, in the middle of the objection,—ver. 30, δικαιοσύνην δὲ τὴν ἐκ πίστεως, 'but that justification which is by faith';—he goes on, ch. ix. 32 to ch. x. 3, to state more at length the ground of the Jews' miscarriage: this he places in that fatal error of theirs concerning the way of justification and acceptance with God; they sought it by the performances of the Law; whereas it is only to be obtained through the faith of Christ. Prof. Hodge traces the reasoning thus: "'What is the inference from the preceding discussion?' and the answer follows, 'The conclusion is,—the Gentiles are called, and the Jews rejected;' or 'What shall we say, or object, to the fact, that the Gentiles are accepted,' &c. P.' But the former explanation is better suited to the context, espec. to v. 32, and to the Apostle's common use of this expression: see v. 14. ch. vii. 7. viii. 31. —'That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained,' &c. The inference is, that what to all human probability was the most likely to occur, has actually taken place. The Gentiles, sunk in carelessness and sin, have attained the favour of God; while the Jews, to whom religion was a [national] business, have [as a nation] utterly failed. Why is this? The reason is given in v. 32; it was because they would not submit to be saved on the terms which God proposed, but insisted on reaching heaven in their own way. As to the force of δικαιοσύνην after διώκων (comp. Phil. iii. 14), Hodge thinks that the word is best rendered 'justification,' 'the consequence of having fulfilled the law,' 'a state of acceptance with God.' The Apostle, he thinks, probably meant, however, to include both ideas in the word, namely, both the excellence which satisfied the Law [the sum of the Lord's requirements in the law, Micah vi. 8], 'righteousness,' and its consequence, 'justification.' It should seem, however, that Paul adverts espec. to the former,—righteousness, as the great end and aim of the διώκειν.

31. Ἰσρ. δὲ διώκ.—νόμ. δικ., &c.] Render: 'but [that] Israel, following up (earnestly pursuing, or aiming at) a law of righteousness, did not attain unto the law of righteousness.' There is no such pleonasm as many Expositors suppose, but merely a seeming over-loading of terms, but arising simply from extreme brevity; the full sense, indeed, being this:—'Israel, by pursuing,' 'aiming at (the establishing) a rule of righteousness, or justification [of their own], did not, and have not, attained to a sure rule of righteousness. And why? because (as it is subjoined) they sought it not where alone it can be found, by faith (i. e. by the righteousness of faith).' The ὥς, at v. 32, may be rendered 'as [being]';—equiv. to 'as though it were thus attainable.' See iii. 20, and Gal. iii. 21. At v. 31, after the second νόμον, A, B, D, E, G, and 3 cursives, omit δικαιοσύνης, which is cancelled by Lachm. and Alf., and by Tisch. Ed. 1, but restored by him in Ed. 2; rightly; for external authority is insufficient, through a deficiency of cursives; and espec. as internal evidence draws two ways;—for though the word may have been, as Alf. thinks, brought in for clearness' sake, yet it may have been expunged by Critics to remove a tautology; and that is far more probable; for it is difficult to imagine that Paul would have omitted what was so necessary to clearness. And as to the tautology hinted at by the Critics, it is not really such, but merely a repetition called for by the antithesis. Besides, the text. rec. is strongly confirmed by all the ancient Versions, except the ignoble Coptic. As to the Transcribers mentioned by Mr. Alf., they could have had nothing to do with the matter either way. As to the νόμον after ἔργων, omitted in A, B, F, G, and 4 cursives, cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. 1, and bracketed by Alf., but restored by Tisch. 2, the evidence for and against it is not, as Alf. says, equally balanced; there being only 8 MSS. (against all the rest, including the Lamb. and Mus. copies) against the word; and internal evidence is in its favour. It was not likely to be omitted by the Transcribers in all the copies but eight; but it was likely to be removed by fastidious Critics, as seeming to overload the context, since it had occurred twice before; espec. as it would seem to improve the antithesis. That it was read by the Pesh. Syr. Translator, and by Chrysa., is certain; and this fact greatly strengthens the authority of the MSS. at large. Mr. Alf. might have advantageously brought to mind his own remark a few further verses on, x. 3, τὴν ἰδίαν δικαιοσύνην, in antithesis to τὴν Θεοῦ δικ., where he rightly retains the second δικ., though it had been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. on the authority of the very MSS. here adduced; and he remarks that 'it would seem as if δικ. had been written for emphasis' sake by the Apostle, and omitted [rather, removed] on account of the words occurring thrice in the sentence.' True; but then why should not the ancient Critics have done in one passage what he admits that they did in another; the case being precisely similar, and the MSS. the same? As Mr. Alf. profited by Tischendorf's second thoughts in one case, why not in the other?

32. The recent Commentators are generally of opinion that what is here adduced from the Old Test. does not properly refer to the Messiah, but is applied by accommodation. That principle, however, is here unnecessary; for the Prophets themselves often intermixed with promises of temporal deliverance encouraging anticipations of that deliverance, both temporal and spiritual, which was to be expected from the Messiah. Nay, the Jewish interpreters themselves refer the words to the Messiah. As to the discrepancies between the Apostle and the Hebrew and Sept., the best mode of adjusting them is to say, we have here, properly speaking, no quotation at all. There is merely a reference to what is said in Scripture; and though formed on two passages, Ia. viii. 14, and xxviii. 16, the words do not profess to be a citation from either. The latter clause, however, differs scarcely at all from the Sept., but recedes from the Hebrew. It is the opinion, however, of Grotius, Capell., and Randolph, that the LXX. read, not πῶρ, but πῶρ. But this notion seems unfounded; for Pocock, Rosenm., and Gesenius have shown that πῶρ is νόμου. Προσέκοψαν γὰρ τῷ λίθῳ τοῦ προσκόμματος, <sup>33</sup> καθὼς γέγραπται Ἴδου τίθημι ἐν Σιών λίθον προσκόμματος, καὶ πέτραν σκανδάλου καὶ [πᾶς] ὁ πιστεύων ἐπ' αὐτῷ οὐ καταισχυνήσεται.

X. <sup>1</sup> Ἀδελφοί, ἡ μὲν εὐδοκία τῆς ἐμῆς καρδίας, καὶ ἡ δέησις ἡ πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ὑπὲρ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ [ἐστίν] εἰς σωτηρίαν.
<sup>2</sup> Μαρτυρῶ γὰρ αὐτοῖς, ὅτι ζῆλον Θεοῦ ἔχουσιν, ἀλλ' οὐ κατ'
ἐπίγνωσιν. <sup>3</sup> Ἀγνοοῦντες γὰρ τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην, καὶ τὴν ἰδίαν δικαιοσύνην ζητοῦντες στήσαι, τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐχ ὑπετάγησαν. <sup>4</sup> Τέλος γὰρ νόμου Χριστὸς, εἰς δικαιοσύνην

a ch. 9. 1-5.
Exod. 33. 10
—12.
1 Sam. 12.
22.
Is. 18. 11, 20.
b Acts 11. 20.
c 22. 2.
ch. 9. 31.
Gal. 1. 14.
c ch. 9. 31.
Phil. 3. 9.
d Matt. 5. 17.
Acts 13. 24.
3 Cor. 2. 12.
Gal. 3. 24.

itself susceptible of that sense. The meaning, however, intended by the Prophet seems to have been, 'he need not flee for fear.'

33. πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel πᾶς, from the principal uncial MSS. and a few others, supported by the Syr., Italic, and other Versions, and some early Fathers; and internal evidence would seem against it. Yet it is found in all the copies infra x. 11, and may have been omitted by the scribes, by being written in abbreviation; as it is in some Mus. copies.

X. "The object of this Chapter, as of the preceding, and of the one which follows, is to correct the fatal error of the Jews concerning justification and acceptance with God, and to set forth the truth in reference to the rejection of the Jews as the peculiar people of God, and the extension to all nations of the offers of salvation. The first verses are again, as those at the beginning of ch. ix., introductory and conciliatory, with the softening expression of affectionate solicitude: 'Brethren, it is the anxious wish of my heart that,' &c., setting forth the ground of the rejection of the Jews, vv. 1—4. The next Section contains an exhibition of the terms of salvation, designed to show that they were as accessible to the Gentiles as to the Jews, vv. 5—10. The plan of salvation being adapted to all, and God being the God of all, the Gospel should be preached to all, vv. 11—17. The truth here taught (the calling of the Gentiles, &c.) was predicted clearly in the Old Testament." (Hodge.)

1. For τοῦ Ἰσρ., A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and 7 cursives, have αὐτῶν, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and internal evidence is in its favour; the other reading seeming a Marginal Scholium. The contrary is the case with the ἡ after δέησις, which Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. have cancelled, on the authority of the very same MSS. The Article so employed has not a little force; though frequently, from that force being unperceived by the scribes, it has been passed over by them. The very same MSS. have not ἔστιν, and, considering how much internal evidence is against it, it would seem to be an interpolation.

2. [ζῆλον Θεοῦ] Not 'a zeal of God,' but 'a zeal for God and his service;' since nouns of this kind have a Genit. sometimes of subject, and sometimes, as here, of object. The expression is derived from Pa. lxxviii. 9. Comp. Acts xxi. 20, and xxii. 8.

— οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν] meaning, 'not in conformity with, or regulated by, sound knowledge, just conceptions of the way of righteousness revealed to them, but proceeding upon ignorance of the true nature and intent of the Law, of which they were such tenacious zealots; not aware that it had ceased and was done away.'

3. ἀγνοοῦντες γὰρ, &c.] 'for, not recognizing the righteousness of God, and seeking to establish their own righteousness.' This is meant to show how they came to be thus ignorant of divine truth, with the means for attaining unto it in their possession. By τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ δικ. is denoted either that method of justification (viz. gratuitous, by faith) which God has revealed in the Gospel of Christ; or, as De Wette and Alf., that only righteousness which avails with God, and becomes ours in justification. By ἰδίαν δικ. is meant a righteousness of their own, i.e. resting on the works of their Law. The Apostle so terms it, because, being a law of works, it made every one's salvation depend upon his own merits; and thus such a law might, in a popular sense, be called a justification of his own.

— τῇ δικ. τ. Θεοῦ οὐχ ὑπετάγ. ] Render, 'were not subject to;' implying, 'are not, and have not been subject to.' Thus the Verb is not so much Pass. for Middle, as for Neut. (as in 1 Cor. xv. 28), the one being the result of the other. It was well remarked by an ancient Philosopher, that 'many would have attained unto wisdom, if they had not thought they had already attained unto it.'

4. τέλος γὰρ νόμου X.] Here is more plainly set forth the mode by which God is pleased that men should be brought to salvation by Christ. The term τέλος, however, admits of more than one sense. It may, with some ancient and modern Commentators, be explained, 'Christ hath put an end to, abrogated the Law, in the case of every believer in him.' This sense, however, is doing some violence to the words, and not agreeable to the context. The true one seems to be that of Chrys. and the Greek Commentators, adopted by Fell, Carpzov, Young, and Dr. Pye Smith, 'Christ is the end, perfection, and accomplisher;—or, rather, 'the scope, end, final object of the Law for justification;' as in Acts xiii. 38, 9. Comp. Gal. iii. 26. Col. ii. 17. Heb. ix. 9. Thus the meaning and connexion of the words will be, as Hodge says, that 'the Jews erred by seeking justification from the law; for the law was meant, not to afford justification, but to lead them to Christ in order to be justified.' This, he remarks, is favoured by the drift of the early part of the Epistle, which e Lev. 18. 5.

Ezek. 30. 11.
Gal. 3. 12.

f Deut. 30.
11, 12.

g Deut. 30.
11-14.
Prov. 30. 4.
h Matt. 10.
23, 25.
Luke 19. 8.
John 3. 22.
Phil. 3. 11.
1 John 4. 22.

παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι. <sup>5</sup> Ὁ Μωϋσῆς γὰρ γράφει τὴν δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐκ τοῦ νόμου, "Ὅτι ὁ ποιήσας αὐτὰ ἄνθρωπος, ζήσεται ἐν αὐτοῖς." <sup>6</sup> Ἡ δὲ ἐκ πίστεως δικαιοσύνη οὕτω λέγει· Μὴ εἴπῃς ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου· Τίς ἀναβήσεται εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν; τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Χριστὸν καταγαγεῖν· ἢ· Τίς καταβήσεται εἰς τὴν ἄβυσσον; τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Χριστὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναγαγεῖν. <sup>8</sup> Ἀλλὰ τί λέγει; Ἐγγύς σου τὸ ῥῆμά ἐστιν, ἐν τῷ στόματί σου, καὶ ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τὸ ῥῆμα τῆς πίστεως ὃ κηρύσσομεν. <sup>9</sup> Ὅτι ἐὰν ὁμολογήσῃς is to show that through Christ we are delivered from the law, and introduced into a state of grace. The same Commentator, however, seems inclined to adopt the usual sense, end, or termination; though he notices the sense of completion, or fulfilment; observing that this latter interpretation amounts to the same as the former, though it differs from it in form, thus: 'Christ has abolished the law, not by destroying, but by fulfilling it.' But surely it would be more agreeable to exact reasoning to engraft the idea of termination on that of completing, 'fulfilling,' than the reverse. However, it would be better to leave the sense of 'completing,' 'perfecting,' as to justification, by itself, and to adopt, as being the most ancient, the interpretation of Chrys., Theophyl., and Theodor. Estius, after an able discussion of the sense, decides in favour of it, and shows that it is called for by the foregoing context. Prof. Hodge and Dr. Peile take νόμου in this connexion to mean (as often in the Epistles of St. Paul) law, as standing for the whole rule of duty prescribed to man, including for the Jews the Mosaic economy. But they have not, in this instance, made out a clear case; for, as appears from Mr. Green, Gr. N. T. 223, there are not wanting passages in which νόμος without the Art. signifies 'the Jewish law,' for which Mr. Green satisfactorily accounts. Among those passages he specifies the present. However, I am inclined to think that, though the Apostle intended the Jewish law chiefly, yet he meant law of any other kind. And Mr. Green himself lays down the canon, that 'the omission of the Article to νόμος is proper, and designed in some texts, where, though the writer has the law of Moses more particularly in view, yet what is said is not in respect of any conditions peculiar to that law, but common to it with other conceivable ends of moral obedience.' His instances also Rom. v. 20, and Gal. ii. 21.

5. The words of this verse are meant to confirm what was just said,—namely, that what the Law did not, and could not, accomplish, Christ completed.

—M. γὰρ γράφει, &c.] Render, 'for Moses writes of (or describes) the righteousness which is of the law (i. e. which arises from it) that the man who shall have performed these things shall have life in and by them,' namely, as to the point of acceptance with God; a very exact description of the legal method of justification by ordinances;—meaning, that 'the man who should perform all the requirements of the Mosaic dispensation would, on the ground of his obedience, have been rewarded with all the blessings of life and happiness which it holds out.' In γράφει τὴν δικαιοσύνην we have a popular ellipsis, in which two clauses have coalesced into one; q. d. 'Moses, treating of the justification to be had from the law, thus writes, or speaks, of it.' It should seem, however, that the words of Moses were meant, under their chief and primary sense, of life and prosperity in this world, to contain an obscure promise of everlasting life.

6-8. Of this obscure passage the subject is justification by faith; and the admonition meant to be inculcated is, to believe, and doubt not. This the Apostle expresses in words derived from Deut. xxx. 11-14; and as the phrases 'ascending to heaven' and 'descending to Hades' were proverbially applied (like the in caelum ire of Juvenal, Sat. iii. 75, and the caelum petere of Horace, Od. i. 3, 38, to denote a moral impossibility, or at least an extreme difficulty; see note on John iii. 13); so there the sense intended is, that 'it is not impracticable to attain a competent knowledge of God's laws.' And here the Apostle, accommodating the words to his present purpose, and applying them to the Gospel, by the formulas τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Χριστὸν καταγαγεῖν, and τοῦτ' ἐστὶ Χρ. ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναγαγεῖν, means to inculcate the facility of exercising faith, and consequently obtaining salvation; meaning to say, that 'the Gospel system asks only what is within the reach of every one, what cannot be withheld without obstinate prejudice,—that is, a belief in its divinity.' The above, however, may, perhaps, best be regarded as not mere formulas expressive of impossibility or great difficulty, but as meant to allude to those points at which the faith of the unbelievers chiefly staggered. So Chrys., Theoph., Theodor., Est., and Carpz., cited by me in Recens. Synop. Others, however, regard the words as not alluding to questions of unbelief; but of embarrassment, from not knowing what to think; or others again, of anxiety as to the results respecting his salvation. There are not a few objections to the first view; and, as to the second and third, they might admit of being conjoined. It would, however, seem that, in his application of these expressions of Moses, the Apostle intended to assail that strong fortress, the evil heart of unbelief, or misbelief, so unworthy of the descendants of the Father of the faithful, which, in its diverse and Protean forms, could not but engender embarrassment and anxiety as to 'the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls.'

The words μὴ εἴπῃς ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου well express that sort of self-confident taking for granted, in which unbelief usually originates.

9, 10. Taken out of the artificial forms in which the sentiment is expressed, it would stand

ἐν τῷ στόματί σου Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, καὶ πιστεύσης ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ σου ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς αὐτὸν ἤγειρεν ἐκ νεκρῶν, σωθήσῃ <sup>10</sup> καρδίᾳ γὰρ πιστεύεται εἰς δικαιοσύνην, στόματι δὲ ὁμολογεῖται εἰς σωτηρίαν. <sup>11</sup> Ἄγει γὰρ ἡ γραφή· Πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων ἐπ' <sup>1</sup> I Isa. 40. 33. ch. 9. 23. αὐτῷ οὐ καταίσχυνθήσεται. <sup>12</sup> Οὐ γάρ ἐστι διαστολὴ <sup>1</sup> I Acts 10. 34. 35. Ἰουδαίου τε καὶ Ἑλλήνος· ὁ γὰρ αὐτὸς Κύριος πάντων, πλου- <sup>2</sup> Is. 15. 9. ch. 3. 22, 30. 1 Tim. 2. 5. Eph. 1. 7. 2. 4, 7. τῶν εἰς πάντας τοὺς ἐπικαλουμένους αὐτόν <sup>13</sup> <sup>k</sup> Πᾶς γὰρ, <sup>3</sup> k Joel 2. 32. Acts 2. 31. ὃς ἂν ἐπικαλέσῃται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου, σωθήσεται· <sup>1</sup> I John 15. 22. Πῶς οὖν ἐπικαλέσονται εἰς ὃν οὐκ ἐπίστευσαν; <sup>14</sup> πῶς δὲ

in full, thus: 'If thou shalt confess and profess with thy mouth, and believe with thy heart, by a vital and influential faith, that Jesus is the Lord, and that God, as such, hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved; thy faith shall be counted for righteousness. For with the heart man believeth, and with the mouth confession is made unto justification and salvation;' see 1 John iv. 15, compared with v. 1. Confession is here first mentioned, as standing first in the passage of Moses. The confessing with the mouth is, indeed, of greater consequence as regards men; but the believing with the heart, as respects God; for it is well observed by Origen, Exhort. ad Martyr. "Ἐστι γὰρ εἰπεῖν, ὅτι μᾶλλον ἐστι τοῖς χεῖρασι τιμᾶν τὴν καρδίαν πόρρω ἔχοντα ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, ἢ περ τῇ καρδίᾳ τιμᾶν αὐτόν, τοῦ στόματος μὴ ὁμολογούντος.

11. 'There are clearly two points established by this quotation from Is. xxviii. 16, referred to at the close of the preceding Chapter (and here repeated by the Apostle with an emphasis on πᾶς, from which flows the remark which he makes in ver. 12, and further confirms from Scripture in ver. 13); and the first is, the universal applicability of this method of salvation,—“whoever, whether Jew or Gentile, believes,” &c.; the second is, that it is faith which is the prescribed means of securing the Divine favour,—“whoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.” The passage, therefore, is peculiarly adapted to the Apostle's object; which was not merely to exhibit the true nature of the plan of redemption, but mainly to show the propriety of its extension to the Gentiles.' (Hodge.)

12. οὐ γάρ ἐστι διαστ.—ἘΛΛ., &c.] 'for there is no point of distinction,' &c. The γάρ refers to the πᾶς preceding; q. d. 'there is no difference in their relations—being alike sinners, to be judged on the very same principles, and to be saved precisely in the same way (see note supra iii. 22); and why? Because ὁ αὐτός—αὐτός, 'forasmuch as the same Lord of all (Acts x. 36, οὗτός ἐστι πάντων Κύριος) is rich towards all who call upon him; lit. 'for there is One and the same Lord of all (comp. supra, iii. 30, ἐπὶ πάντας εἰς ὁ Θεός, 'One and the same God'), who is rich,' &c. By πλουτῶν is meant not only 'rich' in mercy, but in grace, and all other spiritual blessings; superabundant in resources to supply the spiritual wants of all; so that they may be 'filled with all the fullness of God.' Accordingly, the present expression may be compared with the stronger one at Eph. iii. 20, τῇ δυνάμει ὑπὲρ πάντα ποιῆσαι ὑμῖν ἐκ περισσοῦ. This religious invocation (for such is implied in the term ἐπικαλ., including every kind of precatory address) of Christ, as God, implied, of course, the exercise of faith in him; and therefore, as Hodge observes, 'it amounts to the same thing whether it is said, Whosoever believeth, or, Whosoever calls on the name of the Lord, shall be saved.'

13. Κυρίῳ] The original word for this (in Joel ii. 32) is יהוה (Jehovah), whence it is certain that the Prophet speaks these words of the true and only God; and yet it is as certain that the Apostle here ascribes them to our Lord Jesus Christ, from the words following,—'How shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed?' For the Apostle in this whole Chapter discourses of faith in Christ, and from the words foregoing, of which these are a proof, and to which they are connected by the Particle γάρ; introducing the words,—'whoever believeth in him shall not be ashamed,' are spoken, by the Prophet Isaiah, of Jesus Christ 'the Corner-stone' (Isaiah xxviii. 16). And so they are interpreted by St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7. And in the Prophet Joel these words follow, εὐαγγελιζόμενοι οὖν Κύριος προσκλήσεται, 'and the evangelized, whom the Lord shall call, shall be saved.' Here, then, we have two arguments for the Divinity of Christ:—1. That what is spoken of Jehovah is ascribed to Him; 2. That He is made the object of our religious invocation. (Whitby.) This criticism is ably supported by Bp. Pearson on the Creed, p. 149, and by Bp. Bull, Harm. Apost. C. v. § 1, 4.

—πῶς οὖν ἐπικαλέσονται, &c.] The οὖν here denotes, not conclusion, but deduction, and may be rendered now. The force and beauty of the sentiment is much increased by its being thrown into the form of a Sorites of four members (as supra v. 3, 5. viii. 29, 30. James i. 15. 2 Pet. i. 5, 7), proceeding from effects to causes. See Crell, and Hyper., espec. the latter, who has ably traced the course of argument, which is, he shows, drawn 'a causa finali seu effectu fidei tendente ad Dei gloriam.'

14, 15. On the scope of these and the following verses some difference of opinion exists. Grot., Hamm., and Stuart, suppose them to contain an objection, on the part of the Jews, to the Apostle's argument as to the necessity of calling on Christ in order to be saved, on the ground that they had not sufficient opportunities of knowing the truth, &c. To which the Apostle replies at vv. 16, 17. This view, however, rests on no sufficient proof. It should rather seem (according to the opinion of most Commentators, ancient and modern) that the words are from the Apostle himself. And the scope of the passage is well traced by Mr. Young as follows: 'Since the Jews were very greatly offended by the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, and were, in a more peculiar manner, exasperated against St. Paul on that account (see Acts xxii. 2. 1 Thesa. ii. 16), the Apostle takes occasion, from this last text of Scripture, to vindicate the Divine commission of himself and the rest of the Apostles to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles: this he does, 1st, From the necessity of the case; for if it was God's good pleasure, as the Prophets signified beforehand, to grant repentance unto life to the Gentiles, it must certainly have been his intention that the offer of salvation should be properly made to them, ver. 14; 2ndly, From the wonderful success which attended the preaching of the Gospel among the Gentiles, according to the saying of Isaiah, lii. 7, which showed that God's blessing and aid went with the work.'

πιστεύουσιν οὐ οὐκ ἤκουσαν; πῶς δὲ ἀκούσουσι χωρὶς κηρύσσοντος; <sup>15</sup> πῶς δὲ κηρύξουσιν ἐὰν μὴ ἀποσταλῶσι; Καθὼς γέγραπται· Ὡς ὠραῖοι οἱ πόδες τῶν εὐαγγελιζομένων εἰρήνην, τῶν εὐαγγελιζομένων τὰ ἀγαθὰ! <sup>16</sup> Ἀλλ' οὐ πάντες ὑπήκουσαν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ· Ἦσατας γὰρ λέγει· Κύριε, τίς ἐπίστευσε τῇ ἀκοῇ ἡμῶν; <sup>17</sup> Ἄρα ἡ πίστις ἐξ ἀκοῆς, ἢ δὲ ἀκοὴ διὰ ῥήματος Θεοῦ. <sup>18</sup> Ἀλλὰ λέγω· Μὴ οὐκ ἤκου-

15. καθὼς γέγραπ· Ὡς ὠραῖοι, &c.] The connexion is ably traced by Calv. thus:—'Sic in rem præsentem testimonium istud convenit applicare: Dominus, spem liberationis populo suo facturus, insigni encomio eorum adventum ornat qui lætum huius rei nuntium afferrent. Eo igitur ipso declaravit, non minori in pretio habendum esse Apostolicum ministerium, per quod æternæ vitæ nuntius nobis affertur;' q. d. 'that the dignity and high importance of the heralds of salvation are implied in the words spoken of them, by prophetic description, words, too, applicable to the preachers of the Gospel; inasmuch as the return from the Babylonian Captivity had reference to an infinitely more joyful and blessed one in the time of the future Messiah;' for there is no good ground for lowering the passage of Isaiah here adduced to a mere accommodation (as most recent Expositors do), espec. since it appears from the Rabbinical citations in Wetst. that the ancient Jews themselves applied it to the Messiah; but we may suppose that the Prophet here, as in very many other passages, couches under the primary and literal (which referred to the messengers who brought the first news of the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity), a secondary but higher sense, which is here indispensable to make the argument conclusive. Accordingly, the Apostle was fully warranted in citing the passage, as showing that the instrumentality of the preachers of the Gospel was one recognized and alluded to in 'the sure word of prophecy,' where their office is marked with characters of dignity and glory. Theophyl., after Chrys., well illustrates the force of the expressions εὐαγγέλιον, εἰρήνην, and εὐαγγ. τὰ ἀγαθὰ (which are by parallelism synonymous and = τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς εἰρήνης) thus:

Οὐδὲν ἄλλο περιήσαν οἱ ἀπόστολοι λέγοντες, ἀλλ' ἢ τὰ ἀπὸρήτα ἀγαθὰ, καὶ τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ πρὸς ἀνθρώπους γενομένην εἰρήνην. See also Theodor. By ὠραῖοι is meant not 'beautiful,' nor, strictly speaking, 'grateful,' but 'reasonable,' and, by implication, 'acceptable' and 'pleasant.' And so it is used in Sirach, xxxv. 23, ὠραῖον ἔλεος ἐν καιρῷ θλίψεως, also xix. 27, and other passages adduced by Schleusn. Lex. N. T. and V. T. By οἱ πόδες is meant, metaph., 'the approach;' as in Acts v. 9, ἰδοὺ οἱ πόδες τῶν θαυμάτων. Comp. Eurip. Orest. 1217, παρθένου δόχου πόδας, a beautiful figure; for, 'by their approach (as Bp. Jebb observes, Sacra. Lit. p. 126) is excited the idea of their progress towards us: we admire them yet afar off; our imagination kindles at the prospect of good things to come.'

16. ἀλλ' οὐ πάντες ὑπήκουσαν, &c.] q. d. 'But (it may be objected to the argument founded on πᾶς supra) not all have hearkened to the call.' To this the answer, virtually contained in the following context, is, 'True; very few have hearkened to the Gospel; inasmuch that we may say, in the words of Isaiah, Who hath believed,' &c. This is not, indeed, to be considered as a mere accommodation of that passage. The Apostle (as Chrys., Theodor., and Hyper. remark) meant, by its introduction, to argue that the want of success complained of was foreseen and predicted by the Prophet, and, therefore, ought to be no well-founded objection to the Divine commission of the Apostle, or any reason why the ministers of the Gospel should not preach to all.

17. Ἄρα ἡ πίστις, &c.] The ἄρα is conclusive; and the passage is of a similar kind to that at vv. 14, 15, with which it is logically connected, being meant to inculcate the necessity of the Evangelical office; q. d. 'Faith is founded on instruction; and this instruction supposes a Divine communication. If men, then, are to believe, they must hear the message of God through his legates.'

18. ἀλλὰ λέγω· Μὴ, &c.] q. d. but though all have not obeyed the Gospel (ὑπήκουσαν), yet all have heard it, ἤκουσαν; it being meant, that "how great soever the mass of incredulity might be, it must be attributed altogether to the perverseness and evil disposition of the hearers, and not to any want of diligence in the teachers, who had indeed most zealously fulfilled their commission; inasmuch that, what the Psalmist says concerning that universal teaching even to the Gentiles, by which 'the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy-work,' may fitly be applied to the preaching of the Apostles." See more in Hyper. and Calv. So, too, Hodge takes the words, adding, this verse, therefore, is to be considered as a strong σαν; Μενούν γε εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν ἐξήλθεν ὁ φθόγγος αὐτῶν, καὶ εἰς τὰ πέρατα τῆς οἰκουμένης τὰ ῥήματα αὐτῶν. <sup>19</sup> Ἄλλὰ λέγω· Μὴ οὐκ ἔγνω Ἰσραὴλ; πρῶτος <sup>p Deut. 32. 21.</sup> Μωϋσῆς λέγει· Ἐγὼ παραζηλώσω ὑμᾶς ἐπ' οὐκ ἔθνει, ἐπὶ ἔθνει ἀσυνέτῳ παροργιῶ ὑμᾶς. <sup>20</sup> Ἡσαΐας δὲ <sup>q Isa. 52. 1. & 66. 1, 2. ch. 9. 30. Mat. 23. 10. & 23. 9, 10. r Isa. 66. 3 —</sup> ἀποτολμᾷ καὶ λέγει· Εὐρέθην τοῖς ἐμὲ μὴ ζητοῦσιν, ἐμφανὴς ἐγενόμην τοῖς ἐμὲ μὴ ἐπερωτῶσι. <sup>21</sup> Πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ λέγει· Ὁλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐξεπέτασα τὰς χεῖράς μου πρὸς λαὸν ἀπειθοῦντα καὶ ἀντιλέγοντα.

declaration that what Paul had proved ought to be done, had in fact been accomplished. The middle wall of partition had been broken down, the Gospel of salvation,—the religion of God,—was freed from its trammels, the offers of mercy were as wide and general as the proclamation of the heavens. This idea the Apostle most appositely expresses in the sublime language of Pa. xix. 4. This quotation agrees verbatim with the Sept. and also with the Heb., except that it has the word καὶ rendered line, which discrepancy Dr. Randolph and others seek to remove by supposing that the LXX. read καὶ: an ingenious conjecture, but not necessary to be adopted; for (as Rosenm. and others have seen) καὶ may have been taken by the Sept. in the sense clord, which, by metonymy, will denote sound. Thus there will be a parallelism with the clause following.

19—21. By way of reconciling these things to their belief, the Apostle now shows that both the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles, and their joyful acceptance of it, and the rejection of the Jews, had been foretold by their own Prophets.

19. ἀλλὰ λέγω—παραζηλώσω, &c.] Here the interrogation with the negation implies a strong asseveration; q. d. 'But, I say, did not Israel know that, upon their unbelief, the Gentiles would be adopted, and made partakers of the privileges of the Gospel?' Yea, surely they did, or might; for Moses, first, tells, &c. [speaking in the person of God.] The words (taken from Deut. xxxii. 21) agree with both the Heb. and Sept., except that ὑμᾶς is, for accommodation sake, put for αὐτοῦς.

—ἐπ' οὐκ ἔθνει] Supply δυντι. The meaning being, 'not a people of God by any peculiar covenant.' By δυντι, as Grot. observes, is to be understood, not simply 'foolish,' but 'affected with the folly of idolatry;' than which no folly can be greater;—the not having the knowledge of the one true God, which is the only true wisdom.—παραζηλώσω and παροργιῶ signify, by parallelism and pregnancy of sense, 'I will excite your jealousy by conferring on them benefits which you thought belonged exclusively to you.' 'Thus the passage,' as Hodge observes, 'plainly intimates that the Jews were in no such sense the people of God as to prevent their being cast off, and others called.' This is more distinctly and pointedly declared in the next verse (of which the words are from Isa. lxx. 1, 2), which, as Hodge shows, confirms both the great doctrines taught in this Chapter,—namely, that 'the Jews were no longer exclusively the people of God; and that the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom were thrown open to all mankind.'

20. Ἡ. δὲ ἀποτολμᾷ καὶ λέγει· Εὐρέθην, &c.]. 'But, further, Es. is very bold, and saith,' = 'is so bold as to say,' = ἀποτολμᾷ λέγει, lit. 'makes a bold venture' (telling them the blunt truth, however it might shock their prejudices), 'makes bold to say,' not an anomalous phrase, being found in Æschin. p. 72, 17; also by Plut. T. ii. p. 11. Philo. p. 1003, and Diod. Sic. v. 43. However, the words ἀποτολμᾷ καὶ are absent from four of the most ancient uncials, and the Ital. Version; whence it is plain that certain ancient Critics 'made so bold' (such was their wont) as to remove words which, they thought, broke the rules of pure Greek composition, though to the weakening of the sense. Yet our Critical Triumvirs, though they held their hands here, chose to insert ἐν before τοῖς ἐμὲ μὴ ζητ., on the authority of the very same copies, with the addition of B, and proceeding doubtless from the same Critics, who, it seems, thought that good composition required the Proposition. Alf., indeed, pronounces 'the text. rec. a correction to suit the Sept.,' though contrary to the Hebrew י 'by.' It is incredible that Paul should have inserted ἐν against both the Sept. and the Hebrew, confirmed by all the ancient Versions.

—εὐρέθην τοῖς, &c.]. The words are from Isa. lxx. 1, 2; but the two members of the sentences are, for the better understanding of the subject, taken in inverse order; and the sense of the two parts of the parallelism will become plainer by mutual comparison; on which see Koppe. 'The Apostle,' says Hodge, 'quotes and applies the passage in the sense in which it is to be interpreted in the ancient Prophet. In the first verse of that Chapter Isaiah says, that God will manifest himself to those 'who were not called by his name;' and in the second he gives the immediate reason of this turning unto the Gentiles, 'I have stretched out my hand all the day to a rebellious people.' This quotation, therefore, confirms both the great doctrines taught in this Chapter; the Jews were no longer the exclusive people of God, and the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom were thrown open to all mankind.'

21. πρὸς δὲ τὸν Ἰσρ. λέγει.] 'But respecting Israel he saith, ὅλην τὴν ἡμ. ἔξεπ. τ. χ. μου.,' the attitude of gracious invitation, and even entreaty: 'metaphora (says Parmus) a matribus, quæ petulantes pueros pussis uinis alio se revocant, venientes compectit paratæ.' So Dionys. Hal. vi. 86, ἀλλ' αὐτὴ καλεῖ, καὶ a Jer. 31. 37. XI. 1 Δέγω οὖν Μὴ ἀπόσωτο ὁ Θεὸς τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ;

 1 Sam. 12. Μὴ γένοιτο! καὶ γὰρ ἐγὼ Ἰσραηλίτης εἰμὶ, ἐκ σπέρματος
 22. Ἀβραάμ, φυλῆς Βενιαμίν. 2 Οὐκ ἀπόσωτο ὁ Θεὸς τὸν λαὸν
 3 Cor. 11. 23. αὐτοῦ, ὃν προέγνω. Ἡ οὐκ οἶδατε ἐν Ἠλῆ τὴ λέγει ἡ γραφή;
 Phil. 3. 5. ὡς ἐντυγχάνει τῷ Θεῷ κατὰ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, [λέγων] 3 Κύριε, b ch. 8. 29. τοὺς προφῆτας σου ἀπέκτειναν, καὶ τὰ θυσιαστήρια
 c 1 Kings 19. 10. σου κατέσκαψαν καὶ γὰρ ὑπελείφθην μόνος, καὶ ζητοῦσι
 d 1 Kings 19. 18. τὴν ψυχὴν μου. 4 Ἀλλὰ τί λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ χρηματισμὸς;
 e ch. 9. 37. Κατέλιπον ἐμαυτῷ ἑπτακισχιλίους ἄνδρας, οἵτινες οὐκ
 f Deut. 2. 4. ἔκαμψαν γόνυ τῇ Βάαλ. 5 Οὕτως οὖν καὶ ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ
 ch. 4. 4. 5. λεῖμμα κατ' ἐκλογὴν χάριτος γέγονεν. 6 Εἰ δὲ χάριτι, οὐκ
 1 Cor. 15. 10.

ἀντιβολεῖ, καὶ τὰς χεῖρας ὑμῖν ἅμα ταῖς πόλαις ἀναπατάσας υποδίσσεται.

XI. 'This Chapter consists of two parts, vv. 1—10, and 11—36. In the former the Apostle teaches that the rejection of the Jews was not total. There was a remnant, and perhaps a much larger remnant than many might suppose, excepted; although the mass of the nation, agreeably to the predictions of the Prophets, was cast off, vv. 1—10. In the latter he shows that this rejection is not final. In the first place, the restoration of the Jews is a desirable and probable event, vv. 11—24. In the second, it is one which God has determined to bring to pass, vv. 25—32. The Chapter closes with a sublime declaration of the unsearchable wisdom of God, manifested in all his dealings with men, vv. 33—36. In the consideration of the great doctrinal truths taught in this Chapter Paul intersperses many practical remarks, designed to give these truths their proper influence both on the Jews and Gentiles, especially the latter.' (Hodge.)

1. λέγω οὖν μὴ ἀπόσωτο, &c. "When we consider how many promises are made to the Jewish nation as God's peculiar people; and how often it is said, as in Ps. xciv. 14, 'The Lord will not cast off his people;' it is not wonderful that the doctrine of the rejection of the Jews, as taught in the preceding Chapters, appeared inconsistent with these repeated declarations of the word of God. Paul removes this difficulty, by showing in what sense the Jews were rejected, and in what way the ancient promises are to be understood. All the Jews were not cast off; and the promises did not contemplate all the Jewish people, as shown above in the ninth Chapter, but only the true Israel." (Hodge.)

— μὴ ἀπόσωτο, &c. 'Ἀπόσωσθαι is a very strong term, signifying lit. 'to push any thing aside with abhorrence,' as a nauseous potion; and, from the adjunct, 'to entirely cast off, utterly and perpetually reject.' By τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ is meant that true and spiritual Israel (Gal. vi. 16) known only to God himself (Acts xviii. 10), whom, as made one with Christ, he from the beginning accepted and approved. Comp. 1 Pet. i. 20.

2. The Apostle solemnly repeats the negation implied in μὴ γένοιτο! meaning to say that the rejection of the Jews here spoken of had no reference whatever to those who, like himself, had received the faith of Christ. See ver. 5.

— προέγνω meaning, 'whose acceptance he foreknew,' 'who, he foreknew would be his people.' See note supra viii. 28—30, and Macknight in loco.

— ἐν Ἠλῆ meaning, in that part of the book of Kings which contains the actions of Elijah,—namely, the 17th, 18th, and 19th chapters. On which mode of speaking, see note at Mark xii. 26. 'The Apostle (as Mr. Young observes) means to argue, that as in the general apostasy in the days of Elias there was still a small remnant who had not bowed the knee to Baal, so there was now a remnant of converted Jews, who were comprehended in the election of grace, together with the believing Gentiles.'

3. κατέσκαψαν 'have digged down;' κατασκάπτω signifying 'to overthrow any thing by digging under it;' consequently the term is very applicable to the utter destruction of edifices so firm, or with foundations so solid, as not to be destroyed in any other way.

— καὶ γὰρ ὑπελείφθην μόνος meaning, 'I alone of the Prophets am left.' Comp. Aristoph. Plut. 1060, οὐ γὰρ εὐρήσεις ἑμὸν ζῆτάν ἐτ' ἄνδρα τοῦτε τρώσκουσι βελτίονα. Μὰ τὸν Δι' οὐ γὰρ ἴσθιν ἄλλος πλὴν ἐγώ.

4. ὁ χρηματισμὸς 'the Divine response.' The word is used, like χρηματίζειν, of every extraordinary method by which God makes his will known to men. See my Lex. in v. Here, however, it has reference to that still small voice, the Bath-Col, 1 Kings xix. 12. Κατέλιπον ἐμ., 'I have reserved for myself.'

— τῇ Βάαλ The masculine form is generally found in the Sept.; though sometimes the feminine; and it may have been in Paul's copies. Indeed, as Selden (de Diis Syris) says, the god was supposed to be of both sexes, designating either the Sun or the Moon. In the former capacity it was worshipped (under the form of a bull) by the men; in the latter, by the women.

5. οὕτως οὖν—γίγονεν 'Thus, then, too, at the present time there has remained (faithful) a remnant according to the election of grace;' i. e. 'a selection not made on the ground of merit, but of free grace.'

6. εἰ δὲ χάριτι, &c. This verse is intended to further develop the sense of the last clause of the preceding; q. d. 'If the election spoken of be of grace, it is not founded on works; the two things being incompatible.' The latter clause, εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων, is the converse of the former;

ἔτι ἐξ ἔργων ἐπεὶ ἡ χάρις οὐκ ἔτι γίνεται χάρις· εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων, <sup>g ch. 9. 81.</sup>
 οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶ χάρις· ἐπεὶ τὸ ἔργον οὐκ ἔτι ἐστὶν ἔργον. <sup>h Isa. 6. 9.</sup> 7 τί οὖν; ὃ ἐπιζητεῖ Ἰσραὴλ, * τοῦτο οὐκ ἐπέτυχεν, ἡ δὲ ἐκλογὴ <sup>g 20. 10.</sup> ἐπέτυχεν οἱ δὲ λοιποὶ ἐπωρώθησαν <sup>Deut. 29. 4.</sup> 8 <sup>Jer. 5. 21.</sup> καθὼς γέγραπται <sup>Ezek. 12. 3.</sup>
 * Ἐδωκεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Θεὸς πνεῦμα κατανύξεως, ὀφθαλμοὺς <sup>Matt. 13. 14.</sup>
<sup>Mark 4. 11,</sup>
<sup>John 12. 40.</sup>
<sup>Acts 28. 26.</sup>

i. e. 'grace is now no longer possessed of its proper attribute, loses its nature, ceases to be grace;' 'it is no longer an act of grace, or of the gift of God.' Similarly, by ἐπεὶ—ἔργον, which is the converse of εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων—χάρις, is meant, 'inasmuch as [otherwise] work ceases to be work, loses its nature and essence.' However, the words of the latter clause, εἰ δὲ ἐξ ἔργων—ἐστὶν, are not in MSS. A, C, D, E, F, G, and one curiose, and are cancelled by all the Editors from Griesb. to Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch., ed. 1, though in his second ed. Tisch. has restored the passage; very properly; for the external authority existing for its removal is insufficient, from being discountenanced by all the cursives except one. Internal evidence is quite in favour of the words, espec. from a comparison of supra iv. 5, and Eph. ii. 8, 9. We are not bound always to find a reason why words have in certain cases come to be omitted. Here, however, it is not difficult; for palæographical reasons may be imagined, from which might be argued the probability of the words having been left out through inadvertence on the part of the scribes. But I rather impute their omission to the temerity of the Alexandrian Critics, who might think that what is said in this clause is simply the converse of what was said in the former, since it might very well be dispensed with. I find this judgment on the question (to which I had long since been led) confirmed by the παλινομία of Tisch., and the suffrage of Mr. Alf., who judiciously remarks, 'that the Apostle's object being precision (O! si sic omnia!), it is much more probable that he should have written both clauses in their present formal parallelism, than that the second should have been early omitted [rather, removed] from its seeming superfluity, than that it should have been inserted from the margin.' That, indeed, would involve the highest improbability. It was very unlikely to be placed in the margin. Revisers of the text rarely ventured to insert. Nor is it likely to have originated in rash criticism. Had Critics wished to bring in a formal parallelism, they would have contrived to make the fabricated second clause better tally with the first.

7. τί οὖν· scil. ᾠοῦμεν. 'What conclusion, by way of result, shall we draw from what has been said [but this]?' See Calv. and Hyp.

— ὃ ἐπιζητεῖ Ἰσραὴλ, τοῦτο οὐκ ἐπέτυχεν· 'what the people of Israel collectively (i. e. the bulk of the people) seek [namely, justification and acceptance with God by their own merit], that they have not obtained.'

— τοῦτο, which I long ago edited, instead of τούτου, has been since received by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., and the external authority for it is very strong; and I can add nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. However, internal evidence is equally balanced; for, though τούτου might come from a marginal Scholium, yet τοῦτο might proceed from the Critical Cor-rectors of style, considering that, as Mr. Green remarks (Gram. p. 273), the Class. writers use the licence of subordinating an accus. instead of a genit. to verbs of this class, in the case of pronouns and terms akin to them.

— ἡ δὲ ἐκλογὴ ἐπέτυχεν meaning, 'This has been confined to the believing few, who separated themselves from the rest, and were the chosen of Christ; ἡ ἐκλογὴ being for οἱ ἐκλεκτοί (abstract for concrete, as ii. 26. iii. 50. xv. 8), denoting the λαῖμα κατ' ἐκλογὴν χάριτος at ver. 5, that very small, but select, portion of the Jewish nation, which had faith in Christ, and thus obtained justification and acceptance.'

— ἠκουήθησαν· 'became hardened,' or 'hardened themselves;' for the best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that the Passive is for the reciprocal, as in John xii. 40. Of course this is to be understood with the permission of God; and therefore, as Young says, 'judicially, in consequence of their impenitence, and rejection of all the means employed by God for their conversion.'

8. The sentiment is now confirmed from various passages of the Old Test., where the Prophets upbraided the Jews for a similar hardness of heart.

— καθὼς γέγραπται· This passage is composed of several found in different parts of the Old Test. Deut. xxix. 4. Isa. vi. 9, 10. xxix. 9, 10. The spirit, and, to some extent, the language, of these passages Paul cites in support of his present purpose. They are in part descriptive of what had occurred in the times of the Prophet, and, in part, of what should occur in after times; and are, therefore, quoted in reference to the character and conduct of the Jews in the days of Christ (see Matt. xiii. 14). The import of such citations frequently is, that what was fulfilled in the days of the Prophet was more completely accomplished at the time referred to by the New Testament writer. So, in this case, it was more fully accomplished at this period of the Jewish history than at any other, that the people were blinded, hardened, and reprobate. And this the ancient Prophets frequently predicted should be the case. These quotations also serve to show that this hardening, and consequent rejection of the Jews, was an event which, with regard to multitudes, had frequently occurred before, and, therefore, demonstrated that their being cast away militated with none of the Divine promises.

— πνεῦμα κατανύξεως.] The sense here is disputed, from uncertainty as to the force of κατανύξεως, which might signify, did the context permit, 'compunction,' from κατανύσσω, 'to prick,' 'pierce through;' so that it might signify 'the pricking of grief, sorrow;' but among the very few examples of its occurrence it has not that sense, but only 'torpor,' as in Pa. lix. 3 (Sept.), and Isa. xxix. 10, where it denotes 'the torpor of deep sleep,' καταφορά, or κάρωσις, which τοῦ μὴ βλέπειν, καὶ ὅτα τοῦ μὴ ἀκούειν, ἕως τῆς σήμερον ἡμέρας. <sup>9</sup> καὶ Δαυὶδ λέγει· Γεννηθῆτω ἡ τράπεζα αὐ-τῶν εἰς παγίδα καὶ εἰς θήραν, καὶ εἰς σκάνδαλον καὶ εἰς ἀνταπόδομα αὐτοῖς. <sup>10</sup> Σκοτισθήτωσαν οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν τοῦ μὴ βλέπειν, καὶ τὸν νῶτον αὐτῶν διαπαντός σύγκαμψον! <sup>11</sup> λέγω οὖν μὴ ἔπταισαν, ἵνα πείσωσι; Μὴ γένοιτο! ἀλλὰ τῷ αὐτῶν παραπτώματι ἡ σωτηρία τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, εἰς τὸ παραζηλώσαι αὐτούς. <sup>12</sup> Εἰ δὲ τὸ παράπτωμα αὐτῶν

1 Pt. ii. 22.
 Acts 18.
 ch. 10. 19.

there Aquila uses. And so Chrys. t. vii. 450, 451. How it comes to mean this, is not easy to see. It arose probably from νύσσω having, in common with its cognate νυστάζω (from νύξ cognate with νύσσω, whence νυστός and νυστάζω), that sense in Alexandrian Greek. It should seem that the best sense to be assigned is that which is inherent in the καταφορά, or κάρωσις, of Aquila in the above passages, denoting 'a heavy lethargy, or lethargic sleep;' of course here to be taken figuratively.

9. γεννηθῆτω ἡ τράπεζα, &c. As against those who had inflicted injuries on him, evils are denounced by the Psalmist, similar in kind (q. d. Would that their own table may be made bitter by misery and misfortune, and the food provided for their strengthening, turn to their utter injury, σκάδαλον); so here, by accommodation, condign punishment is invoked on the Jews for their injurious treatment of the Messiah:—εἰς ἀνταπόδομα α., 'for a retribution upon them.' So Ecclesi. xiv. 6, καὶ τοῦτο ἀνταπόδομα τῆς κακίας αὐτοῦ; q. d. 'May such evils be a retribution on them, for the injuries they have done to me!' So most Expositors. There is, however, I agree with Hodge, 'nothing in the Psalm which forbids its being considered as a prophetic lamentation of the Messiah over his afflictions, and a denunciation of God's judgments upon his enemies. Viewed in this light (he adds), the Psalm is directly applicable to the Apostle's object, since it contains a prediction of the judgments which should befall the enemies of Christ.'

The words εἰς θήραν (found neither in the Sept. nor the Hebrew) are exegetical of εἰς παγίδα, where we have a metaphor taken from birds or beasts being caught by food placed in a trap.

10. σκοτισθήτωσαν οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ—βλέπειν i. e. 'May they fall, like blind persons, headlong into the evils prepared for them!' A not unfrequent mode of expression to denote falling into sudden and irremediable misery.

—καὶ τὸν νῶτον, &c.] i. e. 'make them groan under heavy burdens, which bow down the back with labour;' the whole forming a lively figure of misery and bondage, amply fulfilled in the yet more grievous subjection of the Jews to the Roman yoke, which took place soon after these words were written.

11—24. The Apostle proceeds to intimate, that as this rejection and exclusion was not total, neither is it final; they have not so fallen as to be hopelessly prostrated; and that the purpose of God therein was not destruction to them, but mercy to the Gentiles, and a paving of the way for their own restoration.

11, 12. λέγω οὖν μὴ ἔπταισαν, ἵνα πείσω.] We have here, as Hyper. remarks, a forcible interrogation carrying with it an objection, founded on σκάδαλον just before,—namely, whether what is there said is to be understood to intimate the final casting off of the Jews; for by πείσωσι is intimated an utter and irremediable fall or ruin; see Heb. iv. 11, and compare Soph. Œd. Tyr. 146, ἡ γὰρ εὐτυχίῃ, ζῶν τῷ Θεῷ φανόμειν, ἡ πεπτωκότις;

The answer conveys a negation of the strongest kind,—μὴ γένοιτο! 'God forbid it should be so!' And the reasons for the denial are subjoined; namely, that this their lapse or stumbling by rejection of the Gospel has been the occasion of its being preached to the Gentiles. In short, 'the Apostle (as Mr. Young observes) shows that all has been done in order to the accomplishment of a plan of the most wonderful and comprehensive goodness; for, 1. The rejection of the Gospel by the Jews (which was the cause of their own rejection by God) was the means of salvation to the Gentiles, through the offer of the Gospel to them, and their embracing it; 2ndly, The fulness of the Gentiles, or their general acceptance of the Gospel, is one of God's remedies for the obduracy of the Jews; εἰς τὸ παραζηλώσαι αὐτούς, v. 11, by provoking them to jealousy and emulation; and so to a desire of regaining their ancient state of favour with God' (see vv. 11, 14, 25, 26, 31; and compare Deut. xxxii. 21).

At ver. 12 we have, as Hyper. remarks, the second reason for the above denial, and that deduced from the utility which would redound to the Gentiles from this restoration of the Jews; according to what he had just before said, that the lapse of the Jews had produced benefit to the Gentiles. Hence we have here an argumentum à minori ad majus, et per contrarium; q. d. 'If from the lapse of the Jews so great a benefit followed to the whole world, undoubtedly a far greater would follow from their restoration.'

Between εἰ δὲ τὸ παράπτωμα—ἰθὺν and πῶς—αὐτῶν there is an antithesis, though it is irregular, from the former member being of two parts which form a parallelism, whereas the latter has but one. The deficient apodosis is well supplied by Koppe, who lays down the construction as follows: εἰ δὲ τὸ παράπτωμα—κόσμον, πῶς μᾶλλον ἡ ἀνάστασις αὐτῶν; καὶ εἰ τὸ ἥττημα αὐτῶν πλοῦτος ἰθὺν, πῶς μᾶλλον τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτῶν; Again, πλοῦτος is for πλουτισμός, blessing and saving, by a true conversion.—ἥττημα is, by some, explained paucitas, diminution; but better by Wetstein, Carpzov, Koppe, and Schleusner, conditio deterior, the being in a worse state, i. e. of degradation;

πλοῦτος κόσμου, καὶ τὸ ἔτημα αὐτῶν πλοῦτος ἐθνῶν πρόσφ
 μᾶλλον τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτῶν; <sup>13</sup> Ἔμιν γὰρ λέγω τοῖς ἔθνεσιν, (ἐφ' ὅσον μὲν εἰμι ἐγὼ ἐθνῶν ἀπόστολος, τὴν διακονίαν μου δοξάζω,) <sup>14</sup> εἰ πως παραζηλώσω μου τὴν σάρκα, καὶ σώσω τινὰς ἐξ αὐτῶν. <sup>15</sup> Εἰ γὰρ ἡ ἀποβολὴ αὐτῶν καταλλαγὴ κόσμου τίς ἡ πρόσληψις, εἰ μὴ ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρῶν; <sup>16</sup> εἰ δὲ ἡ ἀπαρχὴ ἀγία, καὶ τὸ φύραμα καὶ εἰ ἡ ῥίζα ἀγία, καὶ οἱ κλάδοι.
<sup>17</sup> Εἰ δέ τινες τῶν κλάδων ἐξεκλάσθησαν, σὺ δὲ ἀγγιέλαιος

1 Acts 9. 15.
 & 15. 2.
 & 22. 21.
 ch. 15. 10.
 Gal. 1. 10.
 & 2. 7. 8.
 Eph. 4. 5.
 1 Tim. 2. 7.
 2 Tim. 1. 11.
 m. ch. 9. 2.
 1 Cor. 9. 22.
 1 Tim. 2. 10.
 ver. ch. 2. 4.
 Phil. 12.
 1 Cor. 7. 16.
 n 3 Cor. 6.
 19.
 o Lev. 22. 10.
 Num. 15. 12, 13. p Jer. 11. 16. Eph. 2. 12, 13. & 3. 6.

as in 1 Cor. vi. 7. Thus, on the other hand, πλήρωμα may denote a prosperous condition—spiritual prosperity. See Hyper. and Calv. The antithetic term ἔτημα seems to point at 'honour,' which I find adopted by Alf.; but it needs proof. So that unless the former interpretation be adopted, I would propose 'restoration to the former measure of favour;' which will be almost equiv. to 'honour.'

13, 14. Some Expositors place these verses in a parenthesis, v. 15 being closely connected in sense with v. 12. But though the portion is in some measure interposed, yet there is, properly speaking, no parenthesis; as is evident from the γάρ which commences the passage. It would be nearer the truth to say, that the clause ἐφ' ὅσον—δοξάζω is parenthetical, as it was plainly considered by the Pesh. Syriac Translator. And thus the sense of the passage is much cleared; εἰ πως being, as Koppe says, equiv. to ἵνα αὐτὸν (as in Acts xvii. 12. Rom. i. 10. Phil. iii. 11), 'to try if, by any means, I may,' &c. Thus the passage may be rendered: 'Now I speak [thus] to you Gentiles (and, inasmuch as I am the Apostle of the Gentiles, I glory in, [or I maintain,] the honour and dignity of my office), to try if, by any means, I may excite to emulation,' &c. (q. d. 'if I may possibly, and thus haply save some of them'), a mode of expression, Koppe observes, neither savouring of despair on the one hand, nor extreme confidence on the other, and occurring at Acts xvii. 12. Rom. i. 10. Phil. iii. 11.

14. παραζηλώσω μου τὴν σάρκα, &c.] These words are, as Koppe observes, added for the purpose of showing that while he is strongly interested for the Gentiles (to whom he was especially sent) and the Jewish Christians, he was not forgetful of the rest of his countryman; for such is the sense of the expression σάρκα.—σώσω may be rendered (as it is by Piscator and Vorstius) 'put into the way of salvation.'

15. εἰ γὰρ ἡ ἀποβολή, &c.] The γὰρ is illustrative; and ἀποβολή is used (by a metonymy of the effect for the cause) to denote that obstinate unbelief which caused the rejection of the Jews. The meaning is: 'If their sin, which occasioned this casting away, has been the means of reconciling the world, by bringing about the death of Christ, what shall the receiving of them again into the divine favour be (whenever it shall take place) but so happy a change, both to themselves and to the Gentiles, as may, in a manner, be said to be ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρῶν; an expression to denote, by a strong and lively figure, matter of the greatest rejoicing (even such as receiving a dead friend raised to life again), but here alluding to a spiritual regeneration of a world dead in trespasses and sin. 'Since (observes Stuart) we have at Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14, the moral renovation of the Jews designated under the similitude of a resurrection; so it is probable that the Apostle had that passage in mind; and if so, ζωὴ ἐκ νεκρ. must denote their conversion to Christianity.' Of course by καταλλ. is meant, by metonymy, the occasion of their being reconciled, or restored, to God's favour; and the reconciliation is that described in Eph. ii. 11—22.

16. εἰ δὲ ἡ ἀπαρχή—οἱ κλάδοι] Here we have a continuation of the foregoing reasoning; and the Apostle now returns to the principal thesis propounded at ver. 11, that 'God has not for ever and finally rejected the Jewish people.' As to the imagery in this passage, ἀπαρχή is a term denoting properly 'the first-fruits of the new corn' (or 'the dough first made for bread') consecrated to God; see Thucyd. vi. 20, and Numb. xv. 21. Φύραμα cannot, as some suppose, denote 'the rest of the grain after the first-fruits had been presented;' but (as coming from φύρασι, to mix up and knead flour in bread-making) 'the dough;' and here ἀπαρχή must mean only 'the cakes made of the first mass of dough,' and offered to God as first-fruits; and φύραμα 'the whole mass of dough out of which the cake was made.' In short, the sentiment is couched under a double similitude, by two distinct allusions,—the first founded on Numb. xv. 21, taken from the primitive fruits whence the leaven offering of dough was made; the second founded on Jer. xi. 16, from a tree with spreading branches: on which latter the Apostle especially dwells, pointing out by it the respective condition of the Jews and the Gentiles. See more in Whitby and Mackn. The meaning intended by the Apostle is well expressed by Schoëttgen and Carpov as follows: 'If now a great part of the Jews, at the beginning of the New Covenant, have, like primitive offerings of good fruit, been received, on account of their faith, into the Church of Christ, and made partakers of justification and sanctification (Acts ii. 41. iv. 4); so neither has the remaining mass of the Jews been rejected without hope of salvation, but may likewise be received into the Church of Christ, and obtain justification and sanctification; i. e. if the mass shall evince the same faith as the first-fruits.'

17—24. "The object of these verses is to make such an application of the truths just taught, as should prevent any feeling of exultation or triumph in the Gentile Christians over the Jews; q. d. 'It is true, that the Jews have

q<sup>1</sup> 1 Cor. 10.
12.

r Prov. 28.
14.
Isa. 66. 2.
ch. 12. 16.
Phil. 2. 12.

ὧν ἐνεκεντρίσθης ἐν αὐτοῖς, καὶ συγκοινωνὸς τῆς ῥίζης καὶ τῆς πιότητος τῆς ἐλαίας ἐγένου, <sup>18</sup> ἢ μὴ κατακαυθῶ τῶν κλάδων εἰ δὲ κατακαυχᾶσαι, οὐ σὺ τὴν ῥίζαν βαστάξεις, ἀλλ' ἡ ῥίζα σέ. <sup>19</sup> Ἐρεῖς οὖν Ἐξεκλάσθησαν οἱ κλάδοι, ἵνα ἐγὼ ἐγκεντρισθῶ. <sup>20</sup> Καλῶς τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ ἐξεκλάσθησαν, σὺ δὲ τῇ πίστει ἔστηκας. Μὴ ὑψηλοφρόνει, ἀλλὰ φοβοῦ <sup>21</sup> εἰ γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τῶν
κατὰ φύσιν κλάδων οὐκ ἐφείσατο, μή πως οὐδὲ σοὺ φείσεται.

been partially rejected from the Church of God, that the Gentiles have been introduced into it, though the Jews are ultimately to be restored: these things, however, afford no ground of boasting to the Gentiles, but rather cause of thankfulness and caution. Paul illustrates these truths in a very appropriate figure." (Hodge.)

17. By the ῥίζα in the last clause of the preceding verse and of the present cannot be meant, as some suppose, the ἀπαρχὴ τοῦ φυράματος at v. 16, but, as Hodge says, 'the ancient covenant people of God.' 'The ancient Theocracy,' continues he, 'was merged in the people of God; the latter is but the same family still.' The allusion in the terms ῥίζα and κλάδοι is to the above-cited passage of Jerem. (xi. 16), and that comparison is here mainly in view, wherein the Apostle pre-occupies an objection,—namely, that branches, though from a good trunk, yet when broken off, are valueless, and can derive no esteem from the virtue of the trunk; in answering which he paves the way for the admonition following, which is meant to restrain the Jews from showing contempt.

— εἰ δὲ τινες τῶν κλάδων, &c.] We have here a lively image, taken from engrafting trees; though not after the usual mode of introducing the wild olive into the garden olive, but the contrary; for which Expositors assign many reasons,—all rendered nugatory by the fact, ascertained by the researches of Bredenkamp, that it was in ancient times usual so to engraft, in order to promote fecundity.

Ἀγρίαιος must here signify (by an ellipse of κλάδος) 'a wild olive-branch.'—ἐγκεντρίξω signifies lit. 'to prick in,' and is used with reference to the notch made into the stock, in order to insert the graft; though many Expositors assign to ἐν the sense of pro or loco, yet it plainly means among. Thus the sense of the passage will be: 'If some of Abraham's children were cast off for their unbelief, and thou [Gentile], being a wild olive-branch, wert grafted in among them' (i. e. the branches which remained, the believing Jews), and with them partake of the root and fatness (i. e. the fitness of the root, per Hendiadyon) of the olive-tree (i. e. of the promises to Abraham, and the privileges of God's Church), &c.

18. μὴ κατακαυχ. τ. κλάδων] scil. τῶν ἐκκλασθέντων, to be supplied from ἐξεκλάσθησαν, supra v. 17. After εἰ δὲ κατακαυχᾶσαι supply γινώθι, or the like. It is a popular ellipse, occurring 1 Cor. ix. 16, and elsewhere, of which see examples in Winer, Gr. § 66, 7.—οὐ σὺ—σέ. The οὐ placed first is emphatic. Render: 'It is not thou,—but, &c.; as much as to say, 'Know that the Jews owe nothing to you; but you, all to the Jews; since the hope of salvation was transferred from the Jews to the Gentiles, not the reverse; therefore regard them not with scorn.' This strongly-urged plain fact was meant to repress all self-confident exultation of the latter over the former.

19. ἐρεῖς οὖν Ἐξεκλά., &c.] The οὖν, as Crell. observes, serves to infer; q. d. 'that being the case, thou wilt say (urge in argument), "The branches were cut out that I might be grafted in."'

20. καλῶς] 'Well, be it so as thou hast said,'—what is assumed in ἵνα being granted. The Particle ἵνα may be taken, with many Expositors, and recently Hodge and Dr. Peile, to denote, not the express purpose, but an incidental consequence of the branches having been broken off. 'The fact,' says Hodge, 'that they were broken off is admitted, but the inference impliedly drawn by the Gentiles is denied. It was not for any personal considerations that the one was rejected and the other chosen. The Jews were rejected only because they rejected the Saviour, and the only tenure by which the advantages of a covenant relation to God can be retained is faith. The Gentiles, therefore, will not be secure because Gentiles, any more than the Jews were safe because Jews.' (Hodge.) Nevertheless the καλῶς will not prove this; since that may be taken populariter, in a concessive sense; as we say, 'Well, granting it to be so; but, &c., as in Mark xii. 32. Luke xx. 39. John iv. 17. Indeed, Hyper. has proved that there is here a concessio rhetorica, which, seeming to grant something, carries, however, with it the assertion of something further, which is here introduced by δέ.

— σὺ δὲ τῇ πίστει ἔστηκας] meaning, 'but it is by faith [alone] that thou standest;' i. e. 'continuest in the Divine favour, into which thou hast been admitted.'

21. τῶν κατὰ φύσιν] scil. κλάδων, 'the natural branches,' i. e. the Jews; so called because naturally descended from Abraham, the root or trunk of the olive-tree.

— μὴ φείσεται] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit φείσεται from many cursives; to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies. The text. rec. may be, as Alf. thinks, a correction to avoid the Future with μὴ πως; but it is more likely that φείσεται was a correction of the Alexandrian Grammaticists, to introduce the Future; for the Attic style employs the Fut. Indic. The First Aorist form is, indeed, rare; but it is found in Jer. i. 14. li. 3 (ed. Francof.), and also in Eccles. xiii. 12, οὐ μὴ φείσεται, and considering that the 1 Aorist Subjunct. is supported by other passages of the Sept. and of the N. T., it is probably genuine. If, however, the reading φείσεται be adopted, it may be confirmed from Col. ii. 8, μὴ τιε-ίσται. Heb. iii. 12, μήποτε ἴσται ἐν ὑμῖν, and Mark xiv. 2, μήποτε θόρυβος ἵσταται, in which several cases, as observes Mr. Green, Gr. N. T. p. 86, the singularity does not lie in the form of the verb, but in the suppression of ἵπας before μή.

22 Ἰδε οὖν χρηστότητα, καὶ ἀποτομίαν Θεοῦ ἐπὶ μὲν τοῖς <sup>John 15. 2</sup> πεσόντας, ἀποτομίαν ἐπὶ δὲ σέ, <sup>Cor. 15. 2</sup> χρηστότητα, <sup>Heb. 2. 6, 14</sup> ἐὰν ἐπιμείνης <sup>10. 32, 33.</sup> τῇ χρηστότητι· ἐπεὶ καὶ σὺ ἐκκοπήσῃ. 23 Καὶ ἐκεῖνοι δὲ, ἐὰν <sup>1 Cor. 2. 16.</sup> μὴ ἐπιμεινώσι τῇ ἀπιστίᾳ, ἐγκεντρισθήσονται· δυνατὸς γὰρ ἔστιν ὁ Θεὸς πάλιν ἐγκεντρίσαι αὐτοὺς. 24 Εἰ γὰρ σὺ ἐκ τῆς κατὰ φύσιν ἐξεκόπης ἀγριελαιῖου, καὶ παρὰ φύσιν ἐνεκεντρίσθης εἰς καλλιέλαιον πόσῃ μᾶλλον οὗτοι, οἱ κατὰ φύσιν, ἐγκεντρισθῶσιν τῇ ἰδίᾳ ἐλαίᾳ; 25 Οὐ γὰρ θέλω ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, ἀδελφοί, τὸ μυστήριον τούτου, (ἵνα μὴ ᾗτε παρ' ἑαυτοὺς φρόνιμοι,) <sup>u ver. 7, 8.</sup> <sup>Luke 21. 34.</sup> <sup>1 Cor. 2. 16—16.</sup>

22. Ἰδε οὖν χρηστότητα, &c.] 'Behold now the goodness, and the severity of God.' I have placed a comma after χρηστότητα, because the two attributes are (as appears from what follows) considered separately. Here καὶ is, as often, for καὶ, 'not only—but.' Render: 'Behold therefore the goodness, and (also) the severity of God;' like the genuine characteristics of even an earthly father. So Plut. de Educ. p. 13, διὰ δὲ τοὺς πατέρας τὴν τῶν ἐπιτιμημάτων ἀποτομίαν τῇ πραότητι μιγνύειν. The Apostle admonishes them not so to rest upon the goodness of God to them, as to grow secure, and forget his severity. So Ps. cxxx. 40: 'There is mercy with thee, therefore thou shalt be feared.' The words following show the objects and grounds for the exercise of each of these attributes.

—ἐὰν ἐπιμείνης τῇ χρηστ. meaning, 'If thou remain in that state, in which thou hast been placed by the goodness of God, through faith in Christ.'

23. The sense of this verse and the last clause of the preceding is: 'The heathens too may finally be deprived of the benefits now offered or enjoyed; and, on the other hand, the Jews be finally invested with them.' Ἐγκεντρ. should be rendered, not 'will,' but 'shall, be grafted in;' implying only what may be, not what shall certainly take place. From the power of God, Calv., Grot., Hamm., and Whitby, think we may reasonably include his will. See Isa. lix. 1; q. d., in the words of Hodge, 'There is no inexorable purpose in the Divine mind, nor any insuperable obstacles in the circumstances of the case.' Hence, then, it is implied that nothing but their unbelief hinders their being again received into the favour of God; 'Cessante causâ, cessat effectus.'

24. εἰ γὰρ σὺ ἐκ τῆς—τῇ ἰδίᾳ ἐ. ] The scope of the argument is this: 'That the Gentiles should be brought to the felicity of Christ's kingdom was far more improbable, than that the Jews should be brought thereto, since it was originally destined for them.' Here the Gentile nations at large are compared to the wild olive-tree; and each of them singly to one of its branches. Some interpret παρὰ φύσιν, 'contrary to the order of nature,' which forbids a wild and bad tree to be engrafted on a good stock. But see note supra v. 17, 18. The sense would rather seem to be, 'not brought in by nature, but grafted in by art.' Καλλιέλαιος is supposed to be a word coined by the Apostle, to correspond to ἀγριέλαιος. But it is found in Aristotle, de Plantis, i. 6, and some later writers.

25—32.] Having now shown that the restoration of the Jews is in itself a desirable (vv. 12—15), and likewise a probable occurrence (vv. 16—24), the Apostle proceeds, in the present portion, to announce prophetically, 1) that it actually shall take place (25—27), and 2) proceeds to throw some light, in the way of justification, on the plans of Divine wisdom. The announcement is ushered in by the not unusual formula, οὐ θέλω ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, intended to impress on the reader's mind some weighty declaration of Divine truth: so supra i. 13. 1 Cor. x. 1. 2 Cor. i. 8. 1 Thess. iv. 18. Paul further terms the announced truth as a μυστήριον, on which see my Lex. and Tholuck's note, where he classifies the senses, and rightly fixes the use here to the first of those senses, as denoting 'a prophetic event, unattainable by human knowledge, but revealed from the secrets of God.' This is confirmed by the following words, espec. ἵνα μὴ ᾗτε παρ' ἑαυτοῖς φρόνιμοι, suggested by Prov. iii. 7, μὴ ἰσθὶ φρόνιμος παρὰ ἑαυτῷ, Isa. v. 21, συναυτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, and similar passages; here meaning, 'that ye do not take credit to yourselves for superior wisdom, in having accepted that Gospel which had been rejected by the Jews.' The sense intended may be: 'that ye may not be puffed up with an opinion of your own peculiar favour with God and consequent privilege, as if you were irrevocably chosen, and they utterly rejected.' Be that as it may, the mystery in question was the future conversion and restoration of the Jews,—now first announced,—implying that the blindness and obdurate unbelief of Israel was not universal, but in part, and would only continue till the fulness of the Gentiles should come in, i. e. till their conversion should be completed. Ἀχρεῖς οὐ here denotes continuation, as in Rom. v. 15. xi. 8. By ἀπὸ μέρους τῷ Ἰσραὴλ we may understand 'some Israelites,' in opposition to the all at ver. 20. As to the objection of Estius, that there was no mystery in this, it is futile; since, in fact, the mystery in question has respect to the words following, ἀχρεῖς οὐ τὸ πλήρωμα, &c., where πλήρωμα is equiv. to πλήθος τῶν ἰδίων, denoting the great bulk of the heathens, i. e. in a manner, all. At ἀχρεῖς before οὐ τὸ πλήρωμα τῶν ἰδίων εἰσιλθῶ must be supplied some such words as, 'and which will continue to perpetuity, until,' &c. Finally, at v Pa. 14. 7.

& 104. 47.
Isa. 40. 26.
& 50. 20.
x Pa. 14. 7.
Isa. 37. 9.
Jer. 31. 31.
&c.
2 Cor. 2. 16.
Heb. 4. 6.
& 10. 16.
y Num. 22.
10.
z Eph. 2. 2.
Col. 2. 7.
Tit. 2. 9—7.
ver. 31.
1 Cor. 7. 26.
2 Cor. 4. 1.

ὅτι πῶρως ἂν ἀπὸ μέρους τῷ Ἰσραὴλ γέγονεν, ἄχρις οὗ τὸ πλήρωμα τῶν ἐθνῶν εἰσέλθῃ. <sup>26</sup> καὶ οὕτω πᾶς Ἰσραὴλ σωθήσεται καθὼς γέγραπται. Ἡξει ἐκ Σιών ὁ ῥυόμενος, καὶ ἀποστρέψει ἀσεβείας ἀπὸ Ἰακώβ. <sup>27</sup> καὶ αὕτη αὐτοῖς ἡ παρ' ἐμοῦ διαθήκη. . . . ὅταν ἀφέλωμαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν. <sup>28</sup> Κατὰ μὲν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἔχθροί, δι' ὑμᾶς κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐκλογὴν, ἀγαπητοὶ διὰ τοὺς πατέρας. <sup>29</sup> Ἀμεταμέλητα γὰρ τὰ χαρίσματα καὶ ἡ κλήσις τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>30</sup> Ὡς περ γὰρ καὶ ὑμεῖς ποτὲ ἠπειθήσατε τῷ Θεῷ, νῦν δὲ

εισέλθῃ supply εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ, or εἰς τὴν πίστιν.

<sup>26</sup>. καὶ οὕτω] i.e. when it shall be so that the πλήρωμα shall be brought in. Σωθήσεται, 'shall be put into the way of salvation, have the means of salvation bestowed on them.' See Note at Matt. i. 21.

— καθὼς γέγραπται, &c.] The words are from Isa. lix. 20, and agree with the LXX., except that Ἰνκα is there used for the ἐκ here, which, indeed, Beza and Koppe suspect crept in from an abbreviation of Ἰνκα. But it were strange that it should have crept into all the MSS. It is better to suppose, with Vitringa, that, together with this passage of Isaiah, the Apostle had in mind Ps. xiv. 7, τίς δώσει ἐκ Σιών τὸ σωτήριον; and thus blended both into one. In καὶ ἀποστρέψει, &c. the Hebrew slightly differs from the Sept., as followed by the Apostle; but, as Vitringa observes, that is merely from a freedom of translation.

<sup>27</sup>. καὶ αὕτη—διαθήκη] These words are, as Koppe remarks, taken from the same passage of Isaiah; though (as is not unusual in the Jewish writers) the passage is left incomplete, and to be supplied by the reader. The words ὅταν ἀφέλωμαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας αὐτῶν are supposed to be taken from Isa. xxvii. 9. They may, however, be taken, as Stuart says, from Jer. xxxi. 31. Prof. Hodge thinks neither supposition inconsistent with the context, since the Apostle may mean, either that God would restore the Jews after he had punished them for their iniquities, or when he had converted them from their unbelief. See Isa. iv. 4.

<sup>28</sup>. κατὰ μὲν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον—πατέρας] This is meant to meet a tacit objection; q. d. 'It cannot be that all Israel will be saved, and experience such grace from God; since they are God's enemies, and God is theirs.' Reply: 'They are, indeed, enemies; but they are nevertheless beloved, though in another respect.' (Crell.)—δι' ὑμᾶς. Render, 'for your sakes,' or 'for your advantage,' viz. that the Gospel may come unto you.

—κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐκλογὴν, &c.] meaning, 'but in respect of their election (as the posterity of a nation chosen by God for his peculiar people), in that view they are beloved.'—διὰ τοὺς πατέρας, i. e. 'on account of, and in respect of, the love which God bore to their forefathers.'

<sup>29</sup>. ἀμεταμέλητα γὰρ τὰ χαρίσματα, &c.] 'This assigns the reason why the Israelites even yet, on their forefathers' account, cease not to be beloved; and this is founded on the constancy of the Divine will, which decrees nothing of which the Deity can ever repent (Koppe);' q. d. 'For God will never repent of the promises which he made to the fathers, and therefore will never change his purpose in regard to the bestowment of spiritual blessings on their offspring.' (Stuart.) The purpose, however, of the Apostle was, I think, further than this, and is such as is pointed out by Hyper., as follows: 'Erunt quidem semper aliqui ex Judæis electi; id autem, non adeo propter dignitatem Patrum, sed magis propter Dei promissiones ad Patres factas, quas is vult implere etiam erga degenerantes posteros, vel ob id quod promissis gaudet stare, et sententiam nequaquam mutat.'

<sup>30</sup>—<sup>32</sup>. Of this portion (which is parallel with v. 11, and contains, as Hyper. says, a ratiocination à pari intended to draw a firm conclusion) the sense is as follows: 'For as you Gentiles, who were once disobedient to God, by idolatry and unbelief, have at last obtained mercy and introduction into God's church and covenant, on occasion of the obstinate unbelief of the Jews, who crucified the Lord of life (which was the occasion of the Gospel being preached to the Gentiles), even so they also, though now unbelieving, may obtain mercy, through your mercy [i. e. through the mercy vouchsafed to you exciting them to seek for mercy]. (see vv. 11, 14.) and at length receive the Gospel from them: for God hath shut up all (both Jews and Gentiles), that he may have mercy on all.' The Apostle's object, as Hodge observes, is to direct attention to the fact,—that God's dealings with men—both Jews and Gentiles—was such as to place them on the very same ground, as alike dependent on the same Mercy. As all men had forfeited every claim to the Divine mercy, and all were in the same lost estate, from which no effort of their own could save them, God had determined to display his goodness, by having mercy upon all,—Jews as well as Gentiles,—and thus bring all, ultimately, to one fold, under one Shepherd. The great difficulty, however, in the passage, is with the words, συνέκλεισεν ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς πάντας εἰς ἁμ., which have been understood in two different ways. The ancient and earlier modern Commentator, with Wets. and Carp., render, 'hath convicted all of sin,' 'hath proved that they all lie under it,' namely, by his holy law. See iii. 9. Gal. iii. 22. Others, as Piscator and most of the recent Commentators (with the E. V.), interpret, 'hath shut up (i. e. included together) all in disobedience and sin, subjected them to its control,' i. e. hath permitted them to be subject to it. On re-considering this case, I am inclined to agree with Mr. Alf., that no

ἡλεήθητε τῇ τούτων ἀπειθείᾳ· <sup>31</sup> οὕτω καὶ οὗτοι νῦν ἡπείβησαν

τῷ ὑμετέρῳ ἔλεει, ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐλεηθῶσι. <sup>32</sup> * Συνέκλεισε γὰρ

ὁ Θεὸς τοὺς πάντας εἰς ἀπείθειαν, ἵνα τοὺς πάντας ἐλεήσῃ.

<sup>33</sup> * Ω βάθος πλούτου καὶ σοφίας καὶ γνώσεως Θεοῦ! ὡς ἀνεξερεύνητα τὰ κρίματα αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀνεξιχνίαστοι αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ! <sup>34</sup> * Τίς γὰρ ἔγνω νοῦν Κυρίου; ἢ τίς σύμβουλος αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο; <sup>35</sup> * ἢ τίς προέδωκεν αὐτῷ, καὶ ἀνταποδοθή-

σεται αὐτῷ; <sup>36</sup> * ὅτι ἐξ αὐτοῦ καὶ δι' αὐτοῦ καὶ εἰς αὐτὸν τὰ πάντα· αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας! ἀμήν.

XII. 1 * Παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, διὰ τῶν οἰκτιρμῶν mere permissive act of God must here be understood; but that the Apostle is speaking of the Divine arrangement, by which the guilt of sin, and the mercy of God, were alike made manifest. Accordingly, whatever be the nature of the metaphor (perhaps a military one, as Dr. Peile thinks), the sense is, 'God hath shut up, involved in, subjected, all to the same predicament of unbelief: but how? ἵνα τοὺς π. ἐλεήσῃ, (only) that he may have mercy upon them all'—i. e. 'the whole of them.' See the able note of Calv., who, inter alia, observes, 'Non intelligit (Apostolus) Deum ita excusare omnes homines, ut sit illi imputanda eorum incredulitas, sed ita sua Providentia dispensasse, ut omnes incredulitatis rei essent, quo eos haberet iudicio suo obnoxios: atque in hunc quidem finem, ut salus a sola sua bonitate cœset, sepulcis meritis omnibus.'

<sup>33</sup>—<sup>35</sup>. Filled with a deep sense of human demerit, and Divine mercy and wisdom, to which the foregoing considerations, from v. 29 to 32, had guided his mind, the Apostle concludes the doctrinal part of the Epistle by breaking forth into admiration at the unfathomable depth and infinite abundance of the wisdom and mercy of God, evinced in making first the rejection of the Jews a means of calling the Gentiles, and then working upon the contumacious Jews by his mercy shown to the Gentiles. On this noble epiphonema, one of the sublimest to be found even in the Holy Scripture itself, comp. Pa. xxvi. 6. Job xi. 7, 8. v. 9. xxvi. 22, 23. Jer. xlii. 18. Isa. xl. 13—15.

<sup>33</sup>. βάθος πλούτου καὶ σοφίας, &c.] Here (as Chrys., Theophyl., and others have shown) πλούτος is merely intensive of βάθος, and stands for πλούσιος. Comp. Eph. iii. 8, and Phil. iv. 19, where πλούτος means, as in the present passage, not riches, but abundant goodness and grace. Similarly it is said, Plato, Euthyd. 13, τρυφᾷ ἐν πλούτῳ τῆς σοφίας. Prof. Hodge thinks it probable that the Apostle meant to express different ideas by the terms σοφίας and γνώσεως, because both these attributes are wonderfully displayed in the work of redemption of which he had been speaking,—'all-comprehending knowledge,' which surveyed all the objects of this work, all the necessities and circumstances of their being, all the means requisite for the accomplishment of the Divine purpose, and all the results of those means from the beginning to the end. Infinite wisdom, in selecting and adapting the means to the object in view, in the ordering of the whole scheme of Creation, Providence, and Redemption; so that the glory of God and the happiness of his creatures are, and are to be, wonderfully promoted.

—ὡς ἀνεξερεύνητα τὰ κρίματα αὐτοῦ] By τὰ κρίματα understand the decisions, purposes, and decrees of God's providence; and by αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ, the ways by which his purposes are carried into effect. The Apostle means to say, that his wisdom and ways are far above their comprehension; and 'will they take upon themselves to counsel him?' For such is the import of ver. 34.

These words are partly formed on Pa. xxvi. 6, (Sept.) τὰ κρίματά σου ὥστε ἄβυσσος πολλῇ, and Pa. lxxvi. 19, (Sept.) ἐν τῇ θαλάσῃ ἡ ὁδὸς σου, καὶ αἱ τρίβοι σου ἐν ὕδασι πολλοῖς, καὶ τὰ ἴχνη σου οὐ γνωσθήσονται. The utter incompetency of the human intellect to the searching or finding out the way, plans, and purposes of God, was distinctly seen, and sometimes freely acknowledged, by the ancient heathen philosophers. So Iophon. ap. Stob. Eclog. l. ii. 1, p. 11, Heeren, ἐπιστάμαι δὲ καὶ τὰδ', οὐσά περ γυνή, 'Ὅς μᾶλλον ὅστις εἰδῖναι τὰ τῶν θεῶν ζητεῖ, τοσούτῳ μᾶλλον ἥσσαν ἴσται.

<sup>35</sup>. 'This verse must,' as Dr. Peile observes, 'be taken as one continuous sentence.' 'Or who hath first given to him, and it shall'—for 'who hath first given to him, that it should—be given to him again?' (a sentiment probably suggested by Job xli. 11, 'Who hath done me any services, that I may recompense him?') 'Here,' observes Bp. Terrot, 'the Apostle recurs to what may be considered the fundamental doctrine of the Epistle,—Justification by grace; and with it he closes the doctrinal part of the Epistle,—having abundantly proved that, if either Jew or Gentile be saved, it is entirely of grace, not of works; neither of them having done any thing for God, in return for which they could claim Salvation.'

<sup>36</sup>. This verse is suspended upon a negative clause, involved in the interrogation of the preceding one; i. e. [Surely no one;] for of Him, &c., and consequently he may dispose of all according to his sovereign will. The substance of the verse may be thus paraphrased: 'For from him, as their original Creator, all things are derived; through him, as their continual Governor and Preserver, all things consist and subsist, are upheld and preserved; and to him, as their ultimate end, all things and all actions tend, and terminate; so as to contribute to his praise and glory, illustrate his perfections, and finally accomplish his wise and benevolent purposes. Let, then, his majesty, wisdom, and

a ch. 2. 9.
Gal. 2. 22.

b Job 11. 7.
Pa. 26. 6.

c Pa. 92. 6.
Isa. 4. 18.

d Jer. 23. 18.
Wisd. 9. 13.

e Cor. 2. 10.
d Job 41. 11.

f Prov. 16. 4.
1 Cor. 8. 6.

g Col. 1. 16.
a 2 Cor. 10. 1.

ch. 6. 13, 16.
19.

1 Pet. 2. 8.
Pa. 90. 13, 14.

b Eph. 4. 23.
& 5. 10, 17.
1 Thess. 4. 3.
Col. 3. 10.
1 John 2. 15.
1 Cor. 12. 7, 11. Eph. 4. 7.

goodness be magnified and adored for ever!
Amen.'

XII. Having now completed the doctrinal and argumentative part of his Epistle, the Apostle proceeds, in conclusion, to the practical; urging, for the benefit of both the Jewish and the Gentile converts, exhortations, founded on the doctrines laid down, to the moral duties of justified Christians. First, he inculcates the duties of believers generally, of whatever rank or degree, station or dignity (ch. xii.). Secondly, he treats of the political or social duties of Christians, such as are to be observed with respect to their superiors, their equals, and themselves (ch. xiii.). Thirdly, he treats of private duties, economical and ceremonial, such as are to be observed by Christians in their social intercourse with each other, especially towards those who have not hitherto been convinced, or are as yet weak in the faith (ch. xiv.—xvi.). This chapter consists of two parts, of which Part I. (vv. 1—8) treats of piety towards God, and of the proper estimate and use to be made of the various gifts and offices employed or exercised in the Church. Part II. (vv. 9—21) relates to Christian love, and its various manifestations towards different classes of persons. As the sum and substance of all that has been said of the justification, sanctification, and salvation of men is,—that these results are to be attributed, not to human merits, but to the mercy of God, in Christ, the Apostle brings the whole discussion to bear as a motive for devotedness of spirit, and consecration of heart and life, unto God, the Author of these mercies.

1. παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς, &c.] The οὖν conclusive, which ushers in the subsequent exhortation, may be referred to the whole of the above doctrinal discussions, but chiefly to the latter part of chap. xi.—and, as appears from the words διὰ τῶν οὐκτιμῶν τοῦ Θεοῦ, espec. to vv. 31, 32, and 35, 36; q. d. 'Such being the case, and espec. such being the compassion of God towards sinful man, and the provision made for their acceptance through the Beloved,' &c. The Apostle commences with earnestly exhorting them to lead a life worthy of such great and unspeakable mercies and benefits, by presenting their bodies to God a living sacrifice, as opposed to the dead ones under the Law,—and holy, in opposition to external and legal ones, acceptable to God,—in allusion to the selection of the victims for sacrifice; which, in order to be acceptable to God, were required to be immaculate.

One cannot but remark, that almost every expression here (espec. παραστήσαι for προσφέρειν,—a sacrificial metaphor, on which see my Lex.), as in 1 Pet. ii. 5, is borrowed from the Λατρεία of the Old Test., under which the animals presented and devoted to God were required to be free from all blemish of body; in accommodation to which figurative comparison the terms τὰ σώματα are employed, instead of ὑμᾶς αὐτοὺς (comp. supra vi. 13, τὰ μέλη); thus meaning to intimate, that, under the New Covenant, a spiritual sacrifice is required, by the

τοῦ Θεοῦ, παραστήσαι τὰ σώματα ὑμῶν θυσίαν ζώσαν, ἁγίαν, εὐάρεστον τῷ Θεῷ, τὴν λογικὴν λατρείαν ὑμῶν. <sup>2</sup> b Καὶ μὴ

offering of 'ourselves, body, and soul, and spirit, unto God.' See 1 Cor. vi. 20. 1 Thess. v. 23. Perhaps, however, the term σώματα may have been employed to intimate that devoted obedience which we owe to the Lord, as being 'not our own, but bought with a price;' and the expression may be best explained, with Hyper., to advert to the corporeal and external actions, with all the powers of the mind which have their seat in the organs of the body; for it is the regulation of the actions, and the desires which govern action, that is here meant, and not merely the regulating the mind, or soul. And so Tholuck; who remarks, that the expression is so used, because the body is the organ of practical activity; which practical activity is to be dedicated to God's service. However, I do not disapprove, though I cannot embrace, the view of Olsh., De Wette, and Alf., that 'the term is meant to indicate, that the sanctification of Christian life is to extend to that part of man's nature, which is especially under the bondage of sin.' But would not that sense require the Singular—τὸ σῶμα? On the full force of θυσίαν here see Theophyl., Theodor., and Œcumen., who are chiefly indebted to Chrys. It is plain that ζῶσαν θυσίαν is here opposed to the Levitical sacrifices, which might be styled 'dead,' as consisting of slain animals. The Apostle means to intimate, that our Great Sacrifice having been slain for us, and remission of sins obtained (see Heb. x. 12, 14), we need not be offered to God, by the blood-shedding of slain animals, but as living sacrifices. Several examples of this figurative use of the sacrificial term θυσία are adduced by Carp., which he introduces by the remark, 'Ita variis in locis Philo docuit, homines pios ac integros esse ipsos prestare victimas oportere Summo Numini. Nam delectari Deum sancta et sincera mente offerentis, ac spiritu ad virtutes omnis generis composito.' Of the passages he adduces, the most appropriate are, p. 669, ε, ἡ γὰρ ἀληθὴς ἱεροσυνία τίς ἄν εἴη, πλὴν ψυχῆς θεοφιλοῦς εὐσέβεια; p. 638, where, tracing the symbolical and allegorical sense of holocausts, he says, that God is not so much pleased with holocausts, as τῷ πῶ καθ' ὅλον ἀμείνωνι ἄνθρωπῳ, ὃς ἀμνηστὸν ὢν καὶ καθάρθεις, καθάρθαι ταῖς ἀρεταῖς τιλείται. Αὐτὸς ἐστὶν ἡ εὐαρεστιά τῇ θυσίᾳ, καὶ ὅλη δι' ὅλων εὐάρεστος τῷ Θεῷ. He then proceeds to adduce, p. 846, B, of the Nuzirai, αὐτοὺς ἀνατιθίσει καὶ καθιερύσιν. He then goes on to say, that Philo mentions the Essenes as serving God most religiously; and affirms that they did not offer victims in sacrifice, 'sed suas mentes composuisse ad hostias sanctas.' The words are, ἐν τοῖς μάλιστα θαρπεύνται Θεοῦ γάρουσαι, οὐ ζῶα καταθύοντες, ἀλλ' ἱεροπρεπείας τὰς ἑαυτῶν ἀνοίας κατασκευάζειν ἀξιοῦντες: where I suspect that Philo wrote καθ' ἡγίαν, and that the text rec. arose from some stupid marginal gloss. Carp. then adds, 'Illum ipsum confirmat Flav. Josephus, Antt. xviii. i. 5, εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν ἀναθήματα τε (read γε, 'saltum') στέλλοντες, θυσίας οὐκ ἐπιτελοῦσι διαφορέτητι ἀγνίων ὡς νομίζουσιν (by reason of the συσχηματίζεσθε τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ· ἀλλὰ μεταμορφοῦσθε τῇ ἀνακαιώσει τοῦ νοὸς ὑμῶν, ° εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν ὑμᾶς τί τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ, τὸ ἀγαθὸν καὶ εὐάρεστον καὶ τέλειον. 3<sup>a</sup> Λέγω γάρ, διὰ τῆς χάριτος τῆς δοθείσης μοι, παντὶ τῷ ὄντι ἐν ὑμῖν, μὴ

o Pa. 24. 2.
Eph. 2. 10.
1st Pet. 2. 2.
Col. 3. 12.
1 Thess. 4. 2.
d ch. 1. 6.
1 Cor. 3. 10.
Prov. 26. 27.

superiority of the lustrations, which they customarily used; and then he adds, ἐφ' ἑαυτῶν τὰς θυσίας ἐπιτελοῦσι, where ἐφ' ἑαυτ. means 'apud seipsos,' equiv. to 'in seipsis.'

— τῇ λογικῇ λατρίᾳ ὑμ. ] The expression is in apposition, whether with θυσίαν, or, as Alf. supposes, with the whole sentence, is immaterial; since the only point of importance is, to ascertain the sense, much debated, of the epithet λογικῇ. By Theodor., Erasim., Beza, Grot., Hamm., Mackn., and others, it is explained rational, having reason; as opposed to the sacrifice of animals destitute of reason; and so Cyril of Alex. Homil. Pasch. xxii. p. 273, λογικῇ λατρίᾳ τὴν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου καλεῖ καθήκοντι, ἀντιπαρῆξιν (comparing) τὸ χρῆμα ταῖς κατὰ νόμον θυσίαις; while the ancients generally, and, of the moderns, Est., Mede, Wets., Carpz., Koppe, and Rosenm. explain it 'spiritual, offered up with the spirit and heart,' as opposed to lifeless rites and ceremonies. However, I rather agree with Prof. Stuart, Dr. Peile, and Mr. Alford, that λογικῇ is opposed to σαρκ., as used in Heb. vii. 16.—a mere external service, such as the Jews offered and relied on for salvation. Comp. similar figurative language in Philo, t. ii. 254, τὸ καθαρότατον τοῦ θέντος πνεῦμα λογικόν. Thus it will denote 'rational and spiritual service,' such as is the service of rational creatures, offered to the great Source of all reason, and by which it is required that we should 'worship him in spirit and in truth.' See John iv. 24. However, the allusion can be but indirect and secondary; for it is not so much rational worship and spiritual affections that are here had in view, as the sacrifice of the heart, and the consecration of the life, by bringing not only every action, but every thought, into captivity to the obedience of Christ. Comp. 1 Cor. vi. 20. 1 Thess. v. 23. This is ably evinced by Hyper., and espec. by Calv., who says that these words were added, in order the better to explain and confirm the preceding; q. d. 'Exhibete vos in sacrificium Deo, si Deum colere in animo habetis: nam hic est legitimus colendi Dei ritus, a quo qui discedunt, perversi sunt cultores.' This view is confirmed by the next words, μὴ συσχηματίζεσθε—ἀλλὰ μεταμορφοῦσθε, which must refer to action and conduct.

2. The two verbs συσχ. und μεταμ. are not Passive, but Midd. Reflex., in a reciprocal sense; q. d. 'Do not conform yourselves, but transform yourselves,—through a transformation.' An example of συσχ., followed by πρὸς τὸν βίον, is adduced from Plat. Vit. Num. § 20. Here, then, the Apostle intimates how the end of the above admonition may be attained,—namely, by seeking that transformation of the heart, which will alone regulate the actions. Μεταμορφ. is a strong expression, denoting 'complete transformation,' whether physical or mental. In the latter sense, the term implies 'a thorough renewal of the mind.' So Seneca, Epist. vi. (cited by Grotius) says, 'Sentio non emendari me tantum.' Vol. II.

tum, sed transfigurari.' Here, of course, it means the transformation of the soul into the image of Christ from glory to glory (see 2 Cor. iii. 18), by such a renovation of the mind and affections, as can be effected alone by the aids of the Holy Spirit co-operating with our own zealous endeavours, as implied in the use of the Imperative Hortative (as oft., particularly in the Sermon on the Mount), by way of impressiveness; which, however, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. are pleased to change into the Infinitive (as suspended on the παρακαλῶ at the beginning of the preceding verse), from A, D, F, G, and about 18 cursives: very insufficient authority; espec. since all the ancient Versions and Theodor. confirm the Imperative; and internal evidence is quite in its favour; for the Canon, of preferring the more difficult reading, does not apply in cases like this, where the reading may be ascribed to Itacism; as is the case here; for the uncials are all such as abound with Itacisms. And the same may be said of almost all the cursives. Of the only two Lamb. and Mus. MSS. which have the Infinitive, one absolutely swarms with Itacisms, and the other abounds in them. The same may be said of Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. It is no wonder that Lachm., who never collated, should not have been aware of this Itacism in αι, and of its perpetual recurrence. But that Tisch. should not have thought of it, is strange. But even non-collators, like Lachm. and Alf., might have learnt it, and its application here, from Dr. Mill.

2. εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν, &c.] q. d. 'in order that ye may prove by the above process; for, I say, &c.' Paul here seems to advert to the most remarkable results of this ἀνακαιώσεως τοῦ νοὸς: namely, the proving, trying, and approving what the will of God is (or what he would have us both believe and practise); what is good and acceptable to him, and perfect; i. e. fully such.

3—21. We have here some special injunctions, grounded on the foregoing general exhortation, couched in παρακαλῶ, and μὴ συσχημ.

3. Λέγω is to be construed with παντὶ τῷ, &c., in the sense, 'I charge every one that is among you [however high in station or favoured by spiritual gifts] not to think of, regard himself, above measure,—but to gauge himself soberly (suo modulo metiri, as says Horace), modestly, with due Christian humility, forming a just estimate of himself and his spiritual gifts.' That this idea of a modulus was present to the mind of the Apostle, is probable from the subjoined words, which signify, 'Let every one estimate himself according to the actual measure (exact degree) of faith and grace, or Christian knowledge, which has been imparted to him by God through the Holy Spirit.' See Eph. iv. 7, where the term employed, ἐμέρισα, is meant to inculcate modesty and humility, by the appropriate consideration, 'Who hath made him to differ by superiority?' Similarly as at 1 Cor. iv. 7, it is said, τί δὲ ἔχετε ὅντι ἴλασθε; To advert to some matters of phraseology.—The words δοι τῇς χάρι. τ. δ. μ., must not be confined to the ὑπερφρονεῖν παρ' ὃ δεῖ φρονεῖν, ἀλλὰ φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, ἐκάστῳ ὡς ὁ Θεὸς ἐμέρισε μέτρον πίστεως. <sup>4</sup> Καθάπερ γὰρ ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι μέλη πολλὰ ἔχομεν, τὰ δὲ μέλη πάντα οὐ τὴν αὐτὴν ἔχει πρᾶξιν. <sup>5</sup> οὕτως οἱ πολλοὶ ἐν σῶμά ἐσμεν ἐν Χριστῷ, † ὃ δὲ καθ' εἰς ἀλλήλων μέλη. <sup>6</sup> Ἐχόντες δὲ χαρίσματα κατὰ τὴν χάριν τὴν δοθεῖσαν ἡμῖν διάφορα· εἴτε προφητείαν,

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

1 Cor. 12, &c.

Apostolic office, but include the various gifts of the Spirit, which qualified St. Paul for the due discharge of its duties. In the words μη ὑπερφρονεῖν, &c., there is a paronomasia between φρονεῖν, ὑπερφρονεῖν, and σωφρονεῖν; of which several examples might be adduced from Thucyd. and other writers; ex. gr. Thucyd. ii. 62, μη φρονήματι μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ καταφρονήματι. Charondas, in Stob. Sent. 43, προσποιεῖσθαι δὲ ἵκαστος τῶν πολιτῶν σωφρονεῖν μάλλον ἢ φρονεῖν. With ὑπερφρονεῖν παρ' ὃ δεῖ φρονεῖν here comp. ὑπερφανὲς φρονεῖν, 2 Macc. ix. 12. In φρονεῖν εἰς τὸ σωφρονεῖν we have an acutè dictum per paronomasiam, as in the Pindaric φρονεῖν ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ: and it may be paralleled by what our great Epic Poet (Paradise Lost, vii. 20) calls the 'knowledge within bounds;' and the Apostle, as Hyper. thinks, means to intimate that the root of all error and discord is curious and arrogant wisdom.

— ἐκάστῳ ὡς for ὡς ἐκάστος, as at 1 Cor. iii. 5.—μέτρον πίστεως the ancient and many modern Expositors explain of the χαρίσματα at v. 6, the extraordinary gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit. So Eph. iv. 7, ἐνὶ δὲ ἐκάστῳ ἡμῶν ἰδὼν ἡ χάρις κατὰ τὸ μέτρον τῆς δωρεᾶς τοῦ Χριστοῦ. By others it is interpreted of the measure of religious faith and knowledge allotted to each. Both senses may, in some measure, be conjoined. So Carpz. well remarks: 'Μέτρον πίστεως est diversus gradus, ac portio diversæ, beneficiorum et gratiæ Dei, cognitionis Dei, ac donorum Spiritus Sancti, cum administrantium tum sanctificantium, quæ ille singulis distribuit ad commune bonum Ecclesiæ, uti vult. (1 Cor. xii. 4, 11.) Est sive amplior sive arctior mensuræ quantitas, notitia rerum divinarum, quæ Christianis piis unâ cum fide obtingit diversimodè, per unctionem Spiritus Sancti. (1 John ii. 27.)'

4, 5. In these verses we have the same comparison as that which occurs more at length in 1 Cor. xii., and for the same purpose. The object of the Apostle is in both cases the very same. He designs, by a familiar illustration of the subject,—from a comparison of the natural body with the body politic or social, to show that the diversity of offices and gifts among Christians, so far from being inconsistent with their union as one body in Christ, is necessary to the perfection and usefulness of that body. It would be, he intimates, as unreasonable for all Christians to have the same gifts as for all the members of the human frame to have the same office. The sense may be thus expressed: 'For just as in one body there are many members, but the members have not all the same functions: so we, the many (see 1 Cor. x. 17) [the members as a body, as distinguished from any individual thereof] are one body in Christ, considered as the Head of the whole society, but we are each one (for εἰς ἕκαστος καθ' ἑαυτόν, each individually) members one of another,' i. e. are mutually members of the same body. In ὃ δὲ καθ' etc we have an anomalous idiom (found also at 3 Macc. v. 34) for οἱ καθ' ἑαυτοῦ, or εἰς ἕκαστος καθ' ἑαυτόν. As to the reading τὸ, found in several of the most ancient MSS., and received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., it may be the true reading. Internal evidence seems to be in its favour, and, though the formula is yet more anomalous, yet it may be accounted for, and could not arise from an error of the scribes.

6. Having hinted at the liability of new converts to be puffed up with the spiritual gifts which might be dealt out to them, the Apostle proceeds to lay down rules for the exercise of such gifts; and, accordingly, "in this and the following verses we have the application of the preceding comparison to the special object in view. 'If Christians are all members of the same body, having different offices and gifts; instead of being puffed up one above another, and instead of envying and opposing one another, they should severally discharge their respective duties, diligently and humbly, for the good of the whole, and not for their own advantage. There is no appearance of systematic arrangement in this passage; on the contrary, Paul seems to refer, without any order, to the various duties which the officers, and even private members, of the Church were called upon to perform.' (Hodge.)

— ἔχοντες δὲ χαρίσματα, &c.] The construction in this and the verses following is anomalous. Ἐχόντες may best be regarded as a Nominativus pendens, to be taken at each member ἀπὸ κοινοῦ, its sense being adapted to circumstances. At any rate, the general intent of the Apostle is clear, which is to excite his readers to the zealous exercise of the gifts of the Spirit; so, however, that those who enjoyed the higher kinds should not interfere with one another; see ver. 8, and 1 Cor. xii. 4, seq.

— εἴτε προφητεῖαν] Supply ἔχει, ἔχοντες αὐτήν, or ἔχοντες, ἔχομεν. On the nature of this προφητεῖα there has been no little discussion. Yet, still, considerable darkness hangs over the subject. The reader may profitably consult Prof. Hodge's annotation, where he shows, at large, that the term was applied to all classes of religious teachers under the Old Dispensation. See Gen. xx. 7. Deut. xviii. 18, and especially Exod. iv. 16; and that this is the sense of the word in the New Test. is plain from Matt. x. 41. xiii. 57. Luke iv. 24. vii. 26—29. John iv. 19. Acts xv. 32. 1 Cor. xii. 28. xiv. 29—32. 'From these (says he) and numerous similar passages it appears, that the prophets in the Christian Church were men who spake under the immediate influence of the Spirit of God, and delivered some divine communication relating to doctrinal truths, to present duties, to κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως ἡ εἶτε διακονίαν, ἐν τῇ δια-<sup>h 1 Cor. 12.</sup>

 κονίᾳ· εἶτε ὁ διδάσκων, ἐν τῇ διδασκαλίᾳ·<sup>28.</sup> ἡ εἶτε ὁ παρακαλῶν,<sup>Eph. 4. 11.</sup> ἐν τῇ παρακλήσει· ὁ μεταδίδους, ἐν ἀπλότητι· ὁ προϊστάμενος,<sup>1 Pet. 4. 10,</sup> ἢ ὁ προϊστάμενος, καὶ ὁ ἐλεῶν.<sup>11.</sup> Acts 20. 28. 3 Cor. 9. 7. 1 Pet. 5. 2. 1 Tim. 5. 17.

future events, &c., as the case might be. The point of distinction between them and the Apostles considered as religious teachers appears to have been,—that the inspiration of the Apostles was abiding; they were the infallible and authoritative messengers of Christ; whereas the inspiration of the prophets was occasional and transient. The latter differed, again, from the teachers, inasmuch as these were not necessarily inspired, but taught to others what they themselves had learned from the Scriptures, or from inspired men.* As to the not a little debated expression, κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν, one thing is certain, that it is not to be understood, according to the acceptance in which it is used by Theological writers, of the general plan of revealed truth; nor ought it to be supposed to have reference to any article of faith; but it is, as Mackn. says, 'that extent and energy of inspiration which was bestowed upon spiritual men, and which is called 'each man's measure of faith,' ver. 3.

As to πίστις, there seems a reference to the various χρίσματα mentioned just after; and consequently πίστις here must carry with it an adjunct notion of the χάρις spoken of at v. 3. The general sense will then be: 'Let the Prophets speak in proportion as they have faith and grace imparted so to do.'

7. διακονίαν] The words διάκονος, διακονεῖν, and διακονία, though general terms, and used even of the Apostles themselves, are often in the New Test. taken of some certain specific office undertaken in the cause of the Christian religion (compare 1 Cor. xii. 5. 2 Cor. ix. 1), and exercised by those who did not so much employ themselves in explaining the doctrines of the Gospel, as in managing the external and temporal affairs of the Church and of individuals. On the kinds of Deacons, see Stu. Thea. i. 862, and Bingham's Eccles. Ant. ii. 20.

8. ὁ παρακαλῶν] There has been no little debate as to the respective senses of ὁ διδάσκων and ὁ παρακαλῶν, which some regard as meaning the same thing, while others take them to relate to different offices. It would seem that as ὁ προφητεύων is plainly distinguished both from ὁ διδάσκων and ὁ παρακαλῶν, so these two are also meant to be distinct. In what, however, the distinction consisted, it is not easy to say with certainty. It seems most probable that (as Stuart suggests) ὁ διδάσκων was an ordinary stated Teacher, who taught the doctrine of the Gospel according to the degree of religious knowledge which he possessed; while ὁ παρακαλῶν was an Exhorter, i. e. one who urged men to the practical duties, dwelt upon the promises and threatenings of the Gospel, and thus aided and completed the work which the διδάσκων had begun. Thus the expression will be equiv. to ἀντιλήψεις at 1 Cor. xii. 28.

On the next words, ὁ μεταδίδους—ἐν ἰλαρότητι, there is even yet greater diversity of opinion. Stuart is of opinion that by ὁ μεταδίδους, ὁ προϊστάμενος, and ὁ ἐλεῶν, the Apostle refers to private individuals in the Church, conspicuous for their attention to the duties respectively indicated by those words,—the management of the external temporal affairs of the Church, including the relief of the sick and poor. He truly remarks that the Commentators had gone upon an unfounded assumption, when they took for granted, rather than proved, that ὁ μεταδίδους, ὁ προϊστάμενος, and ὁ ἐλεῶν designate officers or offices in the Church. Vitringa, indeed, long ago saw that in the case of ὁ ἐλεῶν; and it is true of the other two, at least of μεταδίδους. And therefore to endeavour to draw any parallel with the gifts and offices stated by the Apostle at 1 Cor. xii. 28, is to needlessly embarrass the subject. It would seem that the scope of the words ὁ μεταδίδους—ἰλαρότητι is to give an admonition as well to the persons who exercised the gifts, as to those who discharged the offices above mentioned. According to this view, there can be no difficulty in referring ὁ ἐλεῶν to the διάκονος, with allusion to that alacrity so requisite in the due discharge of so onerous and invidious an office. As to the ὁ μεταδίδους and ὁ προϊστάμενος, they belong, I apprehend, both to the προφήται and the διδάσκαλοι, and have reference to the then two great divisions of the ministerial office,—namely, teaching and governing. Thus the two offices are mentioned apart at 1 Cor. xii. 28, and also at 1 Thess. v. 12, ἐρωτῶμεν ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, εἰδέναι τοὺς κοπιῶντας ἐν ὑμῖν, καὶ προϊσταμένους ὑμῶν ἐν Κυρίῳ, καὶ νοουσιτοῦντας ὑμᾶς, where the κοπ. is equivalent to the διδάσκ. in the present passage, and the καὶ νοουσιτοῦντας corresponds to the παρακαλ. here. This is confirmed by 1 Tim. v. 17, οἱ καλῶς προϊστάμενοι πρεσβύτεροι διπλῆς τιμῆς ἀξιοῦσθωσαν· μάλιστα οἱ κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ καὶ διδασκαλίᾳ, i. e. who were both προϊστάμενοι and διδάσκαλοι. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that in ὁ μεταδίδους the expression (which should be rendered, 'he who imparts') is quite as applicable to the communication of spiritual knowledge, as of worldly goods. So Rom. i. 11, ἵνα τί μεταδῶ χάρισμα ὑμῖν πνευματικόν. In this view, ἐν ἀπλότητι will mean, 'in simplicity and sincerity,' i. e. not δολῶν τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ. Thus far in my former Edd. On carefully reconsidering this puzzling term ὁ μεταδίδους, I am induced to acquiesce in the ancient, and the most eminent modern Expositors, that the impartment is to be confined to that of temporal goods, for the relief of the necessitous. But that leaves open the question, whether by the persons filling the department are to be understood Church functionaries, as Deacons, or private members of the Church; in other words, whether it is to be understood of distributing the alms of others, or of bestowing one's own worldly goods, so as to be κοινωνικοί. 1 Tim. vi. 18, and thus referring to the private acts of Christian benevolence. Prof. Hodge unites both; dwelling, however, principally on the former. But this is liable to four objections, which I have urged in my Supplement. Volume. Suffice it here to say, that it seems the safest view to understand it in the latter sense only (one frequently found in

11 1 Pet. i. 22. ἐν σπουδῇ ὁ ἐλεῶν, ἐν ἰλαρότητι. 9 1 Ἡ ἀγάπη, ἀνυπόκριτος
 Ps. 50. 4. ἀποστύγοντες τὸ πονηρὸν, κολλώμενοι τῷ ἀγαθῷ. 10 κ τῇ φιλ-& 97. 10.
 Amos 5. 15. 1 Pet. i. 22. & 2. 17. 9 Pet. i. 7.
 1 Pet. 4. 8.
 κ Heb. 13. 1. Phil. 2. 3. 1 Pet. i. 22. & 2. 17. 9 Pet. i. 7.

the Class. and Hellenistic Greek writers) of 'an open-hearted and liberal impartment of our goods for the relief of the necessitous;' as in 2 Cor. viii. 2. iv. 11, 13. This has been shown by Prof. Stuart, in his able Excursus on the passage, where he remarks, that, 'apart from the antecedent improbability of ὁ μεταδίδους being (as it is generally explained) "the person who collected the alms of the Church, and distributed them among the poorer Christians,"—for was not this precisely ὁ διάκωνος, already mentioned?'—and if ὁ προϊστάμενος, the preceding officer, being placed here sixth among the public functionaries, μεταδίδοναι properly means 'to give of one's own to others' (whereas 'to distribute' is διαδίδοναι, Luke xviii. 22. John vi. 11. Acts iv. 35). Thus it will mean some distributors, whether under the Deacons or not is uncertain. There is more difficulty as to the sense of ὁ προϊστάμενος. Stuart, Peile, and Meyer, take it of 'the patronage of strangers, by a sort of free hospitality,' or generally of 'the helping of those that are in need, or under any necessity requiring aid of any kind.' Comp. xvi. 2, προστάτις πολλῶν ἰγνυμένη, and the preceding context. This they confirm from Theophyl., whose words are,—προϊστασθαι ἵστι τὸ βοηθεῖν καὶ διὰ ῥημάτων καὶ διὰ τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ τῷ βοηθείας διομένῃ, where Stuart rightly renders προϊστασθαι by to aid, and διὰ ῥημάτων by words. But that produces a very vague and jejune sense; and, consequently, the passage does not fully establish the interpretation for which it is adduced. Of this Dr. Peile seems quite aware; and, to parry the difficulty, he renders διὰ ῥημάτων 'by pleadings;' comparing the duties of the Latin Patronus. But I cannot find the slightest authority for such a sense of ῥῆμα; and, doubting not that the word is corrupt, I propose the mild emendation χρημάτων, which will make all right; and thus the sense of the words will be, 'both by his worldly means, and by his personal aid and service.' The correctness of the emendation is placed beyond doubt by the words following, where Theophyl. remarks, that, "since the Apostle has spoken about the imparting of worldly goods, περί μεταδόσεως χρημάτων, and since all do not abound in these, (have not these means,) he now exhorts: προϊστασο ἄλλως, ὡς δύνασαι, καὶ βοηθεῖ τοῖς χρῆζουσιν: ἀλλ' ἐν σπουδῇ,—but (so that it be done) with zeal and forwardness." Stuart, Peile, and Meyer, might have confirmed this interpretation from Chrys., who decidedly adopts this view of προϊστ., as appears from his words,—ἐάν ταύτην (scil. ἀγάπην ἀνυπόκριτον) οὐ δαπάνης ἀσθήσης χρημάτων, οὐ πόνου σωμάτων (I conjecture σώματος) καὶ ἐν ῥήμασι καὶ ἐν λόγῳ, and then αἰτᾷται προστάσιον μετὰ σπουδῆς. On the whole, I regard this interpretation of Chrys. as presenting the true sense intended by the Apostle. And should this be adopted by future Expositors, I would propose a yet surer emendation of the words of Theophyl., by reading διὰ χρημάτων καὶ διὰ ῥημάτων. Thus by the repeated διὰ the intermediate words χρημάτων καὶ were lost, though called for by the context, and confirmed by Chrys. That this must have been the view (and not that of Presidency) taken by Theodor. is plain from his interpretation, however brief,—μετὰ ἐπιτάσεως πάντα νομοθετεῖ, καὶ τὴν κηδεμονίαν σπουδαίαν εἶναι καλεῖται. That Œcumen. and Photius so understood the term, is plain from the words καὶ προϊστασθαι μὴ ἀμιλῶς, ἀλλ' ὡς ὑπὲρ ἑαυτοῦ σπουδάζοντα. If this be the true view of the sense, it will prove that the last of the clauses, ὁ ἐλεῶν ἐν ἰλαρότητι must not be taken, as it generally has been, of any Church office; q. d. 'Almoner,' as Vitringa long ago objected to, but any and every private Christian who practises the Christian duty in question; and it is frivolous to distinguish, as Stuart does, the difference between the benevolence practised by the ὁ μεταδίδους and the ὁ ἐλεῶν. As to the latter, it is best taken in the most general sense, including the bestowment of whatever may in any way help those who are in any need, or necessity, whether from poverty, or sickness, or a state of destitution generally, according to the full extent of what is meant in such passages of the Old Test. here in the Apostle's mind, as Prov. xix. 17, δανίζει Θεῷ ὁ ἐλεῶν πτωχόν, and xiv. 21, ἐλεῶν πτωχοῦς μακαριστός, and xxiii. 8, τῷ ἐλεῶντι πτωχοί.

9. Now follow the private virtues to be cultivated by all Christians; of which ἀγάπη denotes the Christian philanthropy described at 1 Cor. xiii. 1—8. I would, however, not here commence, as is usually done, a new Section, but connecting the injunction ἡ ἀγάπη ἐν. with the preceding ὁ μεταδίδους ἰλαρότητι, would point, with R. Stephens in his Ed. O mirificam: ἐν ἰλαρότητι ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος ἀποστύγοντες, as in Engl. Version thus, 'cheerfulness: let love be without dissimulation. Abhor, &c. Or, at any rate, I would not separate them by division of Section; for, as Estius remarks, 'que sequuntur, ut omnibus communia sunt, ita formā a septem superioribus differunt.' This difference, then, made the Editors commence a new Section; though the communis before spoken of should have forbidden it. The term ἀνυπόκρ. is meant to denote that 'every such kind of private benevolence, as that just spoken of, is to be unfeigned, is not to be the mere acting of a part, is to be what it seems, and not issuing from constraint.'

—ἀποστύγοντες, &c.] The construction here and in the following verses is very irregular, and like that at Heb. xiii. 5. To take the Participles, with Koppe and others, for Verbs, is explaining nothing. It is better to suppose an anastrophe, the Participles being used as if suspended on some Verb which occurred in the preceding sentence. Had the Apostle written ἀγαπᾷτε ἀνυπόκριτως, the construction would have been regular. The terms ἀποστύγ. and κολλώμενοι are very strong; the former signifying, as Theophyl. explains, ἐκ ψυχῆς μισοῦντες; and the latter denoting 'the closest cleaving to, adhering to, the practice of what is good.' So κολλ., is used (after the Heb. צרף) in 2 Kings iii. 3, τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ Ἰσραὴλ—ἐκολλήθη, καὶ οὐκ

ἀδελφία εἰς ἀλλήλους φιλόστοργοι, τῇ τιμῇ ἀλλήλους προηγούμενοι, <sup>11</sup> τῇ σπουδῇ μὴ ὀκηνηροί, τῷ πνεύματι ζέοντες, τῷ * Κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες <sup>12</sup> τῇ ἐλπίδι χαίροντες, τῇ θλίψει ὑπομένοντες, τῇ προσευχῇ προσκαρτεροῦντες <sup>13</sup> ταῖς χρείαις τῶν

1 Rev. & 15.
m ch. 8. 2.
1 Thes. 5.
16, 17.
Col. 4. 2.
Heb. 10. 32.
Luke 12. 1.
Eph. 6. 18.
1 Cor. 16. 1.
Heb. 12. 2, 16.
1 Pet. 4. 9.

ἀπίστη αὐτῆς, 'adhered to,' 'continued in the practice,' 'holding fast the practice.' It is a Hellenistic term, from the pure Greek ἀπ-ί-σθαι, found in the New Test.

10. τῇ φιλαδελφία — φιλόστοργοι] Sub. ὄντες. From philadelphía the Apostle rises to something higher, and exhorts them to be φιλόστοργοι τῇ φιλαδελφίᾳ, where τῇ φιλ. is a Dative of instrument, denoting the mōdō in which they ought to be φιλόστοργοι. Φιλόστοργος (a word confined to the later Classical writers) is properly used of the natural affection subsisting between parents and children; but it is also employed to denote tender affection generally.

— τῇ τιμῇ ἀλλήλους προηγ.] The force of this injunction has, I apprehend, been mistaken by those, as Dr. Burton, who understand it—by each thinking the other his superior—of humility, which surely would be here out of place, even if in itself practicable; besides, that it would require προτιμῶντες, as Dr. Peile remarks. I cannot, however, admit his version, 'tying with each other in showing deference,' since it cannot be extracted from the words without violence. In short, the Apostle seems to have meant the reciprocal duty which we owe one to another, in the various orders of civil society, of setting an example of rendering honour where it is due. So H. Steph. Thes. in v. προηγ. 'alius alii suo exemplo præsumit in honore deferendo:' q. d. thus promoting the maintenance of due subordination, and good order, in society. The above interpretation of προηγ. is confirmed by Chrys. and Theophyl., and is adopted by Prof. Hodge.

11. τῇ σπουδῇ—ζέοντες] Expositors are not agreed whether the two clauses, τῇ σκ. μὴ ὀκ. and τ. πν. ζ. are to be regarded as containing separate and independent injunctions, or as belonging to each other, and connected together. Of those who regard them in the former light, some suppose τῇ σπουδῇ μὴ ὀκν. to contain an admonition to diligence in their worldly callings; q. d. 'not slothful to business.' But, surely, that would suppose the sense to be very imperfectly developed. It should rather seem that the words τῇ σπουδῇ—ζέοντες are closely connected together, and are not an independent admonition, but merely meant to strengthen some other with which they are connected in the context. Thus Koppe and others refer them to the admonition following, τῷ Κυρίῳ δουλ., of course understanding σπουδῇ of spiritual concerns. But it is far more natural to refer the words to what precedes, and suppose them intended to mark the manner in which the foregoing duties, of brotherly love and kindly attention, should be performed; namely, with 'zeal and promptitude'; as elsewhere in the New Test. See my Lex. If it be asked how σπουδῇ can be ὀκηνηρό, we may answer (with Crellius), that though no one can be diligently slothful, or slothfully diligent, yet 'eadem orationis formā, in tradendis illis præceptis, uti voluit Apostolus, et in hoc quidem præcepto contrarium per contrarium illustrare.'

In determining the import of the words following, τῷ Κυρίῳ δουλεύοντες, the reading has first to be settled. And here Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. coincide with Scholz in restoring Κυρίῳ for καιρῷ, which, as I have shown at large had, on very insufficient grounds, been edited by Griesbach. I doubt not that Κυρίῳ is the genuine reading, as being more in the manner of St. Paul. And it is only requisite to advert to the scope of the words τῷ Κυρίῳ δουλ. to discover the great propriety of Κυρίῳ. Now it was well seen by Chrys. and Theophyl. of the ancients, and by Calv., Hyper., Whitby, Wetst., and all the best modern Expositors, that the words are not meant to inculcate an independent and general precept (as the ancient Critics, who altered the word, fancied), but to enforce the injunctions foregoing, to brotherly love and kindly attention, on the ground that whatever should be done, would be done unto the Lord, and would be rewarded by him. See Matt. x. 40—42.

12. τῇ ἐλπίδι χαίροντες, &c.] The scope of these words has been variously understood. It would seem that they have no connexion with the preceding context, but treat on a separate subject,—the bearing up under affliction by the power of hope, and the support and comfort of earnest prayer.—προσκαρτ. is a very strong term, occurring also in Acts i. 14. vi. 4. This absolute use of ὑπομένω is found also at Matt. x. 22. 2 Tim. ii. 12. James v. 11, perhaps followed on Dan. xii. 12, μακάριοι οἱ ὑπομένοντες.

13. ταῖς χρείαις—διώκοντες.] Here is enjoined charity to the poorer Christians, and hospitality to strangers, espec. as we may well suppose, to preachers of the Gospel (see Heb. xiii. 2); a kindness which the want of inns, and their utter abandonment by their former connexions, would make particularly acceptable.—διώκ. is a strong term, which may be rendered, 'studiously cultivating.'

For χρεῖαις, D, F, G have μνηαῖς, a reading also noticed by several Fathers, which Alf. pronounces 'a correction introduced, hardly accidentally (i. e. purposely), in favour of martyrs, by commemoration.' I cannot agree with him. He gives not a single example of μνηαῖς as used for such commemoration of martyrs. Considering the character of MSS. F and G, fellow-copies of the same original, and swarming with Itacisms, and with blunders of the scribes innumerable, I suspect that the reading did not arise from priestly roguery, but simply from the error of the scribe of the Archetype, who read χρ. as μν., the letters being often confounded. He might well do this from being probably well acquainted with the use of the word, to denote 'the charitable contributions made at the anniversaries of deceased Christians out of the property left by the deceased, in the form of dolēs,' to which it is probable that the friends of the deceased contributed when necessary (μνηαῖς χάρις), and to do honour to the deceased. See o Matt. 5. 44.

Luke 6. 28.
1 Cor. 4. 12.
1 Pet. 3. 9.
p. Ecclus. 7.
34.
q 1 Cor. 1.
10.
Phil. 2. 2.
1 Pet. 3. 3.
Ps. 131. 1.
Prov. 2. 7.
Isa. 5. 21. ch. 11. 25.

ἀγίων κοινωνοῦντες, τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες. 14 Ὁ Εὐλογεῖτε τοὺς διώκοντας ὑμᾶς· εὐλογεῖτε, καὶ μὴ καταρᾶσθε. 15 Ὁ Χαίρειν μετὰ χαιρόντων, καὶ κλαίειν μετὰ κλαίωντων. 16 Ὁ Τὸ αὐτὸ εἰς ἀλλήλους φρονούντες· μὴ τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονούντες, ἀλλὰ τοῖς ταπεινοῖς συναπαγόμενοι. μὴ γίνεσθε φρόνιμοι παρ' ἑαυτοῖς.

Constit. Apost. I. viii. 42. How the reading came into the MS. D may be easily imagined, since there is a perpetual coincidence in readings between D, F, G, which prob. arose from the same original. From that source, too, the reading μυσταῖς crept into the Italic Version, and even into the most ancient copy of the Vulg. (occasionally retaining the Italic readings), and the Latin Fathers.

14. After treating of brotherly love, the Apostle, in the verses following, up to the end of the Chapter (which are closely connected together, and mark the duties of Christians under the injuries of enemies), inculcates good will even towards enemies, and an entire abstinence from all vindictive feelings towards them, and the cultivation of concord and peace with all men. The terms εὐλογ. and καταρ. are of the strongest kind; and the emphasis, arising from the same thing being expressed affirmatively and negatively, imparts no little energy to the sentiment, which is evidently founded on our Lord's saying in the Sermon on the Mount; which, as Tholuck truly observes, must have been sufficiently well known to Paul, as well as to Peter and James, since in the references among the New Test. Epistles to the direct words of Christ there occur several in the Epistles of James and Peter, but only one besides this in those of Paul,—i. e. 1 Cor. vii. 10.

15. χαίρειν] There is no ellipsis of δαί. There may be a use of Infinit. for Imperat. But, as several Imperatives precede and follow, the intermixture of an Infinit., though a falling off from the construction, cannot injure the sense. And as to impropriety or inelegance, I find it used in the Greek Poets. But to turn from Grammatical questions to matters of more moment. These words, of which many examples of similar import are adduced by Wetst., inculcate a sympathizing spirit, or fellow-feeling, alike in the sorrows and in the joys of those with whom we have to do. If it be real and genuine, both the sorrows of the afflicted are lightened, and the joys of the joyful are heightened; for, as respects the former, it cannot be doubted that (as Dr. A. Clarke observes) 'a man may by sympathy receive into his own affectionate feelings a measure of the distress of his friend; and his friend find himself relieved in the same proportion as the friend has entered into his grief. And to the latter the joy is alike increased by its being really participated in by another.' Why such is the case it may be not easy to say; but the thing is, to a certain degree, accounted for, from the feeling of one party being by sympathy nicely adapted to that of the other, without any misplaced attempt to raise the spirits of the afflicted by an appearance of hilarity, any thing but in unison with 'the spirit of heaviness.' On this an ancient writer, Philemon, fr. ii. p. 822 (Mein.), has touched in a passage of exquisite pathos and beauty: Οἶμος τὸ λυπεῖσθαι γάρ ἐπὶ τὸ ῥῆμ' ἄγει· Τοῦτ' εὐθύς, ὡς ἴοικε, τὸν λυπούμενον. Λυπούμενος δ' ὅταν τις ἀκούσθαι λίγη Χαῖρ', ἐξ ἀνάγκης οὐτος οἰκώγειν λίγηι. The propriety of addressing consolation seasonably and judiciously is well pointed out by Plut. de Discr. Amic. et Adul. § 17: οὐκ οἶδ' ὅπως οἱ πολλοὶ τὰς μὲν ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀτυχήμασι παρηγορίας οὐχ ὑποκρίνουσι· ἀλλὰ μάλ' ὅλον ὑπὸ τῶν συνεπιθρηνηούντων ἀγονταὶ καὶ συνοδουρούμενοι.

16. τὸ αὐτὸ—φρονούντες] This injunction, as appears from the context, relates not to unity of sentiment, but of disposition; having the same common disposition and spirit, so as mutually to bear with each other's infirmities, making mutual allowances. Μὴ τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονούντες is equiv. to μὴ ὑψηλοφρονεῖτε at ii. 21; though here the sentiment is more developed. Render: 'Be not high-minded, i. e. dwelling on the solution of lofty questions, high as perilous.' Of the words τοῖς ταπεινοῖς συναπαγόμενοι the meaning seems to be, 'holding intercourse with the lowly; not proudly standing aloof from them.' The ratio metaphora appears to be this:—A person is said συναπάγασθαι when he is met by a crowd, and is hurried away with them in the direction they are going. But as Passive verbs are often used in a reciprocal sense, so συναπάγασθαι may signify to yield oneself to a multitude, and go with them. Now this admits of a good as well as a bad sense; in the former of which it is here taken, and figuratively denotes 'to condescend to;' which will express humility in all its various offices, lit. 'humble-mindedness.' In this application the synonym συμπεριφύεσθαι is always used. So Diog. Laert. Zenone: συμπ. φίλοις, 'morigerari, non morosum sese exhibere,' and 2 Macc. ix. 27, πέπεισμαι γὰρ αὐτὸν ἐπεικῶς καὶ φιλανθρώπως συμπεριενεχθήσεται ὑμῖν. We must not, as several Expositors do, take ταπεινοῖς as a Nester, merely because the antithesis seems to require it; for Paul does not heed such petty refinements; especially as the context calls for the Macc. The words τοῖς ταπεινοῖς συναπ. are well explained by H. Steph. Thes. in v. as equivalent to 'sinentes vos ab illis (humilibus) quocunque velint duci, eandemque cum illis insistentes viam.' Thus it denotes a spirit of condescension, and community of disposition with—not men of low estate, but—the humble-minded (Syr. Version), as opposed to the οἱ τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρον.—'men of humble piety; those mentioned in 1 Pet. v. 5, ταπεινοῖς—δίδωσι χάριν, and κατ. τὴν καρδίαν, and 2 Cor. vii. 6, from Matt. ix. 29. This interpretation is confirmed by the next clause, μὴ γίνεσθε φρόνιμοι παρ' ἑαυτοῖς, formed on Prov. iii. 7, and Isa. v. 21, where are meant persons akin to the οἱ ὑψ. φρον.—namely, the self-conceited, who, as long as they are such, are never likely to practise the foregoing injunction. The passage of Prov. iii. 7, is quite akin to that at iii. 34.

17 Μηδεὶ κακὸν ἀντὶ κακοῦ ἀποδιδόντες· προνοούμενοι καλὰ r Prov. 20.
22.
ἐνώπιον πάντων ἀνθρώπων 18 εἰ δυνατόν, τὸ ἐξ ὑμῶν, μετὰ πάντων ἀνθρώπων εἰρηνεύοντες. 19 μη̄ ἐαυτοὺς ἐκδικοῦντες, ἀγαπητοί, ἀλλὰ δότε τόπον τῇ ὀργῇ· γέγραπται γάρ· Ἐμοὶ
ἐκδίκησις· ἐγὼ ἀνταποδώσω, λέγει Κύριος· 20 ἢ Ἐὰν οὖν

Matt. 5. 39. Luke 6. 29. Heb. 10. 30. u Exod. 23. 4, 5. 1 Sam. 24. 16—19. & 30. 21. Prov. 25. 21. Matt. 5. 44.

17. The Apostle having shown how studiously Christians ought to cultivate peace and concord one with another, proceeds to teach how they ought to do it with other men (Crell.); inculcating forbearance towards enemies, and patience in supporting the injuries inflicted by them, as opposed to that thirst of vengeance which only serves to perpetuate hatred, and inflame animosity.

—προνοούμενοι καλὰ, &c.] The full sense is, 'taking care [to do] things of good report in the estimation of all men [whether Christians or heathens:]' The phrase προνοεῖσθαι καλοῦ occurs in Sext. Empir. ap. Weta.; and προνο. τοῦ δικαίου in Jos. Ant. ix. 1, 1, where προνο. is for προνοῖαν ποιεῖσθαι. The syntax with the Accusative is somewhat rare; but it occurs in Xen. Anab. vii. 7, 37, ταῦτα, ὡς φίλου ὄντος σου, προνοοῦμεν, and Sept. in Prov. iii. 4 (a passage probably in the mind of the Apostle here), προνο. σὺ καλὰ ἐνώπιον, &c., also in Xen. Mem. iv. 3, 12, τὰ συμφέροντα προνοεῖσθαι. The addition found in some very ancient MSS. and Versions, ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ was evidently introduced for the purpose of making this passage square exactly with that of 2 Cor. viii. 21, and hence one cannot but wonder at the want of judgment evinced by Lachm. in receiving it into the text. The point of doctrine inculcated in the two passages is the same, and is ably handled by Calvin.

18. εἰ δυνατόν—εἰρηνεύοντες] We have here an injunction to a virtue nearly allied to that of forbearance; the striving to live at peace with all men [both Christians and non-Christians]. The full import of εἰρηνεύειν is ably stated by Dr. Barrow, Works, vol. i. Sermon 29, on the present text, where he shows, 1. that 'it is not barely a negation of doing or suffering harm, or an abstinence from strife and violence, but a positive amity,—a disposition to perform such kind offices, without which good correspondence among men cannot subsist; 2. that it implies not some few transitory performances, proceeding from caprice, but a stable purpose,—a continuous cessation from injury, and a promptitude to do kind offices; 3. that it supposes a reciprocity not only in performing good and forbearing to do bad offices, but a receiving the like treatment from others; 4. that it imports not only an outward cessation from violence and a demonstration of amity, but an inward purpose of continuing therein.' 'Thus,' continues he, 'the being at peace differs only, in degree of obligation, and latitude of object, from the state of friendship properly so called.'

The limitation to the precept, contained in εἰ δυνατόν and τὸ ἐξ ὑμῶν (with which comp. Hom. Il. a. 525, ἐξ ἑμῶν γε) implies that, in spite of our utmost endeavours, it is not possible to live at peace with all men; see Pa. cix. 7.

19. In this verse the pronouns are emphatic, and the scope of the whole is to forbid private retaliation; enjoining the injured party to leave vengeance to God, or to the civil magistrate acting in his name. The clause δότε τόπον τῇ ὀργῇ, however, admits of two senses. The ὀργῇ may be referred to the person injured; in which case δότε τόπον will mean, 'let it go, defer venting it,' give space to that anger which is a furor brevis, and may thus have time to cool. Yet no such sense can be shown to be inherent in the words; neither would it be suitable to the words following, 'for it is written,' &c. It is therefore better to refer the ὀργῇ, with Chrysa. of the ancient, and the most eminent modern Expositors, to God; q. d. 'leave it to the wrath of God to avenge you, or to him who is properly the minister of vengeance, as representative of God.' So we have δοῦναι τόπον used at Eph. iv. 27; and Ecclesi. xix. 17, ἐλεῖξον τὸν πλῆσιόν σου πρὶν ἢ ἀπειλῆσαι, καὶ δός τόνον νόμον Ὑψίστου. Eurip. Suppl. 511, ἔφαρξεν ἦν Ζεὺς ὁ τιμωρόμενος· ἡμᾶς δ' ὑβρίζει οὐκ ἔχρην τοιῦνδ' ὕβριν,—where it is strange that all the Editors and Critics should have failed to see that δ' cannot be right, since it destroys the antithesis evidently intended between Ζεὺς and the persons addressed. Eurip. must have written σ', where the Pronoun is opposed to the preceding ἡμᾶς, for ἐμᾶς. How often Σ and Δ are confounded by the scribes every Critic knows. For examples see Greg. de Dialect., p. 589, ed. Schaefer.

In the quotation just after, the Apostle neither follows the Sept. (which is here very inaccurate), nor the Hebrew, but forms something founded on both; which, however, represents the full sense. The Pronouns are highly emphatic. The words λέγει Κύριος form no part of the quotation, but are added (as often elsewhere) to point out the speaker.

20. ἰάν οὖν—κεφ. αὐτοῦ] Taken verbatim from Prov. xxv. 21, 22. The Hebrew has nothing corresponding to τοῦτο ποιεῖν, which was added by the Sept. Translator to make the sense plainer. The ancient Commentators have well remarked that there is here a sort of diminution; q. d. 'I not only exhort you to forbearance, and a striving after peace, abating from private vengeance, but I enjoin you to do good to your enemy, by performing the common offices of humanity to him, should he need them.' Of the words following, ἀνθρακες—αὐτοῦ, there are two interpretations almost equally deserving of attention. 1. That of the Greek Fathers, and most of the earlier modern Commentators, as also Weta., Rosenm., Koppe, Locke, Schleusn., and others: 'By so doing, thou wilt, if he persevere in his enmity and injury, bring down an increased wrath and enmity from God.' Such is undoubtedly the sense of the phrase in the passage of Proverbs, and wherever it occurs in

πεινῶ ὁ ἐχθρὸς σου, ψώμιζε αὐτόν· ἐὰν διψῇ, πότιζε αὐτόν· τοῦτο γὰρ ποιῶν ἄνθρακας πυρὸς σωρεύσεις ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ. <sup>21</sup> ἢ Μὴ νικῶ ὑπὸ τοῦ κακοῦ, ἀλλὰ νικά ἐν τῷ ἀγαθῷ τὸ κακόν.

XIII. <sup>1</sup> Πᾶσα ψυχὴ ἐξουσίαις ὑπερεχούσαις ὑποτασσέσθω. οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶν [ἐξουσία,] εἰ μὴ ἀπὸ Θεοῦ· αἱ δὲ οὐσαι ἐξουσίαι, ὑπὸ [τοῦ] Θεοῦ τεταγμέναι εἰσίν. <sup>2</sup> ἢ Ὡστε ὁ ἀντιπασσόμενος

v Prov. 16.
32.
Luke 6. 37—
80.
1 Pet. 2. 9.
a Tit. 3. 1.
1 Pet. 2. 13.
Prov. 8. 15.
16.
Dan. 4. 32.
Wind. 6. 8.
b 1 Sam. 26.
9.

the Old Test.; and as the words preceding treat of the divine vengeance, it is very suitable: nor is this sentiment liable to any objection, when properly understood; for, as Locke remarks, 'the persecuting malice of the injurer is supposed.' 2. That of Jerome and Hilary of the ancients, and many eminent moderns up to the present time, by which there is supposed to be a metaphor taken from fusing metals; the meaning being, 'Thou shalt melt down his enmity, and soften him to kindness,' as metals are melted by covering the crucible with hot burning coals. And this view I find adopted by Bp. Terrot and Dr. Peile; and also by Prof. Hodge, who remarks that the Apostle's meaning is not, 'Treat your enemy kindly; for by so doing you will secure his being punished most severely by God;' but this: 'Treat him kindly, for by so doing you take the most effectual means to subdue him.' But this sense cannot be extracted from the words without violence; and it is forbidden by the passage of Proverbs above cited. To suppose, with others, that the expression is meant of the burning shame and agony of receiving benefits from an enemy, does not, I agree with Mr. Alf., suffice; 'because that to merely make an enemy heartily ashamed of himself is hardly a worthy motive of action.' Accordingly, I still acquiesce in the former view of the sense; and I understand, with Mr. Alf., the words to mean, 'For in so doing you will be taking vengeance the most effectual,—even as if you heaped coals of fire on his head.'

The full sense of ver. 21 is well expressed in paraphrase by Dr. Peile, thus: 'Do not let your good purpose of forbearance and long-suffering be overcome by evil treatment; but, on the contrary, overcome evil in your opponent by exhibiting on your part only good.'

XIII. This Chapter forms the second Section of the practical part of the Epistle; in which are inculcated the moral duties of all Christians, commencing with those towards magistrates and governors; an injunction, considering the insubordinate and seditious spirit of the Jews and Jewish Christians, very necessary; espec. since the doctrine of resistance to Heathen governors had, as we learn from Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2, been inculcated by the Pharisees. Hence, after explaining the nature and divine origin of civil government (telling them that all governments derived the power they had from God, though they had not the frames of the government from Him, as the Jews had), the Apostle exhorts his readers to faithfully and cheerfully perform their duty in this respect. Similar admonitions are found at Tit. iii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14.

1. πᾶσα ψυχὴ] So the Heb. כָּל נֶפֶשׁ, meaning every individual, without exception, in whatever rank of subjects.

—ἐξουσίαις ὑπερεχ., 'celsis potestatibus,' 'the magistrates set in public authority.' So οἱ ἀρχόντες at ver. 3, and οἱ ἐν ἐπαρχῇ ὄντες at 1 Tim. ii. 2.—ὑποτασσέσθω is Middl. Reflex., 'let him submit himself,' as often in the Epistles, and thrice in the Gospels.—ἐξουσία, 'power, arising from vested authority.'—αἱ δὲ οὐσαι ἐξ., 'now (== 'and so') the existing authorities are ordained by God.' The words Θεοῦ and τεταγ. have reference to the human creation and setting up of those authorities. Of course the ἐξουσία. include sovereigns not only de jure but de facto; and not only sovereigns, but rulers generally, established by proper authority in any country, by the Law, to which Christian obedience is due. See Macknight's note.—To advert to matters of Criticism. Ἐξουσία is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from A, B, D, F, G, and 2 cursives, with the Srr., and Vulg., and other Versions, and Latin Fathers. But the authority is insufficient; though internal evidence is against the word. But I can hardly think that Paul would leave so harsh an ellipsis; though, if we consider οὐ γὰρ—Θεοῦ as parenthetic, then ἐξουσία might be fetched from ἐξουσίαις.—For ἀπὸ, A, B, D<sup>3</sup>, E<sup>2</sup>, J, and 60 cursives (to which I add Lamb. 1184, 1190, and most Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16) have ὑπὸ, adopted by Matth., Lachm., and Tisch., Ed. 1, but restored in Tisch. 2, and retained by Alf.; rightly; since the context requires ἀπὸ, as denoting origin. Comp. Hea. Theog. 96. Hom. Il. i. 279, and Prov. viii. 16.—The τοῦ before the second Θεοῦ is omitted in A, D, E, F, G, and 10 cursives, and is cancelled by Lachm. and Alf., but retained by Tisch.; rightly; since, besides external authority being insufficient, it was more likely to be removed because thought unnecessary, or omitted by error of scribes, than to have been inserted. As to the Article being, as Alf. says, unnecessary after a Preposition, such a refinement in phraseology was not likely to be known to Paul. Besides, though the Article might be dispensed with before an ordinary word, yet in the case of Θεός, espec. in a sentiment of gravity like this, the Article is generally used. So in a similar passage of Epict. Man. ch. xxi., τῶν δὲ βελτίστων σοὶ φαινομένων, οὗτας ἔχου, ὥς ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ τιταγμένους εἰς ταύτην τὴν τάξιν. The meaning of the Apostle is, that the authorities are permitted to hold the office they hold by the disposing providence of God, though mediately appointed to it by the authority, or invested with it by the consent, of man.

2. ὁ ἀντιπασσ. τῇ ἐξ.] lit. 'he who arrays himself,' a military metaphor, like τεταγμ. supra v. 1.

τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ, τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ διαταγῇ ἀνθέστηκεν ὅτι οἱ δὲ ἀνθεστηκότες ἑαυτοῖς κρίμα λήφονται. <sup>3</sup> <sup>d</sup> Οἱ γὰρ ἄρχοντες οὐκ εἰσι
 φόβος τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἔργων, ἀλλὰ τῶν κακῶν. Θέλεις δὲ μὴ φοβεῖσθαι τὴν ἐξουσίαν; τὸ ἀγαθὸν ποιεῖ, καὶ ἔξεις ἔπαινον ἐξ αὐτῆς. <sup>4</sup> Θεοῦ γὰρ διάκονός ἐστι σοὶ εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν. ἐὰν δὲ τὸ κακὸν ποιῇς, φοβοῦ οὐ γὰρ εἰκὴ τὴν μάχαιραν φορεῖ Θεοῦ γὰρ διάκονός ἐστιν, ἑκδικὸς εἰς ὀργὴν τῷ τὸ κακὸν πρᾶσ-σοντι. <sup>5</sup> Διὸ ἀνάγκη ὑποτάσσεσθαι, οὐ μόνον διὰ τὴν ὀργήν, ἀλλὰ καὶ διὰ τὴν συνειδήσιν. <sup>6</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ φόρους

Prov. 14. 33, 34. & 31. 3, 9. Eccles. 3. 2-5. Isa. 1. 17.

3. This verse is connected with the first rather than the second verse, as assigning an additional reason why the ἐξουσίαι should be obeyed,—because such is the will of God, whereby they are appointed to suppress evil, and encourage good works; consequently there is, as Calv. says, an argument a salubri et ab utilitate.

—φόβος] ‘terriculamentum,’ ‘object of fear.’ So in an inscription cited by Wetst., ἐμὲ κριτῆς γὰρ ἦπισθε ἰθὺδικοῖς, τοῖς δ’ ἀδικοῦσι δίκον.

For τῶν ἀγαθῶν, and the other Genitives, A, B, D, F, G, and 2 cursives, with the Ital. and Vulg. Versions, and some Latin Fathers, have τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but on insufficient authority (I cannot add a single cursive), and internal evidence is against the change; for as to being, as Alf. pronounces, ‘a correction to Plural, to suit the sense,’ that cannot be, for if the Correctors had wished to introduce a Plural, they would have written τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἔργοις, and τοῖς κακοῖς. It should rather seem, that the correction is on the other side, by the Alexandrian Critics stumbling at the Genit., which, indeed, involves a great harshness, and hence changed it to the usual construction—the Dative (as in Acts ii. 43, and elsewhere), not being aware, that there is here in the expression a pregnancy of sense for φόβος τοῖς ποιηταῖς ἀγαθῶν ἔργων, as the Æthiop. Translator (alone) saw. And the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Pers. Translators by reading as if their copies had ἀγαθοῖς ἔργοις, must have taken the same view. The idiom is, indeed, extremely harsh and anomalous, but occasionally occurs in the purest Class. writers, as Thucyd., e. gr. Pind. Pyth. v. 81, δοῦναι τινα φόβον. Dem. p. 366, φόβος Θεβαίων, ‘dread at the Thebans.’

4. There is here simply an amplification of the former verse, of which this ought to have formed part. In the clause Θεοῦ γὰρ διάκ.—τὸ ἀγαθόν, the words Θεοῦ γὰρ διάκ. are emphatic; ‘He is a minister, one not acting on his own authority, but on that of God.’ The next words, εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, suggests another reason for obedience,—namely, that the ruler is not only the appointed minister of God to us, but is such for good, and that natural, civil, and moral; being entrusted with power for the welfare of the governed, and therefore is entitled to their obedience, for the general good of society. The next words are intended to point at the other great end of civil government, i. e. ‘to punish the evil,’ for which the ruler οὐκ εἰκὴ τὴν μάχ. φορεῖ, implying the possession of the power of capital punishment, represented by ‘the sword,’ which he carried at his side, or had borne before him. As to the term ἐκδικος, it is scarcely found elsewhere. As an Adject. it was used in the later Greek writers, but only in a good sense, not, as in the earlier ones, in a bad sense. The good sense was avenging. And that the Adj. in a good sense was used in middle Greek is probable, since from it must have been derived the name of the law-officer, who was the syndic or public advocate for a city, to see that it had right and justice. Indeed, it is found in a Phocæan Inscription in Boeckh. t. i. p. 850 (probably written a century or two before the Christian era): Ζωπύρου τοῦ ἐκδικίου. The argument here is, that obedience to rulers and magistrates is not only a civil duty, to be enforced by penal laws, but also a religious duty—a branch of our obedience to God. The term ἀνάγκη is equiv. to καθῆκόν ἐστιν, or δεῖ; for the obedience in question is plainly political, not religious; and the words following suggest the motives; viz. not only through dread of the ὀργή, or ‘penalty annexed to disobedience,’ but διὰ τὴν συνειδήσιν, ‘for conscience sake,’ through religious motives; because he is a minister of that God, who makes civil obedience a matter of duty. As, then, disobedience in such a case involves not only a breach of law, but a sin, so, taking the converse, we may say, in the words of Sophocles, Ant. 872, σέβειν μὲν, ἐσθιβαῖά τις, i. e. ‘honour rendered to whom honour is due, is piety.’

5. διὰ τὴν συνειδήσιν] Here the Apostle, as elsewhere, enforces all relative and social duties, on the ground of conscience and religious considerations.

6. Of the two reasons here assigned why taxes should be paid to rulers, the first refers to the high usefulness of their vocation; the second adverts to their being appointed by God to a ministration which, in various ways, is found most beneficial to men; espec. since, as Dr. Barrow observes (Sermon on 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2), ‘rulers necessarily take much care and trouble, and are exposed to many hazards for our advantage. To their industry and vigilance, under God, we owe the fair administration of justice, and all the other precious advantages of civilized society.’

—φόρους ταλεῖτα] Supply αὐτοῖς. Αὐτὸ τοῦτο must be referred, not to φόρους ταλεῖτα, comprehended in φόρους ταλεῖτα, but to τὸ λατρεύειν τῷ Θεῷ, comprehended in λατρεύειν; meaning, as Dr. Barrow explains, ‘the protection of right and innocency, the preservation of order and peace, the encouragement of goodness, and the correction of wickedness: all which governors are supposed to attend to, and on which their claim to honour and support must rest.’ So Thucyd. i. 120, χρὴ γὰρ τοῦτε ἡγε-

f Matt. 23.

21.

g Gal. 5. 14.

h Tim. 1. 5.

James 2. 8.

i Exod. 20.

14.

Lev. 10. 18.

Deut. 5. 18.

Matt. 19. 18.

k 22. 30.

Mark 10. 19.

Luke 18. 20.

τελείτε λειτουργοὶ γὰρ Θεοῦ εἰσιν, εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο προσκαρτεροῦντες. 7 ἢ Ἀπόδοτε οὖν πᾶσι τὰς ὀφειλάς τῷ τὸν φόρον, τὸν φόρον τῷ τὸ τέλος, τὸ τέλος τῷ τὸν φόβον, τὸν φόβον τῷ τὴν τιμῇ, τὴν τιμῇ. 8 ἢ Μηδενὶ μηδὲν ὀφείλετε, εἰ μὴ τὸ ἀγαπᾶν ἀλλήλους· ὁ γὰρ ἀγαπᾶν τὸν ἕτερον, νόμον πεπλήρωκε. 9 ἢ τὸ μόνας, τὰ ἴδια ἐξ Ἰσου νέμοντας, τὰ κοινὰ προσκοπεῖν, ὥσπερ καὶ ἐν ἄλλοις ἐκ πάντων προτιμῶνται.

Now without the payment of taxes, these various ends could not be attained; for, as Tacitus says, 'Nec quies gentium sine armis, nec arma sine stipendiis, nec stipendia sine tributis, haberi queunt.' And yet it is God's will that the lειτουργία should be performed, and consequently that the taxes necessary to that purpose should be paid.

7. After having enjoined obedience to magistrates, the Apostle subjoins briefly what conduct is due to all persons generally.

— ἀπόδοτε, &c.] The full sense is, 'I would not have you behind-hand with any man in any thing; but if you owe him any duty, perform it to the full. If any honour or respect, in whatever kind or degree, belong to him, account it as justly his due; and let him have it to the utmost of what can with justice or in equity be demanded.' (Bp. Sanderson.)

As to the removal of the introductory οὖν by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from D<sup>8</sup>, E, F, G, J alone, without any cursive, the authority is quite insufficient, espec. since internal evidence is contrary, for the Particle was more likely to be omitted in 5 MSS. by the carelessness of scribes, owing to its being written obscurely, and by abbreviation, than that it should have been interpolated in all the rest. Besides, here the Particle is necessary, to bind the exhortation to the foregoing representation; and asynndeton would be out of place.—With respect to the difference between φόρος and τέλος, the former term denoted 'a fixed tax,' such as the land-tax and capitation-tax; the latter, the octigulia, or cusomus, levied on the imports and exports. So Aristoph. has ἀγορᾶς τέλος. The general usage, however, requires the plural.—By φόβος may here be denoted the reverential homage due to kings and governors; by τιμῇ, the respect due to all who are in authority. So Soph. Ant. 873, Κράτος δ', ὅτι κράτος μέλει, Παραβατὸν οὐδαμῇ πύλει:—a remarkable paronomasia, forming almost a rhyme.

8—10. The connexion here is obscure; and whether there be any, has been doubted. So Bullinger remarks, 'Abrumpt disputationem de debito, inexplicabilem si quis singula persequi velit.' But it would rather seem that there is a connexion, though hanging by a very fine thread,—namely, by a transition from species to genus, as Hyper. ably points out. And this view is confirmed by the suffrage of Calv., who remarks, 'Ego existimo Paulum istam de magistratum potestate præceptionem, ne cui infirma videretur, voluisse ad dilectionis Legem referre, ac si dixisset, Quam postulo ut principibus pareatis, non aliud requiro, quam quod ex Legge dilectionis debent præstare omnes fideles.' And so Estius, 'Sub nomine debiti transitum facit Apostolus ad commendandum generale præceptum dilectionis, tantum debiti cujusquam perpetui.' One might, indeed, have expected a Particle of connexion, such as the Syr., Arab., and Æthiop. Versions prefix. But the Apostle chose the asynndeton, for the sake of greater force. Besides, the above view is quite agreeable to that of Grot. and others, who think that the Apostle takes occasion, from the mention of the word ὀφειλάς, to pass from what respects the political law and public duties, to that which regards morals and the mutual offices in general of Christians one to another; and shows that these precepts, as they had been valid before Moses, so now also did they remain, but with the glorious supplements of the Christian dispensation. In short, the general scope of the sentence is plain, though there has been some doubt as to the details.

8. To take ὀφείλετε, with De Dieu, Koppe, and Rosenm., as an indicative, is not agreeable to the context, which is wholly occupied with injunctives. The common interpretation (adopted by the ancient, and almost all modern Commentators), which regards it as an imperative, is decidedly to be preferred. Here, indeed (as Hyperius observes), we have a persuasive to the performance of what is due by the law of charity, from the effect and excellence of charity; it being intimated that true charity is of such a nature, that it would omit nothing of what is enjoined by the Law; or, in other words, Christian charity is a continual debt, which is ever being paid, but is always owing, and never discharged in this life. A delicate turn, imitated by our great Epic Poet, Paradise Lost, B. iv. 55: 'A grateful mind By owing owes not, but still pays; at once Indebted and discharged.'

— τὸν ἕτερον ] 'his fellow-man,' for τὸν πλησίον, i. e. 'any person with whom he has any connexion whatever.' So our Lord, in his parable of the good Samaritan, has taught us to extend the signif. of the word,—making thereby the command as unlimited as the benevolence of the Deity, and coextensive with the sphere of human action.

— νόμον πεπλήρωκε ] The full sense is, 'hath fulfilled, and doth fulfil, the Law;' i. e. as Bp. Middl. explains, not the Mosaic Law, as regards the Second Table, but Law in general, as the rule of human duty.

9. What is here said is a confirmation of the declaration immediately preceding—that love comprehends the wide circle of human duties. On the force of ἀνακαφ., denoting 'the bringing under one sum,' see my Lex. in v.—The τὸ before γάρ ('for example') is not put for ὅτι, but has reference to γυγραμμένον, or λεγόμενον,—meaning what is said by way of injunction. This may suffice for the construction: as for the logic, there is, as Hyper. observes, 'Probatio, quod tantus sit effectus charitatis, quadam forma inductionis.'—The words οὐ ψευδομαρτυ. are absent from all the most ancient uncials, and many cursives; to which I can add three ancient Lamb.

γάρ· Οὐ μοιχεύσεις οὐ φονεύσεις οὐ κλέψεις [οὐ ψευδομαρτυρήσεις] οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις καὶ εἴ τις ἑτέρα ἐντολή, ἐν τούτῳ τῷ λόγῳ ἀνακεφαλαιωῦται, ἐν τῷ Ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλησίον σου ὡς ἑαυτόν. <sup>10</sup> Ἡ ἀγάπη τῷ πλησίον κακὸν οὐκ ἐργάζεται· πλήρωμα οὖν νόμου ἡ ἀγάπη.

<sup>11</sup> Καὶ τοῦτο, εἰδότες τὸν καιρὸν, ὅτι ὥρα ἡμᾶς ἤδη ἐξ ὕπνου ἐγερθῆναι· (νῦν γὰρ ἐγγύτερον ἡμῶν ἡ σωτηρία, ἢ ὅτε ἐπιστεύσαμεν <sup>12</sup> ἢ νῦν προέκοψεν, ἢ δὲ ἡμέρα ἤγγικεν) ἀποθώμεθα

1 Matt. 22.
 40.
 Mark 12. 31.
 Gal. 5. 14.
 James 2. 8.
 1 Tim. 1. 5.
 1 Cor. 13.
 2.
 Eph. 5. 14.
 1 Thess. 5. 6.
 2 Eph. 5. 11.
 2 Cor. 13. 14.
 1 Thess. 5. 5.
 2 Cor. 2. 8.

MSS. and all the Mus. copies except one; and internal evidence, confirmed by the Syr. Vers., is against the words.

— ἀγαπήσεις τὸν πλησίον σου ὡς ἐ. i.] Not meaning, that we should love him as much as ourselves, but in the same manner, though not to the same degree, as, we love ourselves. This is confirmed by the words following, which seem meant to show the nature of this love,—namely, that we should be as careful to avoid injuring him, as we should of injuring ourselves. To which purpose it is admirably observed by Bp. Sherlock, in one of his Sermons, that 'what the principle of self-preservation is with respect to ourselves, the same is charity with respect to our neighbour.'

<sup>10</sup> ἡ ἀγάπη—ἐργάζεται] Here we may, with many Expositors, suppose abstract for concrete, 'He who loveth,' &c. But it should rather seem that the sense intended is, as Bp. Sherlock thought, 'Love consists in not injuring our neighbour.' And true it is, that a great part of the love we owe to our fellow-creatures is only required to be shown by not injuring them; which will often operate as a positive benefit.

—πλήρωμα οὖν νόμου ἡ ἀγάπη] This may mean, either that 'love is the end and scope of the commandments respecting our neighbour;' or rather, that 'in love is comprehended the fulfilment of the Law,—the sum total of what the Law enjoins as to our neighbour.' Hence the same precept is called, in James ii. 8, τὸ νόμον βασιλικόν, and in 1 Tim. i. 5, τὸ τέλος τῆς παραγγελίας.

<sup>11</sup> The Apostle now proceeds to enforce, up to the end of this chapter, the foregoing duties of Christians; and, to excite them to a holy and exemplary life, he adds this new reason,—that the return of Christ to the earth, to save and bless, is an event not far distant. Holiness of life is then compared to the conduct of men in the broad day-light, and in full view of their fellow-creatures, and who are thereby held in a strong moral restraint. (Koppe.)

—καὶ τοῦτο, εἰδότες, &c.] At καὶ τοῦτο supply ποιῶμεν, 'And this admonition let us especially observe, as knowing that this is the critical season [for action].' In explanation of which it is added, 'inasmuch as now it is time to be roused from the sleep of inactivity, security,' &c. Thus Paul means (as Hodge says) 'forcibly to remind his readers that the time of deliverance was near; that the difficulties and sins with which they had to contend would soon be dispersed, as the shades and mists of night before the rising day. The salvation, therefore, here intended, is the consummation of the work of Christ in their deliverance from this present evil world, and introduction into the purity and blessedness of heaven. Eternity is just at hand, is the solemn consideration that Paul, like Peter at 1 Pet. iv. 7, urges on his readers as a motive for devotedness and diligence in their holy calling.' By ὕπνου here is meant, figuratively, the slumbering of the soul in supineness, security, and worldly carelessness. I agree with Mr. Alf., that the imagery seems derived from our Lord's discourse concerning his coming, Matt. xxiv. 42. Mark xiii. 33. Luke xxi. 28—36, where see notes; espec. since many points of similarity with vv. 11—14 may be traced, so that the matter in text and notes there is the best comment on this portion. The Apostle had in mind the same discourse of our Lord at Eph. v. 14, ἵνα ἡμεῖς ὡς καθυσώσωμεν, where see note.

—νῦν γὰρ ἐγγύτερον, &c.] Render: 'for now is salvation nearer to us, &c.' since the ἡμῶν belongs to ἐγγύτερον rather than to σωτηρία; though the connexion with σωτηρία may seem favoured by Luke xxi. 28, ἡγγίζει ἡ ἀπολύτρωσις ὑμῶν, which passage is important, as tending to fix the disputed sense of σωτηρία here, which is strangely explained by some eminent Expositors, 'knowledge of the doctrine of salvation;—an interpretation utterly baseless. That of others, who refer it to 'the second advent of Christ, when the day of glory to the Church should commence,' is specious; but, as Whitby, Stuart, and others have shown, untenable. Greatly preferable is the interpretation of the ancient and several modern Expositors, who explain σωτ. 'that eternal salvation which will to the righteous be accomplished, and commence at the period of death.'—a period to them the beginning of life, and light, and glory; and of which the Apostle so often says the saints long after, as that period when they shall be 'freed from the bondage of corruption, and be received into the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See Stuart, and also Hodge, who explains ἡ σωτηρ. of 'the consummation of the work of Christ, in the deliverance (the ἀπολύτρωσις of Luke) from this present evil world.' The individual application of the words, though it be secondary, is at this time far more important than the primary, because it applies to Christians of every age, unto the end of the world.—By ἐπιστεῦσαμεν must be meant 'when first we believed' ('at the time of our conversion to the faith of Christ,' as, indeed, the Pesch. Syr. renders), as in Eph. i. 13, ἐν ᾧ ἐπιστεύσαμεν.

<sup>12</sup> ἡ νῦν προέκοψεν—ἤγγικεν] The metaphor here is founded on the imagery of the preceding verse, which considers σωτ. as accomplished at a day or period = the advent of the

οὖν τὰ ἔργα τοῦ σκότους, καὶ ἐνδυσώμεθα τὰ ὅπλα τοῦ φωτός.

1 Luke 21.
24.
Gal. 1. 31.
1 Thess. 4.
12. & 5. 6.
m Gal. 5. 27.
& 5. 16.
1 Pet. 2. 11.

13 <sup>1</sup> Ὡς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ, εὐσχημόνως περιπατήσωμεν μὴ κώμοις καὶ μέθαις, μὴ κοίταις καὶ ἀσελγείαις, μὴ ἔριδι καὶ ζήλῳ· 14 <sup>2</sup> ἄλλ' ἐνδύσασθε τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, καὶ τῆς σαρκὸς πρόνοιαν μὴ ποιέισθε εἰς ἐπιθυμίας.

Lord; and the sense to be assigned to νύξ and ἡμέρα will depend on the mode of interpretation there adopted. Hence it will be meant either that the night of heathen darkness, or Jewish ignorance, is drawing to a close, and the day of Gospel light is dawning; or that the dark and obscure state of this life is far advanced, and the day of the resurrection, or of eternity, is fast approaching. But the latter is far more suitable to the context; so that the full sense may be, that 'the time of sin (as arising from the power of darkness, Eph. vi. 12) as prevailing in the world that now is (lying under that power) is far spent, and the day of the resurrection to light, life, holiness, and happiness is at hand.' The figure is continued at the next words, ἀποθώμεθα οὖν—φωτός, where it has been disputed whether by ὅπλα be meant armour or apparel. The latter sense is adopted by many Expositors; but the interpretation is not tenable, because there is no sufficient authority for the sense. The true version seems to be 'harness,' meaning 'armour' for defence, since 'weapons' seem not here in view, though they are at the similar passage of Eph. vi. 11. Paul probably used the word ὅπλα here, because the Christian virtues, admitted by all Expositors to be meant, are to be habitually cultivated, as the best defence against the assault of temptations to sin. The expressions τοῦ σκότους and τοῦ φωτός are subjoined, because the persons who shall put on the spiritual harness are the ἡμεῖς φωτός of 1 Thess. v. 5; and therefore their harness is called τοῦ φωτός, suitably thereto.

13. There is here an amplification of the preceding, aducing some examples of the works of darkness, which the Christians are to put off, as at v. 14, what works of light to put on. In the expression εὐσχημ. περιπατ., the latter term (formed on the Hebr. חָנַן) denotes 'habitual action'; and εὐσχ. means 'becomingly' (agreeably to our Christian calling), consequently 'decorously.' Suitably to the foregoing metaphor, the Apostle instances, in the way of dissuasion, especially those vices which, in ancient times, were committed almost exclusively in the night,—namely, those of drunken revelry, and its consequent, lewdness and lasciviousness; and also those crimes usually arising from the former, as quarrelling and violence.

14. ἐνδύσασθε τὸν Κ. Ἰ. Χρ.] Expositors remark that we have here a metaphor à re vestitiuā, found also in the Class. writers; Lucian, Gall. 19, ἀποδυσάμενοι δὲ τὸν Πυθαγόραν, τίνα μετμηφίσσω μετ' αὐτόν; Dionys. Hal. Ant. xi. 5, τὸν Ταρκύνιον ἐκείνον ἐνδύμενοι, and denoting 'to follow any one's example,' 'to take upon ourselves his disposition and actions.' But far more seems meant. It is better, with Prof. Hodge and Dr. Peile, to suppose the meaning to be, 'Be ye so made one with Christ, as that he, and not you, may be seen before him with whom ye have to do:' comp. Gal. iii. 27.

Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10. Rev. iii. 18. But even that falls short of the full sense, which Hyper. states thus, 'Respicit quidem ad metaphoram de induendis armis lucis, sed interea cum amplificatione quadam asserit, non tantum induendas novas virtutes, sed induendum ipsum Christum, verarum virtutum absolutissimum Exemplum et Largitorem,' p. 168. And so Estius, 'Christum induere dicuntur, qui Christum sibi assumunt et applicant, sequē ei conformant, adeoque Christum in se quodammodo representant, imitatione virtutum ejus ac bonarum actionum, quæ in illo velut Capite perfectissime refulerunt.' Calv. well remarks, 'Curanda sunt quæ ad corpus pertinent, sed non aliter quam peregrinationis adminicula, non autem ut patrie nos oblivisci faciant.' And Prof. Stenensen observes, 'Christum induere non solum est Christum imitari, verum etiam eam, quæ ei erat, mentem suam facere: hoc vero nemo potest, nisi quocum Christus suum Spiritum communicaverit. Quare Christum induere idem est, ac arctius arctiusque quotidie cum eo jungi, ut ejus vita cum omnibus suis virtutibus quotidie magis mazisque nostra fiat.' The next clause, which presents the opposite, may be rendered, 'And, withal, make not forethought for the flesh, for [the fulfilment of it] lusts,' 'evil desires.' As for the construction of the clause, indispensable to ascertaining the true scope and sense, several eminent Expositors regard the words as forming one construction; according to which view, Mackn. renders, 'make no provision for, by gratifying, the lusts of the flesh.' But this is doing, I apprehend, violence to the construction, and making void the purpose of the Apostle,—which was, while permitting a due care in providing for the necessary wants of the body (which, as appears from Eph. v. 29, it is perfectly allowable to nourish and cherish), at the same time to forbid a solicitous provision for its wants, much less its lusts. This view is confirmed by Theodor., Theophyl., and Beem., who all point out that the Apostle does not say simply, μὴ ποιεῖσθε τῆς σαρκὸς πρόνοιαν [indeed, had he done so, the mouths of those ascetical heretics spoken of by Theodoret could not, as Theodor. and Theophyl. say, have been stopped], but he superadds the words εἰς ἐπιθυμίας, in order to prevent his meaning being misunderstood, though, at the same time, so to phrase the sentiment, as to make quite clear the duty of keeping down the desires of the body to as low a measure as possible,—in short, δουλαγωγεῖν τὸ σῶμα, 1 Cor. ix. 27. The phrase πρόνοιαν ποιεῖσθαι, used of 'a due care of the body,' occurs also in Jos. Ant. viii. 13, 8, τῷ σώματι πρόνοιαν π. Diad. Sic. vol. iv. 6, 1, πρόν. τ. σώμ. π., also Thucyd. vi. 9, τῷ σώματι προνοεῖσθαι. It is plain that by πρόν. is meant 'the taking provident care for the necessary wants of the body.' Comp. the Horatian 'Sit—provisis frugis in annum Copia;' where

XIV. 1 <sup>a</sup> Τὸν δὲ ἀσθενούντα τῇ πίστει προσλαμβάνεσθε, <sup>a</sup> ch. 15. 1, 7.
 μὴ εἰς διακρίσεις διαλογισμῶν. <sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Ὃς μὲν πιστεύει φαγεῖν <sup>1</sup> Cor. 8. 2.
<sup>c</sup> 9. 22.
<sup>d</sup> ver. 14.
<sup>e</sup> Tit. 1. 15.

Doëring, by explaining collecta, spoils the sense, in which Horace had in view the precept of his favourite Epicurus, reported by Diog. Laert. x. 120, κτισίους προνοήσαι (τὸν σοφὸν) καὶ (ἐν) τοῦ μέλλοντος. But there is something yet further, in the passage, to be considered. The Apostle had been before adverting to 'the works of darkness' (evil ones) expressly, and 'the works of the flesh' implicitly; and among the latter he reckons ἐριδι καὶ ἡλῆς, just as he does at 1 Cor. iii. 3, ἔπον ἐν ὑμῖν ἡλὸς καὶ ἐρις, where he infers that the Corinthians are yet 'carnal' (σαρκικοί), by their still having 'envying and strife' among them;—consequently he must have intended to include carnality of spirit with carnality of body by sensuality and all kinds of impurity. And it is plain from the next words, ἀλλ' ἐνδύσασθε, that the Apostle meant to represent that such carnality, even of spirit, is inconsistent with putting on the Lord Jesus Christ; though the next words are to be referred to carnality of body only.

XIV.—XV. 13. This Portion forms the third Section of the Practical part of the Epistle; and, as in ch. xii., the Apostle had treated mainly on religious duties, and in ch. xiii. on those of a political, or civil character, and such as respect the daily intercourse of life, and the private conduct of individuals also, so he in this Section treats especially on the duties of Church members towards one another, and particularly as to the conduct to be pursued towards weak and scrupulous brethren, in which the duties both of the weak and the strong are considered, each in their order: I. as to the mode of treatment to be pursued towards scrupulous Christians, who make a conscience of matters of indifference (i. e. consider them as matters of conscience), vv. 1—12. II. as to the manner in which those who are strong in faith (having no such scruples) should use their Christian liberty in things indifferent.

As to the first Section,—the conduct to be pursued by the strong in faith toward the weak and scrupulous, it is here so treated, as to induce both parties to use mutual forbearance—on the ground, that every person is bound to serve God according to his sincere and conscientious views, as to such matters as are indifferent.

1. τὸν δὲ ἀσθεν. τῇ π. προσλαβ. It has been a matter of no little difference of opinion, what class of persons are to be understood here by 'the weak in the faith.' Some eminent Expositors (as Carpz., Koppe, and Eichhorn) maintain that they were a species of persons like the Jewish Essenes, who (like the Greek ἀσκηταί) practised various mortifications of the flesh, in order to attain greater power in the spirit,—nearly such as were adopted by the Monks of a later age. But it has been fully shown by Rosenm., Stuart, and others, that, although there were then various classes of persons who practised asceticism, espec. in their abstinence from animal food, either wholly or partially, yet that the manner in which Paul here speaks of them forbids such a notion; for, instead of attacking their pride and vain-glory (as at Col. ii. 21—23), he throws his shield over them, and directs that their scruples, which were conscientious and sober, may be respected. And when we consider that in ver. 5 mention is made of the distinction that the persons in question made between days, and compare this with what is said at Col. ii. 16, there can (as Stuart shows) be little doubt that the whole difficulty was one which arose from Jewish scruples about the use of meats which had been offered to idols, and afterwards sold in the market (which the persons in question thought would communicate pollution to those who used them), and the observance of certain fasts and feast-days. But for the better understanding of the whole matter, espec. as a general question, the reader is referred to an admirable discourse of Bp. Sanderson ad Clerum, upon ver. 3, on 'the use of things indifferent;' wherein, after stating the occasion, tracing the scope, and showing the connexion of the text with the context, he divides it into two points of doctrine: I. That we are not to despise others, be they ever so weak, or we ever so strong; and that both for the sin's sake, by which it is hurtful to the despisers, and for the scandal's sake to the despised. II. That we are not to judge and condemn others, 1. from our want of commission; 2. from our want of skill; 3. from the uncharitableness, and, 4. from the scandalousness of the thing itself. Or thus: 1. We have no right to judge; and so our judging is usurpation. 2. We may err in our judgments; and so our judging is rashness. 3. We take things the worst way when we judge and condemn. 4. We give occasion of offence by our judging, and thus it is scandalous. 'Thus the Apostle,' he proceeds to say, 'endeavours to draw both parties (as being both in the wrong) to this honourable composition,—that the strong in faith shall remit somewhat of his superciliousness in despising the weak and scrupulous; and that the weak shall abate somewhat of his acrimony in condemning the strong.' The question as to the use and abuse of things indifferent, as one not confined to the subject of 'meats,' but extending to many other things, has in the fore-cited and many other of his admirable discourses been ably treated by the learned Prelate; and also by Calv. and Hyper., the latter of whom here shows that it is a question of all places, and of every age. 'Nostra tempestas (says he) multis in locis de cibis, diebus, aliisque rebus adiphoris acerrimas disceptationes motas videre licet; ad quas dirimendas præsens disputatio salubre consilium suppeditat.' How suitable this observation is to the present time it is needless to point out.

—τὸν ἀσθενούντα τῇ πίστει According to the foregoing view, ὁ ἀσθενών will denote one who is doubtful, or not fully persuaded, of the propriety or impropriety of certain things in themselves indifferent, and is not satisfied as to the liberty which Christianity allows in those cases. By τῇ πίστει (which should be rendered 'his faith' or 'belief') is denoted a full persuasion of mind as to what is lawful or unlawful.—προσλαμβάνεσθε has been variously interpreted. The word properly signifies, 'to lay hold of and draw any thing or person to us;' and, from the context, here seems to mean receive into

c Col. 2. 18, 17. πάντα, ὁ δὲ ἀσθενῶν λάχανα ἐσθίει. 3<sup>c</sup> Ὁ ἐσθίων τὸν μὴ Acts 10. 34. ἐσθίοντα μὴ ἐξουθενείτω καὶ ὁ μὴ ἐσθίων τὸν ἐσθίοντα μὴ
 d James 4. κρινέτω ὁ Θεὸς γὰρ αὐτὸν προσελάβετο. 4<sup>d</sup> Σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ

Christian communion, with the adjunct notion of taking into friendly intercourse; see also xv. 7, and Gal. vi. 1. I am inclined to agree with Dr. Peile and Mr. Alf., that the caution here given seems, from the connecting δὲ, which binds this on to the general exhortations to mutual charity at ch. xiii., to spring out of those precepts; q. d. 'But while I impress upon you the paramount and perpetual obligation of loving one another, see that your reception among you of one that is weak in his faith (a recent and immature Christian, acting on too confined a principle, and enslaved to prejudice) do not lead εἰς διακρίσεις λογισμῶν.' But what is the meaning of those words? Dr. Peile renders, 'occasioned by the evil thoughts which they entertain of each other.' But such a sense cannot be wrung from the words without great violence. The two versions proposed by Prof. Hodge and Prof. Stuart are equally inadmissible from philological objections, not to be overcome. That of Mackn., which Dr. Peile rejects, is more entitled to be considered the true interpretation than any of the foregoing three. Indeed, it needs only, in order to be entitled to attention, to be amended in the wording thus: 'not so as to produce the differences, alterations, of (i. e. occasioned by) disputative argumentations.' That διακρίσεις may admit of this sense is certain, from the use of διακρίνεσθαι in Jude 9. Acts xi. 2. Sept. in Jer. xv. 10. Ezek. xx. 35, and in the later Greek writers, as Polyb. and Lucian; and so Est. renders, 'ad certamina disputationum,' rather 'disceptationum,' from a signif. found in Plut. Pomp. 20, ἐν διαλογισμοῖς ὧν, where it denotes, 'the disquisitions, or discussions, of the mind with itself, pro and con.' Comp. Judg. v. 16, ἐξέτασμι καρδίας, and Xen. Cyr. viii. 2, 27, ὥσπερ νόμον κατιστήσαστο ὁ Κύριος, ὅσα διακρίσειν δέοιτο ('as to such matters as might need discussion and adjudication'), εἰτε δική εἰτε ἀγωνίσματα, τοὺς δεομένους διακρίσεις συντρέχειν τοῖς κριταῖς. Mr. Alf. makes it mean 'disputes in order to settle the points on which he scruples,' and so long ago in my Lex. 'for the settling of disputed points.' But although this interpretation be very suitable to the context, it needs that establishment by proof, which Mr. Alf. has not adduced, and which I cannot furnish. The wisdom of the Apostle's caution is observable; for to perplex the new convert's mind with points, which his Christian judgment is not sufficiently mature to enable him to grapple with, might drive him into scepticism or worse. See Calvin.

2. The Apostle now illustrates the thing by an example, and shows why he has given the precept. Πιστεύει φαγεῖν, 'is persuaded that he may eat.' At least so Kypke, and most recent Expositors (including Alf.) explain, supposing an ellipse of ἐξείναι. But there needs proof, which has not been adduced, that the expression may be used for ἐξείναι φαγεῖν. Hence it is best to suppose that the idiom rests on some peculiar use (perhaps provincial, or common Greek) of πιστεύειν, namely, by a pregnancy of expression pointed out by De Dieu, conf- idently ventures to eat,—confidently, as trusting it to be safe so to do. He has, indeed, brought no example in proof; but I can adduce at least one, namely, Demosth. p. 866, 1, προῖσθαι δὲ τῆς προῖκα οὐκ ἐπιστάσιν, 'did not confidently venture to give up.' Πάντα: meaning, 'all kinds of food' without distinction, even those forbidden by the Mosaic Law. Λάχανα, i. e. 'even λᾶξ,' rather than forbidden meats; fearing lest he should unwittingly eat meat sold in the market, which had been offered to idols. So Jos., Vit. 93, says of some Jewish priests at Rome, οὐκ ἐλάβοντο τῆς εἰς τὸ θεῖον εὐσεβείας, διετρέφοντο δὲ σόκοις καὶ καρποῖς, i. e. 'from the dread of eating of any unclean flesh meat.' Προσελάβετο, 'has accepted him, admitted him to the benefits and privileges of the Christian religion.' See note on ver. 1.

4. σὺ τίς εἶ, &c.] A further reason why the weak should not judge the strong. 'By what right dost thou hold judgment over another's servant?' meaning Christ's. This use of the formula σὺ τίς εἶ, which occurs also in the Class. writers, imparts much spirit to the appeal of right.—τῷ ἰδίῳ κυρίῳ, not a Dat. commodi et incommodi, as Alf., but of relation, as Stuart and Peile; the sense being in reference to the judgment pronounced at His tribunal, to which he is amenable. This is confirmed by Chrysa. and Theophyl., τῷ δεσπότῃ διαφέρει (pertinet), as to his standing or falling.—στήκει and πίπτει are forensic terms, and signify, 'to stand or fall in judgment,' to be acquitted, or be condemned; and so used in Ps. i. 5. lxxvi. 7, Luke i. 36. Rev. vi. 17, et al. And so all ancient Interpreters, and almost every modern Expositor. The sense assigned by some Foreign Expositors, 'remain in his place as a Christian, or fall from it,' is far-fetched and jejune. As to what Alf. alleges, that the standing in judgment is not in question, that is a matter of opinion; and it need not be understood of the judgment at the last day, but of present acquittal and acceptance, or the reverse. The next clause, σταθίσεται δὲ—αὐτόν, suggests a further reason for forbearance,—and the forensic metaphor seems here dropped, another metaphor being introduced,—namely, that derived from holding up any one who is slipping and falling, and the Apostle seems to have had in view Ps. xvii. 5, 'Hold thou up my goings in thy way, that my footsteps slip not.' Thus the sense is, 'He shall hold him acquitted as to this matter.' See the able note of Estius, who interprets thus: 'Non tuum est eum judicare quasi peccantem edendo, quæ tu putas immunda. Habet dominum ac judicem suum Deum, sive Christum; a quo absolvetur si bene agat, vel condemnabitur si male.' The argument in σταθίσεται, &c., is, as Hyper. observes, that 'there is no reason why the party should so interfere by judgment; since there is a sure hope of the restitution of the person lapsed, or supposed to be lapsed, without any such interference;' besides that it is wholly unnecessary. δυνατός γάρ—αὐτόν, where there is a strong emphasis on δυνατός, which accordingly, under the notion of power, implies also the adjunct one κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην; τῷ ἰδίῳ κυρίῳ στήκει, ἢ πίπτει.

 Σταθῆσεται δὲ δυνατὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ Θεὸς στήσαι αὐτόν. <sup>5</sup> Ὁς <sup>e Gal. 4. 9, 10, Col. 2. 16, 17.</sup> μὲν κρίνει ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν, ὃς δὲ κρίνει πᾶσαν ἡμέραν.
 ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ νοτ' πληροφορεῖσθω. <sup>6</sup> Ὁ φρονῶν τὴν <sup>f 1 Cor. 10. 30, 31. 1 Tim. 4. 8</sup> ἡμέραν, Κυρίῳ φρονεῖ καὶ ὁ μὴ φρονῶν τὴν ἡμέραν, Κυρίῳ οὐ <sup>g 3 Cor. 5. 2</sup> φρονεῖ. καὶ ὁ ἐσθίων, Κυρίῳ ἐσθίει, εὐχαριστεῖ γὰρ τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>Gal. 2. 19, 20. Phil. 1. 30-34. 1 Thess. 5. 10.</sup> καὶ ὁ μὴ ἐσθίων, Κυρίῳ οὐκ ἐσθίει, καὶ εὐχαριστεῖ τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>1 Pet. 4. 2.</sup> 7 Ὁὐδεὶς γὰρ ἡμῶν ἑαυτῷ ζῇ, καὶ οὐδεὶς ἑαυτῷ ἀποθνήσκει.

of 'willingness;' as supra xi. 23; and the sense is well expressed by Estius thus: 'Quamvis homines in fide non satis instructi eum judicent, id est, condemnent, tamen Deus potens est eum absolvere et suo iudicio justificare; quod et faciet.' Comp. 1 Thess. v. 24, πιστὸς ὁ καλῶν ὑμᾶς, ὃς καὶ ποιήσει. The implied notion rests, as Thomas Aquinas shows, on a presumption founded on the goodness of God, 'propter ejus bonitatem presumere debemus quod iterum statuet eum.' Comp. Mic. vii. 8, 'when I fall, I shall arise,' i. e., 'be raised up' (Sept. ἀναστήσεται) by Jehovah; to be supplied from the next clause. For δυνατὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν, A, B, C, and some ancient cursives, have δυνατεῖ γὰρ, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but, although internal evidence may seem in favour of the word, I cannot adopt it; from the want of sufficient external authority, being opposed to all the other uncials, and all the cursives, for I do not find it in any one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies. The reading is, indeed, found in B, C, D, F, G, at 2 Cor. ix. 8, but even there without any cursive. It may, indeed, seem a strong confirmation of δυνατεῖ, that it is found in almost all the copies at 2 Cor. xiii. 3. But the form occurs no where else; and it is, as Dindorf, in Steph. Thesa. in v., shows, such corrupt Greek, that I suspect it to have come in by error of scribes for δυναται (α and ε being oft. confounded). The scribes might make the mistake, since they were prob. well acquainted with the form, which, perhaps, had always been used in the vulgar dialect and in the very low Greek, but not crept into the language of books. In the passage at 2 Cor. ix. 8, it arose prob. from one of two modes of removing the harshness in δυνατός, namely, δυναται and δυνατεῖ.

5. 'Ad aliud genus controversiarum transit Apostolus, ad diem delectum' (Crell.), addecd, says Thom. Aquin., by way of example. Render, 'one man esteems (selects for approbation) one day above another day; another esteems every day alike worthy of honour.' It is obvious, from the context, and from such parallel passages as Gal. iv. 10, 'Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years,' and Col. ii. 16, 'Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holyday, or of the new moon, or of Sabbath days,' that Paul has reference to the Jewish festivals; and therefore his language cannot be applied to the Christian Sabbath. The sentiment of the passage is this: 'One man observes the Jewish festivals, another man does not.' Such we know was the fact in the Apostolic Church, even among those who agreed in the observance of the first day of the week' (Hodge). In ἕκαστος—πληροφορεῖσθω there is a brevity of expression, which requires us to supply from the context ἐσθίων καὶ μὴ ἐσθίων, κρίνων καὶ μὴ κρίνων ἡμέραν. The general sense of the passage is this: 'let every one act with fullness of persuasion, according to the satisfaction of his mind, that he doth what is lawful.'

6. The Apostle now gives examples of both the discrepant sentiments, as well in respect of days, as of meats; and shows, by a new reason, that those who, in this instance, think differently, ought not to feel contempt for each other.

—ὁ φρονῶν lit. 'he who mindeth,' observes.' Κυρίῳ is for eis τὸν Κύριον, 'with a reference to the Lord,' and in obedience to his understood will. Εὐχαριστεῖ τῷ Θεῷ must be so accommodated as to apply both to ὁ ἐσθίων, and to ὁ μὴ ἐσθ. In the former case, it relates both to the returning thanks for the food, and to the Christian liberty of unrestricted use; in the latter case, the sense is, 'return thanks to God for the gift of abstinence.' The general sense may, with Hodge, be thus expressed: 'He who disregards the Mosaic distinction between clean and unclean meats, and uses indiscriminately the common articles of food, acts religiously in so doing, as is evident from his giving God thanks. He could not deliberately thank God for what he supposed God had forbidden him to use. In like manner, he that abstains from certain meats, does it religiously; for he also giveth thanks to God, which implies that he regards himself as acting agreeably to the Divine will.'—It is true that the words καὶ ὁ μὴ φρονῶν—οὐ φρονεῖ are absent from A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and three cursives, and are cancelled in Lachm. and Tisch., ed. 1, but restored in Tisch., ed. 2; rightly,—for 'the words were,' Alf. says, 'lost by the scribes passing over from φρονεῖ to φρονεῖ.' But if so, why did Mr. Alf. place the words in brackets, as probably not genuine?

7. The Apostle now confirms, and amplifies what he has just said by an argument ex toto ad partem; q. d. 'no wonder the particular actions of our life ought to have respect unto the Lord, when our very life itself ought to be wholly subservient to his glory.' (Calv.) The general sense is, in other words, 'But we are, whether alive or dead, wholly and entirely in his power.'—But, to consider the phraseology more particularly. The Datives ἑαυτῷ and Κυρίῳ are Datives of reference; and one of them, ἑαυτῷ, also a Dat. commodi; and so far we may compare Menand. ap. Stob. p. 120, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τὸ ζῆν, οὐχ ἑαυτῷ ζῆν μόνον. Plut. i. 819, Xyl., ἀσχερόν γὰρ ζῆν μόνον ἑαυτοῖς καὶ ἀποθνήσκειν. Thus the sense of this clause is, as Hodge expresses it, 'No Christian considers himself as his own master, or at liberty to regu-

h 1 Cor. 3.
22, 23.
& 15. 28.
1 Thoma. 4.
14—15.
Rev. 14. 15.
1 Acts 10. 42.
3 Cor. 5. 15.
1 Matt. 26.
31.
3 Cor. 5. 10.

8 ἐάν τε γὰρ ζῶμεν, τῷ Κυρίῳ ζῶμεν ἐάν τε ἀποθνήσκωμεν, τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀποθνήσκομεν. <sup>h</sup> Ἐάν τε οὖν ζῶμεν, ἐάν τε ἀποθνήσκωμεν, τοῦ Κυρίου ἐσμέν. <sup>9 i</sup> Εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ Χριστὸς καὶ ἀπέθανε [καὶ ἀνέστη] καὶ [ἀν]έζησεν, ἵνα καὶ νεκρῶν καὶ ζώντων κυριεύσῃ. <sup>10 j</sup> Σὺ δὲ τί κρίνεις τὸν ἀδελφόν σου; ἢ καὶ σὺ τί

late his conduct according to his own will, or for his own ends; he is the servant of God, and, therefore, endeavours to live according to his will, and for his glory.' Consequently, ex opposito, οὐδὲς ἑαυτῷ ἀποθνήσκει must mean, 'no one has, at death, any power over himself and his fate in another state of existence, nor ceases to depend for every thing upon the Lord by whom he is to be judged.'

8. ἐάν τε γὰρ ζῶμεν, &c.] This verse is closely connected with the preceding, as introducing the ground, or inference, of the proposition at v. 7, and consists of two clauses,—the former of which presents, by the γὰρ, the reason why we are bound to live not unto ourselves, viz. because we both live and die unto the Lord, ad ejus arbitrium ac nutum. The latter clause, as Calv. points out, suggests the best reason why we should,—namely, that in every state of our existence, whether in this world or in the next, we belong to Christ. Or we may, with Hyper., regard it as serving to confirm the declaration, that our whole life, and all our actions, are to be devoted to the Lord, inasmuch as He has full power and right over us, as being his property.

9. εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ, &c.] This is, as Calv. and Hyper. point out, a confirmation of what has been just before said, and is adduced in proof of the above assertion,—that 'we are to live and to die unto Christ.' Render: 'Nay, for this end and purpose Christ died, and, after his resurrection, rose again unto glory, and yet liveth, that he might be Sovereign of the whole human race, both the quick and the dead.'

On this verse there exists no little variety of reading. Some MSS. have not the first καὶ; others are without καὶ ἀνέστη; and both are cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; while several uncial and cursive MSS., with some Versions and early Editions, for ἀνέζησεν read ἐζησεν, which is adopted by all the Critical Editors. On again weighing the evidence, and considering the circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that there is no ground for removing the καὶ, and no certainty, though some probability, that the words καὶ ἀνέστη are an interpolation. They are in all the Lamb., and Mus., and Trin. Coll. copies. As to the remaining v. l. ἐζησεν for ἀνέζησεν, there is very considerable authority; to which I add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. As to internal evidence, it draws two ways. Accordingly, I have bracketed the ἀν. Alf. cancels it,—'since,' he says, 'in a case of doubt, early authority must decide.' True! if the testimony of the witnesses were above suspicion, and the reading could not be accounted for on Palaeographical principles in four copies only. On the whole, the reading is an open question, and can scarcely be determined until the cursive MSS. are better collated.

10. σὺ δὲ τί κρίνεις, &c.] Here the Apostle adduces another reason to dissuade his readers from exercising rash judgment, or entertaining undue contempt of each other; and that is suggested partly in the term ἀδελφ.,—which is emphatic, and meant to restrain rash judgment; but chiefly in the words following, πάντες γὰρ παραστησόμεθα τῷ βήματι τοῦ Χρ., which import, 1. that to Christ alone is committed the power of judging; 2. that we are all, whether strong or weak, alike amenable to this judgment, and therefore are not warranted in judging, much less contemning and despising, each other: and, accordingly, that all must be left to the judgment of one great and true Estimator, and none ought to presume to intrude upon his province. There is great force in the expression σὺ δὲ—ἢ καὶ σὺ, of which, as Koppe says, the former σὺ refers to the scrupulous Christian, who condemned the laxity of his brethren; the latter to the better informed, who despised those who were actuated by superstitious scruples.—To advert to a matter of various reading. For Χριστοῦ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit Θεοῦ, from A, B, C, D, E, F, G, with the Coptic and some later Versions. The reading is very specious, since internal evidence may seem in favour of Θεοῦ, from the probability that Χριστοῦ might have crept in from 2 Cor. v. 10. But the insufficiency of external authority, by the total want of cursives to confirm the testimony of the seven uncials, weakens that evidence; while Χρ. is supported by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, and by Origen, Cyrill., and Chrys. t. ix. 705. vi. 429. ix. 229. However, the testimony of all the MSS. except seven is, it seems, according to Mr. Alford's opinion, to 'decide nothing in the presence of the expression in 2 Cor., βήματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ.' But why should we not suppose that Θεοῦ was introduced by the same Alexandrians who made, sub auctoritate, so many other alterations? The probability is, that they did. As to the Fathers, Damasc. and Rufinus, adduced for Θεοῦ, they will weigh little in the balance, since we may well suppose that, as Matthæi says, each, as 'homileta aut dogmaticus,' did it 'ideo quod utramque Christo accommodabat.' just as did Cyrill., ubi supra, cited by Matthæi, where, after citing παραστησόμεθα διὰ τῷ Χριστῷ, he remarks, καθίσταται γὰρ ἐπὶ θρόνον δόξης αὐτοῦ, κρίνων τὴν οὐκουμένην ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ· καί-τοι λέγονται τοῦ Δαυὶδ, ὅτι Θεὸς κριτὴς ἐστί. Θεὸς ἀπὸ ἐστίν ὁ Χριστός. In short, I doubt not that Χρ. was altered to Θεῷ by the Alexandrian Critics, because they thought it called for by the next verse. Bp. Terrot, indeed, remarks, that the difference of reading cannot affect the sense, since 'He who at ver. 9 rules the living and the dead, at whose tribunal we shall stand (ver. 10), and before whom every knee shall bow, is one and the same, called indifferently Χριστός, Κύριος, and Θεός.' And so Hodge observes, that 'the Apostle evidently considers the authority of Christ as being tantamount to submission to God, and without hesitation ap-

ἐξουθενεῖς τὸν ἀδελφόν σου; πάντες γὰρ παραστησόμεθα τῷ
 βήματι τοῦ † Χριστοῦ <sup>11</sup> ἡ γέγραπται γάρ· Ζῶ ἐγὼ, (λέγει <sup>1</sup> Ps. 72. 11.
 Κύριος,) ὅτι ἐμοὶ κάμψει πᾶν γόνυ, καὶ πᾶσα γλῶσσα <sup>2</sup> Gal. 6. 6.
 ἐξομολογήσεται τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>12</sup> ἄρα οὖν ἕκαστος ἡμῶν περὶ <sup>3</sup> Phil. 2. 10.
 ἑαυτοῦ λόγον δώσει τῷ Θεῷ. <sup>13</sup> Μηκέτι οὖν ἀλλήλους κρί- <sup>4</sup> Rev. 5. 14.
 νωμεν ἀλλὰ τούτο κρίνατε μᾶλλον, τὸ μὴ τιθέναι πρόσκομμα <sup>1</sup> Matt. 12.
 τῷ ἀδελφῷ ἢ σκάνδαλον. <sup>14</sup> Οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι ἐν Κυρίῳ <sup>2</sup> Gal. 6. 6.
 Ἰησοῦ, ὅτι οὐδὲν κοινὸν δι' ἑαυτοῦ, εἰ μὴ τῷ λογιζομένῳ τι κοινὸν <sup>3</sup> Gal. 13. 17.
 εἶναι ἐκείνῳ κοινόν. <sup>15</sup> Εἰ δὲ διὰ βρῶμα ὁ ἀδελφός σου λυ- <sup>1</sup> 1 Pet. 4. 8.
 πείται, οὐκ ἔτι κατὰ ἀγάπην περιπατεῖς. μὴ τῷ βρώματί σου <sup>2</sup> 1 Cor. 10.
 ἐκείνον ἀπόλλυε, ὑπὲρ οὗ Χριστὸς ἀπέθανε. <sup>16</sup> Μὴ βλασφη-plies the declarations of the Old Testament in relation to the universal dominion of Jehovah, in proof of the Redeemer's sovereignty.' With him, therefore, Christ our Lord was God.

11. The foregoing position is now confirmed from the sure word of prophecy.

— γέγραπται γάρ, &c.] meaning, 'agreeably to what is said in Scripture,'—namely, Isa. xiv. 23, wherein there is, indeed, some variation from the Sept. and the Hebrew, yet not near so great as would at first sight appear; for, 1. the words λέγει Κύριος form no part of the quotation, but were (as often) added by the Apostle to indicate the speaker; 2. the words εἰ μὴ ἐξαλείψεται—ἀποστραφήσονται were omitted by the Apostle, as not necessary to his purpose; 3. in the next words the Apostle follows the Sept. (not the Heb.), at least in the Alexandrian and some other MSS. The only real discrepancy is in the first words, ζῶ ἐγὼ, which, however, form really an equivalent (and Scriptural) expression to the κατ' ἑμαυτοῦ ὁμολογία of the Sept.; see Numb. xiv. 21, 28. Jer. xxii. 24. Ezek. v. 11. xx. 3. Judg. viii. 14. Zeph. ii. 19.

12. ἕκαστος ἡμ. περὶ ἑαυτοῦ λ. δ. τ. θ.] 'Conclusio hæc ad humilitatem ac submissionem nos revocat: unde etiam statim inferat, ut ne iudicemus alter alterum: quia nobis fas non est iudicandi vices usurpare, quos subeundi pariter iudicii et reddendæ rationis manet necessitas.' (Calv.) So also Estius, who points out, that a stress is laid on περὶ ἑαυτοῦ; q. d. 'de factis propriis, non de alienis.' And he adds, 'Quod intellige, nisi quatenus aliorum vita ad nostram curam pertinet, et aliorum peccata ex officio nostri negligentis proveniunt.' Comp. Gal. vi. 5, ἕκαστος τὸν ἑαυτοῦ φορτίον βαρύνει. That the same emphasis is intended to be laid on ἀλλήλους at the next verse, meant to be referred to περὶ ἑαυτοῦ, has been pointed out by Croll, and Est., who show that the ἀλλά. is used as at Eph. v. 13.

13. The Apostle had before reproved the weak who censured the strong in the use of their Christian liberty. He now proceeds, 13—23, to restrain the strong from offending their weak brethren by too free a use of their liberty, in not forbearing the use of it when it might give offence to the weak. 'After drawing the conclusion from the preceding discussion,—that we should leave the office of judging in the hands of God,—the Apostle introduces the second leading topic of the Chapter,—namely, the manner in which Christian liberty is to be exercised. He teaches that it is not enough that we are persuaded a certain course is, in itself considered, right, in order to authorize us to pursue it. We must be careful that we do not injure others in the use of our liberty.' (Hodge.)

—μηκέτι οὖν ἀλλήλους κρίνωμεν, &c.] Commentators notice the anastrophe in κρίνωμεν and κρίματα, the word being first used in the sense 'to pass severe and unjust judgment upon,' and then 'to resolve.'

14. Here, as Calv. and Hyper. remark, is anticipated an objection on the part of the strong, to justify their not making any distinction between meats. In removing which it is shown, as a general principle, that though there be no sin in the case simply, yet there may be from the circumstances of the use; namely, if thereby our brother be disquieted in his conscience. See Estius.

—οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι, &c.] A strong expression, to denote full persuasion from complete knowledge.—ἐν Κυρίῳ ἰ., i. e. 'by the teaching of Jesus Christ himself,' and not by human reasonings. See Theophyl., Theodor., and Est.

—ὅτι οὐδὲν κοινόν] By the limitation suggested in the context, the sense must be, 'no kind of meat is of, or by itself, in its own nature, impure (i. e. unlawful); but to him who accounts it to be unlawful,' to him it is unlawful; meaning (as Grot. and others explain) that 'the persuasion of any food being forbidden, is to a Christian Jew, as long as he is so persuaded, sufficient to make it unlawful for him to use that liberty which it has given him from the yoke of the Mosaic ordinances.' The εἰ μὴ is not put for ἀλλά, but is used in its ordinary sense, and is only introductory of another and an exceptive clause.

15. διὰ βρῶμα] 'through [thy eating of] food.'—λυπεῖται is explained by the older Commentators, 'is injured and hurt;' by the more recent ones, 'is brought into grief,' i. e. self-condemnation, by being induced to do what he believes to be unlawful. The expression seems simply to mean, 'is disquieted and perplexed with doubts,'—κατὰ ἀγάπην, 'agreeably to Christian charity,' which requires us, for the sake of a weaker brother, to suffer one's own liberty to be circumscribed in any matter not unlawful. By ἀπόλλυε is meant, not final perdition, but rather a present falling from a state of salvation by apostasy or otherwise.

16. μὴ βλ. ὅ. τὸ ἀγαθόν] 'act not so as to p 1 Cor. 8. 8.

Col. 2. 16, 17.
Heb. 12. 9.
q Isa. 46. 24.
r 2 Cor. 5. 6.
Dan. 9. 24.
r 2 Cor. 8. 21.
Phil. 4. 18.
1 Tim. 2. 3.
2 & 5. 4.
s Matt. 18.
11.
Acts 16. 18.
Tit. 1. 15.

μείσθω οὖν ὑμῶν τὸ ἀγαθόν 17 οὐ γάρ ἐστιν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ βρώσις καὶ πόσις, ἡ ἀλλὰ δικαιοσύνη καὶ εἰρήνη καὶ χαρὰ ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ 18 ὁ γὰρ ἐν τούτοις δουλεύειν τῷ Χριστῷ, εὐάρεστος τῷ Θεῷ καὶ δόκιμος τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. 19 Ἄρα οὖν τὰ τῆς εἰρήνης διώκωμεν, καὶ τὰ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους. 20 Ἐνεκεν βρώματος κατάλυε τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ. Πάντα give occasion that your right sense of your Christian liberty in the indiscriminate use of foods be evil spoken of.' (Abp. Newcome.) However, the force of τὸ ἀγαθόν is a point not a little debated. Orig., Calv., Beza, Grot., Est., Olsh., and Hodge, render, 'your freedom,' 'your Christian liberty,' as 1 Cor. x. 29. But that destroys the contrast. It seems better to interpret it, with Chrys., Theophyl., Theodor., and Phot. ap. Ecum., τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν, meaning, 'your strength of faith and grace'; τὴν ἀληθισμένην εὐσέβειαν, Chrys. See also Thom. Aquin.

17. οὐ γάρ ἐστιν—πόσις] A popular and familiar mode of expression, by which the Apostle adduces another reason for caution in the use of meats, and forbearance in offending a weak brother; and that drawn from the principal end of our religion; we may render freely, but faithfully, 'The kingdom of heaven does not consist in, &c.'; q. d. 'The essence of Christianity consists in far different things than the exercise of one's right to eat meats without distinction.' Here it is not meats and drinks that are considered, but virtue, peace (as opposed to a contentious opposition to conscientious prejudices), spiritual joy, or that inward joy which springs from the consolations of the Holy Ghost: meaning, in short (as Bp. Sanderson explains), that 'the religion of Christ consists in the exercise of holy graces, and the conscientious performance of unquestioned duties.' Comp. 1 Cor. iv. 20.

18. 'A consequenti ductum est argumentum' (Calv.); and there is, as Hodge observes, a confirmation of the preceding verse.—By τούτοις are meant the foregoing holy dispositions and spiritual graces, or fruits of the Spirit. It is true, that, for τούτοις, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit τούτω, from A, B, C, D, F, G, and one cursive MS., besides the Vulg. Vera, and some Greek Fathers. But external authority here is insufficient, and internal evidence, fairly weighed, is in favour of τούτοις, since it is called for by the three particulars just before mentioned, namely, the three spiritual graces constituting the justification, reconciliation with God, sanctification,—essential points of the Christian character. And, accordingly, to read τούτω (which arose, I doubt not, by the constant confounding of the terminations ωι and ου), detracts not a little from the force and significance of the words. Mr. Alf., indeed, strenuously maintains τούτω, which he believes expresses 'the aggregate of the three graces,' and takes it, with Baumg. and Crucius, as equiv. to ὅπως. But this is a piling down of the sense, which he would, and justly too, object to in any one but himself. The almost total want of support to τούτω in cursives is suspicious; and the authority of the Pesh. Syr. Vera. strongly confirms the text. rec.

—εὐάρεστος τῷ Θεῷ καὶ, &c.] This is a familiar expression, to signify, 'is in favour both with God and man.' So a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoëttgen: 'Ut diligatur superius (i. e. a cælo, a Deo) et desideratus sit inferius (in terrâ) et acceptus hominibus.' How the senses 'peace and uprightness,' which Mr. Alf. ascribes to the term δόκ., can be got out of the term, I see not. The true force, as expressed by the ancient Versions, is 'probatas,' 'acceptus'; lit. 'approved and received, after trial'; by a metaph. taken from money that has passed the assay, and is received as sterling;—so often in the New Test. and Class. writers. See my Lex., and comp. Hdot., iii. 143, ἐὰν ἐν τοῖς ἀστοῖσι δόκιμος, as said of a person who has stood the test, and is, as it were, stamped with public approbation.

19. Ἄρα οὖν] 'So then,' 'such being the case' (a formula frequent with St. Paul, but not with the other writers of the New Test., or with the Class. writers). The inference is drawn from the preceding context; q. d. in the words of Prof. Hodge, 'Since Christian love [rather, 'peace and love'], the example of Christ, the comparative insignificance of the matters in dispute, the honour of the truth, the nature of real religion, all conspire to urge us to mutual forbearance, let us endeavour to promote peace and mutual edification.'

20. μὴ ἔνεκεν βρώματος κατάλυε τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ] The phrase τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ has been variously interpreted. Some, as Est. and Menoch., regard the ἔργον as standing for the weak brother mentioned, supra, ver. 15, because (they urge) 'edificare et destruere sive dissolvere' must be referred to the same subject; wherefore, since edification has reference to the brother, so must destruction. But καταλύειν is not the same with ἀπόλλυμι: nor does it seem to have been the intent of the Apostle to have said the same thing as at ver. 15 ἄκαια. He meant, I apprehend, to repeat in substantia the foregoing injunction, in order, as Calvin well points out, 'to show the importance of what he had said in the verse before, διώκωμεν τὰ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς, and where the architectural allusion at τῆς οἰκοδομῆς suggested the use of the expression here, ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ, and consequently the other term, καταλύειν.' Yet that will not prove that the Apostle meant to allude to the person as a πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, Eph. ii. 10, 'a holy temple in the Lord,' ii. 18; for here we have ἔργον used, and not πνεῦμα, and the context is against that application. Hence I still prefer to take the expression (as I have all along done) of breaking down and 'undoing' the work which God might be doing on the soul of the weak brother, by strengthening faith, increasing grace (James iv. 6), and nourishing that love, so intimately connected with the peace just before

μὲν καθαρὰ· ἀλλὰ κακὸν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ πῶς διὰ προσκόμματος
 ἐσθίουσι. <sup>21</sup> Καλὸν τὸ μὴ φαγεῖν κρέα, μηδὲ πίνειν οἶνον, μηδὲ <sup>1</sup> 1 Cor. 8. 18.
 ἐν ᾧ ὁ ἀδελφός σου προσκόπτει ἢ σκανδαλίζεται ἢ ἀσθενεῖ.
<sup>22</sup> <sup>u</sup> Σὺ πίστιν ἔχεις· κατὰ σεαυτὸν ἔχε ἐνόμιον τοῦ Θεοῦ <sup>u</sup> Gal. 2. 1.
 James 2. 12.

inculcated. To which purpose we may comp. Gal. vi. 16, ἀγάπη, χαρὰ, εὐφροσύνη, and supra v. 17. This view of the force of the expression is confirmed and illustrated by Phil. i. 6, where this work of God is represented as being carried on progressively in the souls of the regenerate, through the sanctification of the Spirit. This interpretation is adopted, and ably supported, by Calvin, who truly remarks, that 'wherever there is even a spark of piety, there we may recognize the work of God; which they quench and destroy who by their injudiciousness unsettle the yet weak [ill-informed] conscience.' See also Macknight and Dr. Burton.

— πάντα μὲν καθαρὰ.—ἐσθίουσι.] 'The ground on which this forbearance is urged, is not that the things in question are in themselves evil, but solely that the use of them is injurious to others.' (Hodge).—By κακόν, however, we must understand, 'what is morally wrong,' 'criminal.' The words may be referred either to the weak Christian, who, if he eateth διὰ προσκόμματος (i.e. ἐν προσκόμῳ, stumbingly, with an uncertain and dubious mind), sinneth; or rather, to the better instructed and advanced Christian, who, if, by eating, he offends and causes another to sin (διὰ προσκόμματος, for μετὰ προσκόμματος, i.e. 'occasioning an offence to him'), himself also sinneth.

21. καλόν (sc. ἐστι) τὸ μὴ φαγεῖν, &c.] The general sense is, 'It is good (as called for by duty) to abstain from flesh used in sacrifice to idols, or wine poured in libation to idols; or to abstain from flesh altogether; or from any other act in the presence of those who may thus be ensnared to sin, and perplexed with doubts.'

At the μηδὲ before ἐν ᾧ there is an ellipsis, which is variously filled up by Expositors. Koppe supplies πίνειν τι, referring it to any other intoxicating drink besides wine. But that is not permitted by the context, since by 'wine' Paul means wine that had been offered up to idols,—as of meats that had been so offered up. The true ellipsis is that which Expositors generally supply, ποιεῖν (or rather πράσσειν), which carries with it, by implication, its subject τι, sc. πρᾶγμα and ἄλλο, alluding, I apprehend, to the use of those meats and drinks in the way of excess. Mr. Conyb., however, so stumbles at what he terms 'the extreme awkwardness of the ellipsis, necessitated by the received text,' that he thinks it strange no Critic has hitherto proposed the simple emendation of reading ἐν for ἐν, which would remove the awkwardness. True,—but it would introduce bad Greek, since τι is required in such a construction, and ἐν rejected by propriety. Besides, had ἐν been written by Paul, how can we account for its change into the more difficult ἐν?—and thus internal evidence is against the emendation, which is very like many such proceeding from the Alexandrian Critics. As to the ellipsis (which was seen, and rightly supplied, by the Pesch. Syr. Translator) it is not harsher than multitudes which occur in the purest Greek writers. Besides, ἐν cannot be dispensed with at ᾧ (sc. πράγματι).

The words ἢ σκανδαλίζεται ἢ ἀσθενεῖ are absent from A, C, and one cursive, with several Versions and Fathers, and were rejected by Mill, and have been cancelled by Tisch., as being a mere gloss. Such, however, can hardly be the case with ἢ ἀσθενεῖ; and if that clause be genuine, so probably is the preceding one. It is strange that Mill and Tisch., after collating so many MSS., should not at once have seen that the words were omitted in the Archetype of MSS. A and C, by reason of forming one line, corresponding to the preceding, ending with προσκόπτει, and thus the scribe's eye passed from one ε to the other, and thus he omitted the words in question. And this was the more likely to happen, because the most ancient MSS. are almost invariably written in double columns, composed of very short lines, comprising seldom more than four or five words. Thus this circumstance multiplied the chances of that class of blunders among which I number the error in question. There is, indeed, great force in this use of three terms so nearly allied in sense; and here, as Chrys. and Theophyl. say conjoined, to represent the person as altogether weak. Calvin, indeed, traces here an anti-climax; q. d. 'Ne fratribus causa lapsus prebeat, imo nec offensionis; imo nec infirmitatis.' Σκανδαλιζέσθαι, however, is rather a stronger term than προσκόπτειν, denoting such a stumbling as verges to a total fall; the two terms representing less or greater degrees of mental perturbation and perplexity. The third term is, I apprehend, meant to indicate the natural result of the foregoing (compare 1 Cor. viii. 9), in that state of mental vacillation, whereby any one is disabled from distinguishing between what is lawful and what is unlawful, in respect of Christian liberty,—which is a great impediment to growth in grace, and not unfrequently terminates in backsliding, nay, sometimes in virtual apostasy.

22. σὺ πίστιν ἔχεις.] The ancient and early modern Commentators read this interrogatively; the more recent ones, declaratively; which latter mode is confirmed by the Peschito Syriac. And so Lachm. and Tisch. point; which may be defended, and is often found in the Classical writers, especially those of the Comic Drama; but is not suitable to the character of the present address,—and, indeed, to that of the Apostle. Some ancient Critics, however, using MSS. that had not the marks of interrogation, and stumbling at the declarative sense, prefixed an ἢ, to remove the difficulty; and the reading was, most injudiciously, adopted by Lachm., merely because contained in his three crack MSS. A, B, D, though it only furnishes one among a vast multitude of instances of their corrupted text.—But, to turn from verbal Criticism to matters of far more moment: πίστις must here denote 'a full persuasion that what one is doing is lawful and right,' 'a full assent of the judgment and con-

v ch. 7. 15
24.
Act. 24. 16.
x Tit. 1. 12.
Heb. 11. 6.

a ch. 14. 1.
1 Cor. 9. 23.
Gal. 6. 1.

ἡ μακάριος ὁ μὴ κρίνων ἑαυτὸν ἐν ᾧ δοκιμάζει. 23 Ὁ δὲ διακρινόμενος, ἐὰν φάγῃ, κατακέκριται, ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως· πᾶν δὲ ὁ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως, ἁμαρτία ἐστίν.

XV. 1 Ὁ φειλλόμενος δὲ ἡμεῖς οἱ δυνατοὶ τὰ ἀσθενήματα τῶν science.'—κατὰ σεαυτὸν ἔχει [comp. Heliod. vii. 16, κατὰ σεαυτὸν ἔχει, καὶ μηδενὶ φράζει]. The full sense is, 'keep this persuasion to yourself, and your God; use it when you have no other witness; and do not, in exercising it before men, employ it so as to cause your fellow Christian and weaker brother to fail in his duty.' The words of the next clause, μακάριος ὁ μὴ—δοκιμάζει, are capable of more than one sense. Professor Hodge considers it to mean, 'blessed is the man that has a good conscience; who does not allow himself to do what he secretly [in his heart] condemns.' The words are susceptible of this sense; and, if it be the true one, one might suppose the saying formed on Sirach xiv. 2, μακάριος οὗ οὐ κατέγνω ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ. But this is not permitted by the context, which rather requires what I have laid down.—'Happy is he who doth not condemn himself,' expose himself to condemnation, in the way he makes of what he allows himself to do, in the use of his Christian liberty,—namely, by using it in an imprudent manner; or, as Olsh. and Alf., 'It is a blessed thing to have no scruples about things in which we allow ourselves.' The apophthegm has some appearance of being formed on one of the ἀγραφὰ dicta Jesu, unrecorded in the Gospels, which might at that early period be well known by recent tradition to be from our Lord. And we know that on another occasion, recorded in Acts xx. 25, St. Paul has adduced an actual ἀγραφὸν ῥῆμα: Μακάριόν ἐστι διδόναι μᾶλλον ἢ λαμβάνειν. See my note on Luke vi. 5. Olsh. here thinks it has reference to a saying purporting to be from our Lord in the Cod. Bezae at Luke vi. 5, εἰ μὲν οἴσας τί ποιῆτε, μακάριος εἰ, εἰ δὲ μὴ οἴσας, ἱπικατάρατος καὶ παραβάτης εἰ τοῦ νόμου. But the saying is not in our Lord's manner; and the authority for ascribing it to Him is very bad.

23. ὁ δὲ διακριν.—κατακ.] Render: 'But he who wavereth (hath scruples) about eating, incurs condemnation,' or, 'is virtually condemned, if he eat (i. e. in eating), because (the eating) is not from faith; i. e. 'is without faith,'—'without a full persuasion that he is acting rightly.' Theophyl. well remarks, διὰ τί; οὐχ ὅτι ἀκάθαρτον ἦν τὸ βρώμα, ἀλλ' ὅτι οὐκ ἐπίστανεν ὅτι καθαρὸν ἴσται, ἀλλ' ἦν αὐτὸ τοῦ βρώματος, ὡς ἀκάθαρτον. Theodor. regards the words ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ πίστ., and πᾶν δὲ ὁ, as stating the reason for the former; q. d. ὁ γὰρ πιστεύων ἀβλαβῶς μεταλαμβάνει· ὁ δὲ μετὰ τινος διακρίσιος (waverings, scrupling) ἰσθίων καθ' ἑαυτοῦ ψήφον ἐκφέρει = αὐτοκατάκριτός ἐστι. So Bp. Sanderson, Serm. p. 811, 'Be the thing what it may in itself, yet his doubting makes it unlawful to him, so long as he remains doubtful, because it cannot be of faith.'

—πᾶν δὲ οὐκ ἐκ π. ἀν. δ. i.] "Here (Bulling. observes) Paul follows up the preceding reason why the person incurs condemnation by a gnome generalis; but a 'gnome generalis' meant for universal application, not only to the present case, but to all other cases, and of which the sense is,—'that whatever is done, without a full persuasion that it is lawful, is sinful;'" or, as Hodge expresses it, 'whatever we do, which are not sure is right, is wrong.' See a most masterly Discourse of Bp. Sanderson on this text, in which, after ably settling the connexion and scope of the text, he shows that faith must here be the persuasion of the judgment and conscience. He then proceeds to inquire,—I. What is the power of the conscience, as concerning the lawfulness or unlawfulness of actions. II. Whether, in every thing we do, an actual consideration thereof be necessarily requisite. III. What degrees of persuasion is required for the warranting of our actions: whether or no, and how far, a man may warrantably act, with reluctancy of conscience. Wherein is considered the case, 1. of a resolved conscience; 2. of a doubting conscience; 3. of a scrupulous conscience. Upon the whole, he proves that the true import of the text is, in effect, this: 'Whosoever shall enterprise the doing of any thing which he verily believed to be unlawful, or, at least, is not reasonably well persuaded of the lawfulness thereof, let the thing be otherwise, and in itself what it may be, lawful or unlawful, indifferent or necessary, convenient or inconvenient, it matters not,—TO HIM IT IS A SIN.' Here Wets. and Grot. compare similar sentiments from the Class. writers, and Schoettigen some from the Rabbinical ones.

The doxology τῷ δὲ δυναμῶτι, &c., which in the textus receptus comes in at the end of the Epistle, is, in the far greater part of the MSS., including almost all the Lambeth and Museum copies, Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, with several Versions and Fathers, inserted here: a position approved by Grot. and Hamm., adopted by Mill, Wetstein, Matthæi, and Griesbach; but which has been rejected by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. It is a question of very difficult determination, wherein no certainty can be attained. External evidence would seem to be in favour of its insertion here; yet the testimonies for the former position are weighty, including the two most ancient of the MSS. (the Alexandrian and Vatican), and the most ancient Versions. As to internal evidence, it cannot well be balanced, since there are various considerations drawing both ways, which tend to make the ordinary canons of criticism of uncertain application: but, upon the whole, it seems against the genuineness. The internal congruity, moreover, of the passage, as Stuart shows, is strongly against its insertion here; and though St. Paul does sometimes insert a doxology in the body of an Epistle, yet (as he points out) it is in quite a different situation from the present. Besides, as Bp. Terrot remarks, 'the argument of ch. xiv. is so manifestly continued in the first seven verses of ch. xv., that one cannot conceive this to be a proper place for the Doxology.'

XV. This chapter consists of two Parts;—I. vv. 1—13, where Paul enforces the duty ἀδυνάτων βαστάζειν, καὶ μὴ ἑαυτοῖς ἀρέσκειν <sup>2</sup> ἕκαστος [γὰρ] <sup>b1 Cor. 9. 10. & 10. 24. 25. & 12. 5. Phil. 2. 4. & Tit. 2. 9. 10. c Pa. 60. 9. 10. 3. 50. 50. 51. Matt. 10. 26. John 10. 24. d ch. 4. 23. 24.</sup> ἡμῶν τῷ πλησίον ἀρεσκέτω εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν πρὸς οἰκοδομήν.

<sup>3</sup> Καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστὸς οὐχ ἑαυτῷ ἤρρεσεν, ἀλλὰ, καθὼς γέγραπται· Οἱ ὀνειδισμοὶ τῶν ὀνειδιζόντων σε ἐπέπεσον ἐπ'
 ἐμέ. <sup>4</sup> Ὅσα γὰρ προεγράφη, εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν διδασκαλίαν προεγράφη· ἵνα διὰ τῆς ὑπομονῆς καὶ τῆς παρακλήσεως τῶν γραφῶν τὴν ἐλπίδα ἔχωμεν. <sup>5</sup> Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς ὑπομονῆς καὶ

<sup>1</sup> Cor. 10. 11. <sup>2</sup> Tim. 3. 16. e ch. 12. 16. <sup>3</sup> Cor. 1. 10. Phil. 2. 2. & 2. 15, 16. & 4. 2. 1 Pet. 2. 9.

urged in the preceding chapter, by considerations derived principally from the example of Christ. In Part II., vv. 14—33, 'we have the conclusion of the whole discussion, in which the Apostle speaks of his confidence in the Roman Christians, of his motives for writing to them, of his apostolic office and labours, and of his purpose to visit Rome after fulfilling his ministry for the saints at Jerusalem.' (Hodge.)

1—3. Here, after a conclusion from the preceding discussion, we have further exhortations to bear with the infirmities of the weak, from the example of Christ, in order thereby to promote the general welfare of the brethren.

1. By οἱ δυνατοί, as opposed to ἀδύνατοι, must be understood 'the more abundant in knowledge, and the stronger in faith' (xiv. 22, comp. with Luke xxiv. 19, and Acts vii. 22, δυνατοὶ ἐν λόγοις); and by the ἀδύνατοι, 'those less skilled and instructed,' and therefore sometimes in hesitation and doubt as to the lawfulness, or unlawfulness, of any thing. By ἀσθενήματα are meant 'the unfounded, though conscientious, scruples' adverted to in ch. xiv. —βαστάζειν signifies 'to bear with;' a metaphor taken from strong persons who aid their weak fellow-travellers, by occasionally carrying for them their burdens. It is here applied to the duty of using Christian forbearance, rather than offend the prejudices of a weak brother. By ἑαυτοῖς ἀρέσκειν is meant 'gratifying ourselves' by having our own views received as absolute verities.

The phrase ἑαυτῷ ἥρ. is nearly equiv. to ζητῶν τὸ ἑαυτοῦ συμφέρον. 1 Cor. x. 33, meaning 'to please oneself' (only), 'have one's own way,' without regard to the good of others. The phrase is very rare in Class. writers, but it occurs in Plato, p. 101, αὐτοῖς αὐτοῖς ἥρ., and elsewhere, also in Schol. on Æschyl. Prom. 156, αὐτὸς ἑαυτῷ ἀρίσκειν, 'making his own will the law of Justice.'

2. ἀρεσκέτω εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν πρὸς οἰκὸδ. By the addition of this qualifying phrase, εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν πρὸς οἰκοδομήν (meaning, 'so far as may be for his good, unto his edification, and that of the Church')—for the Apostle means to limit his precept, showing that it must be for his good, both morally and spiritually (for otherwise this pleasing will be for harm and evil, so easily does ἀρίσκεια fall into abject subservience); and also for the good of the Church generally, by the promotion of peace and harmony.

3. καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστός, &c.] The foregoing injunction is now pressed on their observance by the example of Christ himself, who set a noble pattern of pure disinterestedness by ever acting on the rule of not pleasing himself. The next sentiment ('nay, he bore patiently the insults of men') is clothed in the words of Scripture, Ps. lxi. 9, 10, adduced by application without the formula citandi; where the words ὀνειδ.—ἐπ' ἐμέ are best considered as containing a metaphor taken from stripes which have fallen upon any one, i. e. which have been laid on him,—a metaphor as apt as it is expressive, since reproaches may be considered as the verbera linguæ. See my Lex. N. T. on ἐπιπλήσσω. And as it would be quite correct to say αἱ πληγαὶ ἐπ' ἐπασόν τινι (and accordingly in Plut. Alex. 9 we have τῆς πληγῆς προσπισούσης αὐτῷ), so here the figure in question is one highly suitable.

4. ὅσα γὰρ προεγράφη, &c.] These words, as Grot. and Crell. observe, are meant to anticipate an objection,—namely, that the above passage has reference to David, not to Christ, or Christians. To this we have here the answer, part of which is contained in a suppressed clause dependent on γὰρ: q. d. [ 'It does, indeed, pertain to David, but it is typical of Christ, or at any rate is intended to serve for our example and instruction; ] for whatever things were written, &c. So that, by studying the example of their patience and forbearance, and bearing in mind the support they received under trials and tribulations, they might hope, under prayer, to obtain the same. Accordingly, this well paves the way for the subject, next introduced, of Christian unanimity.

At the second προεγράφη the προ has been expunged by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. on the authority of B, C, D, E, F, G, and 2 cursives (one from alteration); but without reason, since external authority is insufficient; and internal evidence is against the removal, because it is far more probable that the προ was removed, as considered unnecessary and tautological, than 'introduced,' as Alf. supposes, 'for uniformity.'

5. Here, Hyper. remarks, we have the conclusion of the whole passage, consisting of comprecation (vv. 5, 6), and exhortation, ver. 7. 'In this verse,' observes Hodge, 'the graces, which in the preceding verse are ascribed to the Scriptures, are here attributed to God, as their Author, because he produces them by his Spirit. The full sense of the verse is ably drawn forth by Bp. Sanderson, in a Sermon on this text, where, after pointing out the connection and scope of the words, he shows the nature of the prayer here made; and after observing that prayer is properly united with instruction, and that God is the only Author of peace; and having shown the necessity of that influence of God on the mind and heart of man, which alone can eradicate pride and insatiable humility,—he inquires why God is called the God of patience and of consolation, and treats on the choice of these attributes, and the reason for

† Eph. 5. 2.
Phil. 2. 4, 6.

g ch. 14. 1, 2.
h Matt. 18.
24.
Acts 3. 26.
26.
ch. 9. 4.

τῆς παρακλήσεως δόξῃ ὑμῖν τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν ἐν ἀλλήλοις ἡ κατὰ Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν ὅτι ὡς ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἐν ἐνὶ στόματι δοξάζετε τὸν Θεὸν καὶ Πατέρα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. ὅτι διὸ προσλαμβάνεσθε ἀλλήλους, καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς προσελάβετο * ὑμᾶς, εἰς δόξαν Θεοῦ. ὁ δὲ λέγω, Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν διάκονον their union here. On the matter of the prayer, he considers these following particulars:—I. The thing itself prayed for, namely, like-mindedness [i. e. harmony of feeling], and then two amplifications thereof,—I. in respect of the persons, that it should be universal, and mutual; 2. in respect of the matter, that it should be according to Christ Jesus. II. He considers the second qualification in κατὰ Χριστὸν, importing an agreement, 1st, unto truth and holiness; 2dly, after the example, and in obedience to the command, of Christ.

—ὁ Θεὸς τῆς ὑπομονῆς καὶ τῆς παρακλ.] An expression, I apprehend, used not merely (as many Expositors think) with reference to the various means whereby all things are made to work for good in the end to them that love God, in conjunction with the motives of patience and consolation supplied by the Scriptures. At any rate, it seems meant to allude to the work of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, on the heart; a view, I find, adopted by Calvin, who observes: ‘Ab effectis sic nominatur Deus, quæ prius Scripture attribuebantur; solus enim Deus patientiæ et consolationis auctor est, quia utrumque cordibus nostris instillat per Spiritum suum.’

Here it is well observed by Bp. Sanderson, that ‘being to pray for unity, the Apostle might well make mention of patience, as an especial help thereto, and consolation as an especial fruit and effect thereof, since patience will ever be found the best peace-maker.’

—τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν] The expression is, as Bp. Sanderson remarks, ‘peculiar to St. Paul, and may here be supposed to have reference at once to the understanding and the judgment, and also to the will and affections; namely, that God would so frame the hearts of these Romans one towards another, that there might be, as far as possible, an universal accord amongst them, both in their opinions, and also in their sentiments and affections.’

6. ὡς ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἐν ἐνὶ στόματι, &c.] The full import of these words is well pointed out by Bp. Sanderson, in a Sermon on this text; in which, I. He treats at large on the subject of glorifying God, and proves that the glory of God should be intended as our chief end, for two reasons: 1. as being our chief good; 2. as that whereunto we are both in duty and in wisdom obliged. Hence he adduces an inference of admission, that we do not bestow on any creature, or draw to ourselves, any of that glory which is due to God alone. II. He shows the reason of the expression τὸν Θεὸν καὶ Πατέρα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. III. He considers the glorification of God ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἐν ἐνὶ στόματι, with mind as well as mouth, and what it imports. IV. He shows how much God is glorified by Christian unity, which constitutes the main scope and design of the whole passage.

—τὸν Θεὸν καὶ Πατέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, &c.] Here and in 2 Cor. xi. 31. Eph. i. 3. 1 Pet. i. 3

(where the same expression occurs), we may render (with many eminent Expositors) ‘the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;’ the first Person in the blessed Trinity being (as Whitby and Bp. Pearson remark, from the ancient Divines) the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ in respect to the latter’s manhood, and eternal filiation, or derivation from the Father, being God of God; his Father, in respect of his divinity, or as he is the Word. Yet it may be doubted whether the common rendering, ‘God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,’ be not quite justifiable, and, indeed, preferable, for several reasons, which will appear, I think, to any one who attentively weighs the convincing and masterly discussion of Bp. Sanderson on the reason why the expression was adopted in our Authorized Version. This use of καὶ explicative, where, as Bretschn. Lex. in καὶ, 2, b. observes, ‘καὶ et copulatur et explicatur,’ is frequent in the New Test. Comp. 1 Pet. i. 3. 2 Pet. i. 11. ii. 20. Eph. i. 3. Phil. iv. 20. Col. iii. 17. 2 Cor. i. 3. xi. 31. ‘In all such cases,’ observes Bp. Middl. (Gr. Art. P. I. ch. iii. 2), ‘where καὶ is followed by a noun in apposition with a preceding noun, and limiting or defining it, the Article is usually omitted before the second noun.’

7. διὸ προσλ. ἀλλήλ., &c.] ‘Redit ad exhortationem, in quâ conformandâ semper exemplum Christi retinet;’ q. d. ‘Wherefore, in order to the carrying out of the comproportion of the last two verses by neither party, Jew or Gentile, despising or censuring each other, receive one another, show consideration and kindness mutually, which will effectually promote the unity so indispensable to the wellbeing of the Church.’ The force of the term προσλ. must, however, though applied both to Christ and to the Roman Christians, be somewhat accommodated in sense, as applied to CHRIST, with reference to his benignity to us, notwithstanding our being enemies by evil works. See supra v. 10.

The words καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς προσελάβετο ὑμᾶς may be rendered, ‘as Christ also hath admitted you to the Christian society, as one of his people.’ See note, supra, xiv. 3, and espec. on Gal. iv. 9, and 1 Cor. viii. 3. Εἰς δόξαν Θεοῦ is by most Expositors construed with what immediately precedes; by which a tolerable sense arises, but one not so suitable to the context, as by referring the words to προσλαμβάνειν ἀλλήλους, and considering καθὼς καὶ ὁ Χριστὸς προσελάβετο ὑμᾶς as an illustration; ‘for,’ as observes Prof. Hodge, ‘the Apostle’s object is to enforce the duty of mutual forbearance among Christians;—for which he suggests two motives, the kindness of God towards us, and the promotion of the Divine glory, viz. by the diffusion of his religion.’

8, 9. These verses form a confirmation and illustration of the preceding. But so irregular is the construction, and so darkly expressed is γεγενῆσθαι περιτομῆς ὑπὲρ ἀληθείας Θεοῦ, εἰς τὸ βεβαιῶσαι τὰς ἐπαγγελίας τῶν πατέρων <sup>9</sup> <sup>1</sup> τὰ δὲ ἔθνη ὑπὲρ ἐλέους δοξάσαι <sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup> τὸν Θεόν, καθὼς γέγραπται· Διὰ τοῦτο ἐξομολογήσομαί σοι ἐν ἔθνεσι, καὶ τῷ ὀνόματί σου ψαλῶ. <sup>10</sup> <sup>1</sup> Καὶ πάλιν λέγει· Εὐφράνθητε ἔθνη, μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ. <sup>11</sup> <sup>2</sup> καὶ πάλιν· Αἰνεῖτε τὸν Κύριον πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, καὶ <sup>2</sup> <sup>3</sup> ἐπαινέσατε αὐτὸν πάντες οἱ λαοί. <sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> Καὶ πάλιν· Ἡσαΐας λέγει· Ἔσται ἡ ῥίζα τοῦ Ἰεσσαί, καὶ ὁ ἀνιστάμενος <sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup> <sup>3</sup>

1 Sam. 22.

Pa. 12. 40.

Deut. 32.

Isa. 53.

Isa. 11. 1.

Rev. 5. 5.

Isa. 53. 10.

the sentiment, that the meaning has been very imperfectly ascertained. But the general sense would seem to be this;—that the Apostle now urges as a reason why the Jewish and Gentile Christians should live in harmony, that the purpose of Christ's ministry, as shown by the prophecies of the Old Test. subjoined, extended to both. To the Jews he came as their promised Messiah, and to the Gentiles as the minister of salvation through the mercy of God. Thus the Jews and the Gentiles had reason alike to glorify God for his mercy imparted to both. Nevertheless, to show how this meaning arises, and to fix the sense of some of the details, is not easy. Nay, the very reading is debated; and it requires to be first decided, in order to determine the real sense. The words are brought in by a Particle,—namely, δὲ, in all the MSS. except 7 uncials and 5 cursives, which have γάρ, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But, however specious this reading is, it ought not to be received; as being deficient in external, and forbidden by internal evidence; the δὲ being the more difficult reading, and therefore more likely to be genuine. The γάρ arose, I suspect, from the correction of Critics, who desiderated a Particle more suitable to the observation,—thinking, as Mr. Alf. does, that the Apostle intended to offer a reason for the previous exhortation. But that involves great harshness; so that I retain the δὲ, which was read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator, and has the continuative and ratiocinative force of the Latin autem, 'but,' or 'now.' As to the λέγω, it may be rendered, 'I mean to say,' nearly = 'I maintain;' the Apostle (as Hodge observes) intending to show how it was that Christ had received those to whom he wrote. But what is it that Paul means to allege?—this: that 'Jesus Christ has come a minister of the circumcision;' a peculiar expression, no where else occurring (put by brevity for διὰκονος Θεοῦ ἀποστολλόμενος πρὸς τοὺς περιτομημένους, with which comp. Matt. xx. 28), and here used by Paul, Alf. thinks, to humble the pride of the 'strong'—the Gentile Christians—exalting God's covenant people to their true dignity. The words ὑπὲρ ἀληθ. Θε., mean 'on behalf of,' 'for the sake of, the truth of God,' in the fulfilment of his pledged promises under the Covenant of circumcision.—The next words, εἰς τὸ βεβ. —πατέρων, are a further development of the sense of the former; q. d. 'in order to confirm the promises made to the Fathers' respecting the future Messiah. Here πατέρων is a Genit. of object; a frequent idiom, on which see Winer's Gram. But the greatest difficulty in the sentence is respecting the construction of the first clause of v. 9, where it is best to suppose the construction τὰ ἔθνη—δοξάσαι as suspended on the preceding λέγω,—the sense being, 'that the Gentiles might glorify God,'—namely, for the display of his mercy towards them,—that of being received into the kingdom of Christ, and made partakers of its blessings. In the above it seems implied, however darkly expressed, that (as Dr. Peile points out), 'if the salvation of the Jews redounds to the praise of God's truthfulness, the salvation of the Gentiles redounds yet more to the praise of his mercy,—the mercy of God, through Christ, in the bestowment of salvation.' Comp. supra xi. 31, with Jude 21, τὸ ἔλεος—Ἰ. Χριστοῦ. The term ἔλεος is here employed, and even dwelt upon, because the Gentiles had no covenant promise to appeal to, but only simple mercy to allege.

9. καθὼς γέγραπται· Διὰ τοῦτο, &c.] 'The Apostle (says Dr. Taylor) is persuading the converts to a cordial coalition in public worship, and is giving each party a substantial reason why they ought to unite their hearts as well as voices. But, as it would be more difficult to persuade the Jew, he applies to him several quotations out of Scripture, Pa. xvii. 49. Deut. xxxii. 43. Pa. cxvii. 1. Isa. xi. 10; the first and last of which, as Whitty shows, the Jews interpreted of the Messiah.' All of them agree with the Sept., and, in their general sense, with the Hebrew; and in all of them, derived from the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms, the general idea (as Hodge observes) more or less distinctly expressed, is, that the true Religion of God was to be extended to the Gentiles also; they therefore include the promise of the Redeemer's kingdom to them, as well as to the Jews.

10. καὶ πάλιν λέγει (scil. ἡ γραφή) [This passage is quoted from Deut. xxxii. 43, as read in the Sept.; but the Hebrew, as we have it in our present copies, will not admit this sense; and, accordingly, Calv. and others refer the citation to Pa. lxvii. 3, 5, where the sentiment is the same, though not expressed in precisely the same words. Tholuck, however, goes far to show that the Sept. text is reconcilable with the Hebrew; while Mr. Alf. remarks, that, 'in several passages where the Gentiles are spoken of prophetically, the Hebrew text has apparently been tampered with by the Jews.' But this is an argument better not resorted to, except from necessity; which here seems not to exist; for if the ground taken by Tholuck be thought not defensible, I would prefer to refer the words, with Calv., to Pa. lxvii. 3, 5, or rather to both passages, which is permitted by ἡ γραφή, if it be taken, as Mr. Alf. admits it may, impersonally = 'it is written.'

m Jer. 1. 18
Joel 2. 16.
1 Tim. 1. 1.

n Phil. 1. 7.
2 Tim. 1. 6.
Phillem. 21.

Heb. 6. 9.
3 Pet. 1. 12.

1 John 2. 21.
o ch. 1. 5.
& 12. 3—4.

1 Cor. 3. 10.
& 15. 10.

Gal. 1. 15, 16.
& 5. 9.

Eph. 3. 7, 8.
1 Tim. 1. 11
—14.

ἀρχειν ἐθνῶν, ἐπ' αὐτῷ ἔθνη ἐλπιοῦσιν. 13 Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς ἐλπίδος πληρώσαι ὑμᾶς πάσης χαρᾶς καὶ εἰρήνης ἐν τῷ πιστεῦναι, εἰς τὸ περισσεῦναι ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ ἐλπίδι ἐν δυνάμει Πνεύματος ἁγίου.

14 Πέπεισμαι δὲ, ἀδελφοί μου, καὶ αὐτὸς ἐγὼ περὶ ὑμῶν, ὅτι καὶ αὐτοὶ μεστοὶ ἐστε ἀγαθωσύνης, πεπληρωμένοι πάσης γνώσεως, δυνάμενοι καὶ ἀλλήλους νοουθετεῖν. 15 Ὁ Τολμηρότερον δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν, ἀδελφοί, ἀπὸ μέρους, ὡς ἐπαναμνηστικῶν ὑμᾶς,

12. ἴσται ἡ ρίζα, &c.] Here again Paul follows the Sept., which differs considerably from the Hebrew, though presenting the same general sense; according to which the promise of the Prophet is, 'that from the decayed and fallen house of David One should arise whose dominion should embrace all nations, and in whom Gentiles, as well as Jews, should trust. In the fulfilment of this prophecy Christ came, and preached salvation to those who were near, and to those who were afar off.' The full sense of the briefly-expressed statement is, 'There shall be the Root (or trunk) of Jesse, and [there shall be] He (or, one) who is to arise from it to rule the nations: on Him shall the nations rest their hope.' See Dr. Peile, who remarks, 'The meaning which the Apostle's argument would lead us to attach to this citation is, as though it had been written, ἴσται μὲν ἡ ρίζα τοῦ Ἰσσαι, ἴσται δὲ ὁ ἀνιστάμενος, &c.' On the other hand Theophyl. says, 'it was as if written ἐκ τῆς ρίζης τοῦ Ἰσσαι βλαστήσει ὁ ἀνιστάμενος ἀρχειν, &c.' And so Ecumen. But this is silencing the καὶ, though found in all the copies. I should prefer to take the καὶ in the sense 'even,' as when put between words, and also clauses; on which see Herm. Vig. p. 865; also Matth. and Kühn. Gr., and comp. Matth. xiii. 41, σὺλλὰξ, πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα, καὶ τοὺς π. τ. &c. There are, indeed, objections to this mode of dealing with the difficulty, but not more than to Dr. Peile's.

13. ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τ. ἐλπ. πληρώσαι, &c.] 'Paul here, as at v. 5, concludes by praying that God would grant them the excellencies which it was their duty to acquire. Thus constantly and intimately are the ideas of accountableness and dependence connected in the Sacred Scriptures. We are "to work out our own salvation; because it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, according to his good pleasure." (Hodge.) Thus the Apostle prays to the God of hope (i. e. to God, who is the Author of that hope which it was predicted should repose in the Root, or offspring, from the trunk Jesse), that they may be filled with all joy and peace in believing, and may have a lively hope of future glory, through the influences of the Spirit shed abroad in their hearts; who thus will give them, while here below, an earnest of that glory. Comp. Eph. i. 13, sq., and Rom. viii. 23. Thus ver. 13 is a kind of link to unite the foregoing admonitory with the subsequent excusatory matter; the latter to qualify and make more palatable the former.

14. Now commences the fourth and last Portion of the Epistle, consisting of two Parts; in the former of which, up to the end of this chapter, the Apostle, after good wishes and prayers for their spiritual welfare, addresses them in endearing language, and apologizes for what might be likely to give offence; in the latter (which occupies the last chapter) he resumes, and continues the same endearing language to the end.

14—16. Paul here apologizes for the plainness of his representations, and the earnestness of his exhortations, on the ground,—that they were delivered from no want of confidence in them, and still less from the assumption of unwarrantable authority, but simply in the exercise of his bounden duty and office, as Apostle of the Gentiles. By αὐτὸν ἐγὼ is implied, as Conyb. remarks, 'both by the reports of others, and by my own judgment, whatever I may have said.'

—ὅτι καὶ αὐτοί, &c.] 'ye of yourselves, [even without my admonition].' Beza well compares the Homeric τί με σπᾶύδοντα καὶ αὐτὸν δῶναις; Comp. the kindred sentence in Heb. vi. 9. The expression π. πάσης γνώσεως must not be too rigidly interpreted. Its sense,—as determined by the words following, δυνάμενοι καὶ ἀλλήλους νοουθετεῖν,—is, 'Ye are full of benignity and kindness, and sufficiently abundant in all [Christian] knowledge, as to be able to admonish each other.'

15. The Apostle here anticipates a possible objection,—q. d. 'Why, then, have you plied us with admonitions, &c.?'—and states the reasons why he had written with such boldness and authority. I agree with Dr. Peile, that ἐπὶ μέρος is better rendered, as in E. V., 'in some sort' (rather, 'in some measure'), and so made to qualify τολμ. ἔγραψα, than connected simply with ἔγραψα, as though the Apostle meant to say, 'I have written with more freedom in some parts of my letter;' when, in fact, the part of the Epistle to which he refers would seem to be that which has just preceded, beginning with ch. xiv.; and this is sufficiently indicated by ἔγραψα. I am surprised that the good sense of Conyb. should acquiesce in so objectionable an interpretation as the foregoing, and also that he should reject the sense 'in some measure,' on so frivolous an objection, as that the sense is already expressed in τολμηρ. Mr. Conyb. might have remembered such expressions as μᾶλλον κραίεσον, in Phil. i. 23, and μᾶλλον περισσώτερος, 1 Cor. vii. 13, and Mark vii. 36, which are much more pleonastic, so to say, than this, where the phrase is merely a qualification, or limitation, of the τολμ., and meant to be excusatory. This apologetical language was not uncalled for, since Paul had opposed some of their strongest prejudices, and rebuked them for certain irregularities of conduct.

—ὡς ἐπαναμ. ὑμ.] The full sense is, 'by διὰ τὴν χάριν τὴν δοθεῖσάν μοι ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ <sup>16</sup> εἰς τὸ εἶναι με <sup>p Acts 9. 15.</sup> λειτουργὸν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς τὰ ἔθνη, ἱεουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον <sup>q ch. 11. 13.</sup> τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἵνα γένηται ἡ προσφορά τῶν ἐθνῶν εὐπρόσδεκτος, <sup>Gal. 2. 7, 8.</sup> ἡγιασμένη ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ. <sup>1 Tim. 2. 7.</sup> <sup>2 Tim. 1. 11.</sup> <sup>Phil. 2. 17.</sup>

<sup>17</sup> Ἐχῶ οὖν καύχησιν ἐν Χριστῷ
 Ἰησοῦ τὰ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν <sup>18</sup> οὐ γὰρ τολμήσω λαλεῖν τι, ὧν οὐ <sup>q ch. 1. 5.</sup> κατειργάσατο Χριστὸς δι' ἐμοῦ, εἰς ὑπακοὴν ἐθνῶν, λόγῳ καὶ <sup>ch. 10. 25.</sup>
 ἔργῳ, <sup>19</sup> ἐν δυνάμει σημείων καὶ τεράτων, ἐν δυνάμει Πνεύματος <sup>r Acts 19. 11.</sup> [Θεοῦ] ὥστε με ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ, καὶ κύκλῳ μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυ- <sup>2 Cor. 12. 12.</sup> ρικοῦ, πεπληρωκέναι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ. <sup>20</sup> Οὕτω δὲ <sup>s 2 Cor. 10.</sup> φιλοτιμούμενον εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, οὐχ ὅπου ὠνομάσθη Χριστὸς, <sup>15, 16.</sup> ἵνα μὴ ἐπ' ἀλλότριον θεμέλιον οἰκοδομῶ <sup>21</sup> ἀλλὰ, καθὼς <sup>t Isa. 52. 15.</sup> γέγραπται· Οἷς οὐκ ἀνηγγέλη περὶ αὐτοῦ, ὁψονται· καὶ way of further reminding you of what you already know.' Comp. 1 Pet. i. 12, seqq.

16. εἰς τὸ εἶναι—εἰς τὰ ἔθνη] The general meaning is, 'That I should bestow my special attention to the conversion of the Gentiles to the religion of Christ.' The Apostle, however, uses a formula derived from the Jewish religion, in order the more strongly to impress on the Jewish Christians the dignity of his Apostleship, calling himself, too, not διάκονος, but λειτουργός, a sacred minister (see note on Acts xxvi. 16), and saying that his office is not κηρύσσειν, but ἱεουργεῖν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, i. e. 'to preach the Gospel as a priest of the New Covenant', by which men are made θεοῖα ζῶσαι. So 4 Macc. vii. 8, τοὺς ἱεουργοῦντας τὸν νόμον ἰδίῳ αἵματι. So προσφορά and ἡγιασμένη, a little after, are likewise terms borrowed from the Temple service; see more in Carpz. The words ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ are meant to suggest the means whereby they have been made, and are preserved, pure; namely, by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, and not by external rites.

17. καύχησιν] 'a reason for glorying and rejoicing,' namely, in his labours having been so blessed. Lachm. and Tisch. edit τὴν καύχ., from 6 uncial, and a few cursive, MSS.; but the Article is worse than useless, the sense being, 'a ground of glorying,' as in 2 Cor. vii. 4. xi. 10, et al. and Ecclesi. i. 23. It is true that ἡ καύχησης is found in all the copies, supra iii. 27, πού—ἡ καύχησης; where the word is used in its most abstract sense, to denote 'the exercise of boasting.' But that sense is as much required by the context there, as it is by the context rejected here. The word is one of such rare occurrence in the Class. writers, that it had never been known to exist in them, until of late it was discovered in a tract of Philodemus on Music, found among the rolls of the scorched MSS. discovered in disinterring Herculaneum. I have now, with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., added τὸν before Θεόν, for reasons which will appear from note supra iv. 2.

18. οὐ γὰρ τολμήσω λαλεῖν, &c.] Carpz. recognizes here a delicacy of idiom, q. d. 'I can scarcely venture to say what Christ hath not done by me,' i. e. how much he hath done. More simple and natural, however, is the sense commonly assigned: 'I do not, in saying this, claim any praise, by exaggerating my success, or taking to myself the credit of what others have done. But, after all, the most correct view of the sense may be that adopted by the Greek Commentators, who consider this as a brief mode of expression (occasioned by modesty) for οὐ γὰρ τολμ. λαλεῖν τι, ὧν οὐκ ἰγώ, ἀλλὰ κατεῖργ. Χριστός.

—λόγῳ καὶ ἔργῳ, ἐν δυνάμει—Πνεύμ. Θ.] 'There seems to be a parallelism between λόγῳ and δυνάμει Πνεύματος Θεοῦ, and again between ἔργῳ and δυνάμει σημείων καὶ τεράτων; marking respectively the miraculous gifts exercised by the tongue, such as the word of wisdom, of knowledge, and prophecy; and the gifts of healing, and the like.' (Terrot.)

19. Πνεύματος Θεοῦ] Tisch. and Alf. cancel Θεοῦ, from the Vat. B. Griesb., Scholz, and Lachm. read πνεύματος ἁγίου, from several uncial, and many cursive, MSS. It would seem pretty certain, from the state of evidence, that St. Paul wrote Πνεύματος without any addition, meaning, of course, 'the Holy Spirit,' 'the Spirit of God,' which, being expressed by the Scholiasts, was received into the text.

—ἀπὸ Ἱ., καὶ κύκλῳ] from Jerusalem and the neighbourhood.' The term κύκλῳ may, by the usage of the best Greek writers, have great latitude, and comprehend a very extensive radius of country about Jerusalem, including Palestine, Syria, and the adjacent parts of Arabia. But Jerusalem is especially mentioned, from its being the centre, whence the rays of Divine knowledge beamed.—πεπλ., τὸ εὐαγγ. τ. X. is an expression deviating from Classical usage, and akin to that of Col. i. 25, π. τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, meaning, 'I have fully performed my office of preaching the Gospel.'

20. οὕτω δὲ φιλοτ.] The Participle depends upon a Verb preceding, ὥστε πεπληρωκέναι; but, in translation, it may be rendered by a Verb in the Preterite: q. d. 'Thus have I striven.'—φιλοτιμῆσθαι properly signifies to be studious of honour; and as such a pursuit supposes zeal, labour, and diligence, it comes to signify, 'to do any thing with zeal, diligence,' &c. Thus it here means, 'earnestly striving.'

21. ἀλλὰ, καθὼς γέγραπ. q. d. 'thus making good in my own case the words of Scripture.'

—οἷς οὐκ ἀνηγγέλη, &c.] Render: 'those to whom no message (or declaration) was sent.'

u ch. 1. 18.
1 Thess. 2.
18.
Acts 10. 21.
v ch. 1. 10.
v 15. 32.
1 Thess. 2.
10.
3 Tim. 1. 4.
x Acts 15. 3.

γ Acts 19. 21.
x 24. 17.

z 1 Cor. 6. 1.
3 Cor. 6. 1.
8c.
x 9. 3. 12.
Gal. 2. 9. 10.
a ch. 11. 17.
1 Cor. 9. 11.
Gal. 6. 6.

b Phil. 4. 17.

c ch. 1. 11.
12.
Ps. 118. 14.

d 3 Cor. 1.
11.
Phil. 2. 1.
Col. 4. 12.

οὐδ' οὐκ ἀκηκόασι, συνήσουσι. <sup>22</sup> Διὸ καὶ ἐνεκοπτόμεν τὰ πολλὰ τοῦ ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς. <sup>23</sup> νυνὶ δὲ μηκέτι τόπον ἔχων ἐν τοῖς κλίμασι τούτοις, ἐπιποθίαν δὲ ἔχων τοῦ ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ πολλῶν ἐτῶν, <sup>24</sup> ὥς ἐὰν πορεύωμαι εἰς τὴν Σπανίαν, [ἐλεύσομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς.] Ἐλπίζω γὰρ διαπορευόμενος θεάσασθαι ὑμᾶς, καὶ ὑφ' ὑμῶν προπεμφθῆναι ἐκεῖ, ἐὰν ὑμῶν πρῶτον ἀπὸ μέρους ἐμπλησθῶ. <sup>25</sup> νυνὶ δὲ πορεύομαι εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, διακονῶν τοῖς ἁγίοις. <sup>26</sup> εὐδόκησαν γὰρ Μακεδονία καὶ Ἀχαΐα κοινωνίαν τινὰ ποιήσασθαι εἰς τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν ἁγίων τῶν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. <sup>27</sup> εὐδόκησαν γὰρ, καὶ ὀφείλεται αὐτῶν εἰσιν.
εἰ γὰρ τοῖς πνευματικοῖς αὐτῶν ἐκοινωνήσαν τὰ ἔθνη, ὀφείλουσι καὶ ἐν τοῖς σαρκικαῖς λειτουργῆσαι αὐτοῖς. <sup>28</sup> Τοῦτο οὖν ἐπι-τελέσας, καὶ σφραγισάμενος αὐτοῖς τὸν καρπὸν τούτου, ἀπελεύσομαι δι' ὑμῶν εἰς τὴν Σπανίαν. <sup>29</sup> Οἶδα δὲ ὅτι ἐρχόμενος πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἐν πληρώματι εὐλογίας τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐλεύσομαι. <sup>30</sup> Παρακαλῶ δὲ ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοὶ, διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ διὰ τῆς ἀγάπης τοῦ Πνεύματος, συν-

This absolute construction is very rare; but another ex. occurs in Jer. iv. 5, Sept., ἀναγγεῖλατε ἐν τῇ Ἰουδᾷ, καὶ ἀκουσθήτω ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. The words (from Isa. lii. 15) exactly agree with the Sept., and are by the Jewish Interpreters referred to the Messiah, but applied by the Apostle to his own case.

<sup>22</sup> διὸ i. e. for the reason adverted to at vv. 19, 20; his desire to visit new countries for the purpose of evangelizing the Gentiles.

<sup>23</sup> μηκέτι τόπον ἔχων, &c.] i. e. 'there being no longer any sufficient occasion for my apostolical labours here.' So τὸ πᾶν ἔχων in Heb. xii. 17.

—κλίμασι] 'parts of the country.' The term κλίμα properly denotes one of those divisions of the sphere, between the Equator and Arctic Pole, of which the ancient geographers made seasons. —ἐπιποθίαν, 'a strong desire.' The word is very rare, and synonymous with ἐπιπόθησις, which occurs in 2 Cor. vii. 11.—τοῦ ἐλθεῖν, for ὥστε ἐλθεῖν.

<sup>24</sup> ὥς ἐὰν πορεύωμαι εἰς τ. Σπαν.] Dr. Peile here supposes an ellipsis of εἰς Ἰσταν, or the like, which often occur in the Greek writers, and refers to Matth. Gr. Gr. § 569, 5, and to Porson, on Eur. Hel. 398, and he renders, 'Rest assured that if I travel into Spain.' Of the existence of the ellipsis there is no doubt; but whether it can be admitted here there is a very great doubt. It seems to have been confined to the Class. Greek, and espec. Attic Greek writers, and was not likely to be known by Paul, still less introduced in the familiar language of Epistolary correspondence; and I still incline to render, 'As soon as = whenever, I take my journey into Spain.' The words seem to imply a sort of half-formed intention of visiting Spain: whether Paul ever carried it into execution has long been a question of great dispute. That there exists no historical record of his having done so, in the early Ecclesiastical writers, is, from obvious reasons, no sufficient proof that he did not; but whether it can be proved that he did, may be greatly doubted. As to the passages of Clem. Romanus, and Caius the Presbyter, which have been supposed,—even by the learned Mr. Greswell and Bp. Burgess,—to prove the affirmative; they have been fully shown by Canon Tate, in an elaborate Dissertation, Contin. Hist. p. 171, to be quite inadequate to sustain that view. The learned Dissertator has therein gone far to prove, that Paul's original design to visit Spain was afterwards abandoned, and at the time of writing his 2nd Epistle to Timothy had been long given up. He had, it is clear, from this passage, intended to visit Spain, but it would seem that, at the close of a long series of adverse events, he had felt himself, consistently with other duties, unable to do so; if, indeed, he had not rather laid aside all intention of the kind long before. See also Dr. Davidson's Introduction, vol. ii. 96—102, and, on the other side, Neander, Pf. u. Leit., 527—552.

—ὥς ἐὰν, &c.] Render: 'so soon as I shall first have been in some measure satiated with you,' i. e. with your company and converse. The Pesch. Syr. has, 'been gladdened with the sight of you' (which has the support of Theodor. and Theophyl.), but this proceeds on too confined a view of the sense. Both senses must be included, as is done by Est., who remarks, that 'by this expression, and ἀπὸ μέρου, it is intimated, that the magnitude of his desire could not be fully satisfied by seeing and conversing with them merely for a few days.'

<sup>30</sup> διὰ τ. ἀγ. τ. Πνιύμ.] 'By the Christian love which the Spirit has shed abroad in your spirits,' or 'hearts' Comp. Phil. ii. 1, and Col. i. 8.

In συναγ. μοι ἐν ταῖς προσευχ., there is a highly forcible expression, signifying 'to aid any one in any contest, by striving with him to overcome its difficulties.' Here it signifies 'to help any one by intercession and supplication to God for him.' See more in Calvin, than whom no αγωνίσασθαι μοι ἐν ταῖς προσευχαῖς ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν 31 ὡς ῥυσθῶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀπειθούντων ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ, καὶ ὡς ἡ <sup>2</sup> Thom. 2.

 διακονία μου ἢ εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ εὐπρόσδεκτος γένηται τοῖς ἁγίοις 33 ὡς ἐν χαρᾷ ἔλθω πρὸς ὑμᾶς διὰ θελήματος Θεοῦ, καὶ συν- f Acts 18. 21.
ch. 1. 10.
James 4. 16.
ch. 15. 20.
1 Cor. 15. 11.
Phil. 4. 9.
1 Thess. 5.
22.
Heb. 12. 20.
2 John 6.
Phil. 2. 29.
 αναπαύσωμαι ὑμῖν. 33 Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν. ἀμήν.

XVI. <sup>1</sup> Συνίστημι δὲ ὑμῖν Φοίβην τὴν ἀδελφὴν ἡμῶν, οὖσαν διάκονον τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐν Κεγχρεαῖς. <sup>2</sup> ὡς αὐτὴν προσδέξοσθε ἐν Κυρίῳ, ἀξίως τῶν ἁγίων, καὶ παραστήτε αὐτὴ ἐν ᾧ ἂν ὑμῶν χρήζῃ πρῶγματι· καὶ γὰρ αὕτη προστάτις πολλῶν ἐγενήθη, καὶ αὐτοῦ ἐμοῦ. <sup>3</sup> Ὡς Ἀσπάσασθε Πρίσκιλλαν καὶ Ἀκύλαν, τοὺς συνεργοὺς μου ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. <sup>4</sup> (οἷτινες ὑπὲρ τῆς ψυχῆς μου τὸν ἑαυτῶν τράχηλον ὑπέθηκαν οἷς οὐκ ἐγὼ μόνος εὐχαριστῶ, ἀλλὰ καὶ πᾶσαι αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τῶν ἐθνῶν) <sup>5</sup> καὶ τὴν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν. Ἀσπάσασθε Ἐπαίνετον τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου, ὅς ἐστιν ἀπαρχὴ τῆς * Ἀσίας εἰς Χριστόν.

Commentator has better seen the full sense intended by the words. Yet he has left something wanting, which may be supplied from my note on Col. iv. 12.

31. τῶν ἀπειθ. ἐν τῇ 'f.] i.e. the unbelieving Jews, who bore a deadly hatred to Paul, and sought his life. 'Here (remarks Koppe) the Apostle does not desire to be preserved from calamities, but only that he may be so strengthened, as to be enabled to overcome them; and that he may be the means of cheering the afflicted Christians at Jerusalem.'

XVI. This chapter consists of various recommendations and salutations, intermixed with a solemn warning,—in reference to those among them who sowed divisions and caused offences,—and an earnest injunction that they would cultivate kindness and candour. Then, after expressing the salutations of several Christian friends who were with him, the Apostle concludes with a noble and impressive doxology, comprising earnest prayers for them, and devout ascriptions of glory to God.

1. Φοίβην] She seems to have been in the company of those who conveyed this Epistle, though not herself the bearer of it. It is plain that she was known at Rome, and is here probably commended to the Roman Christians, as needing their friendly notice and assistance.

—διάκονον] According to the constitution of the primitive Church, there was an order of women discharging part of the public business of the Church, consisting of two kinds; 1. Elderly women (πρεσβυτέραις), presiding over, and superintending the morals of, the other female Christians; 2. Deaconesses (διδάκοναι), who discharged some of the offices of the ministry, as baptizing the female converts; and who also collected and distributed the contributions for the relief of sick and poor females, besides other offices less important; see Bingham's Antiq. i. xi. 12. Coteler on the Const. Ap. iii. 15.

2. ἐν Κυρίῳ] 'in the name and on account of Christ.'—ἀξίως τῶν ἁγ., 'in such a manner as Christians ought to receive each other.'—παραστήτε αὐτὴν, literally, 'stand by her;' a military metaphor, with allusion to the ἀσπαστάς, who, in defending their clients, were said παραστᾶσθαι, and were indeed called παρασταταί.—ἐν ᾧ ἂν ὑμῶν χρήζῃ πρῶγμα, 'in whatever good office, or service, she may need your assistance.'

4. τὸν ἑαυτῶν τράχηλον ὑπέθ. lit. 'laid down their own necks [to be cut off on the block of decapitation];' a somewhat hyperbolic mode of expressing, 'they jeopardized their own lives in defending mine.' See Judg. v. 18, and note on Acts xv. 26. A similar metaphor occurs in Ælian, v. H. x. 16, σὺ μὲν παῖς—ἰσθὺς δὲ ὑποθήσας τὴν κεφαλὴν, 'will expose my head' (viz. to the block). The expression ὑποτίθημι τὴν ψυχὴν is synonymous with that (peculiar, at least in the N. T., to St. John) at John x. 11, τὴν ψ. αὐτοῦ τίθησιν ὑπὲρ τῶν προβ., and x. 15, τὴν ψ. μου τίθημι, and xiii. 37, τὴν ψυχὴν μου ὑπὲρ σοῦ θέσω, xv. 13. 1 John iii. 16.

5. τὴν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν] Whether by this is meant, 'the assembly of persons who met for public worship at their house,' or whether it simply designates 'their Christian household,' is a disputed point. But although the latter view is ably maintained by Macknight, yet his arguments are not competent to establish his point; as has been shown by Prof. Stuart, who well observes, 'that this sense of ἐκκλ. is destitute of all support from the usus loquendi of the New Test.' See more in Néand. Ch. Hist. t. i. 339, where is adduced a passage from the 'Acta Martyrii S. Justini,' which proves and illustrates the practice of some eminent Christian professors, like Aquila and Priscilla, of holding assemblies for worship at their houses.

—Ἀσίας] This, instead of the text. rec. Ἀχαίας, found in several ancient MSS. has been, on good grounds, adopted, or preferred, by all the Critical Editors. Indeed, internal evidence is so decidedly in its favour, that

6 ἀσπάσασθε Μαριὰμ, ἥτις πολλὰ ἐκοπίασεν εἰς ἡμᾶς. 7 ἀσπάσασθε Ἀνδρόνικον καὶ Ἰουνίαν, τοὺς συγγενεῖς μου καὶ συναιχμαλώτους μου οἵτινές εἰσιν ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, οἱ καὶ πρὸ ἐμοῦ γεγόνασιν ἐν Χριστῷ. 8 ἀσπάσασθε Ἀμπλίαν τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου ἐν Κυρίῳ. 9 ἀσπάσασθε Οὐρβανὸν τὸν συνεργὸν ἡμῶν ἐν Χριστῷ καὶ Στάχυν τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου. 10 ἀσπάσασθε Ἀπελλὴν τὸν δόκιμον ἐν Χριστῷ. ἀσπάσασθε τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοβούλου. 11 ἀσπάσασθε Ἡρωδία τὴν συγγενὴ μου. ἀσπάσασθε τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ναρκίσσου τοὺς ὄντας ἐν Κυρίῳ. 12 ἀσπάσασθε Τρύφαιναν καὶ Τρυφῶσαν τὰς κοπιώσας ἐν Κυρίῳ. ἀσπάσασθε Περσίδα τὴν ἀγαπητὴν, ἥτις πολλὰ ἐκοπίασεν ἐν Κυρίῳ. 13 ἀσπάσασθε Ρούφον τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν Κυρίῳ, καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐμοῦ. 14 ἀσπάσασθε Ἀσύγκριτον, Φλέγοντα, Ἐρμᾶν, Πατρόβαν, Ἐρμῆν, καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς ἀδελφοίς. 15 ἀσπάσασθε Φιλόλογον καὶ Ἰουλίαν, Νηρέα καὶ τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτοῦ, καὶ Ὀλυμπᾶν, καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτοῖς πάντας ἁγίους. 16 Ἀσπάσασθε ἀλλήλους ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ. ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τοῦ Χριστοῦ. 17 Παρακαλῶ

d Mark 15.
51.

e 1 Cor. 16.
50.
f 2 Cor. 13. 12.
1 Thess. 5.
26.
g 1 Pet. 5. 14.
h 2 Thess. 3.
6, 14.
i 1 Tim. 5. 2.
j 2 Tim. 2. 2.
k Tit. 2. 10.
l 2 John 10.

there can be little doubt that it is the true reading. The very nature of the term ἀπαρχή suggests the idea of one person only (see 1 Cor. xv. 20), and as in 1 Cor. xvi. 15 Stephanus is called the ἀπαρχή τῆς Ἀχαΐας, Epaphroditus could have no claim to the name.

7. ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις.] The sense is somewhat uncertain. Whitby, Koppe, and others take it to mean, that 'they were eminent teachers;' ἀπόστολος being sometimes used in a lower sense; as in 2 Cor. viii. 23. Phil. ii. 25. But in both those passages the Article is not found; which would seem to fix the meaning to Apostle in the higher sense. Thus the ἐν will signify inter; q. d. 'who were well known to, and held in consideration by, or among, the Apostles.' So, too, Prof. Stuart, Hodge, and Dr. Peile. But, on further consideration, I am induced to acquiesce in the view which regards the expression as denoting persons so eminent as teachers, as to be themselves counted, and spoken of, as Apostles. So Acts xiv. 4, 14. 2 Cor. viii. 23. See the notes of Tholuck and Alford.

10. δόκιμον ἐν Χρ.] meaning a tried and approved Christian (ἐν Χριστῷ, and ἐν Κυρίῳ, being often, especially in the present chapter, used to denote Christian); one who has approved himself such by his exemplary conduct; one whose piety is real and sincere.

13. τὸν ἐκλ. ἐν Κ.] 'that true Christian (comp. John i. 47),—that chosen (as in v. 10, τὸν δόκιμον, that approved) servant of Christ.' (Peile.)

— καὶ τὴν μητ. αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐμοῦ.] The full sense, as Bp. Terrot observes, is, 'his mother by nature; mine by maternal kindness.' Comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 18, ἀνίσταυσεν τὸ ἐμὸν πνεῦμα καὶ τὸ ὑμῶν, where see note.

16. ἀσπάσασθε—φιλ.] As the Apostle had before bid them salute certain persons in his own name, so he now bids them salute each other: on the reason for which injunction, see Chrysostom and Theophyl., cited by me in Recens. Synop. On this kiss of peace much has been written by Whitby and others, who trace it to ancient Oriental usage, and suppose it to have been borrowed from the Synagogue. It appears that, in the Apostolic age, the kiss was given to each other at the end of the Liturgy, and before the Communion Service, and was understood to express mutual love, and equality in the sight of God. The custom continued in use during a great part of the first century, and is noticed by several early Ecclesiastical writers. So Const. Apost. lii. 57, εἴτα καὶ ἀσπάζεσθαι ἀλλήλους οἱ ἄνδρες καὶ ἀλλήλας αἱ γυναῖκες τὸ ἐν Κυρίῳ φίλημα. See more in Suicer. Thea. in vν., δσπασμοὶ καὶ φίλημα, and in Bing. Eccl. Ant. xv. 3, §. 17, 20.

17. Before he concludes, the Apostle again touches on the subject of those dissensions, which he had heard prevailed among the Roman Christians, the suppression of which was one principal purpose of the Epistle. Of these, then, he admonishes them to beware, and warns them against the authors. He bids them mark, by way of avoiding, those who caused divisions and raised factions, and also who occasioned scandals and offences among the unbelieving. Now these σκανδαλα might arise both from the immoral conduct of those who made profession of Christianity, even of the teachers, and from the folly of those who, by the introduction of heretical and false opinions, caused the Heathen to take unjust offence at the Gospel; 'for,' as observes Hodge, 'almost all the forms of error in doctrine which disturbed the Primitive Church were intimately connected with practical evils of a moral character. This was, to a certain extent, the case with the Judaizers, and still more so with the heretical teachers, who were infected with a false philosophy, described in Col. ii. 10—23. 1 Tim,

δὲ ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, σκοπεῖν τοὺς τὰς διχοστασίας καὶ τὰ σκάν-
δαλα, παρὰ τὴν διδαχὴν ἣν ὑμεῖς ἐμάθετε, ποιούντας· καὶ ἐκκλι-νατε ἀπ' αὐτῶν. <sup>18</sup> <sup>ε</sup> Οἱ γὰρ τοιοῦτοι τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ <sup>φ. Phil. 2. 18.</sup>
Χριστῷ οὐ δουλεύουσιν, ἀλλὰ τῇ ἐαυτῶν κοιλίᾳ· καὶ διὰ τῆς χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας ἐξαπατῶσι τὰς καρδίας τῶν ἀκάκων.
<sup>19</sup> <sup>h</sup> Ἡ γὰρ ὑμῶν ὑπακοὴ εἰς πάντας ἀφίκετο· χαίρω οὖν τὸ ἐφ' <sup>h</sup> Matt. 10.
ὑμῶν θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς σοφοὺς μὲν εἶναι εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, ἀκεραίους <sup>16.</sup>
δὲ εἰς τὸ κακόν. <sup>20</sup> <sup>1</sup> Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης συντρίψει τὸν <sup>ch. 1. 8.</sup> Σατανᾶν ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας ὑμῶν ἐν τάχει. ἡ χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου <sup>1 Cor. 14. 30.</sup>
ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ μεθ' ὑμῶν. <sup>21</sup> <sup>k</sup> Ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς Τιμό- <sup>1 Gen. 2. 15.</sup>
<sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup> <sup>3</sup> <sup>4</sup> <sup>5</sup> <sup>6</sup> <sup>7</sup> <sup>8</sup> <sup>9</sup> <sup>10</sup> <sup>11</sup> <sup>12</sup> <sup>13</sup> <sup>14</sup> <sup>15</sup> <sup>16</sup> <sup>17</sup> <sup>18</sup> <sup>19</sup> <sup>20</sup> <sup>21</sup> <sup>22</sup> <sup>23</sup> <sup>24</sup> <sup>25</sup> <sup>26</sup> <sup>27</sup> <sup>28</sup> <sup>29</sup> <sup>30</sup> <sup>31</sup> <sup>32</sup> <sup>33</sup> <sup>34</sup> <sup>35</sup> <sup>36</sup> <sup>37</sup> <sup>38</sup> <sup>39</sup> <sup>40</sup> <sup>41</sup> <sup>42</sup> <sup>43</sup> <sup>44</sup> <sup>45</sup> <sup>46</sup> <sup>47</sup> <sup>48</sup> <sup>49</sup> <sup>50</sup> <sup>51</sup> <sup>52</sup> <sup>53</sup> <sup>54</sup> <sup>55</sup> <sup>56</sup> <sup>57</sup> <sup>58</sup> <sup>59</sup> <sup>60</sup> <sup>61</sup> <sup>62</sup> <sup>63</sup> <sup>64</sup> <sup>65</sup> <sup>66</sup> <sup>67</sup> <sup>68</sup> <sup>69</sup> <sup>70</sup> <sup>71</sup> <sup>72</sup> <sup>73</sup> <sup>74</sup> <sup>75</sup> <sup>76</sup> <sup>77</sup> <sup>78</sup> <sup>79</sup> <sup>80</sup> <sup>81</sup> <sup>82</sup> <sup>83</sup> <sup>84</sup> <sup>85</sup> <sup>86</sup> <sup>87</sup> <sup>88</sup> <sup>89</sup> <sup>90</sup> <sup>91</sup> <sup>92</sup> <sup>93</sup> <sup>94</sup> <sup>95</sup> <sup>96</sup> <sup>97</sup> <sup>98</sup> <sup>99</sup> <sup>100</sup> <sup>101</sup> <sup>102</sup> <sup>103</sup> <sup>104</sup> <sup>105</sup> <sup>106</sup> <sup>107</sup> <sup>108</sup> <sup>109</sup> <sup>110</sup> <sup>111</sup> <sup>112</sup> <sup>113</sup> <sup>114</sup> <sup>115</sup> <sup>116</sup> <sup>117</sup> <sup>118</sup> <sup>119</sup> <sup>120</sup> <sup>121</sup> <sup>122</sup> <sup>123</sup> <sup>124</sup> <sup>125</sup> <sup>126</sup> <sup>127</sup> <sup>128</sup> <sup>129</sup> <sup>130</sup> <sup>131</sup> <sup>132</sup> <sup>133</sup> <sup>134</sup> <sup>135</sup> <sup>136</sup> <sup>137</sup> <sup>138</sup> <sup>139</sup> <sup>140</sup> <sup>141</sup> <sup>142</sup> <sup>143</sup> <sup>144</sup> <sup>145</sup> <sup>146</sup> <sup>147</sup> <sup>148</sup> <sup>149</sup> <sup>150</sup> <sup>151</sup> <sup>152</sup> <sup>153</sup> <sup>154</sup> <sup>155</sup> <sup>156</sup> <sup>157</sup> <sup>158</sup> <sup>159</sup> <sup>160</sup> <sup>161</sup> <sup>162</sup> <sup>163</sup> <sup>164</sup> <sup>165</sup> <sup>166</sup> <sup>167</sup> <sup>168</sup> <sup>169</sup> <sup>170</sup> <sup>171</sup> <sup>172</sup> <sup>173</sup> <sup>174</sup> <sup>175</sup> <sup>176</sup> <sup>177</sup> <sup>178</sup> <sup>179</sup> <sup>180</sup> <sup>181</sup> <sup>182</sup> <sup>183</sup> <sup>184</sup> <sup>185</sup> <sup>186</sup> <sup>187</sup> <sup>188</sup> <sup>189</sup> <sup>190</sup> <sup>191</sup> <sup>192</sup> <sup>193</sup> <sup>194</sup> <sup>195</sup> <sup>196</sup> <sup>197</sup> <sup>198</sup> <sup>199</sup> <sup>200</sup> <sup>201</sup> <sup>202</sup> <sup>203</sup> <sup>204</sup> <sup>205</sup> <sup>206</sup> <sup>207</sup> <sup>208</sup> <sup>209</sup> <sup>210</sup> <sup>211</sup> <sup>212</sup> <sup>213</sup> <sup>214</sup> <sup>215</sup> <sup>216</sup> <sup>217</sup> <sup>218</sup> <sup>219</sup> <sup>220</sup> <sup>221</sup> <sup>222</sup> <sup>223</sup> <sup>224</sup> <sup>225</sup> <sup>226</sup> <sup>227</sup> <sup>228</sup> <sup>229</sup> <sup>230</sup> <sup>231</sup> <sup>232</sup> <sup>233</sup> <sup>234</sup> <sup>235</sup> <sup>236</sup> <sup>237</sup> <sup>238</sup> <sup>239</sup> <sup>240</sup> <sup>241</sup> <sup>242</sup> <sup>243</sup> <sup>244</sup> <sup>245</sup> <sup>246</sup> <sup>247</sup> <sup>248</sup> <sup>249</sup> <sup>250</sup> <sup>251</sup> <sup>252</sup> <sup>253</sup> <sup>254</sup> <sup>255</sup> <sup>256</sup> <sup>257</sup> <sup>258</sup> <sup>259</sup> <sup>260</sup> <sup>261</sup> <sup>262</sup> <sup>263</sup> <sup>264</sup> <sup>265</sup> <sup>266</sup> <sup>267</sup> <sup>268</sup> <sup>269</sup> <sup>270</sup> <sup>271</sup> <sup>272</sup> <sup>273</sup> <sup>274</sup> <sup>275</sup> <sup>276</sup> <sup>277</sup> <sup>278</sup> <sup>279</sup> <sup>280</sup> <sup>281</sup> <sup>282</sup> <sup>283</sup> <sup>284</sup> <sup>285</sup> <sup>286</sup> <sup>287</sup> <sup>288</sup> <sup>289</sup> <sup>290</sup> <sup>291</sup> <sup>292</sup> <sup>293</sup> <sup>294</sup> <sup>295</sup> <sup>296</sup> <sup>297</sup> <sup>298</sup> <sup>299</sup> <sup>300</sup> <sup>301</sup> <sup>302</sup> <sup>303</sup> <sup>304</sup> <sup>305</sup> <sup>306</sup> <sup>307</sup> <sup>308</sup> <sup>309</sup> <sup>310</sup> <sup>311</sup> <sup>312</sup> <sup>313</sup> <sup>314</sup> <sup>315</sup> <sup>316</sup> <sup>317</sup> <sup>318</sup> <sup>319</sup> <sup>320</sup> <sup>321</sup> <sup>322</sup> <sup>323</sup> <sup>324</sup> <sup>325</sup> <sup>326</sup> <sup>327</sup> <sup>328</sup> <sup>329</sup> <sup>330</sup> <sup>331</sup> <sup>332</sup> <sup>333</sup> <sup>334</sup> <sup>335</sup> <sup>336</sup> <sup>337</sup> <sup>338</sup> <sup>339</sup> <sup>340</sup> <sup>341</sup> <sup>342</sup> <sup>343</sup> <sup>344</sup> <sup>345</sup> <sup>346</sup> <sup>347</sup> <sup>348</sup> <sup>349</sup> <sup>350</sup> <sup>351</sup> <sup>352</sup> <sup>353</sup> <sup>354</sup> <sup>355</sup> <sup>356</sup> <sup>357</sup> <sup>358</sup> <sup>359</sup> <sup>360</sup> <sup>361</sup> <sup>362</sup> <sup>363</sup> <sup>364</sup> <sup>365</sup> <sup>366</sup> <sup>367</sup> <sup>368</sup> <sup>369</sup> <sup>370</sup> <sup>371</sup> <sup>372</sup> <sup>373</sup> <sup>374</sup> <sup>375</sup> <sup>376</sup> <sup>377</sup> <sup>378</sup> <sup>379</sup> <sup>380</sup> <sup>381</sup> <sup>382</sup> <sup>383</sup> <sup>384</sup> <sup>385</sup> <sup>386</sup> <sup>387</sup> <sup>388</sup> <sup>389</sup> <sup>390</sup> <sup>391</sup> <sup>392</sup> <sup>393</sup> <sup>394</sup> <sup>395</sup> <sup>396</sup> <sup>397</sup> <sup>398</sup> <sup>399</sup> <sup>400</sup> <sup>401</sup> <sup>402</sup> <sup>403</sup> <sup>404</sup> <sup>405</sup> <sup>406</sup> <sup>407</sup> <sup>408</sup> <sup>409</sup> <sup>410</sup> <sup>411</sup> <sup>412</sup> <sup>413</sup> <sup>414</sup> <sup>415</sup> <sup>416</sup> <sup>417</sup> <sup>418</sup> <sup>419</sup> <sup>420</sup> <sup>421</sup> <sup>422</sup> <sup>423</sup> <sup>424</sup> <sup>425</sup> <sup>426</sup> <sup>427</sup> <sup>428</sup> <sup>429</sup> <sup>430</sup> <sup>431</sup> <sup>432</sup> <sup>433</sup> <sup>434</sup> <sup>435</sup> <sup>436</sup> <sup>437</sup> <sup>438</sup> <sup>439</sup> <sup>440</sup> <sup>441</sup> <sup>442</sup> <sup>443</sup> <sup>444</sup> <sup>445</sup> <sup>446</sup> <sup>447</sup> <sup>448</sup> <sup>449</sup> <sup>450</sup> <sup>451</sup> <sup>452</sup> <sup>453</sup> <sup>454</sup> <sup>455</sup> <sup>456</sup> <sup>457</sup> <sup>458</sup> <sup>459</sup> <sup>460</sup> <sup>461</sup> <sup>462</sup> <sup>463</sup> <sup>464</sup> <sup>465</sup> <sup>466</sup> <sup>467</sup> <sup>468</sup> <sup>469</sup> <sup>470</sup> <sup>471</sup> <sup>472</sup> <sup>473</sup> <sup>474</sup> <sup>475</sup> <sup>476</sup> <sup>477</sup> <sup>478</sup> <sup>479</sup> <sup>480</sup> <sup>481</sup> <sup>482</sup> <sup>483</sup> <sup>484</sup> <sup>485</sup> <sup>486</sup> <sup>487</sup> <sup>488</sup> <sup>489</sup> <sup>490</sup> <sup>491</sup> <sup>492</sup> <sup>493</sup> <sup>494</sup> <sup>495</sup> <sup>496</sup> <sup>497</sup> <sup>498</sup> <sup>499</sup> <sup>500</sup> <sup>501</sup> <sup>502</sup> <sup>503</sup> <sup>504</sup> <sup>505</sup> <sup>506</sup> <sup>507</sup> <sup>508</sup> <sup>509</sup> <sup>510</sup> <sup>511</sup> <sup>512</sup> <sup>513</sup> <sup>514</sup> <sup>515</sup> <sup>516</sup> <sup>517</sup> <sup>518</sup> <sup>519</sup> <sup>520</sup> <sup>521</sup> <sup>522</sup> <sup>523</sup> <sup>524</sup> <sup>525</sup> <sup>526</sup> <sup>527</sup> <sup>528</sup> <sup>529</sup> <sup>530</sup> <sup>531</sup> <sup>532</sup> <sup>533</sup> <sup>534</sup> <sup>535</sup> <sup>536</sup> <sup>537</sup> <sup>538</sup> <sup>539</sup> <sup>540</sup> <sup>541</sup> <sup>542</sup> <sup>543</sup> <sup>544</sup> <sup>545</sup> <sup>546</sup> <sup>547</sup> <sup>548</sup> <sup>549</sup> <sup>550</sup> <sup>551</sup> <sup>552</sup> <sup>553</sup> <sup>554</sup> <sup>555</sup> <sup>556</sup> <sup>557</sup> <sup>558</sup> <sup>559</sup> <sup>560</sup> <sup>561</sup> <sup>562</sup> <sup>563</sup> <sup>564</sup> <sup>565</sup> <sup>566</sup> <sup>567</sup> <sup>568</sup> <sup>569</sup> <sup>570</sup> <sup>571</sup> <sup>572</sup> <sup>573</sup> <sup>574</sup> <sup>575</sup> <sup>576</sup> <sup>577</sup> <sup>578</sup> <sup>579</sup> <sup>580</sup> <sup>581</sup> <sup>582</sup> <sup>583</sup> <sup>584</sup> <sup>585</sup> <sup>586</sup> <sup>587</sup> <sup>588</sup> <sup>589</sup> <sup>590</sup> <sup>591</sup> <sup>592</sup> <sup>593</sup> <sup>594</sup> <sup>595</sup> <sup>596</sup> <sup>597</sup> <sup>598</sup> <sup>599</sup> <sup>600</sup> <sup>601</sup> <sup>602</sup> <sup>603</sup> <sup>604</sup> <sup>605</sup> <sup>606</sup> <sup>607</sup> <sup>608</sup> <sup>609</sup> <sup>610</sup> <sup>611</sup> <sup>612</sup> <sup>613</sup> <sup>614</sup> <sup>615</sup> <sup>616</sup> <sup>617</sup> <sup>618</sup> <sup>619</sup> <sup>620</sup> <sup>621</sup> <sup>622</sup> <sup>623</sup> <sup>624</sup> <sup>625</sup> <sup>626</sup> <sup>627</sup> <sup>628</sup> <sup>629</sup> <sup>630</sup> <sup>631</sup> <sup>632</sup> <sup>633</sup> <sup>634</sup> <sup>635</sup> <sup>636</sup> <sup>637</sup> <sup>638</sup> <sup>639</sup> <sup>640</sup> <sup>641</sup> <sup>642</sup> <sup>643</sup> <sup>644</sup> <sup>645</sup> <sup>646</sup> <sup>647</sup> <sup>648</sup> <sup>649</sup> <sup>650</sup> <sup>651</sup> <sup>652</sup> <sup>653</sup> <sup>654</sup> <sup>655</sup> <sup>656</sup> <sup>657</sup> <sup>658</sup> <sup>659</sup> <sup>660</sup> <sup>661</sup> <sup>662</sup> <sup>663</sup> <sup>664</sup> <sup>665</sup> <sup>666</sup> <sup>667</sup> <sup>668</sup> <sup>669</sup> <sup>670</sup> <sup>671</sup> <sup>672</sup> <sup>673</sup> <sup>674</sup> <sup>675</sup> <sup>676</sup> <sup>677</sup> <sup>678</sup> <sup>679</sup> <sup>680</sup> <sup>681</sup> <sup>682</sup> <sup>683</sup> <sup>684</sup> <sup>685</sup> <sup>686</sup> <sup>687</sup> <sup>688</sup> <sup>689</sup> <sup>690</sup> <sup>691</sup> <sup>692</sup> <sup>693</sup> <sup>694</sup> <sup>695</sup> <sup>696</sup> <sup>697</sup> <sup>698</sup> <sup>699</sup> <sup>700</sup> <sup>701</sup> <sup>702</sup> <sup>703</sup> <sup>704</sup> <sup>705</sup> <sup>706</sup> <sup>707</sup> <sup>708</sup> <sup>709</sup> <sup>710</sup> <sup>711</sup> <sup>712</sup> <sup>713</sup> <sup>714</sup> <sup>715</sup> <sup>716</sup> <sup>717</sup> <sup>718</sup> <sup>719</sup> <sup>720</sup> <sup>721</sup> <sup>722</sup> <sup>723</sup> <sup>724</sup> <sup>725</sup> <sup>726</sup> <sup>727</sup> <sup>728</sup> <sup>729</sup> <sup>730</sup> <sup>731</sup> <sup>732</sup> <sup>733</sup> <sup>734</sup> <sup>735</sup> <sup>736</sup> <sup>737</sup> <sup>738</sup> <sup>739</sup> <sup>740</sup> <sup>741</sup> <sup>742</sup> <sup>743</sup> <sup>744</sup> <sup>745</sup> <sup>746</sup> <sup>747</sup> <sup>748</sup> <sup>749</sup> <sup>750</sup> <sup>751</sup> <sup>752</sup> <sup>753</sup> <sup>754</sup> <sup>755</sup> <sup>756</sup> <sup>757</sup> <sup>758</sup> <sup>759</sup> <sup>760</sup> <sup>761</sup> <sup>762</sup> <sup>763</sup> <sup>764</sup> <sup>765</sup> <sup>766</sup> <sup>767</sup> <sup>768</sup> <sup>769</sup> <sup>770</sup> <sup>771</sup> <sup>772</sup> <sup>773</sup> <sup>774</sup> <sup>775</sup> <sup>776</sup> <sup>777</sup> <sup>778</sup> <sup>779</sup> <sup>780</sup> <sup>781</sup> <sup>782</sup> <sup>783</sup> <sup>784</sup> <sup>785</sup> <sup>786</sup> <sup>787</sup> <sup>788</sup> <sup>789</sup> <sup>790</sup> <sup>791</sup> <sup>792</sup> <sup>793</sup> <sup>794</sup> <sup>795</sup> <sup>796</sup> <sup>797</sup> <sup>798</sup> <sup>799</sup> <sup>800</sup> <sup>801</sup> <sup>802</sup> <sup>803</sup> <sup>804</sup> <sup>805</sup> <sup>806</sup> <sup>807</sup> <sup>808</sup> <sup>809</sup> <sup>810</sup> <sup>811</sup> <sup>812</sup> <sup>813</sup> <sup>814</sup> <sup>815</sup> <sup>816</sup> <sup>817</sup> <sup>818</sup> <sup>819</sup> <sup>820</sup> <sup>821</sup> <sup>822</sup> <sup>823</sup> <sup>824</sup> <sup>825</sup> <sup>826</sup> <sup>827</sup> <sup>828</sup> <sup>829</sup> <sup>830</sup> <sup>831</sup> <sup>832</sup> <sup>833</sup> <sup>834</sup> <sup>835</sup> <sup>836</sup> <sup>837</sup> <sup>838</sup> <sup>839</sup> <sup>840</sup> <sup>841</sup> <sup>842</sup> <sup>843</sup> <sup>844</sup> <sup>845</sup> <sup>846</sup> <sup>847</sup> <sup>848</sup> <sup>849</sup> <sup>850</sup> <sup>851</sup> <sup>852</sup> <sup>853</sup> <sup>854</sup> <sup>855</sup> <sup>856</sup> <sup>857</sup> <sup>858</sup> <sup>859</sup> <sup>860</sup> <sup>861</sup> <sup>862</sup> <sup>863</sup> <sup>864</sup> <sup>865</sup> <sup>866</sup> <sup>867</sup> <sup>868</sup> <sup>869</sup> <sup>870</sup> <sup>871</sup> <sup>872</sup> <sup>873</sup> <sup>874</sup> <sup>875</sup> <sup>876</sup> <sup>877</sup> <sup>878</sup> <sup>879</sup> <sup>880</sup> <sup>881</sup> <sup>882</sup> <sup>883</sup> <sup>884</sup> <sup>885</sup> <sup>886</sup> <sup>887</sup> <sup>888</sup> <sup>889</sup> <sup>890</sup> <sup>891</sup> <sup>892</sup> <sup>893</sup> <sup>894</sup> <sup>895</sup> <sup>896</sup> <sup>897</sup> <sup>898</sup> <sup>899</sup> <sup>900</sup> <sup>901</sup> <sup>902</sup> <sup>903</sup> <sup>904</sup> <sup>905</sup> <sup>906</sup> <sup>907</sup> <sup>908</sup> <sup>909</sup> <sup>910</sup> <sup>911</sup> <sup>912</sup> <sup>913</sup> <sup>914</sup> <sup>915</sup> <sup>916</sup> <sup>917</sup> <sup>918</sup> <sup>919</sup> <sup>920</sup> <sup>921</sup> <sup>922</sup> <sup>923</sup> <sup>924</sup> <sup>925</sup> <sup>926</sup> <sup>927</sup> <sup>928</sup> <sup>929</sup> <sup>930</sup> <sup>931</sup> <sup>932</sup> <sup>933</sup> <sup>934</sup> <sup>935</sup> <sup>936</sup> <sup>937</sup> <sup>938</sup> <sup>939</sup> <sup>940</sup> <sup>941</sup> <sup>942</sup> <sup>943</sup> <sup>944</sup> <sup>945</sup> <sup>946</sup> <sup>947</sup> <sup>948</sup> <sup>949</sup> <sup>950</sup> <sup>951</sup> <sup>952</sup> <sup>953</sup> <sup>954</sup> <sup>955</sup> <sup>956</sup> <sup>957</sup> <sup>958</sup> <sup>959</sup> <sup>960</sup> <sup>961</sup> <sup>962</sup> <sup>963</sup> <sup>964</sup> <sup>965</sup> <sup>966</sup> <sup>967</sup> <sup>968</sup> <sup>969</sup> <sup>970</sup> <sup>971</sup> <sup>972</sup> <sup>973</sup> <sup>974</sup> <sup>975</sup> <sup>976</sup> <sup>977</sup> <sup>978</sup> <sup>979</sup> <sup>980</sup> <sup>981</sup> <sup>982</sup> <sup>983</sup> <sup>984</sup> <sup>985</sup> <sup>986</sup> <sup>987</sup> <sup>988</sup> <sup>989</sup> <sup>990</sup> <sup>991</sup> <sup>992</sup> <sup>993</sup> <sup>994</sup> <sup>995</sup> <sup>996</sup> <sup>997</sup> <sup>998</sup> <sup>999</sup> <sup>1000</sup>

iv. 2—8.* Who these heretics were, and what their doctrine was, cannot with certainty be determined; yet, from the subject of the Epistle, it seems probable that they were Judaizers, who, with an outward appearance of sanctity, were carnal, and led an immoral, or, at least, a sensual life (which latter seems to be adverted to in the words δουλεύουσιν τῇ ἑαυτῶν κοιλίᾳ, with which comp. Phil. iii. 19, ὡς ὁ Θεὸς ἡ κοιλία), and only aimed at making the phrase of the Gospel a means of gaining a luxurious livelihood. — χρηστολογία properly means a kind address; but is here used, in malam partem, to signify a plausible discourse, consisting of mere professions without any reality. Conf. χρηστοὶ λόγοι in Hdiān., viii. 3, 10. The word following, εὐλογία, is synonymous and exegetical of χρηστοί, and is merely a detorsio ad deterius of the primary signification of εὐλογία, which is not blessing, but (in our old English idiom) ‘speaking any one fair.’ — ἀκάκων. The expression denotes not so much harmless, as guileless, persons, who, meaning well themselves, suppose others to do the same.

18. ἀλλὰ τῇ ἑαυτῶν κοιλίᾳ] Repeat δουλεύουσιν, with a little accommodation of sense, interueniunt; though the phrase δουλεύουσιν τῇ γαστρὶ occurs in Pallades ap. Anthol. Gr., § 52, Epig. 10, μὴ δεῖν δουλεύειν γαστρὶ λίγων ἀρετῶν.

19. ἡ γὰρ ὑμῶν ὑπακοή] The term ὑπακοή admits of two interpretations, 1) obedience to the Christian faith, comprehended in the Gospel; 2) an obedient disposition, a spirit of obedience and docility towards their teachers. The latter is more agreeable to the following context; and the connexion is well traced by Hodge thus: — ‘It is the more necessary that you should be on your guard against these false teachers, because your ready obedience to your divine teachers is so great and generally known. This, in itself, is commendable; but I would that you joined prudence with your docility.’ This is well intimated by the words θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς σοφοὺς, &c., which are well paraphrased by Grot., ‘I wish you to be so prudent as not to be deceived, and so good as not to deceive.’ Comp. Matt. x. 16, γίνεσθε φρόνιμοι ὡς οἱ ὄφεις, καὶ ἀκέραιοι ὡς αἱ περιστῆραι, where, as well as here, ἀκέραιοι means simplices, άπλοῖ, as in Eurip. Orest. 920. The Apostle says σοφοὺς εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν emphatically, as Eurip. Bacch. 611. Matth. σοφός, σοφός γ’ εἰ πλὴν (‘and what is more’) & δεῖ σ’ εἶναι σοφόν (‘for so the passage should be pointed,’ since there is a wisdom (namely, that spoken of James iii. 15) which is εἰς τὸ κακόν.

20. τὸν Σατανᾶν] Many modern, and especially recent, Commentators understand by this expression the persecuting Jews and Judaizers. But, as Grot. has shown, it must certainly mean the great enemy of God and man, who is also the malignant accuser of the brethren, and who delights in sowing discord where there should be peace. ‘Since,’ says Theophyl., ‘there were divisions, the Apostle invokes the Giver of peace that he would put down the scandals. Now he does not say ὑποτάξαι, but, what is more, συντρίψει; applying it not only to those who were the workers of the scandals, but Satan, the chief and prime mover. Here συντρίψει seems both precatory and prophetic.’ Yet it may be doubted whether the word is precatory; certainly it is not, as Stuart regards it, merely Optative. Far preferable is the view of Calvin, who recognizes here rather a promise to strengthen, than a prayer to help. We may, however, best consider it as breathing that firm persuasion and assurance (see Phil. i. 19) which, in divinely inspired persons, partakes strongly of the prophetic, and therefore is the more calculated to encourage and console. Compare a passage of similar character at 1 Cor. i. 8, ὅτι βεβαιώσῃ ὑμᾶς ἡμεῖς τέλους, &c. and Rom. vi. 14, ἀμαρτία γὰρ ὑμῶν οὐ κυριεύσει, &c. There is, moreover, an allusion to the primeval promise (here, it is intimated, about to be fulfilled) of bruising the serpent’s head, Gen. iii. 15. One might, indeed, suspect that the Sept. Translator read συντρίψει (the Hebrew being שָׁחַ וְשָׁחַ, lit., ‘he shall bruise thee on the head’); though our present copies have τηρήσει, which, after all, may be the genuine reading; the Translator intending it to be taken metaphorically in the sense insidiabitur, which confirms the opinion of Umbreit, on Job ix. 17, and Gees. in Lex. v. שָׁחַ, that that verb originally meant (like שָׁחַ) inhisari, ‘to gape, be open-mouthed at,’ or met. ‘to be intent on for evil,’ insidiari. This would make the expression in Genesis quite graphic,—with allusion to ravenous beasts, and especially serpents, gaping at their meditated prey. But, to revert to the term here used, συντρίψει,—it means, lit. ‘shall crush under foot;’ a metaphor taken from utterly destroying any vessel by dashing it on the ground, and trampling it under foot. Comp. Josh. x. 10, συνέτριψεν αὐτοὺς Κύριος, where there is the same figure; and 1 Cor. i. 8, where see note.

— ἡ χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου, &c.] meaning, ‘and

θεός ὁ συνεργός μου, καὶ Λούκιος καὶ Ἰάσων καὶ Σωσίπατρος οἱ συγγενεῖς μου <sup>22</sup> ἀσπάζομαι ὑμᾶς ἐγὼ Τέρτιος ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ἐν Κυρίῳ. <sup>23</sup> ἀσπάζεταιται ὑμᾶς Γάιος ὁ ξένος μου καὶ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ὅλης. ἀσπάζεταιται ὑμᾶς Ἐραστος ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς πόλεως, καὶ Κούαρτος ὁ ἀδελφός.

<sup>24</sup> Ἡ χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν. ἀμήν. <sup>25</sup> Τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ ὑμᾶς στηρίζαι, κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου καὶ τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν μυστηρίου χρόνους αἰώνιους σεσηγημένου, <sup>26</sup> φανερωθέντος δὲ νῦν διὰ τε γραφῶν προφητικῶν, κατ' ἐπιταγὴν τοῦ αἰωνίου Θεοῦ, εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη γνωρισθέντος. <sup>27</sup> μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ, διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ᾧ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. ἀμήν.

Πρὸς Ῥωμαίους ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Κορίνθου διὰ Φοίβης τῆς διακόνου τῆς ἐν Κεγχρεαῖς ἐκκλησίας.

for these and all other purposes may the favour and help of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.' Thus, as Theodor. observes, having shown the Enemy, he now points out the Helper.

25. The construction, which is exceedingly difficult, is suspended at τῷ δυν. and resumed at v. 27, μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ. Render καὶ τὸ κήρυγμα 'even the Gospel;' for κήρ. is in apposition with εὐαγγ.; the object of Paul being (as Stuart observes) to show that the Gospel which he preached was the true one.

25—28. The sense of the passage is well paraphrased by Dr. Peile as follows:—'Now to him who alone can establish you in conformity to my gospel, even the preaching of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. ii. 2) in terms which unfold a mystery kept secret throughout all past time, but now disclosed, and under the attestation of the writings of the Prophets (or, 'the Prophetical Scriptures'), by command of the everlasting God, made known to all the nations of the world to bring all to the obedience of believers—to the alone wise God in (declared by) Jesus Christ (comp. John i. 18. xvii. 3), to him, I say, be glory for ever! Amen.' I have only to remark, that, at v. 26, the construction, however anomalous, seems to be φανερωθ. τε νῦν διὰ γραφῶν προφητικῶν, εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, 'and which was made known by prophetical declarations given, through the writings of the Apostles and Prophets, by the command of God, for the purpose of bringing all nations into obedience to the Gospel.'

25. κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν μυστηρίου] 'Paul here speaks of the Gospel as something which had been kept secret since the world began; that is, hidden from eternity in the Divine mind. It is not a system of human philosophy, or the result of human investigation, but it is a revelation of the purpose of God. Paul often presents the idea, that the plan of redemption was formed from eternity, and is such as no eye could discover, and no heart conceive; 1 Cor. ii. 7—9. Col. i. 26.' (Hodge.)

27. μόνῳ σοφῷ Θεῷ] A remarkable phrase, occurring also at 1 Tim. i. 17, and Jude 25. Koppe says it is for σοφωτάτῳ Θεῷ. But it is a far stronger expression than that. 'God is said to be the only wise God,—as being the sole Author of all wisdom, and the Fountain whence alone it proceeds—and Paul here affirms him to be such διὰ Ἰ. Χρ., 'by and through Jesus Christ,' as revealed to us in that character alone by Jesus Christ. On the true force of the epithet μόνῳ, see note on 1 Tim. i. 17.

m ch. 1. 8.
2. 15. 18.
Eph. 1. 9.
2. 9. 30.
Col. 1. 26.
2 Tim. 1. 10.
Tit. 1. 2.
1 Pet. 1. 20.
Jude 24.
1 John 1. 1.

o Heb. 13.
15.
1 Tim. 1. 17.
Jude 25.

ΠΑΥΛΟΥ ΤΟΥ ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΟΥ

Η ΠΡΟΣ

ΚΟΡΙΝΘΙΟΥΣ

ΕΠΙΣΤΟΛΗ ΠΡΩΤΗ.

Ι. <sup>1</sup> ΠΑΥΛΟΣ, <sup>2</sup> κλητὸς ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ διὰ <sup>a</sup> θελήματος Θεοῦ, καὶ <sup>b</sup> Σωσθένης ὁ ἀδελφός, <sup>2</sup> ἐτῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ <sup>c</sup> <sup>a</sup> Rom. 1. 1. Gal. 2. 7, 8. <sup>b</sup> Acts 14. 17. <sup>c</sup> John 17. 19.

Acts 9. 14, 21. & 15. 9. & 22. 19. Rom. 1. 7. Eph. 1. 1. 2 Tim. 1. 9. & 2. 20. Jude ver. 1.

Corinth was the capital of Achaia Proper; and from its favourable situation—at the isthmus, (ἐν πύρρῳ, in the passage), between Peloponnesus and the Upper Greece,—and in connexion with both the Aegean and Ionian seas—it was a place of great resort, and in some measure the Emporium of Greece, and the seat of the Roman Proconsul. Hence the inhabitants were rich, but luxurious; and not only, as in most commercial places, dissolute in their morals, but proverbially such. From the devoted attention paid to commerce at Corinth, a considerable number of Jews had settled there, as well as in other trading places of the civilized world; and consequently there was a mixture of Jewish superstition and Gentile scepticism and licentiousness; for the place abounded in sophists, and swarmed with prostitutes. St. Paul, compassionating the miserable state of this great city, had gone thither, about A. D. 52 (Acts xviii. 1—17); remaining there a year and a half, and planting a flourishing church, composed partly of converted Jews, but chiefly of Gentiles; and consisting, with a few exceptions (as Crispus, Erastus, and Gaius), of the poorer classes (1 Cor. i. 26); at least there was a considerable mixture of ranks (1 Cor. xi. 22). On his departure, he was succeeded by Apollos, a learned Hellenist of Alexandria, who preached the Gospel with great acceptance. But the peace of the Church was soon afterwards disturbed by the intrusion of false teachers, who, with great pretensions to enlightened Christian knowledge, endeavoured to subvert St. Paul's apostolical authority, but were strenuously resisted by his friends and adherents. Hence arose two parties—the Pauline, and the Anti-Pauline; the latter comprehending those of the false teachers, and also not a few of Apollos, and Cephas. The uprise of this party spirit (at least as respects the party of Apollos) probably originated in the diversity of the method of preaching pursued by Apollos, and that by Paul himself. For he, as he says (1 Cor. ii. 1), employed the greatest simplicity, in promulgating the grand truths which respected the cross of Christ, without resorting to any of the aids of worldly wisdom, rhetoric, or oratory;—while in the case of his successor, Apollos, 'mighty in the Scriptures,' fervent in zeal, and endowed with considerable powers of oratory, there was a difference, both externally and internally, sufficiently wide to operate to Paul's disadvantage, and thereby to occasion the admirers of rhetoric, eloquence, and oratory, to give the preference to Apollos over Paul, even though the latter was their spiritual Father, and the founder of their Church. The ranks of the Cephas party would be not a little swelled by the accession of the false teachers and their converts,—Jews, or of Jewish extraction,—who had crept in, and occasioned much mischief, by denying Paul's Apostleship, or disparaging its nature, and setting at nought the authority he claimed, on the ground of his not being an original Apostle,—one of the Twelve. Some of these are probably alluded to in the designation ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ, in chap. i. 12, where see note. So that, though the persons so designated did not form a distinct party, but only a section of the Cephas party, yet they were decidedly Anti-Pauline; more so, probably, than the Apollos party. Besides this, the contentious and controversial spirit, which distinguished the Corinthian Church, Pauline as well as Anti-Pauline, was quite notorious. Even those persons, who were most enlightened in Christian knowledge, and possessed spiritual gifts, entered into violent controversies respecting celibacy, and marriage, &c.; nay, those who possessed the highest spiritual gifts abused them in various ways by pride and insubordination, and an unfeeling contumely towards their poorer brethren. And, besides this abuse of correct Christian principles, and of high d ver. 30.

ch. 6. 9-11.
John 17. 17
—19.
Acts 18. 9.
& 26. 18. Eph. 5. 26.

Θεοῦ τῇ οὐσῃ ἐν Κορίνθῳ, ἡγιασμένοι ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, κλητοὶ ἁγίοις, σὺν πᾶσι τοῖς ἐπικαλουμένοις τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ spiritual gifts, there was much to grieve the Apostle in the state of the congregation, both by error in doctrine (introduced by the Judaizing and Philosophizing teachers), and still more in the fact, that many who made high professions, led a moral life unworthy of their high calling in Christ Jesus. No wonder, since the horrible corruption of morals prevalent in the society around them, had, it seems, considerably infected the Christian converts; who, it may be imagined, had never entirely abandoned the licentiousness to which they had been addicted before their conversion; nor had, probably, some of them ever quite laid aside that philosophical scepticism, so prevalent in Corinth,—nay, had in some measure introduced it into the Gospel. Hence had arisen the immorality which so disgraced the Gospel, and the Philosophizing spirit which so corrupted its doctrines; inasmuch as to introduce a virtual disbelief in the Resurrection of the dead. Great need, therefore, was there for the Apostle to endeavour to stay the plague of false doctrine under the guise of enlightened philosophy, and to check the spread of evils, which threatened to bring the Church itself to ruin. Accordingly, the Apostle, being informed of this sad state of things, thought fit to frame the present Epistle, of which the object appears, from the circumstances above detailed, to have been twofold. He had, it is certain, been consulted by the congregation in various matters, not only such as concerned the ordinary transactions of life,—as celibacy, or matrimony, or divorce (see chap. vii. 1),—but also in Ecclesiastical affairs, not only respecting the extent of Christian liberty in regard to meats and drinks (chap. viii.), but also concerning the economy of matters spiritual (chap. xi. 3-16), espec. regarding the exercise of spiritual gifts. Now, even the answering of these inquiries (besides giving the directions which the Corinthians had requested of him, how best to carry into effect his wishes as to the collection to be made for the relief of the distressed Christians at Jerusalem) would, at any rate, have called for a letter of reply. But there existed, as we have seen, other and much stronger reasons why he should address to them, not so much an ordinary letter, as an Epistle Ecclesiastical, of a far higher character, and more extensive purpose. Besides the sad state of morals above noticed, the intelligence which had reached him through the family of Chloe (chap. i. 11), representing, besides the bitter and contentious spirit, so prevalent in the Church, the occurrence, too, of even a very gross case of incest, in a person who formed one of a class of high professors of, we may suppose, Antinomian views, and glossed over, as a venial offence, or, at least, passed over with impunity, by the congregation at large (chap. v. 1): the litigious spirit so prevalent among the people, especially of the highest classes; also the scandalous irregularities in celebrating the Lord's Supper; and last, not least, the utter want of kindness and condescension, not to say of Christian charity, from the higher to the lower classes. All these derelictions of Christian duty called for severe animadversion, and an earnest representation of what ought to be the conduct in a truly Christian Society. Thus we see the wide extent of the objects and purposes which drew forth the present Epistle, and occasioned its considerable length, and unusual elaborateness.—As to the Place where, and the Time when, it was written, the common opinion founded on the Subscription to the Epistle in the textus receptus, that it was written at Philippi, has been utterly refuted, and proof adduced that it was, as indeed, may be inferred from ch. xvi. 8, written (so Eusebius testifies) at Ephesus. As to the time when the Epistle was written, Wieseler, and other recent chronologists, are of opinion that it was in the early part (about Easter) of A.D. 57, and so Conybeare and Howson, and Alf; though Canon Tate, after Dr. Paley, maintains, that the time must have been in the early part of A.D. 56, and the 2nd Epistle at the close of the same year. This difference of exactly a year admits of being accounted for, by the calculation being made on two different principles. To decide which of the two views may be the true one, forms no part of my province, but pertains rather to that of the professed chronologists, to whom I refer such of my readers as may feel interested in a matter which is at once of doubtful disputation, and of no great importance. As to the much agitated question, whether there was, or was not, an Epistle of St. Paul sent to the Corinthians before the one called the first, the question is briefly discussed in the note to ch. v. 9. The contents of such an Epistle, if really sent, have been made out from the data furnished in the two extant Canonical Epistles. It must have been a very brief letter, consisting of little or nothing more than Paul's announcement of his purpose of visiting them on his way to Macedonia, and again on his return from Macedonia (which purpose he changed in consequence of the news he heard from Chloe's household); also of some earnest injunctions,—taken by the people in too strict a sense,—μὴ συναναμίγνυσθαι τοῖς πόρνοις, and finally, a request to set on foot a collection for the relief of the poor saints at Jerusalem. As to the question, of less importance, whether Paul made a second visit to Corinth (from Ephesus), or not,—suffice it here to say, that if such a visit did take place, the likeliest period at which it may be supposed to have occurred is that assigned by Wieseler, Conybeare, and Alf,—at some point of time between Paul's settling at Ephesus (Acts xix. 10), and the spring preceding the departure from Ephesus (Acts xx. 1). During this time they maintain that a second visit to Corinth, of very short duration, took place; and the researches of Wieseler and others,—the substance of which is well summed up by Davidson, Conybeare, and Alf,—go far to prove at least the probability of this. The purpose of it has been gathered by Wieseler and others from intimations supplied by data in the Canonical Epistles. But to advert to the matter and wording of the Epistle. In freedom of style and purity of Grecism, this Epistle takes the first place (at least with the exception of that to the Hebrews) of all the Pauline Epistles. There is a terseness and vigour

Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ, αὐτῶν τε καὶ ἡμῶν.

3 * Χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ Θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

• Rom. i. 7.
Eph. i. 2.
1 Pet. i. 2.

of style,—a consummateness of moulding,—a sustained power of composition,—and in general a perspicuity of expression, far removed from the rude composition, obscure wording, and tortuousness of construction, which mark a great part of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and no small portion of that to the Romans. There is, too, a grandeur of thought,—a dignity and solemnity of manner, scarcely exceeded in the purest Class. writers. On this it is truly observed by a most competent judge,—the very erudite Valckenær, in his Prolegomena to his Scholia in prim. l. Epist. ad Cor.,—“Ad rerum si spectemus pondus, ad sententiarum lumina, ad vim eloquentiæ celestis, hac in parte ipse Demosthenes PAULUS poterit anteponi, cujus eloquium luminibus oratoris et nativis ornamentis decorum, et supra quam credi potest est sublime.” He adduces, as choice specimens of the fore-mentioned excellencies, chap. ix. and xiii., of which the latter has always been regarded as a perfect gem. He ought to have conjoined, and perhaps placed first, chap. xv. At any rate, the three exhibit examples of the noblest thoughts, clothed in the most suitable language, scarcely found exceeded in the Classical writers, and unsurpassed in the Scriptures. There are in various other parts of the Epistle noble bursts of impassioned eloquence, which, though brief, are consummate; e. g. iv. 8—15. As to chap. ii., it is as much a gem, of its kind, as chap. xiii., as containing a most touching and impressive description of the simplicity of the Gospel, clothed in language distinguished by its simple naïveté. But, to advert to something far higher in value. The whole Epistle gives us a most exalted view of the wonderful gifts, both intellectual and spiritual, of the Apostle of the Gentiles; and it leaves us at no loss to imagine how large a measure of the Spirit must have been dealt out to him,—not only, we may be sure, for the instruction of the Corinthian Church, but for the edification of the Church Universal of Christ in every age. Accordingly (to use the words of Mr. Conybeare), “we have to thank God, who so inspired his Apostle, that, in his answers to questions of transitory interest, he has laid down principles of eternal obligation. Let us, then, trace with gratitude the providence of Him who ‘out of darkness calls up light;’ by whose mercy it was provided that the unchastity of the Corinthians should occasion the laws of moral purity to be established for ever throughout the Christian world:—that their denial of the resurrection should cause those words to be recorded whereon repose, as upon a rock that cannot be shaken, our sure and certain hope of immortality.”

I. 1—9 form the Exordium of the Epistle, containing, as usual, a conciliatio benevolentia, by courteous greeting.

1. κλητοὶ ἀπόστολοι See note on Rom. i. 1. The term is, indeed, not in MSS. A, D, E, and is bracketed by Lachm. and Alf.; but it is retained by Tisch.; rightly; since the authority of 3 MSS. whose text is much tampered with is of no great weight against all the rest (I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and espec. since internal evidence is rather against it, for it was more likely to have been removed from three copies because it is absent from the opening of all the other Epistles, except the Epistle to the Romans, than inserted from the Romans in all the rest, and in all the Versions, except two copies of the Italic. As to its being inserted from Romans,—that is the less probable, since it is not inserted in other Pauline Epistles in any copies. By the use of the word κλ. Paul alludes to κλητοὶ ἀγιοι, infra v. 2, as at Rom. i. 7.

VOL. II.

—Σωσθῆνης Supposed by some, but without sufficient reason, to be the person mentioned at Acts xviii. 17; others, with some probability, imagine it was the scribe who wrote this Epistle; and St. Paul, they conceive, joins Sosthenes with himself out of modesty. Almost every thing, however, concerning the person in question is mere conjecture (so Chrys.); and of conjectures Expositors are not sparing. All we can be sure of is, that, from being joined with St. Paul in this prefatory address, he must have been a person of much consideration, and well known to the Church at Corinth.

2. διὰ θαλήματος Θεοῦ ‘by the good pleasure, counsel, and purpose of God.’ I cannot agree with Theophyl. of the ancient, and several modern Commentators, that this is meant to glance at the Corinthian false teachers, who represented Paul as no regular Apostle, but self-appointed. Considering that διὰ θαλ. Θεοῦ is a form of expression occurring in most of the inscriptions to his Epistles, its use is rather to be ascribed to the deep humility of the Apostle, who (as Calvin remarks) ‘is accustomed readily to ascribe to God whatever is any where a work of God, and not to claim any merit of his own; though he does it principally in the case of his Apostleship,—that he may thereby preclude any charge of arrogance.’

—ἡγιασμένοι ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, κλητοὶ ἀγιοι ‘consecrated in Christ Jesus, called to be,’ &c. These words are closely connected with τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, being indeed an epexegetis of the notion ἐκκλ. τοῦ Θεοῦ; as appears from the inscription of Ignat. to his Epistle to the Trallians: ἡγαπημένη Θεοῦ πατρὶ Ἰ. Χρ. ἐκκλησία ἀγία for ἡγιασμένη (i. e. ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ). With respect to the terms κλητ. and ἀγιοι, we may, with Whitby and Pelle, regard them as expressions of the same import, denoting ‘such as are called out of the world, and separated from others through faith in Christ to be a peculiar people unto God:’ and accordingly, in virtue of this calling, are regarded as a chosen nation, a holy nation, &c., as were the ancient people of God, the Jews. So that the term ἀγιοι is often in the Acts and Epistles equiv. to that of Christians, and stands opposed, not to unsound Christians, devoid of the inward sanctification of the Holy Spirit, but to the heathen world. This, however, though the truth, is not the whole truth. This calling to holiness on the part of God, adverted to in the words κλητοὶ ἀγιοι, must, on the part of those who obey it, imply no less than f Rom. 1. 8.

g ch. 17. 8.
h Cor. 8. 7.
Col. 1. 8.

4 Ἐὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ μου πάντοτε περὶ ὑμῶν, ἐπὶ τῇ χάριτι τοῦ Θεοῦ τῇ δοθείσῃ ὑμῖν ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. 5 ὅτι ἐν παντί a solemn obligation to de, as Hyper. explains, 'purgati, lustrati, mundati, devoti Deo,' dedicated and devoted to God, and no longer living to themselves; 'holy even as God is holy.' See 1 Pet. i. 16. 2 Tim. i. 9. Heb. iii. 1. x. 10. Calv. remarks that, by these two expressions ('called by God,' and 'sanctified in, by, and through Christ'), Paul shows us to be accounted among the true members of the Church, and who properly belong to its communion. 'Nisi enim (continues he) vitæ sanctimoniam Christianum to ostendat, delitescere quidem in Ecclesiâ poteris, sed ex eâ tamen non eris.' See more in Calv., and also in Hyper., who, after explaining this point of interpretation in exactly the same way as Calv., offers, as built thereon, the following definition of ἐκκλησία: 'Ecclesia est congregatio eorum, qui in Christum credunt, sive, qui credendo in Christum sanctificati sunt;—agreeably to the XIXth Article of our Church, which defines the Church visible to be 'a congregation of faithful men who,' &c. But to proceed: the words κλητοῖς ἁγίοις are by the best interpreters admitted to mean, 'called to be holy,' or 'unto holiness;' viz. as the suitable end of our Christian profession, and the full carrying out of the doctrine of the Gospel. This is admitted even by Calvin, as probably the sense, though he would prefer referring the cause of sanctification to the calling and election of God. He explains this sanctification as being effected in us when we are regenerated by the Holy Spirit to serve God, and not the world. Though he adds: 'Verum quia id fit, dum inserimur in Christi corpus, extra quod non nisi pollutio est, nec aliunde etiam nobis confertur Spiritus, quam a Christo: merito nos dicit in Christo sanctificari, quando per ipsum Deo adhaeremus, et in ipso sumus novæ creaturæ.' To the former assertion we may assent; but not the latter. The Prep. ἐν before Χριστῷ denotes, not in, but by, through, as denoting means, implying also merits. The work of being consecrated and sanctified is represented in the New Test. as done by the will of God, and through the means of Christ, through the efficacy of his merits, and by the aids of the Holy Spirit, who proceeds from the Son as well as the Father. In accordance with the above statement are the words of St. Clement in the inscription of his Epistle to the Romans (where he had evidently this passage of St. Paul in view): τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ παροικοῦσθ Κορίνθον, κλητοῖς ἡγιασμένοις ἐν θελήματι Θεοῦ διὰ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, where the full sense intended is, 'called to be Christians by the will of God (who would have all men to be saved);' sanctified by that will through our Lord Jesus Christ; i. e. by his merits and atonement, and through the influence of his Holy Spirit. That the sanctification as well as the calling is by his will, appears from Heb. x. 10, ἐν ᾧ (scil. Θεοῦ) θελήματι ἡγιασμένοι ἐσμέν διὰ τῆς προσφορᾶς τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, 'we are atoned for, purified, and thus sanctified;' a passage altogether parallel with the one now before us. On κλητ. ἀγ. see note on Rom. i. 7.

— ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἐπικ., &c.] As to the reference, not a little disputed, of this clause, it most naturally connects itself with κλητ. ἀγ., q. d. 'called to holy fellowship, with all who, &c.' So Chrys., Theoph., and Œcumen., of the ancient, and several modern Expositors, as Est., Heyd., Billroth, and Peile. But the most natural connexion is not, in Pauline composition, necessarily the one intended by the writer. I am, on further consideration, inclined to think, with several recent Expositors, that the words are meant to connect with the words of address χάρις ὑμῖν, intimating that the salutation was not intended to be confined to the members of the Corinthian Church, but was meant for Christian professors (in the full sense of the term) in every place; according to which view, the present Epistle may be regarded as not indeed (with some Expositors) a sort of Catholic Epistle, but, at any rate, as intended to be read by all Christians, and to be made available to the instruction of the Church every where. See Eetius' able note. Regarded in this light, the clause forms an important addition, and was probably placed here chiefly to intimate to the Corinthians, that,—as Mr. Alf. expresses it,—'the membership of God's Holy Church Catholic consists not in being planted or presided over by Paul, Apollos, or Cephas, but in calling on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ.' At any rate those words are not a mere periphrasis for 'Christians,' since the phrase ἐκκαλεῖσθαι τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Κυρίου (on which see my Lex.) was one derived from the Sept., denoting invocation for a religious purpose in prayer, worshipping, as applied to the Lord JEHOVAH; but, as being here applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, must, by implication, supply an irrefragable testimony to the Divine worship rendered to Jesus Christ, as 'very God of very God.'

— ἐν παντί τόπῳ] i. e. 'in every place [as well as Corinth].' The words αὐτῶν τε καὶ ἡμῶν may, with some early modern, and several recent Expositors, be referred to τόπῳ. But thus a somewhat jejune sense is communicated, and one not very apposite; for I agree with Olsh., that "considerations of locality would occupy little of the attention of believers, while much would be devoted to the identity of the Redeemer of all Christians; the meaning therefore would seem to be this,—to all who in any place call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is their Lord, even as he is our's." Hence I still choose to refer the words, with Chrys., Theophyl., Theodor., and Œcumen. to Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν in the sense assigned by Olsh., thus representing Christians as being, wherever they may reside, as the servants of One and the same common Master. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 8, 10.

3. χάρις ὑμῖν—Χριστοῦ] See Rom. i. 7, and note. It is observed by Olsh. that εὐχρησῆ has a deep import, as glancing at the dissensions in the Corinthian Church; and so Theodor. remarks that, to χάρις, εὐχρησῆ was seasonably subjoined, as addressed to persons like them διηρημένους καὶ στασιάζουσιν.

4—9. After the above affectionate salutation, the Apostle proceeds to congratulate the Corinthian Christians on the abundant gifts and ἐπλουτίσθητε ἐν αὐτῷ, ἐν παντὶ λόγῳ καὶ πάσῃ γνώσει <sup>6</sup> (ἡ καθ- <sup>h ch. 2. 1.</sup> ὡς τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐβεβαιώθη ἐν ὑμῖν) <sup>7</sup> ὥστε ὑμᾶς <sup>7 Tim. 1. 8.</sup>

<sup>1 Phil. 2. 20.</sup>
<sup>Tit. 2. 12.</sup>

graces bestowed on them from above, and to express his hope as to their spiritual progress; in order, by a praise calculated to conciliate their good-will, to introduce, with less offence, the reproaches which the state of the Church at Corinth rendered it necessary for him to administer, and which he soon skilfully introduces. There was much to be thankful for, and hopeful about, in their Christian state. And on this he first dwells, in order (as Olah. observes) to appeal to their better feelings, and thus place the contrast in stronger relief, and so fix a deep conviction of sin. On the introductory form, εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ μου, comp. Rom. i. 8, and see note. On πάντοτε see Rom. i. 10, and comp. Phil. i. 4. By τῇ χάριτι τοῦ Θεοῦ is meant the gifts of grace in them, bestowed by the God of all grace (1 Pet. v. 10); denoting, however, not the extraordinary spiritual gifts only, but also the ordinary graces of the Spirit, 'given to every man, to profit withal.' The Singular is used to denote them 'tanquam complexus,' as a whole. By the ἐν before Χρ. 'I. is meant, not so much 'by,' or 'through' Christ, as 'in' Christ; i. e. 'in communion with Christ, your Head' (Eph. iv. 15. Col. i. 18), as a Church of God. And this is confirmed by the parallel passage in Phil. i. 5, ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν ἐς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, where see note.

5. The Apostle here more fully explains what he had said, by enumerating those various benefits and blessings, of which the Corinthians had been made partakers by Christ.

— ὅτι—ἐπλουτ. ἐν αὐτῷ] 'for that (because) in him (i. e. by oneness with him, see Calv., Hyper., and Est.) ye have become enriched in every thing, are completely enriched,' more particularly in what is then specified,—ἐν παντὶ λόγῳ καὶ πάσῃ γνώσει, where, as observes Hyper., 'those leading particulars have a certain emphasis.' As being particulars, they are not well rendered by 'doctrine, or learning, and knowledge.' We may, indeed, with Chrys. and Theophyl., by λόγῳ understand the faculty of teaching and preaching the Gospel; by γνώσει, the knowledge of divine things, whereby alone that faculty would be made effectual; but I prefer to explain λόγῳ (with Theodor., Beza, Calv., Est., Stenerson, and Peile) the faculty or power of imparting to others by word of mouth the divine knowledge they themselves possessed; as it is said, Eph. vi. 19, ἵνα μοι δοθῇ λόγος γνωρίσαι τὸ μυστήριον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. Thus, as Bilroth and Olah. are agreed, 'λόγος here refers to the doctrine of Christianity objectively, as the truth preached; γνώσει, subjectively, as the truth apprehended and received.' Comp. v. 17. ch. ii. 1. xii. 8. Thus the sense of λόγος here is the same as at 2 Cor. viii. 7. But whether, as would seem from v. 7, by γνώσει the Apostle meant to allude to the two cognate spiritual gifts spoken of infra xii. 8,—the Λόγος σοφίας and the Λόγος γνώσεως, is uncertain. One may readily conceive why the two particulars are here associated, if we bear in mind what Chrys. suggests, that 'there is a knowledge without utterance, and there is an utterance without knowledge;'

whereas the persons in question had BOTH, being καὶ νοῆσαι καὶ εἰπεῖν ἱκανοί. Now the stress seems laid on the latter particular, and hence λόγος, as being most prominent in the thought, is placed first.

6. καθὼς τὸ μαρτ. τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἰββ. ἐν δμῖν] The words have been variously explained, and the interpretation has been left unsettled from not sufficiently perceiving the sense of a Particle. Of καθὼς the sense has been variously explained. Theophyl. and Eucumen. of the ancient, and Hyper. and Est. of the modern Commentators, take it as standing for δι' ὧν. But this view is wholly unsupported by proofs; as is also the sense utaten, assigned by Bp. Pearce and Mackn., besides being unsuitable to the context. It would seem that the Particle is here used in no very strict sense. It is rendered quomodomodum by Br. and Est., but may better be represented by our English phrases according as, inasmuch as, or even as, as in the Pesch. Syr. Version; answering to the Classical καθὰ, so used in Lucian, t. i. 524. Arrian, E. A. iii. 16, 9, and Aristot. de Mundo, c. 5.

7. As consequent on the possession of the divine favour in general, we have adduced, in the words following, an illustration and proof, in the χαρίσματα bestowed on the Corinthian Church. As to the sense of τὸ μαρτύριον τ. Χρ., it is best understood, 'the testimony concerning Christ in the Gospel, whether read or preached; equiv. to the Gospel,' 'so called (as Calvin observes) inasmuch as its grand end is to manifest Christ to us, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom.' By the Gospel being confirmed and established is plainly meant its truth and excellence being evinced, and that by its fruits; meaning not merely the supernatural gifts of the Spirit, but its internal graces for faith and sanctification. See Calvin and Hyperius. The words which follow at v. 7 (forming, with those of the present, a parenthetical portion), ὅτι ὑμᾶς—χαρίσματα, are meant to set forth the extent to which these gifts and graces, and consequently the μαρτύριον involved therein, arose. Render: 'Inasmuch that ye (Corinthians) come short (lit. are left behind) in no gift or grace,'—namely, 'such as those imparted to the Christian community of which you are members.' See 1 Cor. xii. passim.

Of the next words, ἀποκάλυψε τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν—Χριστοῦ, the full sense is, 'waiting for, looking earnestly towards—as in anxious expectation of—the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ;' denoting (as at Rom. viii. 19) not a bare historical belief in the fact of the future coming of the Lord, but expressing that longing desire after it, necessarily connected with love, faith, and hope; implying the co-existence and co-operation of all three, as attesting the perfectness of the spiritual life of Christian professors. This sense of ἀπεκδ. (as used of a person as to his coming, or some event connected with it) is also found at Phil. iii. 20. Heb. ix. 28, as said of our Saviour. That the ἀποκάλυψις is one from heaven, plainly appears from 2 Thess. i. 7, ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἀπὸ οὐρανοῦ (comp. 1 Thess. i. 10), ἀνατίσκει τὸν
K 2

1 Thess. 3.
12.
2 Cor. 1.
Col. 1. 22.
1 Thess. 5.
24.
John 16. 4.
1 John 1. 3.
1 Rom. 12.
1, 10. & 15. 5.
2 Cor. 5. 20.
2 Cor. 6. 1.
2 Cor. 10. 1.
Gal. 4. 12.
Eph. 4. 1.
Phil. 2. 2.
2 Cor. 15. 10.

μὴ ὑστερεῖσθαι ἐν μηδενὶ χαρίσματι, ἀπεκδεχομένους τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.<sup>8</sup> ὅς καὶ βεβαιώσει ὑμᾶς ἕως τέλους, ἀνεκλήτους ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.<sup>9</sup> Πιστὸς ὁ Θεὸς, δι' οὗ ἐκλήθητε εἰς κοινωνίαν τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν.

10<sup>m</sup> Παρακαλῶ δὲ ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, διὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἵνα τὸ αὐτὸ λέγητε πάντες, καὶ ἡ μὴ ἡ ἴδον αὐτοῦ ἐκ τῶν οὐρανῶν. The Particip. ἀπεκδεχομένους (depending on ἡμᾶς) is regarded by the Commentators as to be resolved into the cognate Verbo and some Participle; q. d. 'dum expectatis,' or 'utroque qui expectatis.' I should prefer rendering, 'you who are waiting.' The Apostle, it should seem, engrafted this clause on the former, by way of further justifying his giving of thanks to God on their behalf, by representing them as not resting solely on the gifts and graces just mentioned, but as having desires extending further, and only to be accomplished at the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, the day of perfect revelation, in which Christ, our Wisdom, shall be fully manifested.

8. ὅς] This, as I have already shown at large, must be referred, not to the nearer antecedent, 'I. Χρ.', but to the more remote, Θεός, at v. 4, for several reasons; especially because in the reference we should have had ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ αὐτοῦ. The passage is so pregnant in meaning that the sense may best be expressed in paraphrase: 'Who [as He hath hitherto bestowed those gifts and graces] will also confirm you [in their use,—in faith, grace, and the patient waiting for of Christ, and carry you] unto the end [of your Christian course, so that ye may be found] blameless (inextinguishables), at the day,' &c. As to the import of ἕως τέλους, it might mean 'to the end of life;' but the context requires 'to the end of the Christian course,' 'to the termination of your state of trial and probation.' ἕως τέλους seems added to promote their constancy; since (as Hyper. observes) to persevere for a time is a light matter; to persevere to the end of our course, 'hic labor, hoc opus est.' The following sentence, however, seems to look yet further; and the best account of this somewhat perplexing matter is that of Estius, who ably handles the point thus:— 'Ceterum hæc pars duo promittit: firmitatem in acceptis Dei donis, et perseverantiam, qua in illis conserventur usque ad finem vite, vel potius (quod vult pars sequens) usque ad adventum Christi futurum in fine sæculi, quamvis hoc ex illo sequatur.'

The term ἀνεκλήτους (used also Col. i. 23), Dr. Poile remarks, 'well describes that consummation of the Christian character which the faithfulness of God is prepared to effect in all whom he is pleased to call into communion with him in his Son, if only they be faithful to their Covenant of Mercy, and love Him, and keep his commandments.' True; but we must bear in mind Paul's own words at Rom. viii. 33, τίς ἐγκαλέσει κατὰ ἐλεγκτῶν Θεοῦ; Θεὸς ὁ δικαίων, and remark, as Calv. suggests, 'non perfici in nobis primo die hanc tantam munditiam: quin potius bene agitur nobiscum, si quotidie proficiamus in penitentia, si pergamus a peccatis quæ Deo nos obnoxios reddunt, donec cum corpore mortis exuamus omnes peccati sordes.' For shall, I would here render by will, the former suggesting the idea of promise; but all that seems meant is an assurance from strong persuasion, such as we find expressed at Rom. i. 20, Θεός—συντρίψει τὸν Σατανᾶ. Comp. a kindred passage in Phil. i. 6, ποιήσει αὐτὸ τὸτε, ὅτι ὁ ἐναρξάμενος ἐν ὑμῖν ἔργον ἀγαθόν (i. e. of faith and grace, and other Gospel blessings, of which the believer is made partaker with the saints) ἐπιτελέσει (with which compare ἐπὶ τέλους here) ἄχρι (equiv. to ἕως here) ἡμέρας Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

9. πιστὸς ὁ Θεός, &c.] A proof that God will confirm them, taken from his faith in performing his promises (see Est. and Calv.); q. d. 'As God is faithful to his promises, so He will bring you to that participation of Christ and of salvation through him, to which he hath called you;' see Phil. i. 6. 1 Thess. v. 24.

—ἐν κοινωνίᾳ τοῦ Υἱοῦ, &c.] This points at the nature of that calling; and by κοινωνία, &c. is designated a participation in all the benefits of Christ both in this world and in the next, scilicet the latter: and no wonder; since this mystical communion with Christ, as members of his body (see 1 John i. 3), implies the adoption of sons, which is a pledge of perfect redemption and glory. See Rom. viii. 17, 23. 2 Thess. ii. 14.

10. After this conciliatory introduction, the Apostle comes closer to his main purpose, passing with great address from praise to censure, moderate indeed, but grave and decided. And first he adverts to that leading evil, which had given rise to so many others, which he intended to reprove,—a party spirit. Moreover, he endeavours to vindicate the simplicity of Christian doctrine, as well against the ambitious boasts of the Greek Philosophists, as against the superstitious Jews, that he may draw both of them to the truth in Jesus, ver. 10. ch. iv. 21.

—διὰ τοῦ ὀνόματος, &c.] This may signify, as several recent Expositors explain, 'in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ.' But from the character of the context, which bears the stamp of earnest entreaty, some stronger sense is required; and the true sense must be, 'I beseech you, by the sacred name after which ye are called, the only name whereby ye can be saved, even the name of him who loved us and gave himself for us.' (Gal. ii. 20.) See Chrys., Theophyl., Calv., and Est.

—ἵνα τὸ αὐτὸ λέγητε πάντες] Τὸ αὐτὸ λέγειν is equivalent to τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, ὁμοφρονεῖν, and other terms denoting concord and unanimity; which many Expositors

ἐν ὑμῖν σχίσματα· ἦτε δὲ κατηρτισμένοι ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ νοῦ καὶ ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ γνώμῃ. <sup>11</sup> Ἐδηλώθη γάρ μοι περὶ ὑμῶν, ἀδελφοί μου, ὑπὸ τῶν Χλόης, ὅτι ἔριδες ἐν ὑμῖν εἰσι. <sup>12</sup> Λέγω δὲ τοῦτο, <sup>o John 1. 23. Acts 15. 24. 2 Cor. 12. 13.</sup> ὅτι ἕκαστος ὑμῶν λέγει· Ἐγὼ μὲν εἰμι Παύλου· ἐγὼ δὲ, Ἀπολλώ· ἐγὼ δὲ, Κηφᾶ· ἐγὼ δὲ, Χριστοῦ. <sup>13</sup> Μεμέρισται ὁ Χριστός; μὴ Παῦλος ἐσταυρώθη ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, ἡ εἰς τὸ ὄνομα Παύλου ἐβαπτίσθητε; <sup>14</sup> Εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ ὅτι οὐδένα ὑμῶν ἐβά- <sup>2 Acts 15. 2. Rom. 15. 22.</sup>

think is meant here. But by the antithetic clause, καὶ μὴ ἐν ὑμῖν, followed up by the words ἦτε δὲ κατηρτ.—νοῦ, there must be denoted, not so much concord, and its opposite discord, in feeling and sentiment, and unanimity in thinking and profession, as opposed to discord or party divisions. This is clear from the next two verses, in the former of which the term ἔριδες denotes the same as ἔριθία in a very similar passage at 2 Cor. xii. 20. And answering to the σχίσματα here are the ἔρις καὶ διχοστασίαι at 1 Cor. iii. 3, and the σχίσματα and αἰρέσεις at 1 Cor. xi. 18, 19. The words following may be rendered, 'but that ye be knit together in sameness of thinking, and in sameness of feeling.' In κατηρτ. there is a metaphor taken from the act of drawing and stitching together the rents of a torn garment. Comp. Hdol. v. 106, ἴσα τοι κίμα καταρτίσω πάντα.

12. The Apostle now proceeds to fully unfold his meaning; for λέγω δὲ τοῦτο, both in the New Test. and the Class. writers, is adapted to the purpose of explanation, and answers to the Latin scilicet, or sicquidem. Equiv. to, 'Now, what I mean is this.' Ἐκαστος is only to be referred to the generality, i. e. the factions of which each one of them (singuli) said, I am of Paul, &c. On this whole passage (especially ἐγὼ δὲ, Χριστοῦ) Commentators have perplexed themselves to little purpose. No difficulty need be found in Paul, Apollos, and Cephas, being mentioned as heads of parties; for the words are not St. Paul's, but those of persons supposed so to speak. That parties called themselves of Paul, or of Apollos, or of Cephas, involved no blame to those personages, since it was done without their wish. Hence St. Paul lays the blame on the Corinthians themselves. As to Cephas, or Peter, the party called by his name seems to have been so denominated, not so much from any attachment to the person of Peter (as in the case of Apollos), as with reference to his understood (though in some respects misunderstood) opinions as to the obligation of the ritual part of the Mosaic Law on Jewish Christians. Accordingly, the persons in question were probably Judaizers.

As to the difficulty connected with ἐγὼ δὲ, Χριστοῦ, the best mode of encountering it is to suppose, that those who so called themselves were persons pretending to have derived their knowledge of the Gospel either from the fountain-head, i. e. immediately from Jesus Christ, or at least from his nearest relatives, James the less, Simon, and Jude; the first of whom held a very great authority among the primitive Christians, being (as Euseb. H. Eccles. iii. 11, 20, tells us) called ὁ διαπορεύων. These, we may be sure, were of the Anti-Pauline party; but, in fact, they were, as Billr. shows, essentially of one and the same party with those of Cephas; or perhaps they were persons who went a little further, maintaining the notion (Billr. supposes) that intimate intercourse with Christ was essential to the possession of genuine Apostolic authority, and so to place Paul, at least, much below the rest of the Apostles, as one who had entered upon the office later than the others, and in a way peculiar to himself.

13. μεμέρισται ὁ Χριστός;] Most modern Expositors take these words to mean, either, 'is the doctrine of Christ divided and different?' or, 'is the Church divided?' has Christ sanctioned divisions in it?' or, 'does Christ belong to any one party only?' But the simplest mode of interpretation, and the one most accordant with the context, is that adopted by most of the ancient, and some eminent modern Commentators, who explain, 'What, then, are there more Christs than one? or can Christ be divided?' Here we have, as Hyper. remarks, and Calv. coincides with him, a ratio ab absurdo. It is plain that (as Hyper., Calv., Bulling., and others down to Stenerson, have shown, that by Christ must be meant the person of Christ, as being (Alf. observes) the centre and bond of Christian unity. This is called for by the context, as well discussed by Calv., and its sense is well paraphrased by Stenerson. Nevertheless, in the person of Christ may be also implied the Church of Christ; which will intimate an admonition, well expressed by Calv. thus: 'Nos unum esse corpus oportet, si velimus sub eo tanquam sub capite contineri. Quod si in diversa corpora scindimur, ab ipso quoque dissilimus; gloriari ergo ejus nomine inter discordias et factiones, est ipsum discerpere, quod fieri nequit.'

In μὴ Παῦλος ἐσταυρ. ὑπ. ὑμῶν, Stenerson notices the true sense of ὑπὲρ, not inveka,—for Peter, Paul, and other Apostles, were crucified for the benefit of men, attesting the truth of what they taught, by dying for it; but not in the place of sinful man, or to atone for his sins. Lachm. and Tisch., however, have effectually ejected this fundamental doctrine, by bringing in πρὸς from only two MSS., B and D. I say 'only two;' for I find ὑπὲρ in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. The same MS. B, and another of its family, has πρὸς for ὑπὲρ at 1 Thes. v. 10, on the very same subject, and B, C, D, F, in Mark xiv. 24.

14. εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ] The best Commentators are agreed that this phrase (by an idiom common even to modern languages) signifies, 'I am heartily glad.' 'The Apostle so speaks,' observes Canon Tate, 'with reference to the unhappy contentions which occurred subsequently to the sojourn of the Apostle there, and which now made him not sorry that he had administered the rite of introduction to Christianity to πιτσα, εἰ μὴ Κρίσπον καὶ Γάϊον <sup>15</sup> ἵνα μὴ τις εἴπῃ ὅτι εἰς τὸ

 ἔμὸν ὄνομα ἐβάπτισα. <sup>16</sup> Ἐβάπτισα δὲ καὶ τὸν Στεφάνῳ οἶκον λοιπὸν οὐκ οἶδα εἰ τινα ἄλλον ἐβάπτισα.

<sup>17</sup> Οὐ γὰρ ἀπέστείλε με Χριστὸς βαπτίζειν, ἀλλ' εὐαγγελί-ζεσθαι· οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, ἵνα μὴ κενωθῇ ὁ σταυρὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ. <sup>18</sup> Ὁ λόγος γὰρ ὁ τοῦ σταυροῦ τοῖς μὲν ἀπολλυμένοις μωρία ἐστὶ, τοῖς δὲ σωζομένοις ἡμῖν δύναμις Θεοῦ ἐστὶ. <sup>19</sup> γέ-γραπται γάρ· Ἀπολῶ τὴν σοφίαν τῶν σοφῶν, καὶ τὴν

so few.' For thus he intimates that his enemies would lose a fair opportunity of censuring him, as if drawing to himself partisans.

<sup>16</sup> ἐβάπτισα δὲ καὶ, &c. This is said by way of limiting the foregoing too general assertion. The formula δὲ καὶ may be rendered and, or verò, etiam, but likewise.

For ἐβάπτισα, Lachm. and Tisch. edit. from A, B, C, and 9 cursive MSS., and the Vulg., with some later Versions, ἐβαπτίσθητε. But I doubt not that it was a mere alteration to remove a tautology, ἐβάπτισα occurring thrice in a very short compass. Alf. admits it to be a 'correction;' but chooses to ascribe it to a far-fetched reason suggested by Meyer, in preference to the simple and obvious one pointed out by me in my Supplementary Volume.

— οἶκον 'family,' including persons of every age and sex, and, of course, infants. So Ignatius, Epist. p. 21, cited by Wolf: ἀσπάζομαι τοὺς οἴκους τῶν ἀδελφῶν μου σὺν γυναίξει καὶ τέκνοις.

<sup>17</sup> The Apostle now proceeds to a vindication of his doctrine, and of the method he had pursued in communicating it. Up to ch. ii. 2, he treats of its nature, and declares that he cannot accommodate it to the prejudices of men, so as (like the false Apostles) to keep out of view, or sophisticate, what would be censured by many, and seem to them foolishness.

The γάρ has reference to a clause suppressed; q. d. '[I have baptized very few:] for Christ sent me not so much to baptize, as to preach the Gospel; οὐκ—ἀλλά being here, as often, used comparatè, meaning, not for the special purpose of baptizing; q. d. 'That was not the end for which he sent me forth:' and, as Bengel well observes, 'quo quis mittitur, id agere debet.' Baptism might be administered by any, but the chief office of the Apostles was to evangelize.

— οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, &c. Here (as Calvin remarks) there is an anticipation of an objection to Paul's preaching, on the score of its being devoid of the attractions of human eloquence. The answer to which is, that he was not sent to be a rhetorician, who should puff himself forth by the splendour of eloquence, but a minister of the Spirit, who should be content to use plain and popular diction.

— Ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου is for ἐν λόγῳ σοφίας, or λόγῳ σοφῶ (as ch. ii. 13, ἐν διδακτοῖς ἀνθρωπίνης σοφίας λόγοις, or as 2 Pet. i. 16, σισοφισμένοις μύθοις), i. e. not what appeared to men learning, acumen, or eloquence, of which the false teachers so boasted.

— ἵνα μὴ κενωθῇ ὁ σταυρὸς meaning, 'that the doctrine thereof should not become fruitless,' in other words, be deprived (lit. emptied) of its proper force, from the power it ought to have, by its Divinity, on the minds of men, even without human art, being detracted from the Gospel, and ascribed to human contrivance. (Ernesti.)

<sup>18</sup> ὁ λόγος γὰρ ὁ τοῦ σταυροῦ, &c. This we may regard (with Calvin) as a rhetorical concession, to be thus resolved: 'However, the word of the Cross (meaning, the doctrine of salvation through a crucified Redeemer), because it is not made palatable by the communication of human wisdom, may be regarded as no better than folly by those who are in the way to perish, yet to us the wisdom of God shines forth therein.' — μωρία, for μωρός. So Thucyd. v. 41, τοῖς δὲ Λακεδαιμονίοις ἰδοῦμαι μωρία εἶναι πάντα. To the depraved conceptions of such it appears foolishness. 'Just (says Chrysostom) as to the dangerously sick even the most wholesome and grateful viands seem distasteful, and all the kindest assiduities of friends troublesome.' 'Here,' observes Heydenreich, 'since the term μωρία has a twofold opposite, δύναμις Θεοῦ and σοφία, there seems to have been in the mind of the Apostle a double idea, both that of foolishness and that of weakness or inefficacy; the former pointing to the wisdom of God; the latter to the power of God.' The expressions ἀπολλυμένοις and σωζομένοις 'rem. denotant ex effectū'; the sense being, 'To those who disbelieve and reject the Gospel (see 2 Thess. ii. 15), and therefore perish, it appears foolishness; but by those, like ourselves, who believe and embrace it, and are thereby saved (see 2 Cor. ii. 15), it is regarded as the power of God.' In other words, by the former may be understood, as at 2 Cor. iv. 3, those who are perishing (q. d. who are in the high road to perdition), namely, by their unbelief; and, by the latter, those who are being saved, are in the way of salvation; the latter designating those who, believing, have embraced the gracious offer of salvation by being baptized in the name of Christ, and who have thereby become heirs through Christ of eternal salvation. Comp. Acts ii. 41, ἀποδεξάμενοι τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ ἐβαπτίσθησαν, καὶ προσετίθησαν, and especially ii. 47, προστίθει τὸς σωζομένους καθ' ἡμέραν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ. See more in note on 2 Cor. ii. 15.

<sup>19</sup> In proof of the position οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, and to show the reason thereof, introduced by γάρ, the Apostle now appeals first to the testimony of Scripture (ver. 19), then to that of experience (vv. 20—31), showing how strikingly the power of the Gospel appears in its triumph over the wisdom of this world. The citation agrees verbally with the Sept., except that for the literal version κρύψω there, we have here the free version ἀθετήσω.

σύνεσιν τῶν συνετῶν ἀθετήσω. <sup>20</sup> ἢ Πού σοφός; πού γραμματεὺς; πού συζητητῆς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου; Οὐχὶ ἐμώρανε<sup>u</sup> ὁ Θεὸς τὴν σοφίαν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου; <sup>21</sup> ἢ Ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἐν

u Isa. 55. 12.
Job 12. 7.
& 20. 27.
v Matt. 11.
25.
Luke 10. 31.
Rom. 1. 21,
33.

— ἀπολῶ—ἀθετήσω] The words referred to (not quoted) are derived with trifling alteration, for application's sake, from Sept. Vers. of Isa. xxix. 14. In fact, the only difference is in ἀθετήσω being used for κρύψω, and even that is found in a few copies of the Sept., as also in the passages of Just. Martyr. contr. Tryph., Euseb., and Cyprian adduced by the Editors of the Sept. However, the Apostle had also probably in mind Jer. viii. 8, 9, for I agree with Dr. Henderson, that there is here not a mere accommodation of the prophecy, but a special prediction of the awful judgment that God would inflict on the nation by means of the malversation of their teachers; which prophecy the Apostle shows to have had its fulfilment in his days. The words cited are meant to show, by the testimony of Scripture, how unworthy it is that the truth of the Gospel should be prejudiced by the worldly-wise treating it with ridicule, or silent contempt, since from the words of the prophet it appears how utterly worthless in the sight of God is their opinion. Calvin here appears to great advantage in a note full of instruction. One thing, however, he has omitted to point out—namely, why the passage should have so abrupt and unconnected a character. This has been ably set forth by Hyperius as follows: 'Since it might have been urged that those who call the Gospel foolishness are wise men who cannot easily be wrong; to this tacit objection the Apostle replies, not by words of his own, but by the testimony of Scripture, q. d. 'Wise though they be according to this world, yet they are in reality themselves foolish.' The Apostle might, indeed, have said somewhat more plainly: 'Who are those wise who reject the Gospel as foolishness? Are they not those who think themselves wise according to the world? But, if we may speak the truth, the very persons themselves are fools, neither do they understand what they say. They are by God's permission blinded and infatuated.' So the Apostle might have expressed himself. But, with his usual modesty (lest he should seem to invidiously inveigh at wise and great men), he only intimates what he meant by using not his own words, but the words of Scripture. Thus the γὰρ is (as at iii. 19, γίνονται γὰρ ὁ δρασσόμενος, &c.) meant to point the argument as to the utter incompetency of the worldly-wise to appreciate the wisdom of God, which is emphatically termed infra, ii. 7, σοφία Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ.

20. πού σοφός; &c.] The Apostle now applies the sense of the passage, thus understood, to the present case; and adverting to the situation of the Christian Church, of which the greater part consisted of uneducated persons, employs words which are by some supposed to be a quotation from Isa. xxxiii. 18, but by others, regarded as a sort of parody on it, retaining the point in πού—πού? quo ordine? quâ dignitate? where the interrogation has the effect of a strong negation, q. d. 'no where? = they are nought; in which idiomatic phrase we have a familiar form of expression, to denote the utter inability of each and all to attain the professed end of all wisdom, the discovery of the Deity in his works of wisdom and Providence.

By the σοφός are designated the heathen philosophers, especially the ethical ones; and by γραμματεὺς the ᾠδονομοί, or Jewish Scribes, or Jurists; though it may also include men of letters in general, meaning Jewish literati, i. e. that order of persons professing the interpretation of the Scriptures, and having also the privilege of deciding in difficult cases, such as depend on the ceremonial law. By the συζητητῆς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου is meant, 'the subtle disputer of this world,' the Sophist, who rests on mere human wisdom only. It is not agreed whether the Apostle has reference to the Heathen σοφισταί, or to the Jewish ᾠδονομοί, seekers, investigators, who deduced from Scripture allegorical, mystical, and cabalistic senses; held subtle disputations on decrees, customs, &c.; and, in short, were very like the Scholastic Theologians of the middle ages. Both, it should seem, are intended; and the sense taken generally is, 'a subtle disputant on difficult but trifling questions, and curious but empty speculations' (so Theophyl. explains by τὸν λογισμὸν καὶ ἐριῶνας τὰ πάντα ἐπιτρέποντα); the ζητήσις καὶ λογομαχία of 1 Tim. vi. 4; but espec. the former. See Valcknaer's learned note in his Scholæ. Notwithstanding, however, the opinion of the very learned Annotator, it seems best not to confine the reference to the Physical, but to extend it also to the Dialectical Philosophers (so Eusebius, p. 250, 6, αὶ στρεβλοῦμεναι συζητήσις (puzzles) λύονται, the σοφισταί, who professed the art of discussing any proposed subject, and of disputing upon it by conjoint disputation with any other inquirer. These persons were less solicitous about abstract truth, than popular display. It is obvious that the tendency of such must have been to promote universal scepticism; and hence the Apostle might well speak of them pointedly, as he does.

—οὐχὶ ἐμώρανε, &c.] i. e. 'convicted of foolishness?' This interrogation with a negation involves a strong affirmation; and the sense is,—that God, by promulgating a plan of salvation which no human wisdom could have devised, much less accomplished, has thereby placed in a strong point of view the inefficiency of mere human wisdom for the attainment of salvation; see Theophyl. and Chrys.

21. ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ—πιστ.] These words are closely connected with the preceding, and show the cause why God did so; serving the purpose of further illustration. There is, in fact, as Hyper. observes, subjoined another reason why the Gospel needs not learned speech, but is content with a simple and rude style of speaking. This reason is deduced from the just ordinances of God, q. d. 'for after (seeing that) the world by its own carnal wisdom did not (would not) know God, it pleased God to, &c.' The ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ is capable of two or three senses; but the simplest, and most agreeable to the context, is that of the ancient, and several eminent modern Ex-

w Matt. 13.
95, & 10, 11.
John 4. 48.
x Isa. 8. 14.
Rom. 9. 22,
23.
ch. 2. 14.
y Rom. 1. 14.
Gal. 3. 11.
Col. 2. 2.
1 Pet. 2. 8.

τῇ σοφίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔγνω ὁ κόσμος διὰ τῆς σοφίας τὸν Θεόν, εὐδόκησεν ὁ Θεὸς διὰ τῆς μωρίας τοῦ κηρύγματος σῶσαι τοὺς πιστεύοντας. <sup>22</sup> Ὡς ἐπειδὴ καὶ Ἰουδαῖοι † σημεῖον αἰτοῦσι, καὶ
"Ἕλληνες σοφίαν ζητοῦσιν <sup>23</sup> ἡμεῖς δὲ κηρύσσομεν Χριστὸν ἐσταυρωμένον Ἰουδαίοις μὲν σκάνδαλον, * ἔθνεσι δὲ μωρίαν
<sup>24</sup> αὐτοῖς δὲ τοῖς κλητοῖς, Ἰουδαίοις τε καὶ Ἕλλησι, Χριστὸν

positors, — 'in (or 'by') the wise counsels of God (so permitting it to be).—διὰ τῆς σοφίας, 'by (all) its wisdom, talent, and knowledge (as means for the discovery of truth), did not know (failed to find out) God; God εὐδόκησεν, thought fit, vouchsafed, διὰ τῆς μωρίας τ. κηρύγ., by the (so-called, so esteemed) foolishness of preaching, &c.' said, according to a figure occurring in the Class. writers, as Thucyd. vi. 17, οὐκ ἄχρηστος ἦδε ἡ ἀνοία. Soph. Antig. 95, ἀλλ' ἴα με, καὶ τὴν ἐξ ἐμοῦ δυσβουλίαν, and Cæd. Tyr. 397.—σῶσαι τοὺς πιστεύοντας is best explained, 'to put into the way of salvation, be the means of saving, those who should believe and embrace the Gospel propounded by this preaching.'

<sup>22</sup>, <sup>23</sup>. There is here, as Calv. points out, an explanation of the foregoing sentiment, and suspended on the words τῆς μωρίας τοῦ κηρύγμ., which are supposed to be repeated:—'The foolishness of preaching, I say (so regarded by both Jews and Gentiles).' Why so regarded, is stated in the following words, where ἡμῶν seems meant to lay down a consequens in reasoning, serving to a proof of what has been said; and here it refers, as Hyper. remarks, to each part of the preceding proposition. What the Apostle means to prove is, that the means provided by God for the salvation of men really corresponded to what it was, the so-called 'foolishness of preaching'; and why it was accounted foolish, — because it did not agree with the preconceived notions either of the Jew or the Gentile. See more in Hyper., Crell., and especially Calv. Thus we may here render, as in Matt. xxi. 46, Luke xi. 6, inasmuch as, and point thus: πιστεύοντες ἡμῶν—ζητοῦσιν ἡμεῖς, &c. The first part of the proof is contained in the words Ἰουδ. σημεῖον αἰτοῦσι, &c., where the sign which the Jews are represented as requiring is 'a sign visible and extraordinary from heaven,' attesting Jesus' claims. The Jews, we know from Matt. xv. 4. Mark viii. 11. Luke xi. 29, both the Pharisees and the Sadducees, demanded a sign from heaven, such as those signs mentioned in Luke xxi. 11, 25. And perhaps in John ii. 18, and vi. 30, 31, the σημεῖον spoken of is a sign from heaven. The καὶ—καὶ binds together the two parties alike, only in both making unreasonable requirements. See Calv. and Hyper.—The δὲ, which ushers in v. 23, presents a contrast between the Apostle himself and the two parties in question, —their unreasonable requirements, and his firm and conscientious discharge of duty. Thus the general scope and logic of the passage are clear and consistent. There remains only one scrapie — as to the uncertainty of reading, inasmuch as for σημεῖον, Grieb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read σημεία, while the text rec. is retained by Matthæi, rightly; since external evidence is insufficient, inasmuch as, in addition to 7 uncials, the cursives are but 4; and I can only add Mus.

7142, and Cov. 2 (omitted by Mill); and Versions and Fathers are, in a case like this, of little weight; and internal evidence is rather against than for σημεία. Even the innovating De Wette and Meyer are opposed to σημεία, as a correction; because, they say, only the Singular could present any difficulty; which is true, if σημεῖα arose from correction. But I rather think the Plural originated in the negligence of scribes, since α and ον are perpetually confounded; and they were the more likely to fall into error, since the Plur. σημεῖα occurs very frequently, the Sing. σημεῖον seldom. As to Tischendorf's opinion, — that the Sing. was a correction from such passages as Matt. xii. 39. xvi. 4, it is a wholly gratuitous supposition, and involves the highest improbability that such a correction should have crept into all the copies except about a dozen. But the strongest point of internal evidence in favour of σημεῖον is that suggested by Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. p. 190, that 'if the Jews had only required signs and miracles in general, abundance had been performed by our Lord and his Apostles, abundance were at that very time performing in the Corinthian Church, to which St. Paul was then writing. It is evident, therefore, that they were eagerly expecting some particular sign of the Messiah in and from the heavens.'

I must not omit to remark here, that the Jews and the Greeks are well characterized. The Jews seek a sign from heaven, some astounding miracle, agreeable to their gross conceptions: the Greeks do not so much require miracles, as wisdom; but it must be human wisdom, set off by the arts of rhetoric, and grounded on the deductions of human reason and popular philosophy.

<sup>23</sup> ἡμεῖς δὲ, &c.] 'But we simply preach,' &c. Χριστὸν ἰσθ. is equivalent to τὸν λόγον (the doctrine) τοῦ σταυροῦ (of the Cross). The sense of the next words is, 'Though it be to the Jews a stumbling-block (as contrary to all their secular expectations), and to the Greeks foolishness, as not resting mainly on the principles of human reason.' I have now, in deference to the united judgment of the Critical Editors (except Matthæi), adopted ἰθὺσι for Ἕλλησι, from strong external, confirmed by internal evidence.

<sup>24</sup> αὐτοῖς δὲ τ. κλητοῖς] scil. ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, 'to those called [by him];' equiv. to τοῖς κατὰ πρόθεσιν [scil. Θεοῦ] κλητοῖς οὖν, and nearly so (though in another view) to τοῖς σωζομένοις, 'those put into the way of salvation,' supra, v. 18, and 2 Cor. ii. 15. Ἀτ Χριστὸν ὑπεκα κηρύσσομεν, understanding by Χριστὸν the λόγον Χριστοῦ ἰσταυρωμένου, 'the doctrine of a crucified Saviour.' The expressions which follow are meant to further develop the idea of the preaching of the Cross, and are employed with reference, the former to the Jews, whose stum-

θεοῦ δύναμιν καὶ θεοῦ σοφίαν. <sup>25</sup> Ὅτι τὸ μωρὸν τοῦ θεοῦ σοφώ- <sup>a</sup> John 7. 47
James 1. 6
<sup>a</sup> Luke 1. 8
<sup>a</sup> 18. 34, 35.
John 4. 45—
54.
<sup>b</sup> 29. 28, 30.
<sup>b</sup> 3 Cor. 10.
<sup>c</sup> Ps. 6. 2.
<sup>c</sup> Rom. 4. 17.
ch. 3. 6.
Deut. 28. 63.
Job 24. 18,
29, 34.
Ps. 22. 10.
Eccl. 20. 30.

τερον τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐστί· καὶ τὸ ἀσθενὲς τοῦ θεοῦ ἰσχυρότερον τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐστί. <sup>26</sup> Ὡς βλέπετε γὰρ τὴν κλήσιν ὑμῶν, ἀδελφοί, ὅτι οὐ πολλοὶ σοφοὶ κατὰ σάρκα, οὐ πολλοὶ δυνατοὶ, οὐ πολλοὶ εὐγενεῖς· <sup>27</sup> ἅλλα τὰ μωρὰ τοῦ κόσμου ἐξελέξατο ὁ θεός, ἵνα τοὺς σοφοὺς καταισχύνη καὶ τὰ ἀσθενῆ τοῦ κόσμου ἐξελέξατο ὁ θεός, ἵνα καταισχύνη τὰ ἰσχυρά· <sup>28</sup> καὶ τὰ ἀγενή

hing at the weakness of a crucified Messiah demanded such a sign from heaven as should evince power and majesty; the latter, to the Gentiles, who required human wisdom. To this, then, is opposed θεοῦ σοφία, called further on, ch. ii. 7, θεοῦ σοφία ἐν μυστηρίῳ, 'unfathomable by human wisdom,' or, as it is said in another passage, 'hid with Christ in God.'

<sup>25</sup> ὅτι τὸ μωρὸν—ἀνθρώπων ἐστί [This verse (proved by ver. 26, and explained by ver. 27) is meant to anticipate an objection, and supply a reason for the preceding; and that by a common sentiment, where τὸ μωρὸν and τὸ ἀσθενὲς are to be taken like τῆς μωρίας supra ver. 21; and after σοφώτερον we are to supply, from the context, τοῦ σοφοῦ; and also at ἰσχυρότερον, τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ. There is, moreover, a sort of Oxymoron, and, as Scater observes, a consecutio ironica; what is said being after the opinion of men. So Chrys.: 'When he speaks of foolishness and weakness in connexion with the Cross, he speaks only of that which appears, not of that which is; for he is replying to their supposition.' The sense of the verse is: 'For the teaching of God, though it be thought foolish, and the dispensations of God, though seemingly powerless, are really wiser, and stronger, than all that the wisdom of the world could conceive, and the power of the world could accomplish.'

<sup>26—28</sup>. 'The Apostle now proceeds to trace the counsel of God in bringing men to the Christian religion, and to explain who those are, whom he will think worthy of the benefits of it; appealing to the example of those Corinthians who had been converted to Christianity.' (Pott.)

The above view, indeed, proceeds on the supposition that by τὴν κλήσιν is meant 'their call to the Gospel in general.' But from the context it would rather seem that the expression denotes 'the particular calling of the ministers to their office.' Thus the supplementary words at the end of the verse, κλητοὶ αἱσι, to be fetched from the foregoing κλήσις, must mean, 'called to preach the Gospel.' So Greswell, on the Parab. ii. 310, explains, βλῆτε τὴν κλήσιν ὑμῶν, 'look at the nature of your calling, look at them that call you.' 'The context of the passage,' continues he, 'shows that the writer is drawing the attention of the Corinthians to the peculiar character of the instruments by which, not that of the objects for which, God had thought proper to carry on the work of evangelization.' Such, too, is the view adopted by Bp. Turton (Text of the English Bible, p. 68), in the following able examination of the context: 'The Apostle, from ver. 17 to ver. ult. is discoursing on the mode of preaching the Gospel, and the agents employed for that purpose. The preaching of the Gospel was (ver. 17) not with "wisdom of words;" it was, as it were (ver. 21), "the foolishness of preaching;" and with regard to the agents, St. Paul declares (vv. 27, 28), that "God had chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty, and base things of the world, and things that are despised, yea, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are." And the reason assigned (ver. 29) is, that "no flesh should glory in his presence." In the midst of all this comes in ver. 26, which, of course, ought to accord with what goes before, and what follows. Can any thing be more manifest than the object of the Apostle in this place? For the purpose of the "calling" spoken of, it was not the "wise," not the "mighty," not the "noble;" no: God had chosen "the foolish things" to confound "the wise," "the weak things" to confound "the mighty," "things base and despised" to confound "the noble."

The above view was long ago taken by Abp. Anselm and Thom. Aquin.; and after them by Tiren., Casaub., and Scater; and recently by Dr. Mackn., who observes that, 'if it were true' (which, he shows at large, it is not), 'that not many wise, mighty, and able were called, it did not suit the Apostle's argument. For surely God's not calling many of the wise, &c., joined with his calling the foolish ones of the world to believe, did not put to shame the wise and strong, &c. Whereas, if the discourse be understood of the preachers of the Gospel, who were employed to convert the world, all is clear and pertinent. God chose not the learned, the mighty, and the noble ones of this world to preach the Gospel,—but illiterate and comparatively weak men, and men of low birth; and, by making them successful in reforming mankind, he put to shame the legislators, statesmen, and philosophers among the heathens, and the learned scribes and doctors among the Jews, who never had done any thing to purpose in that matter. According to this mode of interpretation, we must supply as a verb to the three Nominatives, καλοῦσιν ὑμᾶς. However, I would render τὴν κλήσιν ὑμῶν not, with Gresw., 'the nature of your calling,' but 'the manner of your calling, in being called (a use of κλήσις found in the Greek Orators), i. e. as to the kind of persons by whom you are called.' At ἐξελέξατο in the next two verses supply αἱ τὴν κλήσιν ὑμῶν, from the preceding context. It is proper to bear in mind, that this selection of the persons in question, when made, was doubtless accompanied by an impartment of the spiritual gifts of which we read, infra, ch. xii. Eph. iv. 11, whereby they were fully enabled to perform the Gospel work

τοῦ κόσμου καὶ τὰ ἐξουθενήμενα ἐξελέξατο ὁ Θεὸς, καὶ τὰ μὴ
 ὄντα, ἵνα τὰ ὄντα καταργήσῃ. <sup>29</sup> ὥπως μὴ καυχῆσθαι πάσα σὰρξ ἐνώπιον * τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>30</sup> Ἐξ αὐτοῦ δὲ ὑμεῖς ἐστε ἐν Χρι-στῷ Ἰησοῦ δις ἐγενήθη ἡμῖν σοφία ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, δικαιοσύνη τε

d Rom. 3. 27.
 Eph. 2. 9.
 e John 17.
 19.
 Rom. 4. 26.
 Eph. 1. 7.
 Col. 2. 4.

assigned to each, espec. the εὐαγγελισται spoken of at Eph. iv. 11. 1 Cor. xii. 28, and 2 Tim. iv. 5.

28. καὶ τὰ μὴ ὄντα—καταργ.] The Apostle adds another link in the chain of antithesis, by employing an expression which partakes of the Hyperbole, or the Oxymoron, but is not unfrequent in good writers; τὰ μὴ ὄντα being for τοὺς μὴδὲν ὄντας (Gal. vi. 3. 2 Cor. xii. 11). With this sentiment comp. Eurip. Troad. 616, ed. Matthim. 'Ὅρῳ τὰ τῶν θῶν, ὡς τὰ μὴ πυρρῶς ἔνυ: τὰ μὴδὲν ὄντα, τὰ δὲ δοκοῦντ' ἀπώλειαν. The καὶ before μὴ ὄντα is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, C, D, F, G, and one cursive—for the αἰτί of Scholz, Grieb., Tisch., and Alf. are sought—authority insufficient for the purpose, espec. considering that internal evidence, though it draws two ways, is yet in favour of καὶ, since it was more likely to be removed by Critics, who thought that it was unnecessary, and that it overloaded the construction (not aware that it meant 'ἴνα', 'yea'), than that it should have been obtruded into all the copies except six, also into the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and Arab. Versions, confirmed by Chrys. and Theodor., and (teste Jacks.) Orig. and Euseb. So I find Dr. Peile takes the καὶ, and why not? since this force of καὶ is frequent in the Sept., and not uncommon in the New Test. Est. renders τὰ μὴ ὄντα by non entia, 'ea quæ non erant' (not are not) pro nihili habitis, a Hebraism. Comp. 2 Ed. v. 36. Acts xv. 18. Rom. iv. 17. Thus the sense is, 'Persons who were in estimation nobodies'—the case with almost all the Apostles.

29. ὥπως μὴ—πάσα σὰρξ. &c.] The connexion may be thus traced with the preceding: '[God pursued the above course; chose those that were of no account] in order that no human being should boast, or ascribe what he doth to his own power, wisdom, or eloquence.' For the text. rec. αὐτοῦ I have, with all the Editors from Matth. downwards, edited from very many MSS., including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x 16, Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, τοῦ Θεοῦ.

30. ἐξ αὐτοῦ δὲ ὑμεῖς ἐστε ἐν Χρ. Ἰ.] Of these words various explanations have been proposed; and the context allows of more than one interpretation. The meaning intended seems to be this: 'Of him, therefore (i. e. through him, owing to him), and through no merit of your own, it is that ye are in Christ Jesus, i. e. incorporated in Christ Jesus.' By the expression εἶναι ἐν Χριστῷ, I would understand not merely, however, the being a Christian; for the act of incorporation, or engraftment into the body of Christ's Church implies the work, however gradual, of regeneration. So, too, where the same expression recurs in 2 Cor. v. 17, εἰ τις ἐν Χριστῷ (scil. ᾧ) καὶ νῦν κτίσται, scil. ἱερί. This full sense intended, was, I find, long ago seen by Calvin alone of the Commentators, who, after remarking that there is an emphasis in ἐστε, as implying 'existence from God and subsistence in Christ,' adds, that 'the Apostle speaks not only of physical creation, but of that spiritual essence into which we are born again by the grace of God.' Now that this involves the being sons of God is plain from John i. 12, ὅσοι δι' ἡλᾶθον αὐτὸν (Christ), ἰδῶκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα Θεοῦ γενέσθαι.

—δις ἔγεν. ἡμ. σοφία, &c.] These words seem meant to awaken in the Corinthian converts a sense of deep thankfulness, by reference to the great spiritual benefits obtained through Christ (especially with allusion to his crucifixion, see ver. 28), so forming a beautiful summary of Gospel blessings, and representing the true nature of the Christian religion. What the Apostle here expresses seems to have been suggested by a consideration of the inestimable benefit involved in this incorporation of believers with Christ. It might, indeed, be thought that this would be so likely to occur to the minds of the Corinthian Christians as scarcely to need mention. But the reason why the Apostle chose to express it is well pointed out by Calvin.—Ὅς ἐγενήθη ἡμῖν may be rendered in full, 'who has been made and become unto us,' meaning, that by him we obtain the following benefits. Some attempts have indeed been made by misplaced learning, and perverted ingenuity, to draw forth a so-called deeper sense. But it is better to rest content with the simple and obvious import of the words,—nor too anxiously inquire how it arises. It is sufficient to regard this as a more forcible mode of expression than if it had been said, 'we were made wise and justified, made holy and redeemed;' besides conveying withal a weightier import, as pointing directly to the Author of the wisdom in question, and, consequently, suggesting the reflection made 1 Cor. iv. 7, τὶ δὲ ἔχουσιν ὅς οὐκ ἔλαβαν; as also the warning there subjoined, not to boast. And the same train of thought may be supposed to have been present to the mind of the Apostle here, since he adds, ἵνα ὁ καυχόμενος, ἐν Κυρίῳ καυχᾶσθω. The τε after δικαιοσύνη has been wholly unattended to by Expositors, and has been removed by ancient Critics, sc. MSS. F, G, D<sup>3</sup>, Orig., Cyr., and Chrys., who read καὶ δικ.; but it is deserving of notice, as serving to closely unite the two terms δικ. and ἀγίασμός, and meant to suggest that the things so signified are indissolubly connected. Accordingly, I would point Θεοῦ, δικαιοσύνη τε καὶ ἀγίασμός, καὶ ἀπολ., 'both justification and sanctification.' Calvin seems to have partly perceived the force of the τε καὶ, since he dwells much on this conjunction of the two terms, though in themselves distinct; and he ably states the inferences arising therefrom. With respect to ἀπολόγησεν, it should seem that the expression has reference not so much to redemption from the penalty of sin, in that spiritual death which consists in the servitude to sin, as to the temporal consequences of sin in this world by sickness and death, with reference to that period (adverted to at Eph. iv. 30, and Rom. viii. 23, υἱοθεσίαν ἀπαιτεῖ χόρον, καὶ ἁγιασμοὶ καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις· 31 ἵνα, καθὼς γέγραπται· Ὁ f Jer. 9. 23.

καυχώμενος, ἐν Κυρίῳ καυχάσθω. II. 1 * Κἀγὼ ἐλθὼν 3 Cor. 10. 17.
ach. 1. 17.
Exod. 4. 10.
Jer. 1. 6, 7. Rom. 16. 12. 3 Cor. 10. 10, & 11. 4.

τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν τοῦ σώματος ἡμῶν) when, by the redemption of the body from the grave, death itself shall be swallowed up in victory, and we be completely and for ever delivered from the power as well as penalty of sin, and thus the promise, that 'sin shall not have dominion over us' (Rom. vi. 14), be finally fulfilled in us.

Such is, I find, the view of the sense adopted by Calvin, who explains the meaning to be, that through Christ we are freed at once from all the slavery of sin, and all the misery consequent thereon. 'Thus,' continues he, 'in this redemption we have that gift of Christ which, as it is the first begun, so it is the last completed, in us. For it is the beginning of our salvation, that we are extricated from the labyrinth of sin and death though in the mean time we groan within ourselves, anxiously awaiting the final day of resurrection, as it is said Rom. vii. 26: 'such being 'the day of redemption' (ἡμέρα ἀπολύτωσης, spoken of at Eph. iv. 30) to which he who is in Christ (the regenerate Christian) is sealed.' This may account for the expression ἀπολύτωσης coming last, whereas we should rather, as observes Billroth, have expected it to stand first. A most important point, however, to be borne in mind is, that the latter (sanctification) can only be attained by that righteousness in the believer, which is the effect of his union with Christ 'our Righteousness,' and results from 'the supply of the Holy Spirit' proceeding from Christ. Thom. Aquin. indeed, says, 'sanctificamur per Christum in quantum per eum cum Deo conjugamur;' namely, as the original source of sanctification. See John xvii. 17, compared with Jude 1, τοῖς ἐν Θεῷ Περὶ ἡγιασμένοις. However, the union with God implies the union with Christ, though it is said to be ἐκ Θεοῦ. And the union in question, where it truly exists, carries with it the impartment of the influence of the Holy Spirit, communicated by the Holy Spirit personally, Who 'proceedeth from the Father and the Son' for that purpose; and hence it is that he is called the Holy Ghost the Sanctifier. In applying to Christ our Saviour this sort of conjugant term, Justification-with-Sanctification, the Apostle may have had in mind the prophecy of Jer. xxiii. 6, 'In his day Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his Name whereby he shall be called to that, The Lord our Righteousness (Κόριος Δικαιοσύνη, as in some copies of the Sept.); 'for believers are made the righteousness of God in him. His obedience unto death is their justifying righteousness, or justification; and, as in the Hebrew original it is Sehovah (a title given, says Dr. Lowth on that passage, to the Messiah by the prophets), this tends to prove the Godhead of Christ as God-man, one with the Father.

31. 'Abit cohortatio in sententiam communem fere eandem a qua exorsa erat, ver. 29.' (Pott.) 'En finis car omnia nobis largiatur Deus in Christo; nempe ut ne quid arrogemus nobis, sed Illi omnia deferamus.' (Calv.) To give the greater weight to the sentiment, it is expressed in the words of Scripture (just as, observes Dr. Poole, the Apostle at Rom. xv. 3. interweaves with his own text the substance of what the prophet Jeremiah had written, ch. ix. 23, 24).

— Ἰνα, καθὼς γέγραπται: 'Ο καυχ. &c.] Here there is an anacoluthon, for Ἰνα cannot properly carry an Imperative. It is, I apprehend, best handled by supposing here a brevity of expression, whereby Ἰνα is capable of being referred, not to καυχ. only, but to some other verb in the Subjunctive left to be understood—probably ᾶ (the ellipse of which is not unfrequent), or γινωσκ., as understood in the sense fiat, may hold good; apply. Nor is this negated by the formula κίαντι following, ὡς γέγραπται, which cannot be taken in a strict sense, since there is no quotation from the passage of Jer. ix. 23, 24, but rather something formed on that passage (and espec. on the words μη καυχᾶσθω ὁ σοφὸς ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ αὐτοῦ—ἔλλα ἐν τοῦτοις,—namely, as it is meant by the words just after subjoined, in understanding and knowing the attributes of the Lord), or an adaptation of that passage, by taking some words, and adding others; so, however, as to produce a similar doctrine; and it is observable that the strictness of the expression ὡς γέγραπται: is qualified by the Ἰνα ᾶ. The same words are added, but without the formula κίαντι, at 2 Cor. x. 17, which serves to show that it is here not to be pressed on. Thus in the present passage we have the very opposite to what takes place in such other passages of N. T. as Gal. iii. 6 and 11. Eph. iv. 25, seq. 1 Pet. i. 24. Heb. xi. 21, where we have the very words of Scripture, but without the form of quotation. I cannot agree with Est. that the Apostle had reference here 'ad totius Scripturæ sacræ sensum et ingenium;' though it may be very true, what St. Augustine (by him cited) remarks, that 'universæ facies atque vultus sanctorum Scripturarum bene intuentes id admonere inveniunt, at qui gloriatur in Domino glorietur; so that (observes Calv.), as often as we would glory, we must go out of ourselves to glory [and go to Him who hath bestowed on us all things in Christ].'

II. 1-6. The Apostle, returning to the subject treated of at i. 17, where he had spoken of his own preaching, and of the Gospel-preaching generally (whence at vv. 18-31 he had somewhat digressed), now more copiously handles it. It was, he declares, no purpose of his to catch their attention by splendour of diction, by ingenuity of reasoning, or the trappings of human eloquence; his sole object being to deliver the message of salvation by Christ. Whatever knowledge, therefore, he possessed, he resolved to keep it out of sight, and speak as if he had it not; confining himself solely to the things which related to the redemption of sinners through the blood of Jesus. The Apostle then proceeded to show why he purposely disclaimed all human wisdom,—namely, because the doctrines he had to teach, being a special revelation from God, were far above the reach of the human understanding, inasmuch that their nature could not be thoroughly understood, or correctly received, by the naturally corrupted minds of men. Thus

b Gal. 6. 14.
c Acts 18. 1.
d 1 Cor. 10. 10.
e 11. 30.
f 12. 5, 9.
g Gal. 4. 15.

πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί, ἦλθον οὐ καθ' ὑπεροχὴν λόγου ἢ σοφίας καταγγέλλων ὑμῖν τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>3</sup> οὐ γὰρ ἔκρινα [τοῦ] εἰδέναι τι ἐν ὑμῖν, εἰ μὴ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν καὶ τούτον ἐσταυρωμένον. <sup>3</sup> Καὶ ἐγὼ ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ, καὶ ἐν φόβῳ καὶ ἐν

οὐ καθ' ὑπεροχὴν (for καθ' ὑπερίχοντα λόγου) signifies lit., 'not with excellence;' by striving after, by striving to shine thereby. In τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ Θεοῦ we have a periphrasis for 'the Gospel,' as supra i. 8, where see note.

1. As to ἀγῶ, I am still of opinion that this expression, 'I too,' is best regarded as said with reference to supra i. 17, where the Apostle had affirmed that he was sent to preach the Gospel, οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου; from which, as Calv. observes, 'he passes on to the general subject of its preaching; and then, at v. 23, reckons himself among those who preach Christ crucified; and now he again reverts to himself.' Nevertheless, there seems to be a thread of connexion with the immediately preceding words, which has been well traced by Hyper. Hence it would seem that (as Hyper., Est., and Wakef., after Justinian, have well seen) the καὶ is here, as often, illative; and its force may be best represented by rendering, 'Accordingly, brethren, I for my part when I came to you.'

2. οὐ γὰρ ἔκρινα τοῦ εἰδέναι, &c.] The οὐ is to be joined, not with τι, but with ἔκρινα, by an idiom frequent in the Class. writers, as employed, though not with κρίνω, yet with the synonymous term δέξω, so that the two words present only one idea, representing the very opposite in sense to the verb. Accordingly, the literal sense is, 'I did not resolve to know;' 'I determined against the knowing;' 'I made up my mind not to know.' So the Class. writers use οὐ φημι, οὐκ δέξω, &c. See Dr. Peile's note.

The τοῦ has been cancelled, on the authority of 7 uncials, and a few cursives (I add Lamb. 1182), by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but injudiciously. The word was, doubtless, thrown out to lessen the difficulty in construction. But the idiom (on which see Winer, Gr. Gr. § 38, § 6, note 3) is elsewhere used in the New Test.; and yet not so often as to induce us to suppose it to have been introduced by the Revisers. The phrase εἰδέναι τι, 'to know ought,' occurs infra, viii. 2, sometimes also in Class. writers (e. g. Theucyd. vii. 19); but here it seems to have a peculiar sense,—namely, as a verb of action, or essence, used of the declaration of the action, &c. (see Glass. Phil. 8. p. 219); and so here it signifies 'to make known to others by teaching, preaching.' It is indeed implied, that the Apostle possessed other knowledge, and could, had he chosen, have brought it forward. To which purpose it is observed by Theodor., that hereby the Apostle intimates that he could have discussed the doctrine of the Godhead (the Divine nature, τῆς θεολογίας), but that he taught them only respecting the incarnation of our Lord, τῆς οἰκονομίας (for this Theodor. elsewhere explains by οἰκονομία), glorying in the suffering of his Lord. Why the Apostle did not communicate these βῆθη to the Corinthians, he mentions further on at ch. iii. 1, οὐκ ἠδυνήθη λαλῆσαι ὑμῖν ὡς πνευματικοί, ἀλλ' ὡς σαρκικοί, by which it is implied that he had not taught them these πνευματικά, because they were σαρκικοί (and not πνευματικοί), and as such could not comprehend them. This view is confirmed by ver. 6 and 7, where to these βῆθη τοῦ Θεοῦ is applied emphatically the expression σοφία Θεοῦ. And it is there said, σοφίαν λαλοῦμεν ἐν τοῖς τελείοις. It is here well remarked by Est.,—'Hence it is plain that he does not preach Christ crucified, who only sets forth and teaches the Cross as a matter of imitation.' That the Socinians do so teach is well known; but who should have expected that on this passage the excellent Grotius should teach the very doctrine in question? Nay, that even Dr. Hammond should make chiefly prominent the death of Christ, viewed as a confirmation of his doctrine, and bring in his satisfaction for sin only in a parenthesis!

3. Thus far the Apostle has spoken of the subject of his teaching. He now adverts to the method which, at Corinth, he had pursued in preaching the Gospel.

—καὶ ἐγὼ ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ—πρὸς ὑμᾶς] A close connexion exists between this verse and ver. 1 (ver. 2 being parenthetical) and καὶ ἐγὼ—πρὸς ὑμᾶς may be rendered, 'And I, for my part, was conversant with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much tremor.' In ἰσχυρόν πρὸς ὑμᾶς there is (as Billroth remarks) a constructio praeponens, the full sense being, 'I went to you and was with you ("apud vos");' a sense of πρὸς ὑμᾶς also found in John i. 1, 2. The thread of connexion between this and what precedes is well traced by Hyper. thus: 'So far, I say, was I from being furnished with any power or influence, from talent or eloquence, whereby I might draw you over to the Gospel, that I passed my time with you in weakness,' &c. As respects the exact sense meant to be conveyed by the term ἀσθένεια, that is difficult of determination. It has been supposed to have reference to those bodily infirmities, and personal disadvantages, which impeded the Apostle's usefulness, and were the source of much mortification to him. Indeed, it is not improbable that the ἀσθένεια here, and the ἀσθενής at 2 Cor. x. 10, allude to what is called 'the thorn in the flesh' at 2 Cor. xii. 7. But it would rather seem to intimate (as Piscator and Estius explain) apprehension lest by his insufficiency, in one way or other, he should occasion offence, and injure the great cause he was so zealous to promote; or, as Camerarius, Piscator, and Heydenreich understand, 'in deep humility and unaffected modesty,' as Phil. ii. 12. 2 Cor. vi. 15. 1 Pet. iii. 15. Eph. vi. 5. These two last views may perhaps, as Hyper. and Est. suggest be combined. Accordingly, they refer it to lowliness of condition, or situation, connected with humility of personal appearance (see 2 Cor. x. 1, comp. with x. 10), which circumstances, united, tended to weaken his influence; see the next words, ἐν φόβῳ καὶ ἐν τρόμῳ πολλῷ. However, it should seem that this may best be meant to intimate a painful apprehension lest this deficiency should be preja-τρόμῳ πολλῷ ἐγενόμην πρὸς ὑμᾶς. <sup>4</sup> καὶ ὁ λόγος μου καὶ τὸ κήρυγμά μου οὐκ ἐν † πειθοῖς [ἀνθρωπίνης] σοφίας λόγοις, ἀλλ' ἐν ἀποδείξει Πνεύματος καὶ δυνάμεως. <sup>5</sup> ἵνα ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν μὴ ᾖ ἐν σοφίᾳ ἀνθρώπων, ἀλλ' ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ.

<sup>6</sup> Σοφίαν δὲ λαλοῦμεν ἐν τοῖς τελείοις· σοφίαν δὲ οὐ τοῦ

f Phil. 2. 16. ch. 1. 20. & 2. 19.

dicial to the cause of the Gospel, owing to his various infirmities and weakness, in himself, for the mighty work in which he was engaged;—not, however, that trepidation arising from the peril of life, which made him stand in jeopardy every hour. It has been well observed by the most fearless of Christian professors, 'Non hæc fortitudo vere Christiana est quod nihil omnino metumus, sed hæc, quod, ubi oportet jusserit aliquid, Dei causâ faciemus, etsi cor nostrum præ timore palpitat.'—LUTHER.

4. The Apostle here returns to his subject just before entered upon,—namely, the setting forth the difference which subsisted between his own mode of handling the doctrine of the Cross, and that of any mere human teacher. Yet there is a thread of connexion between the foregoing and the present verse,—the Apostle meaning to intimate, that the homeliness of his mode of treating the doctrine of the Cross matched with the unpretending (and what the anti-Pauline party represented as mean and abject) lowliness of manner which accompanied it. There would seem in ὁ λόγος μου καὶ κήρυγμά μου a hemidiasis, the sense being, 'my mode of speaking in preaching the word.' οὐκ ἐν πειθοῖς—λόγοις, scil. ἡ, 'was not [couched] in the persuasive words of human wisdom,' i. e. was not compounded of words and sentences adapted to persuade, from the admixture of human art or secular wisdom with Divine.

—οὐκ ἐν πειθοῖς—λόγοις.] I have already shown at large, and Mr. Alford assents thereto, that the various readings here found attest the endeavours of Critics to get rid of the very unusual word πειθοῖς (which, however, rare though it be, occurs also in Athan., vol. i. p. 858. Dionys. Areop., p. 155. Cyrill., p. 125, 248. Epiph. i. 896), though it is formed analogically from πειθῶ, as φαίδος from φαίδω. It is, indeed, not found in the Classical writers; and besides the above passages of the Fathers (derived from this passage), it is found only in this passage of Paul; yet the word was not coined by Paul (there is scarcely one in his Epistles that is), but probably a word of the ordinary, or Provincial (Syriac) Greek. However, had πειθῶ been likely to be the genuine reading, I could strengthen the slender authority for it (only 10 cursives) from Lamb. 1183, 1186; Mus. 7142, 16, 184, and Cov. 2, 3, and 5 (omitted by Mill). But it would nought avail. As to ἀνθρωπίνης, absent from B, D, E, F, G, and 3 cursives, and several Versions and Fathers, I have, on further consideration, placed it within double brackets, as probably arising from a marginal Scholium.

—ἀλλ' ἐν ἀποδείξει, &c.] Notwithstanding what some recent Commentators maintain, πνεῦμα must here denote 'the operations of the Holy Spirit, both ordinary and extraordinary,' as shown in the spiritual gifts imparted by St. Paul; and δυνάμει may refer to that highest mode of its operation, which produced 'the working of miracles.' But from the verse following, it would rather seem that it has reference to the mighty power of the Spirit accompanying the Apostle's ministrations, both as to the communication of the Spiritual gifts, and imparting the ordinary graces of the Spirit; meaning, as Hyper. explains, that 'by the power of God, silently and powerfully acting on the words of St. Paul, as by certain secret motions, men were moved to believe far more than they could by the influence of any oratorical pitkanalogia;' there being an implied reference to the external power of human oratory and eloquence in swaying the hearts of men, by strongly acting on their imaginations, and moving their passions; as opposed to the internal operations of the Holy Spirit, as the Author of the Divine life in regeneration. I find the above view confirmed by Calv., Melanct., and partly by Est. Comp. also Col. i. 29 with Zech. iv. 6. The full sense of the words is, 'but [showed itself] by demonstration of the Spirit and power, i. e. the power thereof [working mightily in me].'

5. ἵνα ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν—Θεοῦ.] Rosenm. and Dr. Peile regard the ἵνα here as having an eventual force, 'so that;' but this interpretation, perhaps, involves a solecism, and is at variance with the preceding context; for it has been fully made out, by Thom. Aquin., Hyper., Est., Pott, and Heydenr., that the ἵνα here denotes (as generally) purpose, in order that. I would render, then, 'in order that your faith may (not, might) be based not on,' &c. And here Olsh. makes the following excellent observation:—'The Spirit is the original creator of faith, which cannot be begotten of human caprice, though man has the capability of hindering its production; and it depends, for its continuance, on the same mighty Spirit, who is almost without intermission begetting it anew.'

6. σοφίαν δὲ λαλοῦμεν ἐν τοῖς τελείοις.] This, as Calv. observes, is said by the Apostle per correctionem, that it might not be inferred from what he had said (ver. 4 and 5) that he was devoid of all wisdom, or, at least, that he held it cheap, like those low-minded and ignorant persons, who despise literature with a sort of barbarian savagery. Accordingly, he means to intimate, that he was himself not deficient in wisdom (at least, such as alone deserved the name, being indeed of the highest kind), but it was such as could alone be appreciated by true judges, and therefore he speaks it only τοῖς τελείοις. As respects the exact sense of these words, the result of close and repeated consideration of the purport of the somewhat obscure portion of this Epistle, extending from ver. 3 to ch. iii. 3, leads me to think that the ancient interpretation, and that adopted by certain early modern Commentators, as Justinian, Beza, Grot., Sclater, and, at a later period, by Rosenm., Billroth, Heydenr., and myself formerly, cannot fully be sustained. The term τελείοις cannot

§ ch. i. 1.
Rom. 16. 26.
Eph. 3. 2.
Col. 1. 26.
3 Tim. 1. 9.

αἰῶνος τούτου, οὐδὲ τῶν ἀρχόντων τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, τῶν καταργουμένων 7 ἄλλὰ λαλοῦμεν σοφίαν Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ, τῇ be proved to mean 'Christians in general,' at least real and genuine Christians, who seek and find Christ, the only true wisdom. Nor can it be proved that σοφία here denotes the fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith,—that of Christ crucified, and salvation by him alone. This indeed, it might, of itself mean, did the context permit it; but it does not, especially as it regards ταλίσμα, in which, as the proof fails, so must the general view above alluded to, connected with it, be insecure and untenable. Accordingly, I am now induced to adopt the interpretation of Thom. Aquin., Erasmi., Crell., Castellio, Casaub., Est., Bengel, Whitby, Mackn., Valckenaer, Pott, Stenersen, and others, who take σοφίαν to denote, emphatically, the deeper mysteries of the Christian faith, as founded on the secret counsels of God; as, for instance, those which respect Divine election and reprobation, the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, the priesthood, sacrifice and intercession of Christ, justification by faith,—in short, those and similar βάθη τοῦ Θεοῦ, which are contained in the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Hebrews, which abound in such matters. It is not improbable that the allegorical and typical mode of reasoning and discussion employed by St. Paul in the above Epistles, for the purpose of opening out the more profound sense of Christian doctrine, is to be included in this σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ. That such are here adverted to, plainly appears from the next verse, where this σοφία is called σοφία Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ (οὐσα); though it is not to be denied, that the more elementary and fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith might very properly be termed σοφία, nay, also σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ, which, besides being clear in itself, is certain from supra, i. 24. In short, the τάλεις here must, as appears from the following context, be equiv. to the πνευματικοί at ver. 15, and iii. 1, as opposed to the σαρκικοί at iii. 1—4, and the ἡπιοί at iii. 1. This further appears from the two verses of ch. iii. (espec. γάλα ὑμᾶς ἐπότισα at ver. 2), compared with Heb. v. 12, 13, 14, where, after speaking of the elementary Christian doctrines as yet necessary to them, he adds, by a lively figure, that they need γάλακτος καὶ οὐ στεριάας τροφῆς—πᾶς γὰρ οὐ μὲν τέχνης γάλακτος ἀπείροι (ἴσται) λόγῳ δικαιοσύνης, ἡπιοὶ γὰρ ἴσται. Τάλεις δὲ ἴσται ἡ στεριάα τροφή, meaning that of the σοφία, or σοφία Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ, above mentioned. It is then added in the same portion: Διὸ ἀφέντες τὸν τῆς ἀρχῆς τοῦ Χριστοῦ λόγον, πρὶ τῆς ταλειότητος φερόμεθα, by which latter is to be understood the solid food of the more recondite doctrines and mysteries of the Christian faith, which were alone suited to the τάλεις. And so at xiv. 20 of this Epistle τάλεις stands opposed to νῆπιος. Accordingly, to persons so matured in judgment and spirituality as to be able to receive this wisdom (in a mystery),—the Apostle laid open the rich 'treasures' of the wisdom of God, which excited their admiring adoration. If, therefore, the Corinthians had not been initiated into the depths of this Divine wisdom, it was because they were not proper recipients of them,—could not bear them as yet. See John xvi. 12, and infra iii. 2. We must be careful, however, that this interpretation be not wrested and abused, to countenance the practice of some Romanists—that of holding one set of opinions in private, and propounding others quite different on public occasions; thus, by a base dissimulation, hiding their real sentiments. Thus the words, 1 Cor. ix. 22, 'I am become all things unto all men,' have been, as Est. on that passage observes, grievously abused by those who hold that a Christian minister is warranted, by the example of St. Paul, 'apud homines simulare et dissimulare, ne quis offendant, aut etiam quamplurimos Christianos lucrificet,' much less for the lure of gain. Moreover, in such a case as that supposed, the opinions are presumed to differ essentially; which is quite the contrary in the present instance, since they both form parts of the same Christian system. Estius does not here touch on the abuse that might be made of the doctrine of this passage. Nay, it does not appear, from his references to the early Romanists, that such abuse had taken place, or, at least, been at all countenanced. That, indeed, had been with all care precluded by the early Fathers. So Augustin in his Tract 96—98, in considering the question 'whether spiritual persons may have any thing in their teaching which they may keep secret from carnal persons, and mention to spiritual ones only?' answers to the following purport, as it had been summed up by Estius: 'Although the Apostles did not at once teach all things belonging to the doctrine of the Christian religion to those to whom they preached the Gospel; yet they had not themselves, or other spiritual men appointed by them, any thing in doctrine which, at a suitable time, they might not draw forth and openly declare to the multitude; thus teaching the same things to great ones and little ones (i. e. the perfectly and the imperfectly instructed); constantly taking care, however, to put them forth to each and all, according to the capacity of each,—to the little ones, as it were, a drink of milk, which they would take with pleasure, and easily digest; to the well-instructed solid food, by explaining reasons, order, method, and other circumstantialities pertaining to those things to be believed; which is no other than what we find here, 'to speak wisdom among them that are perfect.'

— σοφίαν δὲ οὐ τοῦ αἰῶνος, &c.] The Apostle now passes on to describe more fully this recondite wisdom in which he abounds; and in doing this, he again speaks per correctionem, q. d. 'but I mean a recondite and deep wisdom, not of this world, i. e. not terrene, as it is said ch. ii. 13, ἀνθρωπίνῃ καὶ σαρκίῳ, such as the σοφία τοῦ αἰῶνος καὶ τοῦ κόσμου τούτου spoken of supra, ch. i. 20, such as that promulgated by the Greek philosophers, orators, sophists, rhetoricians, and dialecticians. As respects the expression τῶν ἀρχόντων (not a little disputed in meaning), I still prefer the view of its sense which I have before adopted. According to the opinion of the early Latin Expositors, and Est., it is to be referred to the evil spirit, the authors of magic, divination, and idolatry, who were to be de-ἀποκεκρυμμένην, ἣν προώρισεν ὁ Θεὸς πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, εἰς δόξαν ἡμῶν <sup>h Matt. 11. 25. John 7. 48. & 10. 3. Acts 2. 17. & 13. 27. 8 Cor. 13. 14. 1 Tim. 1. 13. 1 Isa. 64. 4. ver. 14.</sup> <sup>8</sup> ἣν οὐδεὶς τῶν ἀρχόντων τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἔγνωκεν (εἰ γὰρ ἔγνωσαν, οὐκ ἂν τὸν Κύριον τῆς δόξης ἐσταύρωσαν) <sup>9</sup> ἀλλὰ, καθὼς γέγραπται· [Ἄ] ὁφθαλμὸς οὐκ εἶδε, καὶ

stroyed by Christ, together with the whole body of these arch-deceivers. But this view, though specious, is quite untenable, being refuted by the words at ver. 8, εἰ γὰρ ἔγνωσαν, &c. Not to say (with Stenerson) that the wisdom of evil spirits, if they have any, is unknown to men; and it would little redound to the praise of any minister of religion, least of all an Apostle, that 'he did not teach such wisdom.' In the adjunct expression, τῶν καταργ., it is intimated that, however great their power or influence may be, it must be utterly brought down, and thus their influence would be as transitory as their wisdom. Now this was literally verified in the case of the Jewish rulers and doctors, who were speedily put down; as also in that of the heathen philosophers and sophists, whose wisdom was nullified by their false religion being exploded. It is observable that the term καταργ. was here adopted as suitable to the idea contained in ἀρχόντες; καταργεῖν being used of 'deposing a ruler, or magistrate,' Hos. i. 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 5, which is alluded to in 1 Cor. xv. 24, καταργ. ἀρχήν. Heb. ii. 14, καταργ. Διέβολον, considered as κοσμοκράτορα.

7. ἀλλὰ λαλ. σοφίαν Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρ.] Render: 'But it is God's wisdom that we speak.' The Apostle here not only shows what wisdom it is that he delivers,—namely, the wisdom of GOD, as opposed to that of the world, but he further unfolds what he meant by σοφίαν ἐν τοῖς τελειότοις, by describing this wisdom of God as a wisdom wrapt in mystery, a recondite plan of Divine wisdom. He further designates it as τὴν ἀποκρυπ., 'the plan hidden' to the natural man, ψυχικῇ, as it is said, ver. 4, or the man unenlightened by the Spirit, to whom, as such, the Gospel itself, even in its simplest form, is hidden; much more the σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ, by which it is to be observed, is meant, not man's, but God's esoteric course of teaching. This σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ, meaning the Gospel in its utmost extent, and fullest depth of meaning, is further designated as that ordained of God from all eternity to be promulgated. Comp. Ephes. iii. 9, φανεῖται πάντως τῇ ἐκκλ. οἰκονομία (or, as other copies have, κοινωνία) τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ ἀποκρυμμένου ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων ἐν τῷ Θεῷ, meaning, 'in the secret counsels of God'; though there seems meant the whole plan of redemption, including both the elementary and fundamental, and the more recondite parts. Comp. Col. i. 26. The words εἰς δόξαν ἡμῶν are subjoined in the same way as τῶν καταργουμένων at ver. 6, and τὴν καταργουμένην at 2 Cor. iii. 7, by way of subjoining another, and not unimportant, circumstance, q. d. 'so as to be the means of glory to us believers, as partakers of the glory of Christ.'

8. ἥ] This may be referred either to σοφίαν, or δόξαν, and Expositors take either one or other view. The former is required by the next verse; but it may include the other sense, q. d. 'None of their rulers (temporal or ecclesiastical) knew the ineffable wisdom, and the glory it involves to its recipients; else they would not (we may presume) have crucified the Lord of glory [with whom alone are the issues of life and salvation].' The expression, Κύριος τῆς δόξης, is not to be lowered, with many recent Commentators, to the 'author of the glory,' since it is formed on a similar one in the O. T., Pa. xxiv. 7, βασιλεὺς τῆς δόξης (a passage probably had in view by the Apostle), where the best Commentators are agreed that it designates CHRIST by an august title, which may be compared with the expression employed John i. 14, δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς; and which, when taken in conjunction with that of Θεὸς τῆς δόξης at Acts vii. 2, sets forth Christ as both King of Glory, and Lord of hosts, our 'Lord and our God.'

At προώρισεν supply, from the subject-matter, ἀποκαλύπτειν. The expression has reference to the eternal counsels of God (πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου) for the salvation of the human race. See Acts iv. 28. Rom. viii. 29, sq. Eph. i. 5, 11. Render: 'which God had from eternity planned and purposed to reveal.'

The words εἰς δόξαν ἡμῶν may be referred (as they are by some) to the Apostles in general; q. d. 'to the glory of those by whom this revelation has been promulgated.' But it is better to understand them, with others, in the sense 'us Christians;' q. d. 'to our future glory and high felicity;' the εἰς denoting end, or purpose. The general meaning of the verse may be thus expressed: 'What we preach is not the wisdom of this world, but that which proceeds from God; mysterious, indeed, and formerly hidden and unknown, but which God had from eternity pre-determined to reveal and promulgate, to be the means of glorification to us believers.'

9. ἀλλὰ, καθὼς γέγραπται, &c.] meaning, 'But it is no wonder that they should not have known; since the Divine truths respecting human salvation, as revealed by the Divine wisdom, are alone to be manifested by the Spirit of God, who alone can fathom the depths of his counsels; for to apply the words of Scripture, Eye hath not seen,' &c. The passage here had in view is doubtless Is. lxiv. 4. So great, however, is the dissimilarity of the words with the Hebrew and Sept., that some have supposed the words to be quoted from a lost apocryphal book. But the opinion is at once discountenanced by the expression ὡς γέγραπται; this being never applied to any but the canonical books of Scripture. Indeed, it would seem that this is a not unfaithful citation ad sensum, and as regards the substance, though not ad litteram. For the words ἐν καρδίᾳ—ἀνίστη form no part of the quotation, but are merely exegetical of the preceding, and formed on Is. lxv. 17. The words ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος οὐκ ἠκούσαμεν ought not to be adduced in comparing the Apostle with the Hebrew and Sept., since he plainly did not mean to cite them.

The Apostle here accommodates the words of the Prophet to his present purpose. Now accommodation admits of some change, and it may κ Matt. 13. 11. οὐς οὐκ ἤκουσε, καὶ ἐπὶ καρδίαν ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἔβη, ἃ ἡτοίμασεν ὁ Θεὸς τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν αὐτόν.

 Luke 2. 22. ἔβη, ἃ ἡτοίμασεν ὁ Θεὸς τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν αὐτόν.
 10 κ ἡμῖν δὲ ὁ Θεὸς ἀπεκάλυψε διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος αὐτοῦ τὸ
 1 Pet. 1. 12. 1 John 2. 27.

easily be shown that there is here no change in sense; and a slight modification of the words is the more permissible, since the best Interpreters, ancient and modern, think that the subject is probably the same both in the Prophet and the Apostle,—namely, the blessings of the Gospel dispensation: the general sentiment being, that ‘the spiritual benefits which God hath prepared for such as love and obey him (see John xiv. 21—24) are such as transcend all human faculties adequately to understand.’ In the expression of the sentiment, there is a beauty not to be overlooked; an apt distribution, or enumeration, being here made of the several parts which conduce to the understanding of any thing—the eyes, the ears, and the heart: in which, too, there is a climax in the third step, wherein the sacred writer alludes to the marvellous power of the human mind in the operation of conception, which is almost as unlimited as it is rapid. See Hom. II. xv. 80, where, as Pope observes, ‘the poet describes a traveller, who revolves in his mind the several countries which he has seen, and in an instant passes in imagination from one distant part of the earth to another.’ As respects the paraeology, we have, observes Billroth, here again, as at i. 31, an anacoluthon, occasioned by the formula citationis. But it may be doubted whether there be really here any anacoluthon properly speaking, or only a harshness, occasioned by a want of some verb to carry on the thread of reasoning. This verb, indeed, is dispensed with by some; but that can only be done by suppressing or passing over either the former or the latter δ, which is not to be thought of. The best Commentators are of opinion that there is an ellipsis; though, what it is, they are not agreed. Indeed, whether there be a grammatical ellipsis at all, may be doubted. There would seem to be rather a subaudition from the preceding context, to be mentally supplied by the reader,—namely, as Estius, Bp. Pearce, Heyd., Pott, and Billr. suggest, λαλοῦμεν Θεοῦ σοφίαν ἐν μυστηρίῳ, thus regarding the clause ἃ ὀφθαλμός—αὐτόν, as in apposition with σοφίαν, or else as simply put for ὅσα, q. d. ‘But we speak, I say, things which (to use the words of Scripture by accommodation) eye hath not seen.’ And then, we may suppose the next words, ἃ ἡτοίμασεν—ἀγαπ. αὐτόν to be exegetical of the foregoing; q. d. namely (equiv. to, I mean) the things which, or we may take the δ as standing for καθ’ ἃ, quod attinet ad. According to this view, the sense may be well expressed, as it is by Est., thus: ‘But we speak those things which, according to the Prophet, neither eye of man hath seen, nor ear of man heard, nor the mind of man conceived, that is, what no man whatever hath known,’—namely, those things which God hath prepared for them that love him. By the things here spoken of I would understand, not (as they are explained by most Commentators) simply the blessings of the Gospel for future salvation and eternal glory; nor exclusively (as Lightfoot and Whitby explain) the benefits and blessings of the Gospel for the present state; but, in a more extensive sense, all the benefits and blessings obtained for us by Christ both for time and for eternity, in this world and in the next, for the present adoption, as sons, and its termination in future glory. This view of the sense I find confirmed by the erudite and enlightened Hoffman in his admirable Demonstratio Evangelica, vol. ii. p. 137, where, after ably pointing out that ‘St. Paul has alleged the passage quite ad mysterium Spiritus Sancti,’ and appositely thereto, he proceeds to remark, as a consequence from his elaborate disquisition, that ‘although the words of the passage taken in themselves are quite suitable to the glory of the life to come, which far exceeds all that the human mind can conceive; yet that the immediate scope both of the Prophet and the Apostle was not life eternal, but the whole salvation of the Messiah, with the benefits connected therewith, commencing in this present life, and to terminate in the one to come. However (he adds), considering that all these things have been conjunctly the object of expectation to the Church of God,—accordingly, so far as the passage may not unaptly be applied to the life of glory, so that the whole economy of grace which precedes it be not excluded; which economy is, like the life of glory, not perceived by, or perceptible to, the carnal intellect.’ That so much is to be understood appears from the preceding context (πρώρις, at ver. 7), and from the term ἡτοίμασεν, which here, as at Matt. xx. 23. Heb. xi. 16, and 1 Pet. i. 5, bears the sense ‘destinavit, decrevit, atque adeo paravit,’ with a reference to the great ‘decreta Dei ac consilia’ for the salvation of men, espec. embodied in the leading doctrines of the Gospel, as involved in the σοφία Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ—ἢν πρώρις ἐθεώ.

10. The Apostle now shows (as Hyper. observes) how things so hidden and remote from human imagination could have been known to himself and the rest of the Apostles, and other τέλειοι,—namely, by the revelation of the Holy Spirit, and also why we cannot of ourselves conceive or know these truths. The αὐτῶν here is not to be confined to Paul and the other Apostles, but extended to all the τέλειοι or πνευματικοί, in short πᾶσι τοῖς ἀγαπῶσι τὸν Θεόν mentioned in the preceding verse; to whom alike with Apostles and preachers of the Word pertain the promises of the Spirit, in his gifts and graces. The next words, τὸ γὰρ Πνεῦμα—Θεοῦ, are meant to strengthen the assertion as to his having to the full the σοφίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν μυστηρίῳ, the σοφίαν ἀποκρυφμένην,—namely, inasmuch as the great Revealer, the Holy Spirit, penetrateth into and fully knoweth, and hence is competent to reveal what he pleases. See Est. and Calv.—By βᾶν is meant the σοφία ἐν μυστηρίῳ ἀποκ., ver. 7, those mysterious dispensations which lie hid from human view; the most hidden counsels of God, such as the calling of the Gentiles. Comp. Rom. xi. 23; and see note.

γὰρ Πνεῦμα πάντα ἐρευνᾷ, καὶ τὰ βάθη τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>11</sup> τίς γὰρ οἶδεν ἀνθρώπων τὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, εἰ μὴ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ; οὕτω καὶ τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν, εἰ μὴ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>12</sup> Ὁμείς δὲ οὐ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ κόσμου ἐλάβομεν, ἀλλὰ τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἵνα εἰδώμεν τὰ ὑποκείμενα τοῦ Θεοῦ χαρισθέντα ἡμῖν. <sup>13</sup> Ἄ καὶ λαλοῦμεν, οὐκ ἐν δι-

<sup>1</sup> Prov. 30.
27.
<sup>8</sup> Jer. 17. 9.
<sup>m</sup> Rom. 8.
18.
<sup>n</sup> 1 Pet. 1.
1.
<sup>o</sup> 1 Cor. 1. 17.

11. This exact knowledge of the mysteries of God by the Spirit is now illustrated by an apt comparison, derived from human affairs; q. d. 'for as no one can tell the inward thoughts and designs of any man, but the man himself,—so it is the Spirit of God alone that can be acquainted with the secret counsels of God.' When it is said that 'no one knoweth the things, or deep counsels, of God except the Spirit of God,' it is not, of course, said to the exclusion of the Son of God, but inclusively of the Son, as appears from John xvi. 15. Though, in like manner, there the Holy Spirit is not excluded. So, too, here, ἐι μὴ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ must, from what has been said, be meant not to exclude any other person πνευματοδοξάτος. So at Matt. xi. 27, where it is said, οὐδείς ἐπιγινώσκει τὸ Πατέρα ἐι μὴ ὁ Υἱός, καὶ ὃ ἐὰν βούληται ὁ Υἱὸς ἀποκαλύψαι, it is to be understood not to the exclusion of the Holy Spirit, since the Holy Spirit is the medium of such revelation and knowledge; even the Holy Spirit who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, the great Agent for enlightenment and sanctification, as imparting both of his gifts and his graces. But, to advert to matters of phrasology. At τὰ before τοῦ ἀνθρώπου supply, from the subject-matter, νοήματα, and at τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ, νοικοῦν, intimating its privacy, and its being hidden from others. Τοῦ ἀνθρώπου is used, and not τινὸς ἑαυτοῦ, in order (as Pott observes) that the application of this example from man to God (in which we have an argument a minori ad majus) may thus be rendered more prominent.

At  $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\tau\acute{o}\upsilon$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$  (with which I would compare Theophr. Char. Esh. xi. p. 30,  $\kappa\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\iota}$   $\alpha\upsilon\tau\eta\varsigma$   $\delta\omicron\kappa\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\tau\omicron\upsilon$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ ;) must be supplied from the preceding,  $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\beta\epsilon\theta\eta$ , meaning the deep thoughts or counsels of God. A most decisive testimony both to the personality and the Deity of the Spirit; who, we may hence infer, is omniscient, intimately united with God the Father (even as the soul of man is with the body), and consequently Divine.

12. Here the connexion is obscure, and the scope of what is said disputed. The best view seems that of Calv. and Hyper., who suppose that the Apostle means to amplify the certainty before spoken of, by a comparison of contraries; q. d. 'The Spirit of revelation which we have received is not of the world, that it should grovel on earth, be subject to vanity, and be a matter of doubt and perplexity; but it is of God, and therefore of solid and unchanging truth, and removed far beyond the reach of doubt.' So, too, Estius, who remarks that the words are meant to pre-occupy an objection,—namely, this: 'But, if no one knoweth the things of God except the Spirit of God, how camest thou to know them?' To which an answer is made by a repetition of the same sentiment as supra, hūiς ο Θεός ἀπακάλυψε αὐτά, in other words,—and, he might have added, in a stronger way of putting the thing, so as to again disavow every thing of the world, both its worldly wisdom and knowledge, and its worldly and secular spirit; for by τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ κόσμου are meant the spirit and disposition that prevail in the world, which values human wisdom only; see John iii. 13, 31. It is to be noted that τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἐκ Θεοῦ is not (as most Expositors regard it) simply for τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, but has a stronger sense, meaning ‘the influence of the Spirit proceeding from the Comforter and Enlightener sent by God to the faithful to guide them into all Gospel truth, according to the promise,’ John xiv. 26, and xvi. 13. From the above statement of the general sense, as regards the former clause of the verse, it will follow, that the ἴσα, at ἴσα εἰδόμενα, has the eventual force, denoting result; and the words may be rendered, ‘so as that we may know,’ equiv. to, ‘the result being that we know.’ If, however, the usual force of ἴσα, as denoting end, or purpose, be retained, the words may be explained as I have already done; ‘that we may fully know [and duly appreciate] the things freely given to us by God.’ And as to the objections which may be involved, they may be avoided by taking εἰδ. to denote that ‘complete knowledge’ (even heart-knowledge) which leads to a just appreciation of the things in question. This view is confirmed by Eph. i. 18, a good comment on the present passage, as illustrating τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ χάρισμα ἡμῖν, ‘graciously and freely bestowed by God’ τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν αὐτόν. Moreover, considering that there the εἰδόμενα ἡμῶς is closely connected with this enlightening of the eyes of the understanding by the influence of the Holy Spirit, in order, by that knowledge, to the communication of the πνεῦμα σοφίας, it cannot but, as here, denote full and complete knowledge. Finally, we may notice the words of the Apostle himself elsewhere, Rom. viii. 14—32, commencing from the sonship of the elect, and terminating with the glorious grace of God (in his rich gifts by the Gospel, adverted to here and in Eph. i. 16), τὰς οὐκ αὐτὸν αὐτῷ (Christ) τὰ πάντα ἡμῖν χαρίσας:

[13. ἡ καὶ λαλοῦμεν, &c.] The ἡ I would not, with Est., refer to the deep mysteries of God spoken of at ver. 10; but, as the construction absolutely requires, to the τὰ χαρισθέντα just before, as understood in the sense which has been above assigned. Λαλοῦμεν means, by Hebraism, 'we publicly speak (lit. 'discourse') and communicate;' and the words οὐκ ἐν διδακτοῖς—ἀλλὰ, &c., are as strongly expressed as those in the former verse, and with the same view,—namely, to exclude all idea of what is secular even in wisdom, what is of man's teaching and calculated chiefly to gratify human passions and prejudices, in opposition to what is of Divine

δακτοὺς ἀνθρωπίνης σοφίας λόγοις, ἀλλ' ἐν διδακτοῖς Πνεύματος
 e Rom. 5. 7. [ἀγίου]· πνευματικοῖς πνευματικὰ συγκρίνοντες. 14° Ψυχικὸς origin, as taught under the influences of the Spirit of truth. As respects the construction, ἀνθρ. σοφίας and πνεύμ. depend on διδακτοῖς, just as τοῦ Θεοῦ on διδακτοῖς in Matt. xxv. 34. Render, 'taught by human wisdom;' of which syntax (namely, the Genit. of cause) another example occurs at John vi. 45, διδακτοὶ Θεοῦ. And, indeed, this is occasionally found, in the case of such verbals as the present, in the Class. writers. Comp. Pind. Olymp. ix. 153, πολλοὶ δὲ διδάκταις Ἀσθράκων ἀνταῖς κλέϊς Ὀρουσαν ἰλίσσασθαι. With respect to the term λόγοις, I am still, as formerly, of opinion that it refers to the wording, implying the various artificial modes of mere polished composition and rhetorical display. I cannot, however, as formerly, accede to the view adopted by Theophyl., Grot., and others (including Dr. Henderson); for it is worthy of consideration that, as Billroth observes, 'the Apostle is here not instituting a contrast between the Old and New Testament, but between human wisdom and Divine revelation.' Still less can I, with others, understand πνευματικοῖς in the sense of spiritual men, i. e. 'teachers of spiritual knowledge;' an interpretation which is not agreeable to the context. Considering that the words πνευματικὰ and πνευματικοῖς are in apposition with ἂν and λόγοις (and, indeed, are partly exegetical of them), the term πνευματικοῖς can only be interpreted of things, viz. the λόγοις, or wording. Accordingly, the sense intended must be, 'setting forth, disclosing spiritual things (i. e. doctrines) by spiritual wording,' and so accommodating the wording to the subject-matter. The word δῶλον before Πνεύματος, not found in 6 uncial and 7 cursive MSS. (I add 2 Lamb. MSS.), has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. But to bracket it is as much as is justified by the state of the internal evidence.

14. The Apostle now gives the reason why this heavenly wisdom was treated with contempt,—namely, that the natural man, unassisted by the aids of the Holy Spirit, cannot appreciate it.

—Ψυχικὸς δὲ ἄνθρωπος οὐ δέχεται, &c.] By ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος is meant the disposition of those who have only the ψυχὴν (or 'animal nature,' which man possesses in common with the brutes), without having, or at least using, the πνεῦμα, or 'rational faculty,' which distinguishes man from the brute creation; thus we have a sense of ψυχικὸς derived from that existing in the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy, by which ψυχὴ is considered as 'the lower and animal nature, common to man with the beasts that perish,' as distinguished from 'the higher and rational nature;' ὁ νοῦς, τὸ πνεῦμα, belonging to man alone. So Arrian, Epict. iii. 7, 5, ἡ ἰδέσθῃ ἢ ψυχικῇ. Thus, then, by the ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος would be denoted one who is led by sensual impulses only; but in Christian Philosophy, as taught in the Word of God, especially in St. Paul's writings, it denotes not only that, but very much more, as resulting from it, meaning 'the mere animal man,—man as he is by nature,' who has, or at least follows, only the ψυχὴ, the natural, and consequently evil, principle in man; who follows only the faculties of his own animal nature, his corporeal sense, as the rule of his conduct; not necessarily implying gross sensuality; and therefore admits not the teaching of the Spirit, (consequently, has not been regenerated by the Spirit;) and embraces not the discoveries of Divine revelation in the Word of God. Accordingly, it is said, such an one οὐ δέχεται τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'does not admit,' or 'hearken to, the doctrines revealed under the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit,' 'does not care to understand, cannot appreciate them;' for, in fact, they seem to him foolish; nor can he understand them, they having to be searched out and discovered alone by the spirit, or understanding, under the illumination of the Holy Spirit, of which he is destitute: 'for as (says Chrys.) the eyes of the body, though the most beautiful and useful of the members, yet, without light, cannot see; so the ψυχὴ cannot discern, unless enlightened by the Holy Spirit. In fact, the expression οὐ δέχεται (where δέχ. stands for προσδέχεται) is pregnant in meaning, implying the assent of the understanding to what is propounded for its acceptance, and also the acquiescence of the heart and will by approval; and thus οὐ δέχ. adverts to the absence of the great principle of faith. Similarly in Hdot. i. 48, it is said of the various answers received by Cræsus from the various oracles of Greece, except that from Delphi, τῶν μὲν δὲ οὐδὲν προσέτατό μιν, lit. 'liked him, was approved by him,' as in Aristoph. Eq. 358, ἐν δ' οὐ προσέταται με Τῶν πραγμάτων, lit. 'liketh me not,' equiv. to 'is liked by me;' comp. Amos iv. 5. In both the passages the true meaning intended is, that not one of the things is admitted or finds access to the mind and heart by cordial approbation. The next words are meant to show why the animal man withhold his assent to the truths of the Gospel,—namely, because they are foolishness in his sight: where, as at ch. i. 18, we have the use of subet. followed by ἵνα for adjective; an idiom found also with the same word in Thucyd. v. 41, τοῖς δὲ Λακ. ἰδοὺς μωρία εἶναι τὰτα. The next words carry the idea out still further, rising to something higher, q. d. 'not only he does not admit them to the assent of the understanding and the acquiescence of the heart, because they seem absurd and foolish,—but he cannot understand them,' οὐ δύναται γνῶναι, i. e. not only does he not, but he can not. It is, however, to be borne in mind that this non-admission is supposed to arise, not so much from simple defect of light in the mind, as from want of will, arising from pravity of heart: comp. John v. 39, 40, ἱκευᾶτε τὰς γραφὰς (meaning, if, at least, the indicat. is to be read, 'ye scrutinize them in search of light and salvation'), καὶ (and yet) οὐ θέλετε ἰλθεῖν πρὸς με, ἵνα ζωῆτε ἐν ἡμῖν: comp. John vi. 44, οὐδεὶς δύναται ἰλθεῖν πρὸς με, ἢ μὴ ὁ Πατὴρ ἀκούσῃ αὐτόν (namely, by the Spirit sent from the Father), where the want of power in question is to be ascribed to want of will, since want of will produces want of power in a moral agent. Then is subjoined the reason for this inability (as far as it depends on the understanding), namely, because these things are δὲ ἄνθρωπος οὐ δέχεται τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Θεοῦ· μαρρία γὰρ αὐτῷ ἐστὶ, καὶ οὐ δύναται γινῶναι· ὅτι πνευματικῶς ἀνακρίνεται. 15 Ὁ δὲ πνευματικὸς ἀνακρίνει μὲν πάντα, αὐτὸς δὲ ὑπ' οὐδενὸς ἀνακρίνεται. 16 τίς γὰρ ἔγνω νοῦν Κυρίου, ὃς συμβεβάσει αὐτόν; ἡμεῖς δὲ νοῦν Χριστοῦ ἔχομεν. III. 1 Καὶ to be examined, weighed, or judged of, appreciated, [only] after a spiritual manner; the term πν. being opposed to that mode pursued by the ἄνθρωπος ψυχικός in discussing divine institutions; and accordingly it must denote the mode of thinking and judging which has place with the man who is not ψυχικός, but πνευματικός: namely, the mode pursued by the spiritual man, who, under the guidance of the Spirit, searcheth into the τὰ πνευματικά.

John 15. 15. & 15. 18—19. & 17. 6—8. Rom. 11. 34. Gal. 1. 13.

15. ὁ δὲ πνευματικὸς—ἀνακρίνεται] What is here said is in contrast to what was just said of the ψυχικός; and accordingly I would render: 'On the contrary, the spiritual man does that which the ψυχικός is morally incapable of doing;' he judgeth of (i. e. is able so to do), weighs in a just balance, and thus fully appreciates, forms a right estimate of all things, meaning, not, however (as Est. supposes), all the deep mysteries above mentioned, but simply all things that come within the scope of his spiritual discernment,—all that Christ hath revealed in the Gospel, and taught by the Spirit promised to guide Christians into all truth, all things necessary to salvation. Of the words following, αὐτὸς δὲ ὑπ' οὐδενὸς ἀνακρίνεται the sense is, from the force of the antithesis, 'he is to be judged of, appreciated by no one' (viz. of the other class), i. e. by the ψυχικός, the more spiritual person. Calv. here well remarks; 'Though the flesh here exercise all its acumen, it is the spiritual man alone that can possess such a sure and solid knowledge of the mysteries of God, as with certainty to distinguish truth from falsehood, and the doctrine of God from the traditions of men. He is, however, judged of no man, because the certainty of faith is not made subject to men, to stand or fall at their bidding, being, indeed, above the angels themselves.'

16. Now follows the reason for this inability; in expressing which the Apostle tacitly employs, with some abbreviation, the words of Isaiah xl. 13; and, as there is no direct citation, the application of the words may well be, as it is, very different from that of the Prophet. On their exact sense, indeed, Commentators differ in opinion, according to the view they take of αὐτόν; which some (consisting of most ancient and many modern Expositors) referring to Κυρίου, understand the inquiry to be, whether any man has so known the mind of the Lord, as to be able to give him counsel or instruction; see Heydenreich. But Theoph. and others (comprising many of the best modern Commentators), referring the αὐτόν to ὁ πνευματικὸς before, assign the following sense: 'for what [natural] man hath known (the mind, or spirit) the purpose of God, so that he may instruct him (i. e. the spiritual man)? but we have the mind of Christ, and are therefore able to judge all things, and to instruct and discern the spiritual man.' Of these two modes the latter is far more agreeable to the context, it being evidently the Apostle's intention to expose the absurdity of a natural man presuming to instruct a spiritual man in spiritual things, or of any ordinary Christian, or even Teacher, presuming to dictate to an inspired Apostle like himself; for it was plainly the Apostle's purpose here to indirectly establish his own authority, which had been called in question by some among the Corinthians. The ἡμεῖς, indeed, must, strictly speaking, be referred to the οἱ πνευμ., though of course it is applied to the Apostles, as being, κατ' ἐξοχήν, οἱ πνευματικοί.

—ἔχομεν] for κατέχομεν, habemus, 'we are in possession of.' Though the usus loquendi very well admits of the sense assigned by Erasmus, Hyper., Bengel, Krause, Rosenm., and Pott, tenemus, cognitum habemus, 'we comprehend, understand;' as in Menand. Μέση frag. ii. 5, τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔχει καλῶς; and such would seem required by the antithetical term in the former clause, namely, ἔγνω. The reason why the same term was not used in the latter is, that there a stronger sense was required, and that exists in ἔχομεν, which signifies penitus cognitum habemus, 'since it is implied in the context that this knowledge proceeds from revelation by the Spirit, and therefore cannot but be complete and perfect. So Chrys., Theophyl., and Ecumen., after explaining νοῦν by τὰ ἐν νόῳ, subjoin, by way of paraphrase, καὶ ἴσμεν ἡμεῖς οἱ πνευματικοί ἅπασιν αὐτοῖς (Χριστοῦ) βούληται καὶ ἀποκαλύψει, viz. by the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth sent by the Father to the faithful to guide them into all the truth, the whole body of truth as it is in Jesus. See ch. xiv. 16, 26. xvi. 13.

III. In order to check the contentious spirit of the Corinthians about teachers, and their boasting of having had a clearer insight into Divine truths, the Apostle now proceeds to anticipate an objection of his adversaries,—that the Corinthians had scarcely received from him the rudiments of the Gospel, and that they therefore did right to prefer teachers who had communicated the capita verum. He shows why he had not fully instructed them on those abstruse subjects, on which their teachers had plausibly speculated,—namely, because, though they had been many of them endued with the supernatural gifts of the Spirit, yet he had observed such things in their disposition and conduct, as rendered it improper for him to speak unto them, as to persons qualified to receive the deeper discoveries of Divine wisdom. On these the Apostle did not much treat, because he knew the Corinthians could not bear them; and also that such instruction would feed carnal passions, instead of generating faith and love. The Apostle now proceeds to make an application to the Corinthians of what he had said respecting the ψυχικοί. The force of καὶ ἡμεῖς will depend on the connexion. According to that traced by Billr. (who remarks, ἐγὼ, ἀδελφοί, οὐκ ἠδυνήθην λαλήσαι ὑμῖν ὡς πνευματικοίς, ἀλλ' ὡς σαρκικοίς, ὡς νηπίοις ἐν Χριστῷ. <sup>2</sup> Ἐὰν ὑμᾶς ἐπότισα, [καὶ] οὐ βρώμα· οὐπω γὰρ ἠδύνασθε· ἀλλ' οὔτε ἔτι νῦν δύ-

<sup>a</sup> Heb. 6. 13.
<sup>b</sup> John 16. 12.
<sup>c</sup> 1 Pet. 2. 2.

that though the Corinthians could not be called ψυχικοί, yet they resembled such by being σαρκικοί, so that the Apostle could not address them as a purely spiritual community), the meaning will be, Dr. Peile says, 'and yet,' or 'notwithstanding' καὶ being taken as put, by a frequent use, for καὶ τοι. But, according to the connexion more generally adopted, it will mean accordingly, 'agreeably to the principle above laid down,'—that spiritual things are suitable only to spiritual persons. The Apostle first declares that he could not, and did not, treat them as such, and then at ver. 3 and 4 shows why. Thus we may paraphrase as follows: 'Accordingly I [though spiritual, and addressing τὰ πνευματικά τοῖς πνευματικοῖς, nay, τὰ βάθη τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῖς τέλειοις] could not [consistently with that principle] address you as,' &c. Of the foregoing two modes of explaining, the former is very specious; but the latter has more of simplicity, and, I think, of truth, espec. from its being fitted to meet the tacit objection traced by several Expositors; q. d. 'How is it that you who have the full mind of Christ (ch. ii. 16) should not have instructed us more completely in the sublimer parts of the Gospel?'—By σαρκικοί: Paul means to express not (what some Expositors suppose intended) that they were such as had fallen back, after conversion, into a carnal and corrupt life; nor, as Calv. observes, is it even meant to be said that they had not a spirit of grace, but that they were such in whom the flesh prevailed too much over the spirit. Hence, although not destitute of grace, yet, because there was more of the flesh than of the spirit within them, they are denominated σαρκικοί. See also Beza. Perhaps, however, the term σαρκ. is meant to be understood chiefly of disposition, spirit, views, and so meant to denote that grovelling, secular, and worldly-minded spirit, which aims at the things of this life only,—its wealth and grandeur, or the influence which results from station, or talent, or eloquence, which last-mentioned particular was the fruitful source of those party prejudices, envyings, strifes, &c., which are enumerated by the Apostle, Gal. v. 20, among the works of the flesh. The next words I would not, with some eminent Commentators, regard as exegetical of the foregoing term σαρκικοί, but as referring solely to the case of those who, from sluggishness of disposition for the contemplation of things purely spiritual, had made little progress in the higher views of the Divine life, so as to have attained little growth towards 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (Eph. iv. 13), by Christ being there meant the doctrine of Christ, i. e. the truths of his Gospel. See Eph. iv. 20. This view is placed beyond doubt by the subjoined words ἐν Χριστῷ. As to σαρκίους, edited by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., for text rec. σαρκίους, from A, B, C, D, and only 3 cursives, with Clem. Alex., Orig., and Greg. Nys., I cannot yet bring myself to adopt it,—1. from the great want of confirmation from cursive MSS.; 2. because internal evidence is, at least,

equally balanced. It may have been an alteration of Revisers to a more usual word; but so may σαρκίους have been an alteration of Critics, to introduce a somewhat milder term (and rather more Classical, being used by Plato, and others of the purest Greek writers); q. d. 'men of flesh,' 'encompassed with the frailties of the flesh'; and the four MSS., on which this reading mainly rests, and about in rash alterations,—proceeding, as Scholz well saw, from the Alexandrine school of Critics. The reasons assigned by Meyer, De Wette, and Alf., for regarding σαρκίους as 'undoubtedly the true reading,' are very plausible, but too far-fetched and sophistical to be confidently acquiesced in. Besides, these very MSS. bring in σάρκιν. for σαρκικ. at Rom. vii. 14, where Alford grants that σαρκικ. is the more appropriate term, and pleads the frequent confusion of the words,—an argument, however, that draws two ways; see my note there. Paul, indeed, uses σάρκινος at 2 Cor. iii. 3; but there the term is more suitable than σαρκικός, as will appear from my note. The same may be said of σαρκιν. at Heb. vii. 16; besides that, the weight of external authority is far greater there than here. Billr. and Dr. Peile, who retain σαρκικ., refer to Theodor. on supra ii. 14 (where see my note); and thus there is no difficulty here in σαρκικ., if we bear in mind such passages as Rom. vii. 18, 25. Gal. v. 17, 24, where 'flesh,' as ascribed to converted persons, and set in opposition to Spirit, denotes the remainder of natural corruption, even so much of that υπόστασις of sin as is still unmortified even in regenerate persons. They are styled νήπιοι = 'minors in Christianity,' as opposed to τέλειοι ἐν Χρ. Col. i. 28. Heb. v. 13, 14.

2. γὰρ ὑμ. ἔπ. καὶ οὐ βρώμα] Paul here illustrates his meaning by a metaphor taken from the feeding of infants, or babes, as compared with that of persons of more advanced years. To the former is given the lightest food, as milk, pap, &c.; to the latter, solid food, here expressed by βρώμα, but in a parallel sentiment, Heb. v. 12, more definitely, by στειρά τροφή: both expressions denoting the more sublime and mysterious doctrines, as γὰρ does the elementary and simple ones,—namely, the corruption of human nature, and the rich mercy of God in redemption by the blood of Christ; faith, regeneration, the nature and necessity of holiness, the influences and fruits of the Spirit, the eternal happiness or misery of all men, &c.—Ἐπότισα is meant to apply, per syllepsin, as well to the former as to the latter; see Luke i. 63; and comp. Hom. II. viii. 546, οἶνον—οἰσέουσιν Σιῶν τε. Finally, πνευματικοί here is equivalent to τέλειοι supra ii. 6, and Rom. xv. 1; meaning persons so enlightened by the Spirit, as to comprehend and appreciate the deeper mysteries of the Gospel.

—The καὶ after ἐπότισα, not found in A, B, C, and 15 cursives, some Versions, and many Fathers, has been cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but on scarcely sufficient grounds; its omission being easier to be accounted for than its insertion. Nay, Matthæi νασθε <sup>3 b</sup> ἔτι γὰρ σαρκικοί ἐστε. ὅπου γὰρ ἐν ὑμῖν ζῆλος <sup>b ch. 1. 11.</sup> καὶ ἔρις καὶ διχοστασίαι, οὐχὶ σαρκικοί ἐστε, καὶ κατὰ ἄνθρω- <sup>Gal. 5. 19.</sup>

πον περιπατεῖτε; <sup>James 2. 16.</sup> <sup>c ch. 1. 12.</sup> <sup>α ch. 4. 6.</sup> <sup>4 c</sup> Ὅταν γὰρ λέγῃ τις 'Εγὼ μὲν εἰμι Παῦλον ἕτερος δέ 'Εγὼ 'Απολλῶν οὐχὶ σαρκικοί ἐστε;

<sup>5 a</sup> Τίς οὖν ἐστὶ Παῦλος, τίς δέ 'Απολλῶς, [ἀλλ' ἢ] διάκονοι, <sup>d ch. 1. 12.</sup>
δι' ὧν ἐπιστεύσατε, καὶ ἐκάστω ὡς ὁ Κύριος ἔδωκεν; <sup>ε ch. 1. 12.</sup> <sup>6 c</sup> ἐγὼ
ἐφύτευσα, 'Απολλῶς ἐπότισεν, ἀλλ' ὁ Θεὸς ἡύξανεν. <sup>ε ch. 1. 12.</sup> <sup>7</sup> ὥστε
οὔτε ὁ φυτεὺν ἐστὶ τι, οὔτε ὁ ποτίζων, ἀλλ' ὁ αὐξάνων Θεός.

observes: 'Redundare videbatur. Nemo ergo id addiderit, sed potius omiserit.'

These words, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἔτι νῦν δύνασθε, imply more than they express; q. d. 'Nay, ye are not even now able [even when ye have had time to be thoroughly grounded in the faith]; nor can I now expound the more recondite truths of the Gospel, with any hope of promoting your spiritual improvement.'

3. The Apostle now shows the grounds on which this opinion of their inability is founded, i. e. that they are yet carnal, &c.

— ὅπου] 'whereas'; as often in the best writers. Ζῆλος, ἔρις, and διχοστασία are not, as Krause imagines, mere synonyms; but there is rather a Climax; envy (as Grotius observes) leading to strife, and strife to division. The first represents the inner feeling; the second, the outward demonstration of it; the third, the results, in open and continued rupture and disunion.

— οὐχὶ σαρκικοί ἐστε] i. e. 'does not the flesh yet too much prevail? are ye not yet σαρκικοί, compared to the truly spiritual, the πνευματικοί just before mentioned?' Thus envy and strife are by the Apostle, at Gal. v. 20, numbered among the works of the flesh, which comprehend (says Grotius) all those affections that do not tend to the glory of God and the good of man, but are merely directed to our own selfish gratification.

4. See Note on i. 12. Here the Apostle, as Crell. and Hyper. show, takes occasion, from the expression just used, to make a transition to the second part of the foregoing head, and thus reverts to the principal topic he meant to treat of; namely, of the schisms and dissensions among the Corinthians, which had arisen mainly from the invidious distinctions and comparisons of one minister of God with another. In thus ascribing to one more honour than to another, or in attaching themselves exclusively to one or to another, he shows that they are highly censurable; for none of their teachers were masters, but merely servants employed by the common Master to teach the truths of his Gospel; merely persons instrumental in producing, and not the authors of, faith and conversion, and who therefore ought not to be set up as heads of the religion.

5. τίς—ἀλλ' ἢ] lit. 'what else than, or but,' equiv. to what but? An idiom found also in Luke xii. 5. 2 Cor. i. 13. The words are, indeed, cancelled by all the recent Critical Editors, but on external authority scarcely sufficient: as to internal evidence, it is rather against the removal; since it is more probable that the words should have been removed by those who objected to the inelegance of the Greek, than inserted by those who wished to remove an abruptness. Billroth and others are of opinion that ἐκάστω ὡς ὁ Κύριος ἔδωκεν is a transposition for καὶ ἕκαστος, ὡς ὁ Κ. ἔδ. αὐτῷ, just as at Rom. xii. 3, ἐκάστω ὡς ὁ Θεὸς ἰμῖν ἰσχύει μέτρον πίστεως, for ἕκαστος ὡς ὁ Θεὸς αὐτῷ i. μ. π. The idiom, however, may most properly be said to come under the head, not of transposition (which could only be the case, supposing ἐκάστω ὡς put simply, as Grot., Est., and others take it, for ὡς ἐκάστω), but rather a certain permutation of construction, such as is not unusual in the best Greek writers, is frequent in Thucydides, and scarcely less so in the writings of St. Paul. However, there is in the present passage an ellipsis of something left to be supplied from the subject-matter. Though what that is will depend on whether ἔδωκεν is to be understood of the evangelized or the evangelizers. I prefer to refer it to the latter, for the reasons which occurred to Calvin and others. Of course the word to be supplied is διακονῶν.

6. Here the subject (the nature of this ministry) is illustrated by metaphors derived from agriculture, of which, in the East, irrigation forms the most important operation.—ἡύξανεν, lit., 'made to grow'; namely, by the influence of his Spirit.

— ἀλλ' ὁ Θεὸς ἡύξανεν] The full sense is, 'but it was God [who] gave the increase'; a brevity of expression such as is occasionally found in the writings of St. Paul, and probably one of the idioms of the common Greek style, and which, in our own language, has, from negligence in writing, extended beyond the colloquial style.

7. ἀλλ' ὁ αὐξάνων Θεός] In the former clause ἵστί signific, according to its frequent use in the Class. writers, is ought, of any worth. With respect to the construction, in the latter clause, Bill. and others would supply ἵστί πᾶν, urging that, since this is an affirmative clause, πᾶν is involved in the π of the negative clause. But there is something too subtle in this grammatical theory to suit the plain, and any thing but artificial, language of Scripture. More of simplicity, and, I think, truth, is there in supposing, with the framers of the Vulg. Version, and also Est., Crell., Grot., Beng., Rosenm., Pott, and others, that the real ellipse. is ἵστί τί. According to this, οὐδ and τί taken together will signify nothing (i. e. comparatively nothing) in respect to God; and after Θεὸς must be repeated ἵστί τί, and τί be taken emphatically, as often in the Greek Class. writers, though almost always in the masculine τίς. Yet examples of the neuter do occur, and two have been adduced by Pott and Krause from Plato and Dio Cass. As, however, something, when compared with nothing,

1<sup>a</sup> Ps. 12. 8<sup>a</sup> Ὁ φυτευων δὲ καὶ ὁ ποτίζων ἐν εἰσω ἕκαστος δὲ τὸν ἴδιον
 Matt. 10. 27. μισθὸν λήψεται κατὰ τὸν ἴδιον κόπον. 9<sup>a</sup> Θεοῦ γὰρ ἐσμεν
 Rom. 2. 6. συνεργοί· Θεοῦ γεώργιον, Θεοῦ οἰκοδομή ἐστε. 10<sup>b</sup> Κατὰ τὴν
 Gal. 6. 5. χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὴν δοθείσάν μοι, ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτέκτων θεμέλιον
 1<sup>a</sup> Cor. 6. 1. & Eph. 2. 20. Col. 1. 27. 1 Tim. 1. 11—14. 1 Pet. 4. 11.

is 'all,' 'the whole,' so here the τι understood carries the notion of all, and, as applied to a person, that of 'whole and sole'—(sole in power), to use the expression of Milton.

8. Ἐν εἰσω 'are [both] one and the same,' both alike, i. e. only διάκονοι in producing faith (supra, ver. 6), ministers of the same God, employed on the same work, and alike looking to the same increase from him who maketh to grow by the influence of the Spirit. Hence it is implied, no one ought to be magnified above another, since they were occupied in the same labour, the success of which rested with God alone. Other relations of oneness there are that might be traced, and which are suggested by the words of St. Paul, Eph. iv. 4—6: but there the reference is to Christians in general; here, to ministers of the word; and hence what is chiefly implied here seems to be in the way of dissension from rivalry between fellow-labourers (see Theophyl. and Phot.), and a spirit of faction and party among those who enjoyed the same spiritual advantages under different ministers.

— ἕκαστος δὲ τὸν ἴδιον, &c. This is added by way of stirring them up to diligence, that it might not be supposed that all the labourers, however inferior in industry, would be on the same footing, and receive the same reward. The words, therefore, form an epanorthosis; q. d. 'They are not so far one, but that respect will be had to each one's labour and pains, and he will receive his own reward proportionably.' Hence would arise a strong incentive to diligence and activity, supplied by their knowing that their 'labour should not be in vain in the Lord.'

9. Previously to describing this labour (which is done at ver. 10), the Apostle briefly points out the scope to which the labour is to be directed.

— Θεοῦ ἵκεν συνεργοί We have here a resumption of the foregoing agricultural metaphor. The συν in συνεργοί is by some referred to God; q. d. 'we are fellow-labourers with God:' but that sense would require Θεῷ—συνεργοί, as appears from Eurip. Ion 43, Θεὸς Συνεργὸς ἦν τῷ παιδί: Xen. Cyr. viii. 4, 8, συν. ἔσονται ὅμιν: and Hipp. ii. 9. Anab. i. 9, 12. Demosth. 886. The Genit. of person in this case is of rare occurrence; yet I have noted it in Demosth. p. 884, 2, ὁ κοινωνὸς αὐτοῦ καὶ συνεργός. Plut. Pericl. τινὰ τῶν Φειδίου συνεργῶν πείσαντες. In the present instance, however, συνεργός bears the sense adjutor, administer, and so is nearly equiv. to minister (answering to διάκονος); which is the very sense here intended, and not cooperarius, or cooperator, at least as understood, according to the full sense of which those terms are capable, to represent (as Hyper. and other early Commentators explain) God, as the Operarius principalis, and the Apostles in question as his cooperarii, or under-workmen,—a view of the sense open to objection, as derogating from the awful dignity of the τὸ πᾶν attributed to him who 'worketh all in all.' To avoid which objection, and to get rid of the seeming antitropomorphism thus involved, without, however, sinking the sense of the συν, several eminent Expositors, while retaining the full force of the συν, refer it not to God, but to the operators, or teachers, here spoken of; as meant to express their relation to each other as to parity of condition, in virtue of their being associated in the service of God, and being fellow-ministers of his. This view of the sense, however, lies open to the objection, that it agrees not with the context, nor is capable of being sustained on correct grammatical principles. Indeed, besides being objectionable, it is unnecessary, since nothing hinders us from taking the word in a modified sense (as, indeed, we must take all expressions used κατ' ἀνθρωποπάθειαν), since, as Thom. Aquin. and Est. observe, 'tota cooperatio nostra etiam spiritus Dei operatio est, facientis ut faciamus.' This qualified sense is well expressed by Est. and Pott.

In the next clause the Apostle slides from the agricultural into an architectural metaphor; both being employed in Scripture with reference to men as the object of God's purposes in the Gospel; see Matt. xiii. 38. John xv. 1. Isa. lxi. 5, and 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. ii. 20. The several Pronouns in this sentence are emphatic; q. d. 'We are God's labourers, whether in cultivating the field, or rearing the building; ye are the tilled field of God, ye are the building of God.'

10—15. Thus far the Apostle has proceeded on the supposition, that the labourers were skilful and faithful: he now adverts to those who were, more or less, not so; and in doing this, he continues in the architectural metaphor just adopted. In short, the whole passage is allegorical; the Christian congregation being the building, and its ministers the architects. St. Paul had laid a sure foundation; if that were removed, there would be quite another building. Whatever superstructure be added, it must await the issue of that day of trial, which will bring every man's work to the test.

10. κατὰ τὴν χάριν, &c. Here the Apostle adverts to himself; but in doing this he employs an expression of deep humility,—of which the meaning is not, as most recent Commentators understand, 'according to the office of Apostle of the Gentiles graciously committed to me by God.' Here, though the office in question be included, the principal idea intended to be presented is, the portion of Divine grace given to him for the discharge of his Apostleship. We may in this instance (as Calv. observes) trace the accustomed modesty of the great Apostle, who is ever careful to avoid arrogating to himself a single particle of the glory due to God, 'by whose grace,' says he, infra xv. 10, 'I am what I am;' thus referring every thing to God, and regarding himself as the mere instrument.

— ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτέκτων θεμέλιον, &c. This use of σοφός to signify skilful, or expert, as applied to mechanics, is found also at Eccl. xxix. 3, xxxvi. 1. And the very phrase σοφός

τέθεικα· ἄλλος δὲ ἐποικοδομεῖ· ἕκαστος δὲ βλέπεται πῶς ἐποικοδομεῖ. <sup>11</sup> (ὁ θεμέλιον γὰρ ἄλλον οὐδεὶς δύναται θείναι παρὰ τὸν κείμενον, ὃς ἐστὶν Ἰησοῦς [ὁ] Χριστός.) <sup>12</sup> Εἰ δέ τις ἐποικοδομεῖ ἐπὶ τὸν θεμέλιον τούτον, χρυσόν, ἄργυρον, λίθους τιμίους· ξύλα, χόρτον, καλάμην—<sup>13</sup> ἕκαστου τὸ ἔργον φανερόν γενήσεται· ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα δηλώσει· ὅτι ἐν πυρὶ ἀποκαλύπτεται.

1 Isa. 28. 16.
Matt. 16. 18.
Eph. 1. 20.
1 Ch. 4. 4.
2 Tim. 2. 9.
1 Pet. 1. 7.
3. 4. 12.
1 Ch. 1. 8.
Mal. 3. 17.
Rom. 2. 5.
16.
2 Thess. 1.
7—10.
3 Tim. 1. 18.

ἀρχιτέκτων occurs in Isa. iii. 2, and sometimes in the Class. writers. In ἀρχιτέκτων (which should be rendered architect) St. Paul adverts to his own dignity, as Apostle of the Gentiles.—Θεμέλιον τέθεικα, i. e. by communicating the elementary truths.—ἄλλος is, as Pott remarks, to be taken collectively, with reference to those persons (Apollos and others) who had followed the Apostle at Corinth. On the mention of 'building thereon,' the Apostle engrafts an admonition to those who are, or may hereafter be, employed in it; that they may mind with what kind of doctrines they follow up the first elements, so that they may be suitable thereto.

11. This verse seems parenthetic, and in it the Apostle (as Billr. observes) gets rid of the erroneous notion that it is possible to lay some foundation besides.

—θεμέλιον γάρ, &c.] Here γάρ refers to the preceding βλεπόμενος πῶς, &c. [And understanding there is to take heed as to how;] FOR other foundation may no man [consistently with his Christian duty] lay. Of τὸν κείμενον the full sense is, 'what has been laid down [by me].' By '1. ὁ Χριστός' understand the fundamental doctrine to be taught of Jesus as the Christ, the Anointed of God. See Acts x. 38, compared with Acts v. 42, διδάσκοντες Ἰησοῦν (suppl. εἶναι τὸν Χριστόν). The preaching of this doctrine implies a faithful inculcation of all the fundamental truths of the Gospel, both as to its promises and its threatenings. Supposing, however, the true reading here to be, as there is reason to think, Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, or, as Lachm. and Tisch. edit, Χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς, then the sense will be, 'the doctrine of Jesus Christ, or Christ Jesus,' implying faith in him as the Son of God, the Redeemer of the world. The former reading is supported by Acts v. 42, ἀπαγγελλόμενοι Ἰησοῦν τὸν Χρ., and xvii. 18, τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπαγγελλόμενοι. The latter, by Rom. vii. 1. xv. 17. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 5. Gal. vi. 15. Eph. ii. 10 and 13. Phil. iii. 14. Col. i. 4. ii. 6.

12. The sense of this and the following verses is somewhat obscure, arising from some confusion in metaphor: though, indeed, the difficulty has been increased by not adverting to the close connexion of this verse with v. 10, and by a misapprehension of the Apostle's general purpose in this passage; which was not, I apprehend, as is commonly thought, to represent one edifice, but two. He means to say, that on the foundation, as to its elementary principles, of 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' two very different buildings might be raised, either of very precious, or of utterly worthless materials. Stenerson well paraphrases thus: 'I having laid the foundation, others will now build upon it; but let them see how they do this. For though the foundation itself, once laid, cannot be changed, yet on this foundation may be raised different kinds of buildings: but what each is good for will hereafter appear; for what is built of worthless materials will fall, but what is formed of proper materials, and diligently built up, will remain firm and steadfast.'

13. ἕκαστου τὸ ἔργον φανερόν γενήσεται.] These words are closely connected with the foregoing, forming the apodosis to v. 12. The general sense is, 'Whether any one builds on this foundation a solid and splendid building of precious marbles, of which palaces or temples were built, or a mean hut, formed of boards and thatched with dried grass, each architect's work will be made manifest.' Of course it is implied that any one may build either one kind of superstructure or the other, but each one's work will be made manifest [as to what it is good for]: and why? ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα δηλώσει, where ἡ. ἡμ. δηλ. cannot mean 'time will show,' since the Article ἡ calls for a more definite sense; and the following context demands the sense, 'the day of judgment.' See Heb. x. 25. James v. 31. 1 Pet. i. 7. iv. 12. Some eminent Expositors explain it of the day of persecution; an interpretation which they think proved by the above-cited passage, 1 Pet. iv. 12. But it is not so proved. And besides that that would suppose the meaning to be most enigmatically expressed, the other is more suitable to the context, and is required by the idea meant to be suggested in the following words, ἐν πυρὶ ἀποκαλ.; for God's judgment is often elsewhere compared to a fire, which is here considered as a test. Besides, as Est. observes, 'by "the day of the Lord," or "the day," is every where in Scripture (from which he adduces many examples) meant "the day of final and universal judgment."' He then adds, that 'the Apostle himself, in the next Chapter, ver. 5, speaking yet of the proof of soundness in Christian doctrine in ministers, says it will be "at the day of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ," which day can be no other than that of the general judgment. Moreover,' continues he, 'while Scripture sometimes speaks of "the day of the Lord," and other times of "the day of our Lord's coming," and occasionally (as here) mentioning it emphatically as the day, it always designates it as one and the same day. But we expect no other day of the coming of our Lord (as it is usually called in Scripture) than that in which he is to come for the exercise of universal judgment.'

Ἀποκαλύπτεται may be, with some, referred to ἔργον (building), the words ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα δηλώσει being regarded as in some measure parenthetical; and thus a good sense will arise. But it is more natural to refer it to the nearer antecedent ἡμέρα, and thus arises a more simple construction, and a better sense is obtained; for the day of judgment will (as we learn from 2 Pet. iii. 10) be revealed with fire. According to the

m ch. 6. 19.
2 Cor. 6. 16.
Eph. 2. 21.
22.
Heb. 3. 6.
1 Pet. 2. 5.
n Prov. 6. 7.
1an. 5. 21.
6. 44. 30.
Jer. 27. 9.
Luke 21. 8.
Gal. 6. 6. 7.
Eph. 6. 6.

καὶ ἐκάστου τὸ ἔργον ὁποῖόν ἐστι τὸ πῦρ δοκιμάσει. <sup>14</sup> Εἴ τις τὸ ἔργον μένει, ὃ ἐπ' αὐτὸν δοκίμηται, μισθὸν λήψεται· <sup>15</sup> εἴ τις τὸ ἔργον κατακαήσεται, ζημιωθήσεται· αὐτὸς δὲ σωθήσεται, οὕτω δὲ ὡς διὰ πυρός. <sup>16</sup> Οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ναὸς Θεοῦ ἐστε, καὶ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν; <sup>17</sup> Εἴ τις τὸν ναὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ φθειρεῖ, φθερεῖ τούτου ὁ Θεός· ὁ γὰρ ναὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἅγιός ἐστιν, οὐτίνες ἐστε ὑμεῖς. <sup>18</sup> Μηδεὶς ἑαυτὸν ἐξαπατάτω· εἰ former view, the sense intended will be, that the fiery trials and conflicts to which Christian teachers and their doctrines are subject will test the truth and value of their doctrine and teaching; the system of teaching being represented under the figure of a building, of which only the solid parts can withstand the fire.

— After τὸ πῦρ three uncial, and seven cursive MSS., and some Fathers, have αὐτὸ; which reading is adopted by Lachm. and Tisch.; perhaps rightly; at least internal evidence is in its favour; but more authority is wanting to justify its reception. The Pesch. Translator had it not in his copy.

14. Here μισθὸν λήψεται and ζημιωθήσεται are opposed to each other; and in the former there is an ellipsis of ἔργου, to be taken from τὸ ἔργον just before; in the latter (which is a juridical term), an ellipsis of τοῦ μισθοῦ, from μισθὸν preceding; q. d. 'He shall be mulcted of, lose, the reward, which he would have received for his work.' At αὐτὸς σωθ. those Commentators are much perplexed, who refer the passage to Christians in general: but they do this without reason; for it is plain that the Apostle had only in view Christian teachers. The sense of the passage is, indeed, obscured by a blending of the physical and the metaphorical parts of the comparison; the first of which represents a builder, whose house is, as it were, burnt over his head, and who with difficulty and danger escapes through the fire. See Jude 23; and comp. Livy, xx. 35, 'prope ambustus evaserat.' The second part of the comparison designates a Christian teacher, the superstructure of whose doctrine does not square with the fundamental principles of Christianity previously laid down, and accordingly is brought to destruction: thus, then, he loses his labour, and is himself saved with very great difficulty. Comp. Artemid. On. i. 50, θάπτον γὰρ, καὶ ὡς εἰσέλαι, ἐκ πυρὸς ἀντάζουσι τὰ σκήλη.

15. It is plain that this passage cannot, upon any principles of just interpretation, be adduced to countenance the Romish doctrine of purgatory. That notion has no support in any of the earlier Fathers, and the countenance seemingly afforded by the later ones is not without suspicion of interpolation; of which we are enabled to convict the Romanists in one instance, that of Theodor. in loc., where see the note of Neeselt.

16. Having thus reminded the teachers of their duty, the Apostle now addresses himself to the taught, that they also should take heed. To the former he had said, 'Ye are the master-builders of the house of God.' To the latter he now says, 'Ye are the temples of God; it is therefore your part to keep yourselves unpolluted by the world' (Calv.); warning them, also, to beware of those who promulgate false doctrine, and not to rest upon their own human wisdom. (Hyper.)

— οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ναὸς, &c.] There is here a recurrence to the idea at ver. 9, probably suggested by the foregoing architectural metaphor; and under this imagery the Apostle speaks of the whole body of Christian converts as being the temple of God, built by him, and consecrated to his service; just as in the Old Test. God is said to dwell among the Jews, who are accordingly styled the habitation, and even the temple, of God. It is further declared that the Spirit of God dwelleth in them, and is attested by his gifts and graces, as God manifested his presence in the Temple at Jerusalem; q. d. 'Ye are not merely the building of God, but his temple, as being that in which his Spirit dwelleth.' This is meant to point a denunciation against false teachers, who corrupt the minds of their disciples with erroneous doctrines. The general sense is, that the indwelling of the Spirit constitutes the spiritual temple of God; and that every true Christian is both individually such a sacred shrine, and also that the whole Christian Church forms collectively the complete and magnificent building now substituted in the place of the Jewish Temple.

The next assertion (founded, as Stenensen shows, on a general sentiment so universally approved by the consent of all nations, as to seem born in the very nature of man) is, that 'if any one shall corrupt or injure this body of the Church, composing the spiritual Temple of God (whether by false doctrines, or a contentious and sectarian spirit, or by a conduct unworthy of his high calling, see vi. 15—19), him shall God destroy.' Comp. Acts xxiii. 2, 3, where the expression used is not imprecatory, but predictive; and so here φθειρεῖ is not so much predictive, as denunciatory. See Note on Acts viii. 20. 'Αγιος is here very significant, and even emphatic; q. d. 'holy [and therefore not to be violated or injured with impunity].'

17. οὐτίνες ἐστε ὑμεῖς] This clause gives a reason for the foregoing assertion; q. d. 'which kind of Temple [in inviolability] ye [the body of Christ] are;' and therefore that Temple is not to be violated with impunity. The construction here is remarkable; the plural οὐτίνες being used instead of the singular ὅστις, by a not very unusual idiom, whereby, when a relative is placed between two substantives, it sometimes takes the number of the preceding; sometimes, as here, of the following.

18. 'Hic Apostolus ea, quæ nuper dixerat, ad lectores transfert, rectitque simul ad rem, v. 5, inceptam, copiosius tractandam.' Comp. iv. 1. (Stenensen.) There is now traced the origin of the dissensions which agitated the Corinthian Church. (Crell.) And this forms a third argument to prove the folly and sin of making schisms.

τις δοκεῖ σοφὸς εἶναι ἐν ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ αἰῶνι τούτῳ, μαρὸς γενέσθω, ἵνα γένηται σοφός. <sup>19</sup> Ὁ γὰρ σοφία τοῦ κόσμου τούτου μαρία <sup>o Job 5. 12. ch. 1. 20, 26.</sup> παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ ἐστι. γέγραπται γάρ· Ὁ δρασσοῦμενος τοὺς σοφοὺς ἐν τῇ πανουργίᾳ αὐτῶν. <sup>20</sup> καὶ πάλιν Κύριος <sup>p Ps. 94. 11.</sup> γινώσκει τοὺς διαλογισμοὺς τῶν σοφῶν, ὅτι εἰσὶ μάταιοι. <sup>21</sup> Ὥστε μηδεὶς καυχάσθω ἐν ἀνθρώποις· πάντα γὰρ <sup>q 1 Cor. 4. 5. Rev. 21. 7.</sup>

— μηδεὶς ἑαυτὸν ἔξω.] These words ought to be referred, not (as some have supposed) to what precedes, from ver. 10, but to what follows, being a formula (similar to others, Matt. xxiv. 4. Eph. v. 6. 2 Thess. ii. 3. 1 John iii. 7, and Jer. xxxvii. 9) intended to impart force and solemnity to a warning, or a precept, by hinting at the danger of not heeding it, through the deceivableness of persons, or the deceitfulness of things. Thus the sense is, 'let no one (whether teacher or taught) deceive himself, either by resting on the vain opinion of his own wisdom, or of wisdom in general, which, without Divine illumination, cannot but fail him.'

— εἰ τις δοκεῖ σοφὸς εἶναι.] Not, 'seemeth to be wise,' nor, as Wakef. renders, 'has the reputation of being wise, (which might be the sense, and which in Class. Greek it would be),' but, rather, (which is the sense required by the words preceding, μηδεὶς ἑαυτὸν ἔξαπατάτω) 'thinketh himself, or seemeth to himself, to be wise,' 'deems himself wise.' So the term is explained in all the ancient Versions except the Vulg., and by Erasmus, Calv., Beza, Hyper., Pisc., Grot., Est., Crell., Heydenr., and almost all the more ancient Commentators and Lexicographers. Worthy of attention is the remark of Bp. Pearce as follows: 'I observe in St. Paul's style that, when σοι is joined to εἰ τις δοκεῖ it signifies: 'if any thinks, or seems to himself, to be, but is not what he thinks he is:' when σοι is left out, the words signify, 'if any one sets up, or pretends to be.' At the same time the Apostle does not deny that he is really what he pretends to be.' The words ἐν τῇ αἰῶνι τούτῳ are by some ancient and modern Interpreters construed with the words following; but it is more natural and agreeable to the style of Scripture and the context to connect them with the preceding. Render, 'in knowledge of the things of this world;' or, as Calv. and Grot., 'in the esteem of men of the world, who know not the true wisdom.' Μαρὸς γενέσθω, 'let him renounce all pretensions to wisdom superior to that which the word of God reveals.' 'ἵνα γέν. σοφός,' 'in order that he may become really wise,' i. e. unto salvation.

19. We have here, as Calv. observes, an argumentum à contrario, in which the laying down of one contrary destroys the other.

— ἡ γὰρ σοφία, &c.] meaning, '[And this indeed is necessary, for the wisdom of this world [only] is [but] foolishness in the estimation of God.' Dr. South (in an able Sermon on this text, vol. i. 375 seqq.) takes σοφία here to mean that worldly wisdom which lies in practice, and goes by the name of policy,—a kind of practical cunning, having something of the nature of a trade. This he thinks plain from the πανουργία in the next clause; but from what the Apostle immediately subjoins at ver. 10, espec. adverting to διαλογισμοῖς (see Rom. xiv. 1) and μάταιοι (see Rom. i. 21), it would seem that he had also in view that sort of wisdom which consists in speculation, and which, however admired by the learned among the heathens, was accounted by St. Paul 'vain philosophy,' and 'science falsely so called.' Be that as it may, by σοφία is here to be understood the seeming wisdom [whether speculative or practical] (but which is, in effect, folly) of men who 'lean to their own understanding' without reference to Divine teaching. Comp. Plato, Apol. p. 23, A, ὅτι ἡ ἀνθρωπίνη σοφία ὀλίγον τι πλεονέκτηται καὶ οὐδένος. The subsequent quotations, serving to confirm and illustrate this truth, are from Job v. 13, and Ps. xciv. 11. In the former passage those words only are taken which suited the Apostle's purpose; and even those are taken not only from the Sept., but from another Version. In the latter, Paul quotes according to the Sept., but accommodates the passage to his purpose by giving σοφῶν instead of ἀνθρώπων. In ὁ δρασσο. τοὺς σοφοὺς ἐν τῇ παν. α. we have a metaphor taken from hunters, who catch wild animals by throwing over them a noose in (ἐν) which they are caught and held fast, as in Soph. Phil. 452, ἀλλὰ καὶ σοφαὶ γινώμηναι—ἰμποδίζονται θάμα ('are hampered,' 'fail of effect'). In the next clause of the Sept. (which is in parallelism with this), the term πολυλόκου has a very similar metaphor also from hunting. The sense is many-knotted, or plaited, with allusion to the nets laid to catch wild animals; denoting, as Olympiodorus, on the above passage of Job, observes, τοὺς ἄγαν συνετοὺς, the over-wise. Thus by τοὺς σοφοὺς are denoted 'those who think themselves wise.' Now these, it is meant, are caught in a noose or net, while they are laying it for another. See Job xviii. 8. Ps. ix. 15. xxxv. 8.

21—23. Here follows the epilogue, in which the Apostle, having thus shown the folly of schisms, adds an exhortation (introduced in the form of a conclusion from what has been said) not to boast, some of one teacher, and some of another, to the disregard of all the rest; since not only all teachers, but all events that may befall them, are made subservient to the general good of the Christian body. (Est. and Pott.)

21. μηδεὶς καυχάσθω ἐν ἀνθρώποις.] 'let no one boast in men,' i. e. be proud of them as their teachers; namely, by ranging himself under any one's banners, as leader of a sect; which was the case both with the Jews and the Greeks. The reason is subjoined in the words following: πάντα γὰρ ὑμῶν ἐστί, which (as addressed to the taught) is as much as to say 'ye exist not for the sake of the teachers, but the teachers for you:' in other words: 'Yours are all teachers, whether Paul, or Apollo, or Cephas.' As respects the teachers, the term ἀνθρώποις is adopted by way of intimating a reason why this should

reh. 11, 2.
2 Cor. 10, 7.
3 Matt. 24.
45.
3 Cor. 4, 5.
4 6, 4.
Col. 1, 26.
Tit. 1, 7.
1 Pet. 4, 10.
b Luke 12.
42.
4 10, 10-12.
3 Cor. 2, 17. & 4, 2. Col. 1, 26, 27.

ὑμῶν ἐστὶν <sup>22</sup> εἴτε Παῦλος, εἴτε Ἀπολλῶς, εἴτε Κηφᾶς, εἴτε κόσμος, εἴτε ζωὴ εἴτε θάνατος, εἴτε ἐνεστῶτα εἴτε μέλλοντα πάντα ὑμῶν ἐστὶν <sup>23</sup> ὑμεῖς δὲ Χριστοῦ Χριστὸς δὲ, Θεοῦ. IV. 1 Ὁὕτως ἡμᾶς λογιζέσθω ἄνθρωπος, ὡς ὑπηρέτας Χριστοῦ καὶ οἰκονόμους μυστηρίων Θεοῦ. <sup>2</sup> Ὁ δὲ λοιπὸν, ζητεῖται ἐν not be done; because they are all but men, and only instruments of God for the salvation of mankind.

— πάντα γὰρ ὑμῶν ἐστὶν, &c.] Πάντα here is by some Commentators referred to things,—namely, the endowments of the Apostles and teachers; by others (which is more agreeable to the context), to persons, namely, all teachers; the sense being, 'All teachers, and all the various endowments they respectively enjoy, are yours,' i. e. meant to be promotive of your spiritual good. Comp. Rom. viii. 28, 38. This πάντα is then explained per merismum. The terms themselves are not to be too much pressed; since, as Calv. and Hyper. are agreed, this is merely meant as a representation καθ' ὑπερβολήν, or κατ' ἀξίαν, of things the most excellent in the universe, by a sort of magnificent gradation; q. d. 'Yours are all teachers (and their endowments), whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas; nay, yours is the whole universe, and whatever it affords, whether distributed into things endued with life, or destitute of it; whether into things present, or things future (comp. Col. i. 16. Rom. viii. 39), all are yours, i. e. are meant to be subservient to your real and ultimate good.' 'It may,' observes Hyper., 'easily be shown that all these things, comprehended in the foregoing μερισμός, are appointed for the especial service of the righteous. The world, as created for the righteous,—life, as given for the righteous, and death subdued to them,—all things, whether present or future, are meant for their final good.' The general sense is, that, 'under the direction of God's providence, the world, and all things which form parts of its course, whether things of the present or of a future state, are made subservient to the final benefit of the righteous,' working together for their good in the end, serving to make them holy here, and happy hereafter.

23. ὑμεῖς δὲ Χριστοῦ] There is an emphasis on Χρ., q. d. 'ye are Christ's servants [and therefore not to be enslaved to any teachers] even as Christ is God's' viz. in his human capacity, in the exercise of his office of Mediator and Intercessor; in the discharge of which he depended on God the Father. Compare a similar passage to the present (alike meant to carry the gradation to the highest pitch) in 1 Cor. xi. 3. An inference from the foregoing may (as Billr. suggests) supply an admonition to teachers: 'Let not therefore pride be among you: ye belong to Christ the Lord; but even he sought not to serve himself, but in all things did the will of God. Belong, then, to him, and be one with him.'

IV. The Apostle goes on to show, that all preachers are but stewards of the manifold grace of God, and are valued in the sight of God according to their fidelity, which cannot now be known to men; and that therefore they ought neither to be too much extolled nor depreciated till Christ, their Lord, shall come, who will assign them their due honour. Moreover, that, having nothing but what they have by him received, such stewards have no ground of glorying. Then, in order to point out the difference between the false teachers (so admired by the factious) and himself, with the other Apostles, he draws a striking contrast between the luxury and ease in which the former were living at Corinth, and the poverty and persecution which the Apostles endured. He further intimates that he shall shortly come, and put to the test the claims of his adversaries, by seeing the supernatural powers which they can bring forward for their confirmation. As to the first five verses, their connexion with the preceding and following context is thus traced by Billr.:—'In the preceding Chapter, the Apostle had said that the teachers, as servants of God and of the Church, could not possibly become rulers over the latter and founders of sects; in this Chapter he proceeds to state that the teachers are simply stewards of that which God hath committed to their charge. The only praise that could accrue to them was that which they might procure by fidelity. But even for this praise he himself did not look, in so far as men were concerned (ἡμεῖς δὲ αἱς ἐλπίσιν ἡμῶν ἀναριθμῶ, & ἐπὶ ἀνθρωπίνῃς ἡμέρας): nay, so little did he think of judgment, that he had not even judged himself, but had left all to the Lord. If, then, the Apostle were so humble, how much more ought the Corinthians to be so!'

1. οὕτως ἡμᾶς λογιζέσθω ἄνθρωποι, &c.] Ὁὕτως, 'in this [following] light alone; namely, ὡς ὑπηρέτας Χριστοῦ, for διακόνους Χριστοῦ, ch. iii. 5. So Luke i. 2, ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου, equiv. to διακ. ch. iii. 5; and so in Jos. Bell. ii. 15, 4. The inference implied is, these, then, are not to be accounted lords of their faith, so that they should bear their appellation from them.

— οἰκονόμοι μυστηρίων Θεοῦ] i. e. 'stewards and dispensers of the benefits of the Gospel, by preaching its doctrines;' which are called mysteries, because they are not discoverable by human reason, but only to be known from Divine revelation. It is meant that they are stewards only, not proprietors, of that which they dispense, and ought therefore in all respects to follow the directions of their Master; and accordingly fidelity is their chief duty. As respects the expression οἰκον. μυστηρίων Macknight, in his note supra, ii. 7, and Dr. Peile, think, that here, and in various other passages, the Apostle applies the term μυστήρια to the Gospel by way of recommending it to the Greeks, and thereby weaning them from those heathen mysteries of which they were so fond; and because the discoveries the Gospel contains were unspokeably more important than those of any of those so-called myste- τοῖς οἰκονόμοις, ἵνα πιστὸς τις εὐρεθῇ. <sup>3</sup> ὁμοί δὲ εἰς ἐλάχιστόν <sup>2 ch. 3. 13.

4 Ps. 142. 2.</sup>
ἐστίν, ἵνα ὑφ' ὑμῶν ἀνακριθῶ, ἢ ὑπὸ ἀνθρωπίνης ἡμέρας· ἀλλ' <sup>Job 9. 2.
Rom. 8. 29.
2 Cor. 5. 10.</sup>
οὐδὲ ἐμαυτὸν ἀνακρίνω. <sup>4</sup> οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐμαυτῷ σύνοιδα, ἀλλ' <sup>1 John 3. 20.
21.</sup>

ries, and far more certain, being from GOD. Accordingly, on this verse Mackn. maintains that St. Paul by οἰκον. μυστ. means to characterize himself as a myologist of these mysteries, to intimate that the deepest doctrines, as well as the plain elementary principles, were intrusted to him to be dispensed and made known. This, however, seems a vain fancy; and the notion, besides that it supposes the Apostle to do what was so censurable in the Romanists of later ages, is at once refuted by the fact, that, in nearly all the passages Mackn. speaks of, the singular μυστήριον is used, which can relate only to the Gospel generally; and, moreover, where the plural μυστήρια is used (which is only five times), it cannot have any reference to the Heathen mysteries. As to the passage of 1 Cor. xiii. 2, ιδὼν—εἰδὼ τὰ μυστήρια πάντα καὶ πάσας τὰς γνώσεις, there by μυστήρια must be denoted, as at xiv. 2, the Θεοῦ σοφία ἐν μυστηρίῳ (1 Cor. ii. 7), and Mackn. does not himself recognize the allusion there. Again, as respects τὰ μυστήρια τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Θεοῦ in Matt. xiii. 11, and Luke viii. 10, the expression may only mean the Gospel doctrines, as appears from τὸ μυστ. τῆς βασιλείας, found in the parallel passage of Mark iv. 11. Here, however, the plural is used of the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel; on which see Est., who with other eminent Expositors, includes the Sacraments; though Mr. Alford denies that they can be referred to either of the two categories in which the Sacraments are classed. The most correct view seems to be that taken by Calv., thus: 'Honorificum est Evangelii elogium, quod arcana Dei, quæ in eo continentur, nuncupat. Porro quum his mysteriis annexæ sint Sacramenta, tanquam appendices, sequitur, eorum quoque legitimos dispensatores esse qui verbo administrando præsent.' See also Hyper., who well observes,—'Vocat hic dispensatores, similitudine ducta ab œconomia, seu administratione domus (comp. οἶκος Θεοῦ, said of the Church of God, 1 Tim. iii. 15), sicut ante vocavit co-operarios. Etsi vero humilitatem verbe ista significant, tamen valde illustrent illorum munus. These μυστήρια ministers, as they are the stewards thereof, are to announce, and deal out the truths contained therein (ὀρθοτομεῖν), having for that purpose received them from the Fountain of Truth, the Holy Spirit.

2. The sense here depends on the reading. For the text. rec. δὲ, A, B, C, D, F, G, and 5 cursives, with the Syr., Vulg., and other ancient Versions, have οὐδὲ, which is adopted by Lachm. (but placed at the end of the ver. preceding), Tisch., and Alf. But in his 2nd edit. Tisch. restores δὲ, rightly; for the great deficiency in cursives casts a great shade on the authority; and internal evidence is against the reading, which yields so harsh and jejune a sense, that only a German stomach can digest it. Besides, the position of οὐδὲ at the beginning of a sentence is unprecedented. The very reason which induced Lachm. to clap it, without any authority, at the end of the preceding verse, though to the great detriment of the sense. I doubt not that οὐδὲ arose from an error of the scribes, who confounded δὲ with οὐδὲ (as we see the same scribbling did at Luke xvi. 25), stumbling at the unusual idiom δ λοιπὸν, which seems Hellenistic, or Provincial Greek, for the Class. τὸ λοιπὸν (for κατὰ τὸ λοιπὸν, lit. 'as to what remains,' as at Eph. vi. 10); and Paul uses τὸ λοιπὸν, as well as λοιπὸν, and once, it seems, here, δ λοιπ. In these cases, however, there is, I think, under ceterum implied the notion of potissimum, 'especially,' which here is very suitable.

—ζῆνται; lit. 'the indispensable requisite, the most essential duty, is.' See the notes of Calv. and Hyper.

3. ὁμοί δὲ εἰς ἐλάχιστόν ἐστι; lit. 'it comes to, passes for, very little.' An Hellenistic phrase for ἐλάχιστόν μοι ἐστίν, equiv. to the Classical παρ' οὐδὲν ἐστίν, or οὐδὲν διαφέρει, non curo, &c., there being a mixture of two constructions. The Pron. ὁμοί is emphatic; q. d. 'But to me it counts for very little, that I should be examined, or scrutinized, as to my faithfulness, by you; or that I be brought under the judgment-day (for the judgment, or verdict) of man;—the Adject. ἀνθρωπ. meaning, 'what proceeds from man, or men.' The expression, indeed, involves great harshness, and was regarded as so anomalous by Jerome, as to be set down by him as a Ciliacism. But the best Expositors are agreed that Paul chose to employ the term with allusion to that great day of final judgment, infra γ. 5, supra iii. 13—15. Joel i. 15, about the award of which alone he was anxious; his meaning being, that 'whether he be approved or censured by a human verdict is of little consequence to him, in comparison with the unerring judgment of God at the great day.' Thus he cares not to prove his fidelity to those who choose to doubt it,—but contents himself with simply protesting it, with an appeal to the tribunal of the great Searcher of hearts.

—ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἐμαυτὸν ἀνακρίνω] The difficulty (which has been started by Est., Mackn., and others),—namely, that it is the duty of every man (a duty enjoined by the Apostle, 1 Cor. xi. 31, and 2 Cor. xiii. 5) to examine and judge himself, is not to be satisfactorily removed by assigning to ἀνακρίνω ἐμαυτὸν a sense so unprecedented, as 'I condemn myself.' We may prefer the version of Dr. Peile, who renders, 'nay, I am not even my own examiner.' But, before adopting that sense, we should have satisfactory proof that the words admit of it. I see not why the difficulty may not be as well removed by taking ἀνακρίνω in the sense to hold judgment on; thus the sense will be, 'Nay, I do not care to hold judgment on myself in such a case;' 'I do not care to decide on my own merits or demerits.' This view of the sense is confirmed by the term ἀνακρίνω, just after used; the words οὐδὲν—δεδικαίωμαι being parenthetical. I find this view supported by the authority of Theophyl., Theodor., and Est.

4. Of the next clause, οὐδὲν γὰρ—σύνοιδα, which is parenthetical, the sense is, 'Though I am not conscious to myself of having done any οὐκ ἐν τούτῳ δεδικαίωμαι) ὁ δὲ ἀνακρίνων με Κύριός ἐστιν.

 5 * Ὅστε μὴ πρὸ καιροῦ τι κρίνετε, ἕως ἂν ἔλθῃ ὁ Κύριος· ὃς καὶ φωτίσει τὰ κρυπτὰ τοῦ σκότους, καὶ φανερώσει τὰς βουλὰς τῶν καρδιῶν καὶ τότε ὁ ἔπαινος γενήσεται ἐκάστῳ ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

6 * Ταῦτα δὲ, ἀδελφοί, μετεσχημάτισα εἰς ἑμαυτὸν καὶ Ἀπολλῶν δι' ὑμᾶς ἵνα ἐν ἡμῖν μάθητε τὸ μὴ ὑπὲρ ὃ γέγραπται φρονεῖν, ἵνα μὴ εἰς ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἐνὸς φυσιοῦσθε κατὰ τοῦ ἐτέρου. 7 * Τίς e Matt. 7.

 3, 2.
 Luke 6. 37.
 Rom. 2. 1,
 18, 20.
 2 Cor. 5. 10.
 Rev. 20. 12.
 f ch. 1. 12.
 g 2. 4-7.
 3 Cor. 10. 7, 12, 15.
 h 11. 4, 12-15.
 g John 8. 27.
 James 1. 17.
 1 Pet. 4. 10.

wrong [in my ministry], yet am I not, on that account, regarded as justified and free from blame,—namely, it should seem, that of sinning occasionally through ignorance or inadvertence. —At οὐδὲν supply κακόν, as in the Nil conscire sibi of Horace. The word is sometimes expressed, as at Job xxvii. 6, οὐ γὰρ σύνοιδα ἑμαυτῷ ἄτοπα πράξας.

—ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐν τούτῳ δέδικα.] 'Yet am I not heresy (i. e. by this self-verdict) justified, cleared of blame.' Comp. Ignat. Ep. ad Magn. ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 36, ἀλλ' οὐ παρὰ τοῦτο δεδικαίωμαι. Of the next words the literal sense is, —'but he who holdeth inquiry upon me is the Lord'; implying that he alone who is to judge him at the last day—the LORD—is his true Judge, to determine whether he deserves praise or blame.

5. On this the Apostle founds a most weighty admonition, admitting of universal application, though meant for the readers, like others at Rom. xiv. 3, 4, 10, 14, and in the form of a conclusion from what has been said; q. d. 'Wherefore (such being the case) (ὁστε), abstain from all sitting in judgment upon others,—myself, or any other person or party,—as being premature'; lit., 'before the time [appointed].' At ἕως δὲ ἔλθῃ there is an ellipse; q. d. '[But wait] until the Lord shall come to exercise such judgment at his second advent.' The next clause, ὃς καὶ φωτίσει, &c., is meant to intimate why this judgment should be abstained from,—namely, 'since we weak mortals are destitute of that competent knowledge of all the circumstances of any case, without which the office of judgment cannot properly be exercised; and ought therefore to leave judgment to the great Searcher of hearts, who will not only bring to light the most secret actions, but (καὶ φωτίσει—καὶ, &c.) will manifest the hidden counsels of the heart.' 1 Cor. xiv. 25.

The phrase βουλὰς τῶν καρδιῶν is formed on several in the Old Test.; especially Ps. xlv. 22, 'Will not God search it out; for he knoweth the secret things of the heart?' ὃς γινώσκει, Sept., τὰ κρύφια τῆς καρδίας.

—καὶ τότε ὁ ἔπαινος—Θεοῦ] Theophyl., after Chrys., observes, that we should have expected the Apostle rather to have said ἡ τιμωρία, ἢ ὁ ἔπαινος. But, by so expressing, the Apostle, we may say, confines himself to the more agreeable of the two ideas. Though, indeed, in ἔπαινος is, Billr. thinks, also included the opposite to praise, ἡ μίμνησις and τιμωρία, on the principle of contrarium ē contrarium; yet it might best be accounted for on the principle, that ἔπαινος is one of those words which properly have a middle signification; though in use they come to have a signification either in deterius, or in melius; so our word 'meed.' That there are not a few such words in most languages is not to be doubted: but I cannot find any proof that ἔπαινος (or even its root αἶνος) was one of this kind: for, as to the gloss of Hesych. ἐπαινοῦς· κρίσεις—even supposing the sense there intended to be awards, it would scarcely be sufficient evidence, being probably founded on the usage of some poet. Rejecting, then, both of the two principles above propounded, I now prefer rendering: 'And then to every one (i. e. teacher) shall be apportioned by God the portion of praise due to him,' equiv. to his meed of praise. This is more agreeable to the context in the next verse; for, as Est. well points out, 'the purpose of the Apostle is to repress those who, through contention, extolled their own particular teachers.'

6-13. The Apostle now explains the design he had in the mention of himself and Apollos,—namely, to withdraw the Corinthian converts from all party-spirit, and the pride and vanity which it engenders.

6. ταῦτα δὲ, ἀδελφοί, μετεσχ. εἰς ἐμ.] However, these things [namely, 'which I have now written, on the authority of teachers,' ch. iii. 4-35], 'I have in figure applied (accommodated) in other words, to myself and Apollos for your sakes, for your instruction'; 'I have brought forward this in my own person and in that of Apollos, as if what was said of others (whom I, out of delicacy, forbear to mention) were applicable to us; intending, under my own name and his, to admonish you, for your instruction, as to the degree of estimation in which you ought to hold any teachers of the Gospel, and where you should stop.'

—μὴ. τὸ μὴ ὑπὲρ ὃ γέγραπται φρον.] The full sense is, 'that ye may learn the lesson, not to go beyond those things that are written'; i. e. as Mr. Alf. explains, 'not to exceed, in your estimate of yourselves, or us, the standard of Scripture, which had been partly pointed out supra i. 19 and 31.' Γέγραπται is an expression commonly serving to introduce something written in Scripture for general admonition; and not admonition only, but instruction generally, to avoid going beyond the due measure of what is marked out for us therein.

—ἵνα μὴ—φυσιοῦσθε] The use of the Indic. after ἵνα is so uncommon (occurring only once besides in the N. T., Gal. iv. 17), and agrees so ill with the notion of intention involved in ἵνα, that Billr. is of opinion, that, since in both places the verb is one in -ῶ, the Apostle has fallen into a grammatical error, using -οῦσθε for -ᾶσθε, and -οῦτε for -ᾶτε. But grammatical

γάρ σε διακρίνει; τί δὲ ἔχεις δ' οὐκ ἔλαβες; Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἔλαβες, τί καυχᾶσαι ὡς μὴ λαβών; <sup>8</sup> Ἦδη κεκορεσμένοι ἐστέ, ἤδη

errors rarely, if ever, occur in Paul's writings. So that the error may rather be imputed to the scribes, who might, as often, confound αὐ with οὐ. But, if Paul really intended the Indic., we may, perhaps, ascribe this use of the mood with a Particle of design to provincialism, which Jerome calls Cilicium. The words may be rendered in their full sense: 'that ye may not be inflated with pride, each one in behalf of one [of the two party-leaders] to the prejudice of the other.' By this force given to it, 'the Article expresses,' as observes Dr. Peile, 'an individuality to the one and the other of the two party-leaders.' He might have adduced, in the way of example, a passage of Luke xxiv. 18, ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ εἰς, meaning one of the two persons just before mentioned. Thus Dr. Peile's version, some one, is not quite correct. If his rendering of εἰς be (which it may) right (and certainly it is countenanced by Theodor.), the εἰς stands for εἰς ἑαυτοῦ. Considering, however, that that ellipsis is one requiring proof, I prefer to take the εἰς as standing for εἰς τὸν αὐτοῦ, 'any particular individual.' This manner of taking the words is supported by the authority of Theophyl., Phot., and Ecumen.

7. Having warned the people in general, the Apostle now turns from the taught to the teachers, and severely stigmatizes their conceit; apostrophizing them in terms of keen sarcasm, and bitter irony. He took this course, because he had in view that pride of the teachers, and rivalry one against another, which could not but engender a like feeling of vanity among the disciples. Hence, to check this evil, Paul apostrophizes one such self-conceited and inflated teacher, prob. a leader of the Anti-Pauline party (priding himself in his own endowments of learning, wisdom, or eloquence), representing as it were the rest. The use of the singular serves to increase the force of the triple interrogation here employed. The answer, as being unavoidable, is left to be supplied, 1. by ὁ Θεός; 2 and 3. by ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ; In the second interrogation, τί δὲ ἔχεις, δ' οὐκ ἔλαβες; the reason for putting it may be, what Est. supposes, namely, to anticipate the reply which might be made to the first interrogation—'my superiority is the fruit of my own talents, and the laborious assiduity with which I have cultivated them.' Now this is effectually refuted by the interrogation, of which the sense is, in other words: 'What hast thou of talents or energy, gifts or graces, that thou didst not receive [from God]?' Comp. John iii. 27, with James i. 17. As respects the third interrogation, it is only necessary to point out the strong mode of putting the thing; where the καί, which signifies even, equiv. to as is really the case, even so, and the emphasis on ἔλαβες, serve to increase the force of the sentiment. The ὡς μὴ λαβών is meant, as Theophyl. observes, to advert to the absurdity of claiming that received from another, as if it were our own. It must, however, be observed, that the words admit of application to the taught in any Christian congregation, as well as to the teachers—in fact, to Christians in general, as such. And here the Fathers, especially Chrys., Cyprian, and Augustine, have done good service, by refuting the Pelagian dogmas, and proving that (to use the words of Calv.) 'quidquid excellentie in hominibus non est naturaliter ingenitum, ut ascribi queat vel naturæ, vel generi; sed ex merâ et gratuita ejus misericordia manare.'

8. Ἦδη κεκορεσμένοι ἐστέ, &c.] I was formerly of opinion, that what is here said is to be understood of the teachers and pastors: and such is the view entertained by several eminent modern Commentators. Considering, however, that this view involves too much harshness, I am now induced to acquiesce in that adopted by the ancient Expositors, as Chrys., Theophyl., and Ecumen., and by some early modern Commentators, as Hyper. and Calv., according to which the reference is to the Corinthian community; though I see not why it may not include such of that community as, having been endowed with the higher spiritual gifts (the λόγος γνώσεως and λόγος σοφίας spoken of in 1 Cor. xii. 8), had, on that ground, become the διδάσκαλοι mentioned at xii. 29; and as those spiritual gifts were extensively distributed, it is probable that the persons in question were many. This view is confirmed by v. 15, ἐν γὰρ μύριον παιδαγωγῶν ἐχρητὴ ἐν Χριστῷ. The sense of the whole passage is well explained by Chrys., who, after ably tracing the connexion with the preceding context, points out the bearing of the three different clauses one towards another. The first is taken from persons so filled with food, as neither to need nor desire any more; the second, from persons so rich, as to have no need of or desire for more wealth; the third, from one who, from being a private person, is raised to the throne; and, having therefore attained the highest station, has nothing further, in the way of ambition, to wish for. After noticing the indignant vexation in the context, Chrys. marks the strong force and emphasis in ἤδη, as intimating the improbability and absurdity of their fancied ταλίστη. Accordingly, with a due regard to the delicate thread of connexion, alone perceived by Chrys., we may express the general sense intended by the Apostle thus:—'Received, however, you aver you have, —and it would seem all at once. Short has been the time since you became acquainted with the Gospel, ye are, it seems, even now already full to satiety.' Κεκορ. may seem a somewhat coarse term; but exx. of it, and of others yet more homely (such as χορτάζεσθαι), are adduced by Athen. p. 100, ed. Cassaub., from the purest Attic writers; in addition to which I have noted Eubul. in his Δόλων, fr. i. But, to proceed: at the next step in the gradation, ἤδη ἐπλουτήσατε, 'ye are rich,'—viz. in all spiritual wealth,—there is an allusion to what was said, supra, i. 5 and 7, ἐν παντὶ ἐπλουτίσθητε—ἐν πάσῃ γνώσει, ὥστε ὑμᾶς μὴ ὑστερεῖσθαι ἐν μηδενὶ χαρίσματι (meaning 'spiritual gift'), where what is said is rather to be understood of their claim to possess all these spiritual riches and gifts, than the being in actual possession of them. Comp., too, Rev. iii. 17. Here, then, the Apostle means to intimate that such is the case with them. In the words which follow, h Ps. 44, 22.

Rom. 8, 36.
1 Cor. 4, 11.
1 Thess. 5, 9.
10.
Heb. 10, 33.
6, 11, 36.
Rev. 6, 9—11.
2, 7, 11—14.
2, 17, 6, 7.
1 ch. 2, 6.
2, 18.
Acts 17, 13.

ἐπλουτήσατε, χωρίς ἡμῶν ἐβασιλεύσατε καὶ ὀφελὸν γε ἐβασιλεύσατε! ἵνα καὶ ἡμεῖς ὑμῶν συμβασιλεύσωμεν. <sup>9</sup> Ἡ Δοκῶ γὰρ ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς ἡμᾶς τοὺς ἀποστόλους ἐσχάτους ἀπέδειξεν, ὡς ἐπι-θανάτους· ὅτι θέατρον ἐγενήθημεν τῷ κόσμῳ, καὶ ἀγγέλοις καὶ ἀνθρώποις. <sup>10</sup> Ἡμεῖς μωροὶ διὰ Χριστὸν, ὑμεῖς δὲ φρόνιμοι ἐν Χριστῷ ἡμεῖς ἀσθενεῖς, ὑμεῖς δὲ ἰσχυροὶ ὑμεῖς ἔνδοξοι, χωρίς ἡμῶν ἐβασιλεύσατε, we have the top-step of the climax; and the metaphor is bold, not to say harsh. Examples, indeed, are adduced by Wets. from Horace and other writers of a similar use in Latin of the verb regno; but these are not to the purpose; any more than the example adduced by Dr. Peile from Hor. Sat. i.

3, 12, 'reges atque tetrarchas, omnia magna lo-quens,' since it is observable that the purpose of the Apostle here is to represent the persons in question, not as talking big, but as inordinately vain, fancying themselves to be very princes of wisdom. Accordingly, the force of the term here employed may be thus expressed: 'Ye reign paramount,' viz. to your fellow-Christians in other Churches. This use of the Aor. I for Present (denoting 'I have done and do a thing') is frequent in the best Class. writers. Finally, the words χωρίς ἡμῶν are thrown in by way of intimating the indignity of the thing, and the unconscientious injustice thereof. The sense is,
'without us,' i. e. independent of us (Apostles), without our aid or good will (so Eurip. Inc. 67, χωρίς Θεοῦ), even though Paul, as he reminds them, infra v. 15, was their father in Christ, having begotten them in the Gospel of Jesus.

—καὶ ὀφελὸν γε, &c.] In these words irony passes into indignant sarcasm. The sense here intended, however obscurely expressed, seems, as the best Expositors are agreed, to be this:—
'Would that ye were so abundant in all spiritual riches! for then I might partake of your prosperity, by the credit and honour which I should enjoy from having converted and taught you; since the fame of the disciple tends to the honour of the teacher.'

9. δοκῶ γὰρ ὅτι ὁ Θεός, &c.] In order to arrive at the exact sense of these words (rendered obscure by deep feeling) it is necessary to ascertain the connotation, and trace the scope of the passage. The intent of the Apostle would seem to be, to contrast his own situation with theirs, and thus put them to shame. The link of connexion seems to subsist in a clause omitted, to which the γὰρ has reference, q. d. '[And well may we Apostles form such a wish;] for how different is our situation as compared with yours!
thus while you abound in every good thing, and carry your heads high, we,' &c. This use of δοκῶ is (like our I trow) subservient to irony or sarcasm. Ἡμᾶς τοὺς ἀποστ. ἐσχάτους ἀ-πέδειξεν, 'hath set us Apostles in the lowest place;' lit. 'row.' Comp. Luke xiv. 8—10, a figure taken from ranging persons in a row, according to rank, intended to denote meanness of condition.

At ἐπιθαν. (sc. ἀπιδίδε) there is another figure, to express the general idea of men condemned to death, and who are in continual expectation of meeting their fate. In the words following, ὅτι θέατρον ἐγενήθημεν, it would seem that we have a new figure, engrafted on the foregoing one, and probably suggested by it,—since, from the circumstance that the execution of criminals was in most cases public, the term suggested the use of the metaphor in θέατρον, which stands for θέαμα, as used in Arrian, Epict. iii.

22 (to denote a gazing-stock), θέαμα εἶναι ἤξιον
τῶν παριόντων. Thus the sense of ὅτι θέατρον —ἀνθρώποις appears to be, '[And, in one point of resemblance we may truly be called ἐπιθεά-ριοι:] for we, like them, are become a gazing-stock to the whole universe, both angels and men.' Θέατρον ἴσχυρ. is for θεατριζόμενα, as in a kindred passage of Heb. x. 33. As to the difficulty started by some—how angels can be supposed present at such a spectacle, it may be answered, with Chrys. and Grot., that καὶ ἀγγέλ.
καὶ ἀνθρ. are put per μεταφῶν, being enumerated as the constituent parts of τῷ κόσμῳ preceding; and thus the world [of intelligent beings] is here distinguished into two parts, the superior and the inferior Family, forming, as it were, the visible and the invisible spectators.
Comp. 1 Tim. v. 21.

10. ἡμεῖς μωροὶ—ἀτιμοὶ] In this antithetical sentence (in which is resumed the comparison between himself and his fellow Apostles on the one hand, and the Corinthian teachers and people on the other) the Apostle repeats ironically the things which his enemies said of him; and in the same spirit of irony attributes to them the opposite qualities.

—μωροὶ διὰ Χριστὸν] for μ. διὰ τὸν λόγον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 'on account of the plain preaching of Christ and him crucified;' see supra i. 18, 23. ii. 2. In ἡμεῖς μωροὶ there is an ironical concession; q. d. 'those who are thought fools by the worldly-wise,' both heathens and some of the Corinthian Christians. Φρόν. ἐν Χρ. denotes, with the same qualification, 'so prudent and provident in the cause of Christ, as to run as little risk as possible.'—Ἀσθενεῖς καὶ ἰσχυροὶ admit of more than one interpretation; and what sense Paul intended is scarcely to be ascertained, but probably this: 'We are [thought] weak, as suffering passively; ye are strong and influential, able to repel injury, or conciliate forbearance from aggression.' It should seem that the Apostle meant here to advert to the three great means whereby any influence is gained with men, or effects produced in the world,—namely, wisdom, wealth (or power), and fame. Consequently, ἀσθενής, in both these passages, means 'the being destitute of external endowments and worldly advantages;' and ἰσχυρός, 'the being possessed of and buoyed up with them.' In the last clause (where the inverse order is adopted, in order to draw a closer connexion with the next verse), ἀτιμοὶ is equiv. to τὰ ἀγασθῆ καὶ τὰ ἐξουθενῆ-ἡμεῖς δὲ ἄτιμοι. <sup>11</sup> κ' Ἀκρι τῆς ἀρτι ὥρας καὶ πεινῶμεν καὶ <sup>12</sup> δυνώμεν, καὶ γυμνητεύομεν, καὶ κολαφιζόμεθα, καὶ ἀστατοῦμεν, <sup>13</sup> καὶ κοπιῶμεν ἐργαζόμενοι ταῖς ἰδίαις χερσὶ λουδορῶμενοι, εὐλογοῦμεν διωκόμενοι, ἀνεχόμεθα. <sup>14</sup> βλασφημούμενοι, παρακαλοῦμεν ὡς περικαθάρματα τοῦ κόσμου ἐγενήθημεν, πάντων περίφημα ἕως ἀρτι. <sup>15</sup> Οὐκ ἐντρέπων ὑμᾶς γράφω ταῦτα,

μία, supra i. 28; and ἔνδοξος means 'in high fame,' as party-leaders, or, at least, as influential party-men.

11. The position of ἄτιμοι, lost, in v. 10 (by the adverse order), suggests the dwelling on the distresses of body, and mortification of mind, which the Apostle had to encounter; and this is drawn forth into a pathetic enumeration (by way of example), brought to a kind of climax—'eo ordine (says Hyper.) ut in extremis incrementum sit, summæque significetur abjectio.' The expression with which the description is introduced, ἀκρι τῆς ἀρτι, serves to denote the incessancy of the evils in question: q. d. 'Nay, not to mention past afflictions, up to this present time we are scantily supplied with the common necessities of food, drink, and clothing.' To this penury of circumstances is then subjoined another class of evils, scarcely less trying, in mortifications. The term placed in the foreground, κολαφιζόμεθα, is to be taken, in a modified sense, of 'contumelious treatment;' as in 2 Cor. xii. 7. 1 Pet. ii. 20; and so in English 'to buffet,' or 'to cuff,' is used in our old authors, as Shakespeare; equivalent to 'to be pushed and shoved out of the way;' like περιωδιῆσθαι in Thucyd. iii. 57, 4, and Aristot. Pol. v. 6. The word is pronounced by Phryn. and Thom. Mag. as non-Attic. But is not the Greek of Pausanias (who uses the word) Attic enough to please any reasonable judges? To the above is subjoined the affecting particular, ἀστατοῦμεν, meaning 'the having no settled abode,' not having where to lay their heads' (see Matt. viii. 20. x. 23), but wandering from city to city, as the Poet says, 'incerti quo fata ferant, ubi sistere datur.' A state this, among the ancients considered so deplorable, as to be numbered among the execrations imprecating evil on the wicked. The next particular, καὶ κοπιῶμεν—χερσὶ, ought not to have been thrown to v. 12,—since the working by hand for maintenance by hard labour has nothing to do with forbearance, but rather belongs to the former particular, ἀστατοῦμεν, as an example of endurance,—since the hand-labour during the time Paul's ecclesiastical employment permitted its exercise, must have been severe, and kept up to a late hour, and consequently (as Chrys. notices) very wearying. However, the chief reason, I think (with Hyper., Est., and Grot.), why Paul mentions this, is to draw a contrast with the false teachers, who lived luxuriously from the labours of others. This view I find confirmed by Chrys., Theophyl., and Œcumen.

12. The foregoing are instances of endurance; those subjoined, vv. 12 and 13, are instances of forbearance. The foregoing, observes Theodor., put the Apostle's fortitude to the proof; the following called for τὴν τελευταίαν φιλοσοφίαν, meaning 'the philosophy of forbearance;' εἰς, of which see in Saic. Thea. in v.; q. d. 'we patiently submit to reproach, insult, and persecution; nay, we requite them with the very opposite;—εὐλογ., lit. 'we give good words in return.' See Rom. xii. 14, and note.

—ἀνεχόμεθα lit. 'we put up with it,' bear it patiently; as in 2 Cor. xi. 20. Joa. Antt. xvi. 9, 4. xvii. 2, 4, and Boll. iv. 8, 10 (which last-mentioned passage presents a strong resemblance to the present), ἀρπαζόμενοι ἀνίχιστα, καὶ τυπτόμενοι σιωπᾶται. In the next words, with παρακαλοῦμεν ('we use entreaty'), compare δέομεθα in Thucyd. vi. 80, 3. Such terms of deprecation have no little pathos. The next clause, ὡς περικαθάρματα—ἀρτι, forms the highest step of the climax; in which the Apostle sums up the details of injurious treatment in a few words, the sense of which, however, is disputed. Περικαθάσμα τοῦ κόσμου, is by many Commentators, ancient and modern, regarded as a sacrificial term, with allusion to the expiatory sacrifices of the Greeks and Romans, among whom, in times of public calamity, some poor wretch was selected from the dogs of the people, to be offered up as a lustration sacrifice. Such persons, however, were called καθάρματα, or περικαθάρματα, with reference to the purification, or expiation, effected by their sacrifice; which can have no place here, unless the term be taken, in a very qualified and highly figurative sense, of those who undergo the greatest evils from their fellow-creatures; see Heydenreich and Photius. And when we consider the expression which follows (evidently meant, by a parallelism, to be exegetical), πάντων περίφημα, there is little doubt that the sense of περικαθάρματα is 'the cleansings up,' as περίφημα is 'the sweepings up,' or 'around;' metaphorically denoting the vilest things, or persons,—the very outcasts of society. Of περίφημα in this sense, examples are frequent; of περικαθ. very rare. But what confirms this rendering is, that Paul must, it should seem, have had in view the words of Lam. iii. 45; for the Hebrew text there contains two words which, though now lost in the Sept., were probably once there,—namely, περικαθάρματα καὶ περίφημα, each of which Paul here introduces. Render: 'Thou hast made us as the offscouring (or 'sweepings-up') and refuse among the people,' 'the scum of society.' The word περίφημα may, however, not have been in the text of the Sept., but been used by St. Paul to further develop the idea, and it is quite permitted by the force of the Hebrew term.

14. The Apostle now softens the seeming harshness of the foregoing expressions, by assuming the Corinthian converts that he did not mention his sufferings as a reproach to them, but as a proof of his fatherly affection for them (v. 15) in bearing so much for their good, and in order to excite them to follow his example.

—οὐκ ἐντρέπων ὑμᾶς—συνδεδῶ Render:

k Acts 28. 2.
2 Cor. 4. 6.
11. 22.
1 Matt. 6. 4.
Luke 6. 35.
2. 22. 24.
Acts 7. 60.
18. 1.
20. 24.
Rom. 12. 14.
1 Thess. 2. 9.
2 Thess. 2. 8.
1 Tim. 4. 10.
m Lam. 3. 48. n 1 Thess. 2. 11.

o Acts 18. 11. ἄλλ' ὡς τέκνα μου ἀγαπητὰ νουθετῶ. 15 Ὁ γὰρ μυρίους Gal. 4. 19. παιδαγωγούς ἔχητε ἐν Χριστῷ, ἄλλ' οὐ πολλοὺς πατέρας ἐν Philom. 10. γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ διὰ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἐγὼ ὑμᾶς ἐγέννησα.
James 1. 18. 16 Ὁ Παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς μιμηταὶ μου γίνεσθε. 17 Ὁ Διὰ τοῦτο p ch. 11. 1. ἐπεμψα ὑμῖν Τιμόθεον, ὃς ἐστὶ τέκνον μου ἀγαπητὸν καὶ πιστὸν John 10. 4, 5. ἐν Κυρίῳ, ὃς ὑμᾶς ἀναμνησεί τὰς ὁδοὺς μου τὰς ἐν Χριστῷ, Phil. 3. 17. καθὼς πανταχοῦ ἐν πάσῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ διδάσκω. 18 Ὡς μὴ ἐρχο-
1 Thess. 1. 6. 2
2 Thess. 2. 9.
Heb. 12. 7.
1 Pet. 2. 8.
q 1 Tim. 1. 2.
1 Tim. 1. 2.
ver. 2.
ch. 7. 35.
Num. 12. 7.
Prov. 13. 17. Matt. 24. 45. & 25. 31, 25. Eph. 6. 21. Col. 1. 7. & 4. 9. 2 Tim. 2. 2. Rev. 2. 10, 12.

'I write not thus to you as shaming you,' or, for ἐντρέψαν, 'with a view to shame you,' 'put you to shame.'—ἄλλ' ὡς τέκ. μου ἀγ. νουθετῶ, 'but as beloved children I admonish you [as a father].'

15. In παιδαγωγούς and πατέρας the Apostle contrasts the severity and mercenary service of paid instructors with the gentleness and the disinterested paternal spirit evinced by himself.

—ἐν Χριστῷ] Construe this with ἐγέννησα. These words show the nature of the paternity just spoken of; namely, that of having converted them to Christianity.

16. μιμηταὶ μου] Not 'imitators of my modesty,' as many Commentators explain; for it seems to be simply the Apostle's intention to deduce from his spiritual paternity the inference, that they should be imitators of him, as far as he imitated Christ; just as parents and teachers are, to their children and pupils, the exemplar by which they are to model their character.

17. διὰ τοῦτο ἐπεμψα, &c.] 'for which reason,' i. e. 'in order that ye may the better be enabled to trace my exemplar in doctrine and duty.'—τέκνον, 'disciple,' or 'convert.'—ἐν Κυρίῳ, 'in the work of the Lord,' the spreading of his Gospel.

—ὃς ὑμᾶς ἀναμνησεί τὰς ὁδοὺς, &c.] The Apostle does not say 'shall teach you;' because to be taught by so young a man as Timothy would have offended their pride; and for the same reason he adds 'my ways,' q. d. 'he shall not speak his own, but mine' (Billr., from Æcumen. and Theophyl.). I would, however, observe, that the Apostle was the less likely to here speak of teaching, since taught the Corinthians had been already, and that by himself, all the essential truths of the Gospel; though, as Stenensen observes, 'they might have had their notions disturbed by false teachers, so as not to be well able to discern right from wrong conclusions, or more important from less important matters, so as to occasionally need that the simple and plain doctrine of the Apostle should be recalled to their minds.' Moreover, it is to be considered that things may be known indeed, though not sufficiently kept in view, being pushed out of mind by other and newer things, though far less important. How much this is the case at the present day,—and continually more and more,—no serious and reflecting Pastor need be told,—nor, it is hoped, informed,—by what means the evil is to be remedied. The Apostle employs here a delicacy of expression, which has a close parallel in the words of St. Peter, 2 Epist. i. 12, οὐκ ἐκλήσσω αἱ ὑμᾶς ὑπομνησκῶν περὶ τούτων, καίπερ εἰδότες, where the force of the καίπερ εἰδ. is well illustrated by the above remark. As respects the next words τὰς ὁδοὺς μου τὰς ἐν Χριστῷ, these have been variously explained; but their sense not satisfactorily determined. They might denote, as Grot., Est., and Pisc. explain, 'my mode of life and conversation worthy of the Gospel.' But the subsequent words ἐν Κυρίῳ, and καθὼς διδάσκω, which are exegetical of the foregoing, preclude that view. Nor is it sufficient to understand, with Theophyl. (after Chrysa.), as thereby denoted, τὰς ἐν τῷ κηρύγματι οἰκονομίας, τοὺς κανόνας, τὰ ἔθη, τοὺς νόμους τοὺς θεῖους. For, though that is the truth, it is not the whole truth. The Apostle had just earnestly exhorted them to be imitators of him [and not of the upstart new teachers]; and then he adds, that, in order to their becoming such, he has sent unto them Timothy to do what is subjoined. But, considering that in those respects they could not be imitators of the Apostle, however they might of his life and character,—accordingly I am inclined to think, that under the idea of teaching is to be included the doctrines taught. And need there was that the Corinthians should be imitators of their spiritual Father in holding fast 'the form of sound words,' as the faithful had been taught from the first; considering that false doctrines, nay, pernicious and soul-destroying heresies, were even then being disseminated by false teachers every where. That such had arisen at Corinth, is certain from ch. xi. 18 and 19, with a reference to which the Apostle commenced that chapter with the same words as here, μιμηταὶ μου γίνεσθε. I now find that long ago Crell. and Hyper., under the idea of 'mode of teaching,' included doctrines; and Est. observes that some here extend the force of δὲ to doctrine, from which view he expresses no dissent. Of later Commentators several adopt this view. Finally, the words πανταχοῦ ἐν πάσῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ seem meant to pre-occupy an objection on the part of some,—namely, that Paul accommodated not only his mode of teaching and regulating the Church, but the doctrines he taught, to the tastes and prejudices of his disciples, teaching one set of doctrines to the Gentiles, and another set to the Jews,—a groundless accusation, which Timothy could, on his own testimony, wholly refute.

18. ὡς μὴ—ὑποσιώθησάν τινες] Render: 'But certain persons, as though I were not coming to you, have become puffed up.' The persons alluded to were, doubtless, for the most part, the vain and arrogant teachers in question; though, also, as Chrysa. and Theophyl. suppose, the friends and connexions of the gross offender alluded to in the next Chapter (probably a person of wealth and consequence), as is almost certain from ch. v. 2, καὶ ὑμεῖς πεφυσιασμένοι

μένου δέ μου πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἐφυσιώθησάν τινες<sup>19</sup> ἔλεῦσομαι δέ<sup>r Rom. 15. 24.</sup>
 ταχέως πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἐὰν ὁ Κύριος θελήσῃ, καὶ γνώσομαι οὐ τὸν<sup>James 4. 15. Heb. 6. 3.</sup> λόγον τῶν πεφυσιωμένων, ἀλλὰ τὴν δύναμιν.<sup>20</sup> οὐ γὰρ ἐν<sup>1 sch. 2. 4. 2 Thes. 1. 5. 2 Cor. 1. 16. 2 Cor. 10. 2. & 12. 10.</sup> λόγῳ ἢ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀλλ' ἐν δυνάμει.<sup>21</sup> Τί θέλετε; ἐν<sup>a Lev. 15. 2. Deut. 27. 30.</sup> ῥάβδῳ ἔλθω πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἢ ἐν ἀγάπῃ πνεύματι τε † πρῶτος;

V. 1. <sup>a</sup> Ὡς ἀκούεται ἐν ὑμῖν πορνεία, καὶ τοιαύτη πορνεία, ἰστί; where the persons meant seem chiefly those; as also other persons of rank and influence, who thought they could not face a present, as they could an absent spiritual pastor and master. Accordingly I would, with Calv. and Est., understand the words in question to denote the inflation of self-confidence and arrogance founded on pride. The force of the δὲ after ἐρχομένων will appear from the following connexion of the words, as traced by Billr. [‘I have sent Timothy at present’]; but not because I do not myself intend to come, as some, &c. So Steneresen explains: ‘Do not interpret this sending of Timothy to imply that I dare not come to you, as some among you, puffed up with vain confidence, venture to maintain.’

19. In order to preclude the suspicion that by this Epistle, and the mission of Timothy, he only meant to try how they were disposed towards him before he ventured to come to them, the Apostle boldly adds, ‘But they are mistaken; for, by God’s permission, I will quickly come unto you.’

— γνῶσομαι οὐ τὸν λόγον, &c.] ‘I shall know,’ prove, or test, not the words of those puffed up, but the power which manifests itself in them; not the power of working miracles; but the ability of performance, as opposed to that of mere words, boasting, and promises, of what they can and will effect. We need not, however, exclude the power of the Holy Ghost as evinced in the spiritual gifts, which contributed so much to the δύναμις of the Apostles and first teachers of the Gospel: though I would now also include efficacy of doctrine, as shown in preaching ‘with the demonstration of the Spirit and of power’ (see supra, ii. 4). In accordance with this, it is, I find, the view of Est., who explains τὴν δύναμιν to mean ‘virtutem in effectus doctrinæ quam tradebant,’ q. d. ‘[I shall know by trial, or learn by proof] not how cleverly they speak, but what good, by the knowledge they boast, they have done among you.’

20. οὐ γὰρ ἐν λόγῳ, &c.] The exact sense here depends on that assigned to λόγον and to δύναμιν in the preceding verse; and I would still interpret δυνάμει here of the power of effecting something in opposition to mere words; a view, I find, adopted by Est., who remarks that ‘virtutem intelligi in effectus sermonis:’ ‘for by this (adds he) the kingdom of God is promoted, if the address of the preacher be efficacious on the minds of the hearers, so that they do works of righteousness, peace, and other things which pertain to the kingdom of God;’ alluding to the similar passage at Rom. xiv. 17. By ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ understand ‘the promulgation of the Gospel;’ and supply ἰστί, in the sense κατεργάζεται.

21. τί for πότερον, ‘Whether [of the two things] do you choose?’ ‘Ἐλθε, must I come?’ — ἐν ῥάβδῳ] It is truly remarked by Billr., that the ἐν is not for σύν; but by ἐν ῥάβ. is denoted ‘by the use of the rod.’ In fact, the Prep. ἐν here answers to the Heb. 2. 25 or by, here meaning ‘in the way’ or ‘exercise of,’ as is plain from the following ἢ ἐν ἀγάπῃ, &c. The phrase ἐν ῥάβδῳ occurs several times in the Sept., and is equiv. to ἐν κολάσει, or ἐν παιδευτικῇ ἐνεργείᾳ; alluding to the chastigation by severe reproof, or, if need were, by spiritual censures, or, when the extremity of the case demanded it, by inflicting miraculous judgments on the refractory. In ἐν ἀγάπῃ πνεύματι τε πρῶτος there is a Hendiadys, or the latter term may have been added by way of explication. Not but that the other course might be (as Chrys. observes) ἐν ἀγάπῃ, i. e. well-meant correction; but this would be also ἐν πνεύματι πρῶτος. For πρῶτος, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit. παρθῆτος, from A, B (C uncertain), and one cursive MSS., and some Greek Fathers. The same change has been made by Tisch. and Lachm. at 2 Cor. x. 1. Gal. v. 23. Eph. iv. 2. Coloss. iii. 12. 2 Tim. ii. 25. iii. 2, from nearly the same MSS. But Lachm. retains παρθῆ. at Gal. vi. 1, and Col. iii. 12;—a manifest inconsistency. Better would it have been to have edited παρθῆ. in those two passages, for which he would have had as good authority there as that which he has, on other occasions, deemed sufficient to warrant the introduction of a reading. It is, I think, little to be doubted but that the Apostle employed on all occasions the same form; and that form, I believe, to have been παρθῆ., not because a few uncial MSS. every where present it, but because it is used by St. Peter and St. James, and is the form almost invariably found in the Sept., and the Greek Fathers; whereas παρθῆ. is invariably the form used by the Class. writers, both the Attic and the common Greek. Thus παρθῆ. would seem to have been peculiarly an Alexandrian, or provincial Greek form, and accordingly was likely to be used by St. Paul. However, I do not think fit to bring it into the text, except on further authority, which I cannot furnish.

V. Here commences the second Section of the Epistle, in which the Apostle proceeds to lay to the charge of the Corinthians something of a more serious nature than even schism, or sectarism, spiritual pride, &c.—even immorality of the grossest kind, connived at by them; rebuking them for not having visited with ecclesiastical censure a scandalous incest committed by a member of the congregation of Corinth. He enjoins the immediate excommunication of the offender; and, for further warning, subjoins a serious admonition to avoid all familiar converse with persons who, by immorality, disgrace their Christian profession.

1. Ὡς ἀκούεται ἐν ὑμῖν, &c.] The force of the assertion here mainly depends upon the sense

ἥτις οὐδὲ ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν [ὀνομάζεται], ὥστε γυναικὰ τινα τοῦ πατρὸς ἔχειν. <sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Καὶ ὑμεῖς πεφυσισμένοι ἐστέ; καὶ οὐχὶ μάλ-

<sup>b</sup> ch. 4. 8.
<sup>2</sup> Cor. 12. 21.

to be assigned to ἄλλως, which is employed in an unusual manner, and hence has been variously interpreted, according to the construction adopted; some construing it with πορνεία, others with ἐν ὑμῖν; whereby various senses have been assigned, specious, indeed, but too factitious, and, from the harshness of the construction, inadmissible. The natural construction of the word is with ἀκούεται, and it may have the sense, assigned by some, of καθ' ἑαυτὴν, 'ab omni parte,' generally. Yet for that signification the authority is very slender, and, as regards the position of the word at the beginning of the sentence, none at all. Nay, from that position, it would rather seem to have been the Apostle's intent to use the word, like the Latin omnino, at the beginning of a sentence, in the sense, 'certainly,' 'really,' by which it has the force of confirming the assertion following. This position is, indeed, in the Class. writers so rare, that I am not aware of a single example. The word, however, is so employed a little after the beginning of a sentence, as in Plutarch, Vit. vii. p. 636, Reiske, καὶ ὁ λόγος ἄλλως ἡγίχθαι δοκεῖ τῷ Ἡριόδω. In construction, however, it seems to belong to both ἀκούεται and πορνεία.—The term πορνεία (a general one to denote 'illicit intercourse of all kinds') is here employed to denote incest; and, unless the woman in question had been separated from the father by legal divorce, adultery. Whether the parties were living in marriage, or in concubinage, cannot be determined. The latter is the more generally supposed; yet probability rather lies the other way.—ἔχειν, in the sense 'to be united in conjugal union,' is frequent both in the Classical and Scriptural writers; while in the other sense it no where occurs in the Scriptural ones. Yet from 2 Cor. vii. 12, it would seem that the father was then alive. But that circumstance presents no real difficulty in the case, since, when a woman had abandoned her husband, the marriage-tie was supposed to be ipso facto broken; and then the law did not prevent the marriage of the woman to her seducer, or to any other man; though this was forbidden by the Jewish law. This is plain from Jos. Antt. iv. 8, 23, μὴ ζυγυνύσθω συνοικοῦσαν ἄλλω, νοθεύσας αὐτήν, μηδὲ λυτῶν (read λυτῆρα) τὸν πρότερον αὐτῆς ἄνδρα, 'let him not marry a woman living in matrimony with another man, after corrupting her; nor aggrrieve her former husband (whom she has abandoned)'; for that circumstance is implied, and in Epiphanius' version expressed. The blunder arose from an ancient scribe mistaking the abbreviation λυτῶ for λυτῶν. That the marriage-tie was supposed to be broken by the abandonment of, or separation from, a husband by the wife, is certain from 1 Cor. vii. 11. That she was then held unmarried is clear from the very injunction that she shall not marry another.

—οὐδὲ ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ὀνομάζεται] The true meaning here would seem to be, not 'is not named,' but 'is not heard, or spoken of, as occurring among,' &c. in which sense the word is used at Eph. v. 3, πορνεία—μηδὲ ὀνομαζέσθω ἐν ὑμῖν, 'reported as being practised among you.' That such instances were not wholly unknown, is plain from what is said in Horne's Introd., vol. ii. p. 394 sq. vol. iii. p. 149 sq. 307 sq.; and accordingly the assertion must be regarded as to be taken with some qualification. Or we may, with several Expositors, explain the word to mean, 'is named with approbation:' a sense which will be quite agreeable to fact; since, as Mr. Locke observes, the marriage of a son-in-law and a mother-in-law, though not prohibited by the laws of the Roman empire, was, however, looked upon as so scandalous and infamous, that it never had any countenance from precedent; as is plain from the words of Cicero in his Oration pro Cluentio, § 4, 'Nubit genero soccrum, nullis auspiciis, nullis auctoribus. O scelus incredibile, et præter hanc unam, in omni vitâ inaudibilem!' Though this passage would seem to support the former mode quite as much as the latter; and, if the ὀνομάζεται be removed, with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Alf. from A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and several cursives, it must be adopted. But I find no countenance given to its removal in any of the Lamb., Mus., or Trin. Coll. MSS.; and I suspect that it was expunged to remove the difficulty connected with its presence. Besides, the Pesch. Syr. Vers. confirms the reading of all the MSS. except the above-mentioned.

2 καὶ ὑμεῖς πεφυσισμένοι, &c.] It is not agreed whether this sentence should be taken interrogatively, or declaratively. Several modern Editors and Expositors prefer the latter mode; but I suspect that they were biased by the  Vulgate,—which had a great influence both on punctuation and interpretation. There is, indeed, some difficulty in the former mode. Yet it seems to have more spirit, and to be more agreeable to the air of the context, and is supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version, and the Greek Fathers, and Commentators; and the more difficult construction is, in a writer like St. Paul, more likely to be the true one. Though, indeed, there is no great harshness; for the sense may be thus expressed, 'And yet [while such enormities are committed in your society,] are ye puffed up with spiritual pride? [as if all things were right among you;] and did ye not [as ye ought] rather mourn [over this fall and your disgrace], and take measures that he who hath done this deed should be removed from among your society?' Estius points out how much stronger the rebuke is with the mark of interrogation. He further remarks, that the rebuke in question is intended, not for all the Corinthian congregation,—but partly for the conceited and arrogant teachers alluded to supra, iv. 19, and partly for their factious disciples, of whom mention is made at ch. iv. 6. However, it may refer to the persons alluded to ver. 18, namely, the friends and connexions of the incestuous person, who, puffed up with confident arrogance, set Paul's ecclesiastical authority at naught. On the term itself, πεφυσ., see note supra, iv. 18.—Ἐπειθ', alludes to that formal mourning, over any scandal brought on the whole body,—which accompanied the excommunication of the offender; who was bewailed as one dead, by a custom borrowed from the synagogue, and long retained in the Church. Hence, under the idea of mourning is conched

λον ἐπενθήσατε, ἵνα [ἐξ]αρθῇ ἐκ μέσου ὑμῶν ὁ τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο ποιήσας; 3<sup>c</sup> Ἐγὼ μὲν γάρ, ὡς ἀπὸν τῷ σώματι, παρὼν δὲ ὁ Col. 2. 2. τῷ πνεύματι, ἤδη κέκρικα ὡς παρὼν, τὸν οὕτω τοῦτο κατεργασάμενον, 4<sup>d</sup> ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, (συναχθέντων ὑμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἐμοῦ πνεύματος,) σὺν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, 5<sup>e</sup> παραδοῦναι τὸν τοιοῦτον

<sup>d</sup> Matt. 18. 19.

<sup>e</sup> 18. 18. John 20. 22.

<sup>f</sup> 1 Tim. 1. 20. ch. 2. 9, 7.

that of excommunication, which is particularly enjoined in the next clause.

— Ἰνα ἐξαρθῇ ἐκ μέσου ὑμῶν] A mild expression, instead of the harsher one, ἰκκοῦν, and meant to suggest the possibility of his restoration to the Christian body, after thorough repentance and reformation. See 2 Cor. ii. 7. As to the reading ἀρθῇ for ἐξαρθῇ, adopted also by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., I am more inclined than before to receive it. As to internal evidence, it is equally balanced.

— τὸ ἔργ. τ. ποιήσας;] For ποιήσας, MSS. A, C, and 7 ancient cursives have πράξας, which is adopted by Tisch.; while Lachm. and Alf. retain the text rec.; rightly; since the other reading is a correction of style by the Alexandrian Critics, not aware of the Hellenistic use of ποιῶν in such a case for πράξας, as in several passages of the Sept., e. g. 2 Sam. xii. 5 (which may have been in Paul's mind), ὁ ἀνὴρ ὁ ποιήσας τοῦτο. How Meyer and Alford can bring themselves to think that this phrase, and τοῦτο κατεργ. at v. 3, refer to the consummation of marriage between the two guilty parties, I am at a loss to imagine. 'Secum habeo sorrentesque!'

3—5. The construction here is supposed to be, ἐγὼ μὲν γάρ, ὡς ἀπὸν τῷ σώματι, παρὼν δὲ τῷ πνεύματι, ἤδη κέκρικα ὡς παρὼν, τὸν οὕτω τοῦτο κατεργ. παραδοῦναι τῷ Σατανᾷ, the remaining words being regarded as sentences inserted. But it is impossible to bring such anomalous composition to any regular construction. It may more accurately be said, that the intermediate words consist of classulae serving to mark the circumstances of the action, and θροῦνα together confusedly, whereas they ought to have been distributed. The words ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χρ. are to be taken with κέκρικα; the words συναχθέντων ὑμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἐμοῦ πνεύματος, as denoting the time of the thing in question, with παραδοῦναι; and, lastly, the words σὺν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. with παραδοῦναι. It is true, that some eminent Expositors refer ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι to παραδοῦναι. But this is not a little harsh, and is liable to the objection of confounding the decision, or decree, with its execution at the time of the convocation. The reference σὺν τῇ δυνάμει is not so clear; and the reference to παραδοῦναι is thought liable to the objection, that thus ἐν, not σὺν, would be required, and the sentiment be almost a repetition of that at ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι. But the former objection is of inconsiderable weight; and the latter groundless, for the sentiment is, in effect, not the same, but rather, 'acting by virtue of his power.' If the words be referred, as they are by Chrys., Theophyl., Thom. Aquin., Erasmus., Est., Rosenm., and others, to the preceding συναχθέντων, the sense will be, that 'not only Paul will be present spiritually with them, but that also Christ will be present with his power,' whereby the thing may be perfected. Thus it is meant that, as Paul will be present by his spirit (a form of expression found 2 Kings v. 26, and Col. ii. 5, ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ ἀπαιμι, τῷ πνεύματι σὺν ὑμῖν εἶμι), so will Christ by his power. It is immaterial whether the words be connected with what precedes, or what follows; the general sense being, that, as Paul promulgates this decree, as to what shall be done, by virtue of the power of Christ vested in him, so it shall be carried into execution by the joint agency of himself and the assembled congregation, with the co-operation of the Lord, virtually present by his power to carry it into effect.

5. παραδοῦναι τ. τ. τῷ Σ.] On attentive reconsideration of the somewhat perplexing question as to the exact force of these words, I must still adhere to my opinion before expressed, that, —for the weighty reasons urged by Lighf., Mackn., and others, —wholly inadmissible is the view of their import adopted by several ancient Commentators (Theodor., Œcumen., Balsamon, Zonar., Augustin., and Pseudo-Ambrose), and, of modern Commentators, Calv., Hyper., Beza, Est., Musc., Scalig., Sc Slater, Wesley, and Scott, —namely, that all that is here meant is excommunication; in other words, banishment from the Church and kingdom of God; by which the offender would be put into the power of Satan to do his behests. And why? 'Because (says Dr. Field, On the Church, l. i. 15) they are "left naked," and void of all means to make resistance unto his will and pleasure: and, as if this were not enough, they are denied that solace which they might find in the company and conversation of the people of God.' To refer, as they do, the expression διεθρ. τῆς σαρκὸς to 'the destruction of the offender's lusts and passions,' is harsh in the extreme; espec. considering that the words have respect to the purpose of the παραδοῦναι τῷ Σατ. And as in the only other passage where it occurs—namely, 1 Tim. i. 20—such is said to be done for castigation and ultimate reformation, so must it be here. Nor can the view of other Commentators, who suppose the passage to have no reference to excommunication be maintained,—since to excommunication there is allusion at ver. 2. Upon the whole, I am now inclined to think that the difficulty may best be reconciled by combining what is sound in both the above views (the one first stated, and that last noticed), and engrafting one on the other,—either the latter on the former, as is done by Stenerson; or the former on the latter, according to the opinion of Storr and Heydenr.,—in which I am inclined to acquiesce; for there is no difficulty in supposing that the παραδοῦναι τῷ Σατανᾷ implied, at least, a temporary excommunication, only to be removed by sincere repentance, such as the castigation in the flesh would be calculated to produce (see Heb. xii.

τῷ Σατανᾷ εἰς ὄλεθρον τῆς σαρκός, ἵνα τὸ πνεῦμα σωθῇ ἐν τῇ
 1 Gal. 5. 9. ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. <sup>6</sup> Οὐ καλὸν τὸ καύχημα ὑμῶν. Οὐκ
 John 15. 7. οἴδατε ὅτι μικρὰ ζύμη δλον τὸ φύραμα ζυμοῖ; <sup>7</sup> Ἐκκαθάρατε
 ch. 15. 3. οὖν τὴν παλαιὰν ζύμην, ἵνα ᾖτε νέον φύραμα, καθὼς ἐστέ ἀζύμοι
 1 Pet. 1. 19.

11), and which chastisement must be meant by the term ὄλεθρον; though so strong a term must certainly imply no less than griveous and painful disease (short, however, of death),—a use of the term seemingly derived from the inexact language of common life, by which, in all languages, terms are used (such as exulium, pestis, &c. in Latin, and plague, ruin, &c. in English), in a sense milder than the literal import would warrant. Of this use of ὄλεθρον I have met with not a few examples in the Greek Comic Drama; nay, even in grave prose writers, such as Plato, p. 434, where he says, τὴν πολυπραγμοσύνην ὄλεθρον ἵναί τῃ πόλει (the state). That if inflicted, it did fall short thereof, we know from the second Epistle, ch. ii. 6. Whether it was, or was not inflicted, it is difficult to say. That it was, is not improbable, for the reasons I have urged in my Recens. Synop. But further than probability we are not able to advance. No direct proof is to be derived from the present passage; since in the expression εἰς ὄλεθρον there is only intimated the tendency and purpose of the being delivered to Satan for castigation, and which would, if God so pleased, follow it.

The words ἵνα τὸ πνεῦμα—Ἰησοῦ may be thus paraphrased: 'that his soul, corrected, humbled, and reformed by these sufferings, may be saved at the day when Christ shall come to judge the world.'

6. The Apostle here reverts to reproof, rebuking the Corinthians for their supineness in tolerating so scandalous a character among them, and not promptly ridding themselves of him by excommunication. He then subjoins the reasons for this injunction, especially with reference to the pernicious effect of such an example in the Church. Such seems to be the real scope of the words; for I would, with Menoch., Bp. Hall, Rosenm., Krause, Pott, and Heydenr., regard οὐ καλὸν τὸ καύχημα ὑμῶν as containing a general reproof, founded on παφισισμῶν at v. 2; the Corinthians having, it seems, in a letter to Paul, boasted of the excellent state of things in the Church, and, perhaps, hinted at their superiority to other Churches. Thus the sense is: 'Your boasting is not well founded, or commendable [while such foul sins are committed among you, and connived at by you].'

—οὐκ οἶδατε] This must neither be regarded as merely a form of transition, nor, on the other hand, ought its sense to be too much pressed on. It merely refers to what is subjoined as what is, or ought to be, well known. So iii. 16, and elsewhere. In μικρὰ ζύμη, &c. we have a proverbial saying, occurring also at Gal. v. 9. Its general force is to denote that, from very small beginnings great things arise; so Eccles. xi. 32, ἀπὸ σπιθίης πυρὸς πληθύνεται ἀνθρακίς, and Pind. Pyth. iii. 66, πολλὰν τ' ὄρει πῦρ ἐξ ἱνὸς Σπέρματος ἰνδορὸν ἀίστασιν ἔλατ. Here, however, the application is somewhat different; and as the process of fermentation implies a kind of corruption, so, with reference thereto, ζύμη was applied figuratively to whatever has the power of morally corrupting. So the Rabbinical writers speak of evil concupiscence as corrupting the whole man, just as a little leaven leavens a large mass of dough. With a view to this idea, the Priest of Jupiter among the Romans was forbidden to touch any leaven. Here there is an especial reference to the moral contagion of evil example; and the μικρὰ is emphatical, overruling the plea, that there is but one such person in the congregation: the admonition intimated being, that 'even one such pestilential member may corrupt the whole society.' So Juvenal, Sat. ii. 79, 'Sicut grex totus in agris Unius scabie cadit et porrigine porci.'

7. The Apostle takes occasion, from the above similitude, to exhort the Corinthians (under a new allegory, derived from the Jewish custom of putting away leaven at the Passover, then probably at hand,) to forsake vice and vicious persons, and, in order to prevent the spread of moral contagion, to exclude them from their society; since vice can never be banished from the Church, unless those who will not abstain from it are banished likewise.

—ἐκκαθάρατε τὴν παλ. ζύμην meaning, (by a certain figure taken from the custom of putting away leaven at the Passover) 'cleanse out all the old leaven of sin and wickedness in you, that you may be a new-made mass of dough' [before the leaven is put in], in other words, a pure society. So Ignatius writes in his Epist. to the Magnesians, ch. x.: 'Lay aside therefore the old, and sour, and evil leaven, and be ye changed into the new leaven, which is Jesus Christ.' The figure is, however, not unknown to the Class. writers, as Dinarch. c. Aristog., p. 67, ἐκκαθ. τὴν δωροδοκίαν.

—καθὼς ἐστέ ἀζύμοι] 'Inasmuch as you are [by your Christian profession] without the leaven of wickedness in your composition.' Of the words following, καὶ γὰρ τὸ πάσχα—Χριστός, the purpose is, as observes Hyper., by fully explaining the allegory, to thus pre-occupy a possible objection, namely, that 'what was commanded to the Jews respecting the putting away of the leaven at the time of the Passover, had nothing to do with them as Christians;' q. d. 'Not so; for we Christians, too, have a Passover of our own in the sacrifice of Christ.' Render: 'For our paschal Lamb has been sacrificed for us, even Christ [our sacrifice for the expiation of sin]; which sacrifice obliges us to far greater purity of life than the Jews were bound to practise.' The Apostle (as observes Mr. Green on the Parable of the Leaven) 'means to urge, that, as the Passover went to be sacrificed was Christ, so the old leaven, the leaven required to be put away in order to a due participation in the feast, was the leaven of malice and wickedness; the new leaven, which was to supersede the old, or, as he terms it, the unleavened bread with which the feast was to be kept by Christians was the leaven of sincerity and truth.'

καὶ γὰρ τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἐτίθη, Χριστός. <sup>8</sup> Ὡστε <sup>h Exod. 12.</sup> ἐορτάζωμεν μὴ ἐν ζύμῃ παλαιᾷ, μηδὲ ἐν ζύμῃ κακίας καὶ πονηρίας, <sup>12</sup> ἀλλ' ἐν ἀζύμοις εὐδικρινείας καὶ ἀληθείας. <sup>Deut. 16. 3.</sup>

<sup>1 v. 2, 7.</sup> <sup>2 Cor. 6. 14.</sup> <sup>Eph. 5. 11.</sup> 9 Ἐγραψα ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, μὴ συναναμίγνυσθαι πόρ-

8. Ὡστε ἐορτάζωμεν] 'Accordingly, let us keep [our] feast'—the Christian Passover Feast, —namely, that of a holy life and conversation. Comp. Isa. xx. 9. Exod. v. 1. xii. 14, ἐορτάζουσιν τῷ Κυρίῳ. The words μηδὲ ἐν ζύμῃ, &c., stand for δηλονότι μὴ κατέχοντες ζύμην, τουτίστι τὴν κακίαν καὶ πονηρίαν, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἀζυμα, τουτίστι τὴν εὐλικ. καὶ ἀλήθειαν. Of the several terms here denoting the vices to be shunned, and the virtues to be exercised, κακία denotes vice simply, immorality. With respect to πονηρία, the term means properly worthlessness; though sometimes, as in Menand. Frag. Incert. xii. 8, 'utter depravity of heart and life.' And so it is used in Luke xi. 38, and Rom. i. 29. Here, however, it has a less strong and more general sense, to denote 'profligacy of life'; as in Acts iii. 26, ἀποστρέφειν ἡκαστον ἀπὸ τῶν πονηριῶν ὧν, and it is here used with reference to the particular case of the wicked person, the offender, to whom allusion is made ver. 2.—εὐδικρινής prop. signifies 'unmixed,' pure from adulteration; and, metaph., non fucatus, genuine (see on 2 Pet. iii. 1). Comp. Boeckh's Greek Inscriptions, vol. ii. p. 258, 48, where we have εὐδικρινὴς γνησίαν (i. e. 'purely genuine') ἔχουσιν πρὸς πάντας φιλοστοργίαν. Here, as opposed to κακία καὶ πονηρία, εὐδικρινεία must denote 'genuine purity of heart, and spotlessness of life.' With respect to the term conjoined with εὐλικ., namely, ἀληθείας, it may denote, as Billr. explains, 'the obvious morality of truth,' 'the life of him that doeth the truth' (John iii. 21), who hath put on the new man, ὁ κτισθείς ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ δεινότητι τῆς ἀληθείας. But I would rather regard the term as subjoined by way of further developing the idea conveyed in the somewhat obscure term preceding, εὐλικ. (as in the Greek Inscr. above cited: εὐδικρινὴς γνησίαν, for γνησίως εὐδικρινῇ); and, moreover, drawing forth the implied notion of what is 'free from deceit and hypocrisy'; a view confirmed by Phil. i. 10, ἵνα ᾗτε εὐδικρινεῖτε καὶ ἀπρόσκοποι, where the latter term has reference to practice in moral conduct; the former, to purity of heart and motive, unmixed with the leaven of hypocrisy.

9. Ἐγραψα ὑμῖν ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, μὴ, &c.] On these words ἐν τῇ ἐπιστ. a considerable difference of opinion exists; some of the most eminent Commentators supposing the expression to have reference to an Epistle which St. Paul had already written to the Corinthians, but which is now no longer extant. Others, of no less note, maintain that by ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ we are to understand the Epistle he is then writing. Bp. Middleton, indeed, admits that the question can never be so decided as to preclude all future doubt; since the reference in the Article may be either to the Epistle St. Paul was writing, or to a former one; and the meaning of ἔγραψα is not less ambiguous. He justly observes that one thing alone is certain; that our common version, 'in an Epistle,' is not correct. 'Ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, then,' he argues, 'must be rendered,

"in the letter," or "in my letter;" but the question is, What letter? the present, or a former one? That it may,' continues he, 'denote the letter St. Paul is writing, is beyond dispute; as appears from Rom. xvi. 22. Col. iv. 16. 1 Thes. v. 27. 2 Thes. iii. 14, and two passages of Libanius cited by Lardner. At 2 Cor. vii. 8, indeed, ἡ ἐπιστολή can only mean the former Epistle; but there the reference to it is evident, because the Apostle had just been speaking of its effects; which is not the case here. There seems, then, no internal evidence for a lost Epistle, unless ἔγραψα and the general import of the passage compel us to suppose one. But the first Aorist, it is well known, has often a Present signification, and even a Future one, and is not necessarily to be understood in a Past sense. [Thus it may be rendered, 'I have just written to you.'] At ver. 11 ἔγραψα again occurs, where we have, ὑμῖν δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν, μὴ συναναμίγνυσθαι, ἰδὲν τις, ἀδελφός ὀνομαζόμενος,' &c.

Supposing, however, the present Epistle to be the one here spoken of, the reference must surely be, not (as some make it) to what follows in this Epistle, but rather to the direction which has been given to expel the fornicator; which certainly might, from the Apostle, be regarded as equivalent to a general command not to associate with fornicators, especially as the admonition to 'purge out the old leaven,' i. e. fornicators and such like, would favour the same opinion. Lest, however, they should so far mistake the command, as to withdraw themselves entirely from the world, the Apostle explains himself, and informs them, ver. 10, that this injunction does not extend to fornicators among the heathens, for with such, in the ordinary intercourse of life, they must associate, but that it applies only to their Christian brethren. Mr. Green (Gram. N. T. Dial. p. 225) confirms the Bishop's opinion, that, as far as the words themselves are concerned, there is no need of reference to a former Epistle. The question therefore must, he adds, be settled by other considerations irrespective of the Article, principally by the contents of the present Epistle. 'An unwillingness (continues he) is naturally felt to admit the loss of an Epistle proceeding from an Apostle; but it may be here observed, that, if St. Paul had written a former reply to questions addressed to him by the Corinthians, it may be supposed to have been brief; and, its contents being embraced and amplified in the present more lengthened answer, it would be superseded by it, and sink into oblivion without any real loss to the Christian Church.' The same view is taken by Dr. Henderson, who asks, 'What real difficulty is there in this, or any other supposable case, more than in the universally admitted fact, that a portion only of the gracious and Divine words which proceeded out of the mouth of the Saviour himself has been preserved to us?' They both evidently adopt the opinion, that there is a reference to a previous Epistle to the Corinthians. That view was also adopted by Ratius, who ably νοις. <sup>10</sup> (καὶ οὐ πάντως τοῖς πόρνοις τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, ἢ τοῖς

πλεονέκταις, † ἢ ἀρπαξίν, ἢ εἰδωλολάτραις· ἐπεὶ ὀφείλετε ἄρα ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἐξελεῖν.) <sup>11</sup> καὶ νυνὶ δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν, μὴ συναναk 2 Thes. 2.

14

maintains it; nay, goes so far as to affirm that 'there is no doubt but that other Epistles, as well as this written by the Apostle, have been lost (an opinion before hazarded by Calvin). But he does not offer any proof, not even in the traditions of the early Fathers. As to the argument urged by Est., that 'there must have been an Epistle to the Corinthians before the present,' from what occurs in 2 Cor. x. 10, ὅτι αὐτὸν ἐπιστολαί, φησι, βαρύνται καὶ ισχυραί, we are not obliged to refer the words in question to Epistles addressed to the Corinthians; for, when St. Paul wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians, he had already written three Epistles—namely, the one to the Galatians, and the two to the Thessalonians. And it is not to be doubted that in such a great emporium of commerce as Corinth (see Thucyd. l. i. 120, 3), holding communication with all the civilized world, those Epistles, written upwards of four years before, must have been well known to the Corinthian Christians. Moreover, what goes further to decide the thing is, that from Col. iv. 16 it appears that St. Paul's Epistles were sent from one Church to another, to be publicly read. It cannot be denied that the three Epistles in question contain matter which answers to the above character, as being in matter always weighty, occasionally authoritative (so 2 Thes. iii. 6, παράγγελλομεν ὑμῖν, 'we enjoin you'), and now and then severe and objurgatory, as, for instance, Gal. iii. 1, ὦ ἀνόητοι Γαλάται! τίς ὑμᾶς ἐβάπτισκεν; and iv. 9, πῶς ἐπιστρέφετε—δουλεύειν θέλετε; and iv. 20, ἀπορούμαι ἐν ὑμῖν; and v. 7, ἐπρίχεται (ye did run) καλῶς τίς ὑμᾶς ἐνέκοψε, &c., μικρὰ ζύμη θλον τὸ φάρμα ζυμοί, where we have the same metaphor as in the present passage. As to the ἔγραψα dicta Christi, adverted to by Dr. Henderson in support of his view (and on which I have treated in my note at Acta xx. 35), these have no bearing on the present case. Were it not for the united judgment of Bp. Middl. and Mr. Green that τῇ ἐπιστολῇ might have reference to a former Epistle, I should say that it would require the previous mention of such an Epistle, or the addition of προτέρω to ἐπιστολῇ. But I bow to such high authority. I must also admit that Mr. Green's mode of accounting for the Epistle's not being preserved, makes me look with a more favourable eye on the hypothesis. Nevertheless, though admitting that the matter is an open question, not likely to be brought to any absolute decision, I cannot but still suppose the words to have reference to the Epistle the Apostle was then writing; and I lay hold on the clue held out by Theodor. in his suggestion, that 'we may conceive the Apostle, after what precedes at vv. 2, 5, 6, to have been thinking less of the actual inditing, than of the practical PURPOSE of his instruction.' Building on which remark, Dr. Peile, I find, well observes, that 'if we put ourselves in the position of one who generally wrote, and certainly on the present occasion (see xvi. 21), by an amanuensis, we shall better understand how Paul here, and Tertius, Rom. xvi.

22, came to speak of the letter, on which the mind of the one, and the pen of the other, was at the moment engaged, as 'the Epistle.' Accordingly, we might freely render, 'in what I have just been addressing to you.'

10. καὶ οὐ πάντως] Render: 'and yet not absolutely or precisely.' By τοῦ κόσμου τούτου understand 'the world that lieth in sin,' 'aliens from the covenant of grace' (Eph. ii. 12), equiv. to heathens. And what is said of disolute persons is also applied to other notoriously worldly persons (as avaricious and rapacious ones, see Luke xviii. 15), or to open heathens. Comp. Luke xii. 30, τὰ ἔσθῃ τοῦ κόσμου. That the above is the true sense of καὶ (for καίτοι) is plain from the context. But Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the word, on the authority of A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and 3 cursives. But, specious as is the reading, I pause at the almost total want of confirmation in cursives (for I can supply none); and internal evidence is not altogether against the word; for it may have been passed over by Translators, and removed by Critics, from not perceiving its true force. The ἢ before ἀρπαξίν is by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. altered to καὶ, on the authority of 7 uncials, and 7 cursive MSS., confirmed by internal evidence. It should seem that the two words ἀρπ. and πλεον. were meant to present one idea. Of the words following, ἐπεὶ ὀφείλετε—ἐξελεῖν, the sense is: 'Since in that case it would follow, ye must go out of the world,' a somewhat hyperbolic and perhaps adagial mode of speaking, to denote the abandonment of the society of men. This use of ἐπεὶ ἀρα recurs infra, ch. vii. 14, and Job xxxv. 17, and is not unfrequent in the Class. writers, espec. Plato and Xenoph.—nay, occasionally in the poets, e. g. Soph. Œd. T. 390. The force which I have ascribed, is, however, not contained in the particle itself, but in the hypothetic nature of the proposition to which it is attached.

11. νυνὶ δὲ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν] I agree with Dr. Peile, that this is to be understood as being opposed to ἀρα, then [or rather, as a conclusion, 'in that case'], being meant to distinguish what the Apostle did, from what he did not mean to convey by what he had just written. Accordingly, νυνὶ here has the sense 'in this (i. e. the present) case.' Of which use of νυνὶ δὲ examples are found in Thucyd. i. 140, 122. iii. 43. iv. 126, and Alexis, Πυρ. συναστρόφ. frag. i. 5, also in Heb. xi. 16. Thus the sense will be, 'But now what I really mean by writing thus, is,' &c. So that the words will be added in explanation of, not in opposition to, the ἔγραψα at ver. 9.—'Ἀδελφοί ὀνομαζόμενοι' is a more significant expression than ἀδελφοί ἀν. intimating that he is such only by profession, and in name, not in reality, there being no spiritual affinity. I have adopted β for ἢ (with all the Critical Editors) from several MSS. (to which I add Cor. 2, 3, 4, omitted by Mill), espec. since propriety requires it; and the evidence of MSS., were they far better collated than they are, is, in matters of this minute kind, of no authority; whereas that μίσγυσθαι, εἰάν τις, ἀδελφὸς ὀνομαζόμενος, * ἢ πόρνος, ἢ πλεο-

ρέκτης, ἢ εἰδωλολάτρης, ἢ λοιδόρος, ἢ μέθυσος, ἢ ἄρπαξ· τῷ
τοιούτῳ μηδὲ συνεσθίειν. <sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> Τί γάρ μοι καὶ τοὺς ἔξω κρίνεις; <sup>1</sup> Mark 4. 11.
οὐχὶ τοὺς ἔσω ὑμεῖς κρίνετε; <sup>13</sup> τοὺς δὲ ἔξω ὁ Θεὸς † κρίνει. <sup>1</sup> Thess. 4.
[Καὶ] ἐξαρεῖτε τὸν πονηρὸν ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν. <sup>1</sup> Tim. 2. 7.
<sup>2</sup> Matt. 18.
<sup>15-17.</sup>

. VI. <sup>1</sup> * Τολμᾷ τις ὑμῶν, πρᾶγμα ἔχων πρὸς τὸν ἕτερον, <sup>1</sup> Acts 15. 14.
<sup>15. 3. 19. 38.</sup>

of Versions is, on any thing affecting the sense, as strong as in the other case weak.

In enumerating the vices on account of which any Christian brother ought to be avoided, the Apostle does not strictly follow the former lists, but, because so much more is expected in a Christian, adds other particulars not contained therein. And those which he expresses are only a specimen, meant to include others of the same kind.

With respect to εἰδωλολάτρευσις, that must be accommodated to the nature of the case, and, as the best Commentators are agreed, must denote that kind of idolatry in which some, though retained in Christian societies, indulged themselves,—namely, by frequenting the idol-feasts, or by so eating of the meat thence brought, as to offend weak brethren.

— τῷ τ. μηδὲ συνεσθίειν meaning, 'to hold no familiar intercourse with;' community of table being a figure expressive of intimacy; see Luke xv. 2. Gal. ii. 12. This was meant to strengthen the efficacy of excommunication, and, under certain circumstances, to supply its place. Some regard συνεσθίειν as only another word for the same thing as συναναμίγνυσθαι (on which see my Lex.), or an explanation of it by way of example; while others recognize in it a stronger expression; which would be the case as regards συνεσθ., if understood of a private table, as comp. with συναναμ. But the μηδὲ (nequidem, nedum) alters the case; for I agree with Vorst. that μηδὲ here is a nota memoria, and with Erasmi, Grot., Est., Vorst., and Billr., that the sense is, 'not even to sit at a common table with him,' which (as Grot. remarks) was one of the least among the marks of friendship. And this is confirmed by the authority of Theodor., who explains it to mean κοινή τροφή, 'a meal taken in common at any table NOT one's own;' for the other would come under the idea of συναναμίγνυσθαι, denoting not only the intercourse of friendly society, but that which consists in the interchange of mutual hospitality; as in the passage of Theodor. adduced by Bulling., well expressed in the version of that passage by Erasmi, 'Qui ad mensam semper eandem Cenabant ambo, fidi nimirum ut amici.'

12. Here there is intimated (as Pott observes) the ground of what was just said; and there may be an ellipse of προσέκει, as in Ælian, V. H. vi. 11, cited by Wets.; q. d. 'for what concern of mine was there with those without the Church?' q. d. 'ye might have supposed that I should so judge' [for what business had I with those without] [the pale of the Church];—namely, to hold judgment over them? Some eminent Commentators point, οὐχὶ τοὺς ἔσω ὑμεῖς κρίνετε. But this neither the context, nor the use of the Particle οὐχὶ, will permit. There is no good reason to abandon the common punctuation, according to which the sense will be: 'Do ye not judge those within the Church?' (q. d. 'is it not only on them that you exercise judgment?')

13. τοὺς δὲ ἔξω ὁ Θεὸς κρίνει! For κρίνει all the Editors from Wets. to Tisch. adopt κρίνει, on strong authority; but Alf. retains κρίνεις, rightly; since internal evidence is in its favour (external authority in so minute a matter as this is of little weight); and especially since it yields a more suitable sense, by better expressing (as Alf. truly observes) the attribute and office of GOD, and answers better to the other presents. The Fut. κρίνει did not, however, as he supposes, come from Heb. xiii. 4, but from the Fut. just after, which I find in the great body of the MSS., though there Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐξάρτα, from several uncial and some cursive MSS. (I add Lamb. 1185. Cov. 2, omitted by Mill, and Leicester MS. omitted by Wets.); but internal evidence is, as I have shown, in favour of the text. rec. The other has every appearance of being a mere correction of Grecism, proceeding from the Alexandrian school. It is better Greek, for, in fact, the use of the Fut. for the Imperat. is rarely found in the pure Greek writers, and even then only with οὐ and an interrogation, except in a very few passages of the poets, as once in Homer, and thrice in Eurip., and even then the Fut. has not so much an Imperative as an Injunctive sense. As to one of the three Euripidean passages, Herc. Fur. 772, ἤξειτ' εὐγαθεὶ καλὰδ' ὕβαν πόλιν, the anti-strophic foot in Πλοῦτωναος requires a spondee in the second syllable of ἤξειτ', and I doubt not that the true reading is ἤξειτε, as Musgrave long ago conjectured.—ἐξαρτεῖτε being not a Greek, but an Hellenistic idiom, formed on the Hebraic use of the Future Indicative for the Imperative, is more likely to be genuine. Finally, the reading καὶ ἐξαρτεῖτε is strongly confirmed both by the Pesch. Syr. Vers. and by Deut. xvii. 7. xxii. 21. xxiv. 7, passages doubtless had in mind by the Apostle.

VI. 1. There may seem here to be a somewhat abrupt transition to another subject. Yet it is one suggested, as Krause well points out, by the association of ideas; not, however, by connexion with κρίνεις at v. 12 (as he thinks), but rather (as I have already pointed out) with κρίνετε in the same verse,—the Apostle, as Pott observes, reflecting how little that ἡ ἴσα κρίσις was suitable to that fondness for litigation even before heathen judges, which, it seems, marked the conduct of the Corinthian Christians. This view I find confirmed by Photius ap. Ecumen. However, the connexion of ideas is, I apprehend, not with v. 12 only, but also with iv. 5 (to which Thom. Aquin. indeed confines it), ὅστε μὴ πρὸ καιροῦ τι κρίνετε, and Paul introduces it with the abrupt earnestness of one astonished and shocked at the existence of the evil practice in question.

b Dan. 7. 18, κρίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδίκων, καὶ οὐχὶ ἐπὶ τῶν ἁγίων; <sup>2</sup> b Οὐκ
 Zech. 14. 5, οἰδατε ὅτι οἱ ἅγιοι τὸν κόσμον κρινούσι; καὶ εἰ ἐν ὑμῖν κρίνεται Matt. 10. 28, Luke 22. 30, Rev. 2. 26.

τολμᾷ τις, &c.] Render 'sustinet aliquis,' &c. We may remark the strong force of the expression, which, as Heydenreich says, 'usurpatur de ausis impiis et nefandis, quæ quâ ratione quis sustinere, quâ fronte illa a se impetrare quis possit, mirum, et animo vix complectendum, videatur.' This use of the term may refer to any strong motive, whether of fear, or shame, or pity, whereby a person cannot endure to do a thing, which otherwise he might be induced to do. Πράγμα is a forensic term, signifying a suit, or such a matter as would afford ground for a suit, at law. Τὸν ἄλλον, 'another,' or, as Bp. Middl. takes it, 'his neighbour,' as Rom. xiii. 8, and infra x. 24. 29. The reason of the Article being used is, he says, this,—'that two persons are supposed, who stand in a certain relation to each other.' The truth is, that in almost every instance of this idiom (and here espec.), it would be better to render, 'the other party.' Κρίνεσθαι, 'to be impleaded,' τῶν ἀδίκων is for τῶν ἀμαρτωλῶν, equiv. to τῶν ἀπίστων, τῶν ἔξω at ver. 6, the Gentiles, as opposed to οἱ δίκαιοι, or ἅγιοι. Thus, as Olsh. observes, 'the expression is not meant to convey any individual stigma on the heathen magistrates, as though absolutely unjust judges, but only to denote their common character, as wanting the righteousness evangelical.' In καὶ οὐχὶ ἐπὶ τῶν ἁγίων there is, as Kypke observes, an emphasis; the argument being, he says, drawn from the quality of the judges, which is such as to forbid the Corinthian converts to expect justice at their hands.

Recent Commentators are of opinion, 'that as the Jews had permission from the Romans to hold courts for the decision of suits at law, one among another, so this privilege had been granted to the Christians, espec. the Jewish Christians; but that some Corinthian believers, despising the Christian judges, had recourse to the Heathen ones, from some false notions respecting Christian liberty, and a disinclination to assimilate themselves with Jews.' But besides that there is no proof of the existence of such courts as held by the Jews, it is plain that by τῶν ἁγίων are here meant, not Christian judges authorized to finally decide suits, but private arbitrators, by whose decision they were not obliged to abide, and often did not abide, but brought their suits before the Roman judges. In after-times, however, it appears, from the Const. Apost. C. 46, 47 (where there is much matter illustrative of this passage), that there were regular trials, in courts composed of the presbyters and deacons.

—ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδίκων—τῶν ἁγίων:] To regard these two terms, with the Commentators in general, as merely convertible, the former with ἀπίστων, Gentiles, and the latter with the denomination Christians, is surely to attribute too little meaning to terms which may justly be supposed any thing but mere words of course. Certainly it is impossible to coincide in the remark of Mackn., that "many of the heathen judges were distinguished for their regard to justice and all the duties of morality!" This is quite inconsistent with what the Apostle says in his Epistles, and espec. in that to the Romans, and nearly as much with what may be gathered from the Class. writers, Greek and Latin. As little is there to approve in what he says, that "the heathens are called unrighteous in the same sense as the Christians are called the sancti; the latter," he adds, "not on account of the real sanctity of their manners, but from their profession," so treating the two terms as mere nominal designations. Rather we must suppose Christians are so called because their solemn engagements at Baptism oblige them to be such, and because, if true members of Christ's mystical body, his Holy Catholic Church, they cannot fail to be such. They are bound to be what the ancient people of God were, though in a higher degree, namely, as it is said 1 Pet. ii. 9, ἴδετε ἅγιοι. As respects the term τῶν ἀδίκων, we are not obliged to suppose that the Apostle means to attribute injustice to all the heathens indiscriminately, still less injustice to all the heathen judges without exception; but he merely employs a term which would be applicable, more or less, almost universally. I am, however, inclined to think that he does not use τῶν ἀδίκων simply for ἀπίστων; for then why should he not have rather employed the plain term ἀπίστων, which he always elsewhere applies to heathens, and never ἀδίκου, or even ἀμαρτωλοῖ, though that is found in the Gospels! The reason why he chose to use the term here (and here only) has been well pointed out by Chrys., who observes, that the Apostle does not say ἐπὶ τῶν ἀπίστων, but ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδίκων, adopting an expression as suitable as possible to the purpose which he had in view,—which was to dissuade and draw off [from an evil practice]: for as the subject of his words was judgment, and those that are impleaded seek nothing so much as that there should be a strict regard to justice on the part of their judges,—hence he suggests a consideration calculated to set forth the impropriety of such a procedure, q. d. 'whither are ye going, and what are ye doing, to commit your cause to the unjust, in preference to the just?' In short, as regards both expressions, the Apostle means to intimate that, as in the one quarter they could not reasonably look for justice, so in the other they might expect it at least at the hands of those who were by profession and in reality of ἅγιοι.

2. οὐκ οἰσῶν ὅτι, &c.] I am still of the same opinion as to rejecting the ὅ, which has been received into the text before οὐκ, by almost all the Editors from Griesb. to Alf. This is decidedly opposed by internal evidence, for, while we are unable to well account for its being thrown out (Alf.'s reason 'being thought superfluous,' is baseless), easily may we account for its being brought into, the text, namely, from ver. 16 and 19 of this same Chapter. Nor is the external evidence for it by any means strong, for it is found in only 5 uncial and 12 cursive MSS., to which I can only add one Lamb. and one Mun. copy. Moreover, the most ancient of MSS. (the Vatican B) is without it. As to the Versiones, they are no sufficient evidence in such a case as this, since the Translators merely express the Particle by a mark of interrogation. Nor is any real evidence to be derived from the Latin Fathers; for they merely follow the Vulgate. As to the Greek Fathers, they have the ἡ only in the last; and even there some of the MSS. have it not. Had the ancient Critics perceived the force of the asyndeton (so frequent in St. Paul), they would not have intruded the ἡ. Not that this omission of the Particle implies the absence of any connexion; but the purpose of its omission seems to be merely to rouse attention, by the force thus imparted through the asyndeton, a force which would have been lost by the prefixing of the ἡ.

ὁ κόσμος, ἀνάξιοι ἔστε κριτηρίων ἐλαχίστων; <sup>3.</sup> οὐκ οἴδατε <sup>2 Pet. 2. 4. Jude ver. 8.</sup> ὅτι ἀγγέλους κρινοῦμεν; μήτι γε βιωτικά; <sup>4</sup> βιωτικά μὲν οὖν κριτήρια εἰν ἔχητε, τοὺς ἐξουθενμένους ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, τούτους καθίζετε. <sup>5</sup> Πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῖν λέγω. οὕτως οὐκ * ἐνὶ ἐν ὑμῖν σοφὸς οὐδὲ εἰς, ὃς δυνήσεται διακρίναι ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ; <sup>6</sup> ἀλλὰ ἀδελφὸς μετὰ ἀδελφοῦ κρίνεται, καὶ τοῦτο ἐπὶ ἀπίστων; <sup>7</sup> Ἡδὴ μὲν οὖν ὅλως ἥτημα [ἐν] ὑμῖν ἐστίν, ὅτι

—οἱ ἅγιοι τὸν κόσμον κρινοῦσι] After a renewed and most careful consideration of the exact import of these words, which involve no little difficulty, I still continue as formerly to give the preference to that by which it is supposed that the faithful servants of God, after being accepted in Christ, shall be, in a certain sense, assessores judicii, by concurrence, with Christ, and being partakers of the judgment to be held by him over wicked men and apostate angels, who are, as we learn from 2 Pet. ii. 4, and Jude 6, 'reserved unto the judgment of the last day.' This view, if carefully propounded, and understood with due limitation, avoids the objections so formidable, if not fatal, to which the other is open,—of interpreting κρίναι strictly of judging; while, on the other hand, it is abundantly sufficient for the purpose of the Apostle's argument. See the able annotations of Calv., Beza, Est., Stenerson, and Billr., whose interpretation of ἐν ὑμῖν (which I have adopted), 'by means of you,' is supported by the authority of Photius ap. Euseb., who takes ἐν ὑμῖν as standing for δι' ὑμῶν. Stenerson and Usteri (quoted by Billr.) have well pointed out that by the ἅγιοι must be meant, in the highest sense, 'the sanctified' through the truth (John xvii. 17, 19), and by the operation of the Holy Spirit (Rom. xv. 16), answering to the ἁγιαζόμενοι in Heb. x. 14, namely, those who are sanctified by faith springing from regeneration, and evidenced by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit unto obedience; in other words, those justified by faith in Christ, who have had the full νόσθεσία (Rom. viii. 23), and to whom is secured the κληρονομία (so Rom. viii. 17, κληρονομία Θεοῦ, συγκληρονομία Χριστοῦ), 'even the inheritance of the saints in light.'

3. ἀγγέλους κρινοῦμεν] meaning the evil angels, 'who kept not their first estate,' of whom mention is made at 2 Pet. ii. 4, where they are described as ἐν κρίσει τηρούμενοι. The judgment of their prince is declared at John xvi. 11; and that both he and his subject-angels must be judged by the Son, is certain from John v. 22, where it is said, τὴν κρίσιν πᾶσαν δέδωκε [ὁ Θεός] τῷ Υἱῷ. Nor is there any reason why we may not understand κρινοῦμεν here also of the same kind of virtual judgment; though how far precisely, and in what way, is not made known to us by any certain revelation.

4. βιωτικά μὲν—καθίζετε] Some eminent Commentators place a mark of interrogation after καθίζετε, which they take as an Indicative, in the sense, 'If, then, you have controversies about worldly affairs, do you set them to judge who are the least esteemed in the Church, i. e. heathen magistrates?' This, however, is, as I have shown, liable to serious objections. Others, of scarcely less note, take καθίζ. as simply Indicative, extra interrog. But the sense thus arising, though not unsuitable, is feeble and jejune, and does not well comport with the air of the context, which is that of pointed irony. Hence I still prefer the interpretation of the ancient, and all the earlier modern Expositors, who take καθίζ. as an Imperative; q. d. 'Set them to judge (such βιωτικά, causes involving more secular matters) even who are of no account [rather than heathen judges].' The τούτους is emphatic; q. d. 'these, I say, whom you affect to hold so cheap.' On καθίζ. in its forensic sense, as used both of judges and arbitrators, &c., see examples in my Lex.

5. πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμ. λέγω] lit. 'for shame to you (i. e. 'to put you to shame') say I this' (a form of earnest expostulation, recurring at ch. xv. 34); q. d. 'What I say may put you to shame, as proceeding on the supposition that there are no persons of judgment among you disposed to act as arbitrators.'

—οὕτως οὐκ ἐν, &c.] This use of οὕτως, as of the Latin itaque, imports wonder mixed with censure; q. d. 'Is it really so?'—Σοφός is to be understood of judgment, or knowledge, in the business of common life; as σοφίας at Acts vi. 3, where see note. In the repetition at οὐκ οὐδὲ εἰς, and even in the dialysis, there is much force; q. d. 'Are none of your boasted teachers wise enough, none of your eloquent preachers acute enough, to decide a petty case of common equity between Christian brethren?' There seems allusion to the μιστοὶ or διαίτηται, private arbitrators chosen (αἰρετοὶ) by two parties disagreeing upon any claim, in order to settle the matter between them.—ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ for τῶν ἀδελφῶν, 'Sing. collectively, for Plur. (see Winer, Gr.), by Hebraism,' says Kuttner.

6. We have here a repetition of the reprehension at ver. 1, with a yet stronger animadversion on their litigious spirit; q. d. 'But ye are not content with arbitration, but ye go to law one with another, and carry your causes before heathen judges.'

7. Waving the censure of their carrying their complaint before the heathen courts, the Apostle now, at ver. 7, keeping to the reproof of their litigiousness commenced at ver. 6, and at ver. 8

e Gal. 5. 19—21.
Eph. 5. 4, 5.
1 Tim. 1. 9.
Heb. 12. 14.
16. & 13. 4.
Rev. 21. 8.
& 22. 15.

κρίματα ἔχετε μεθ' ἑαυτῶν. Διὰ τί οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἀδικεῖσθε;
διὰ τί οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἀποστερεῖσθε; <sup>8</sup> Ἀλλὰ ὑμεῖς ἀδικεῖτε καὶ ἀποστερεῖτε, καὶ ταῦτα ἀδελφοί. <sup>9</sup> Ἡ οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ἀδικοί proceeds to animadvert on the grasping spirit, which mainly occasioned that litigiousness which prevailed among them.

— ἥδη μὲν οὖν ὅλως ἤτημα—ἔστι] Render: 'so then, even now (i. e. thus far, in this respect) there is, on the whole, a defect (lit. short-coming) among you.' On this emphatic force of ἥδη, see my note on Thuc. vi. 34, 9.—The μὲν οὖν is rendered by Alf. imo, vero, as in Soph. CEd. Col. 31, referring to Hartung, Partic. ii. 400, and to infra ix. 25, and Phil. ii. 23. But the question is, whether the sense will apply here? I should say not; for Dr. Peile has well seen, that neither here, nor at v. 4, are the Particles μὲν οὖν to be taken together in their frequent sense imo, vero, 'nay, rather;' but that μὲν, on the principle indicated at Rom. xi. 13, serves only to throw the emphasis on βιωτικά and on ἥδη. The same idiom, as I have observed above, is found at ix. 25, and Phil. ii. 23; in which cases I agree with Dr. Peile, that the μὲν without δέ is = 'to go no further.' But, to advert to the term as used to characterize their having suits at law with each other, ἤτημα, the best Expositors have been agreed that it means 'a falling short of the strict line of duty;' 'a short-coming,' = 'a minor delinquency' (so Est., minorationem).—a term less strong than παράπτωμα. See Erasmus, Hyper., Bulling., Grot., and Est., who well show, that Paul purposely selected the expression (which is of exceedingly rare occurrence) as denoting something less than παράπτωμα. There is, indeed, scarcely any point about which Expositors, ancient and modern, have been so agreed as this. Mr. Alf., however, issues a decided veto, and pronounces the sense to be, 'a falling short of your inheritance in the kingdom of God;' and seeks to confirm the interpretation from v. 9, ἀδικοὶ βασιλ. Θεοῦ οὐ κληρονομήσουσι. But Paul does not here impute to them injustice, but, as Calv. and Hyper. show, a kind of imbecillitatem arising from inability to exercise due patience and forbearance. I have dwelt longer on this matter than the force of a single term might seem to warrant, but only because it involves a most important question, and one, as Calv. observes, not accurately discussed by Theologians. His own note is most masterly, and goes to fully settle the question of Christians going to law. He first inquires whether it is possible to go to law without the impudentia? for if it be so, to go to law will not be always evil, but only for the most part. 'Ego autem fateor,' continues he, 'ut sunt corrupti hominum mores, impatientiam aut tolerantiam defectum (ut loquuntur) esse omnium fere litium accidentis inseparabile. Sed hoc non obstat tamen, quin discernas inter rem ipsam et accidentis vitiosum. Itaque meminimus, Paulum non ideo improbare lites, quod bonam causam presidio magistratus tueri per se malum sit; sed quia fere perpetuo adherant pravi affectus, ut intemperantia, ulciscendi libido, inimicitia, pertinacia, et similes.' He then proceeds to discuss the question more minutely; and he ends with giving some rules for the exercise of a Christian's right of seeking redress for an injury by law; and he concludes with the wholesome admonition,—'tenendum semper moderationem esse, ne remedium sibi a Domino permixtum proprio vitio contaminent.'

— διὰ τί οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἀδικεῖσθε; &c.] In ἀδικεῖσθε and ἀποστερεῖσθε (of which the former is supposed to denote personal or general injury, and the latter injury in one's property) there is an idiom (by no means frequent) to signify 'bear to be injured, or deprived of one's own' (on which see Glass. Phil. Sac., and Win. Gr. Gr. § 32, 3); 'take wrong,' as Dr. Peile explains; 'suffer yourselves to be wronged, i. e. put up with the injury?' And so Tyndale long ago rendered. This idiom (unnoticed, I believe, by the Commentators) is found also, in the case of this very verb, in Thucyd. i. 120, 4, μήττα τῷ πονηρῷ τῆς ἐκρήνης ἡδόμενον ἀδικεῖσθαι, 'to endure being wronged;' where I have adduced examples of the idiom in πλασσόμενοι. Thucyd. i. 77, 1. I add Plut. Mor. pp. 150, 232, 236, τὸ ἀδικεῖσθαι δύνασθαι, 'able to put up with being wronged;' and Wytténb. adduces examples from Aristot., Menand., and other writers; and he well remarks.—'Est autem ex interiori vi Verbi Medii ἀδικεῖσθαι injuriam ferre.' That it is really a Middle form cannot be doubted, and so it is regarded by Winer, Gr. § 39, 4, though he has not shown to what force of the verb Mid. this should be referred. That I apprehend, is the reflexive form; and, accordingly, the literal sense is, 'to wrong oneself;' i. e. by allowing another to wrong one, agreeably to the principle laid down by Kühner and Jelf, as inherent in the Middle voice, that the person who allows an action to be done to himself is often conceived and spoken of as if he did it himself. So διδάσκεισθαι, 'to suffer oneself to be taught,' equiv. to 'to learn,' as in Soph. Antig. 356, ἀσπασόμενος ὄργης ἰδιδάξεται.

8. We have here an amplification followed by a circumstance serving to aggravate the offence.—Ἀδικεῖτε, in antithesis to ἀδικεῖσθε, as in Dionys. Hal. vi. 73, οὐκ ἀδικεῖσθε, ἀλλὰ ἀδικεῖτε, and 170, 1. The term δικ. is used of cheating by fraud, denial of a just debt.—Καὶ ταῦτα is for καὶ τοῦτο, et quidem: a rare idiom; but of which Rosenm. has adduced one example from Josephus, and Rinck some few from Plato. I add Dion. Hal. Antt. viii. 58; and I could subjoin several from Thucyd.—The reading τοῦτο, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, C, D, F, and 7 cursives, is manifestly a Critical correction. Alf., indeed, pronounces the ταῦτα 'a correction, because two things, δικ. and ἀποστ., are mentioned.' But the Critics would scarcely be so stupid as not to know that καὶ ταῦτα, as used in that idiom, merely means et quidem, 'even;' as the Peisch. Syr. Translator saw. It is plain that the τοῦτο was brought in—probably suggested by the καὶ τοῦτο at v. 6—to introduce an easier reading; though the difficulty was not so great as the ταῦτα at v. 11.

9. Against the unholy dispositions above men-βασιλείαν Θεοῦ οὐ κληρονομήσουσι; Μὴ πλανᾶσθε οὔτε πόρνοι, οὔτε εἰδωλολάτραι, οὔτε μοιχοὶ, οὔτε μαλακοὶ, οὔτε ἄρσενόκοῦται, <sup>10</sup> οὔτε κλέπται, οὔτε πλεονέκται, οὔτε μέθυσοι, οὐ λοιδόροι, οὐχ ἄρπαγες, βασιλείαν Θεοῦ οὐ κληρονομήσουσι. <sup>11</sup> Καὶ ταῦτα τινὲς ᾔτε. ἀλλὰ ἀπελούσασθε, ἀλλὰ ἡγιασθήτε, ἀλλ' 1 Cor. 2.1

Tit. 2.2
Heb. 10.22

tioned (litigiousness and a grasping spirit) they are now warned by a reference to the punishment denounced against these and all other unchristian dispositions; 'and the admonition,' observes Olsh., 'is rendered highly impressive by reference to the character of the kingdom of God, which, as a kingdom of purity, excludes from it all that is impure; and at the same time by the serious consideration, that having been purified from their evil deeds by the blood of Christ, the giving themselves up to the dominion of sin would make them doubly guilty.'

— ἢ οὐκ οἰδατε ὅτι, &c.] The ἢ here and at ver. 16 is not without force. Render: 'an forte nescitis?' (a doubt being implied,) or, 'are ye really ignorant?' So Thucyd. vi. 77, 2, ἢ μιν οὐ μὲν ἔως αἶν, or, 'are we really waiting until,' &c. ? And so often in N. T., as Rom. ix. 21, ἢ οὐκ ἔχου ἐξουσίαν; ch. xi. 2, ἢ οὐκ οἰδατε τί λέγει ἡ γραφή;

— μὴ πλανᾶσθε οὔτε πόρνοι, &c.] The Apostle now proceeds to enumerate, in the way of example, all such vices (including those he has been censuring) as exclude from salvation. This he introduces with the impressive words μὴ πλανᾶσθε, formed on those of Luke xxi. 8, βλέπετε μὴ πλανηθῆτε, and found also at 1 Cor. xv. 33. Gal. vi. 7, and sometimes in the Class. writers. So Philemon, cited by Krause: Μηδὲν πλανηθῆναι ἵσταται κἀν Ἀΐδου κρίσει, ἥτις ποιεῖσι Θεοῦ, ὁ πάντων δασκότης. The sense, then, intended is, 'Deceive not yourselves, but be well assured that,' &c.

10. μέθυσοι.] 'Drunkards' are thus classed among those guilty of greater crimes, since vices go in clusters, and it is very rare to find drunkenness unattended with one or more of the other vices, especially the sins of uncleanness, and also brawling and brutality.

— οὐχ ἄρπαγες] There is here a resumption of what was said at πλεονέκται, the class of persons being the same, but the degree of guilt greater, by a more daring breach of the Divine law; the latter denoting 'those who defraud others by deceit,' the former 'those who injure them by extortion.' So Thucyd. iv. 88, ἀπάτη ἀνέρις πλεονεκτῆσαι τινα, and i. 77, where πλεονεκτεῖσθαι signifies 'to be over-reached,' as opposed to καταναγκάζεσθαι, 'to be deprived of any thing by compulsion.' The οὐ before κληρον, not found in A, B, C, D, E, and 20 cursives, is cancelled by Lachm. and by Tisch. ed. i. though in his 2nd ed. he has restored it. Mr. Alf., however, has not profited by the δαύταται φροντίδες of his fidus Achates, but cancels the οὐ,—a course involving a breach of one of the most certain of Critical Canons; and nothing can be plainer, than that the οὐ was removed by Alexandrian Critics, as involving a breach of Grammar. That the οὐ should have come in, as Alf. thinks, from writing the οὐ twice over, in all the copies, except a comparatively few, is incredible. I now find my decision confirmed by the suffrage of Mr. Green, Gr. N. T. 106, who remarks, that the reading of the MSS. in question arose from correction. He numbers this passage, in which the οὐ is found, as one of the examples in Greek of a repetition of the same negative, mostly involved in words syntactically connected (as here) with the verb which has the negative joined with it; and he observes, that 'intensity of sense is generally designed.' He remarks, too, on the peculiarity involved in the repetition of the bare Particle οὐ, adducing as other examples 1 Cor. xii. 15, 16, and Soph. Antig. 5, ὅποιον οὐ τῶν πάντων τε καμῶν οὐκ ὅπως ἐγὼ κακῶν, where intensity is communicated by the repetition. Not so in Æsch. Agam. 1635, δε οὐκ, ἐπειδὴ τῶδ' ἰβούλευσαι μόνον, Δράσαι τὸδ' ἔργον οὐκ ἐτλης.

11. καὶ ταῦτα] To account for the use of the neuter here, we may, with Billr. and Alf., suppose that the words ταῦτα τινὲς are to be taken together, as equiv. to τοιοῦτοι, analogous to the Latin id genus homines; the grammatical harshness of using ταῦτα for persons being softened by the addition of τινὲς, which, Alf. remarks, 'limits the ὑμεῖς, the suppressed subject of ᾔτε.' However, this seems an unsatisfactory mode of dealing with the difficulty. The merging together the ταῦτα and τινὲς is quite gratuitous, and does violence to the construction; since τινὲς was evidently thrown in as a qualification; q. d. 'certain persons at least;' neither does it remove a particle of the grammatical difficulty, which it is best to face at once (not to shuffle it off, with Meyer, by supposing the neuter to be used in the sense of 'a rabble'), and class the anomaly with such passages as Thucyd. vi. 77, οὐκ ἴδους τάδε σκῶν; Eur. Tr. 99, οὐκένι Τροία τάδε; Androm. 168, οὐ γὰρ ἰσθ' Ἐκτωρ τάδε. See Matth. Gr. § 440, who says the idiom is often found.

— ἀλλὰ ἀπελούσασθε, ἀλλὰ ἡγιασθήτε, &c.] A sentence pregnant with meaning, and of which the purpose seems twofold—to soften the pungency of the previous reproof, and to stir up the minds of the readers to profit by the benefits of the Gospel. 'The three terms ἀπελούσασθε, ἡγιασθήτε, and ἰδικαίωθήτε, express (says Olshausen), by a sort of climax, the experience of Christian regeneration, and thus the passage is of a similar kind to those of Rom. v. 1, 2, and vi. 1—23; and the thrice repeated ἀλλὰ gives force to the implied admonition; which conveys, as Beza remarks, 'a solemn warning, that repentance and forgiveness, justification and sanctification, are united by an indissoluble bond.' In explaining these three terms, Commentators have gone to the two extremes, either of too nicely distinguishing the three spiritual benefits, or of blending them into one; though, indeed, the three are so closely connected, as scarcely to be separated one from the other. In the first of the three terms there is a manifest allusion to baptism, and in the second and third, to its ef-ἐδικαιώθητε, ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, καὶ ἐν τῷ Πνεύματι τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν.

g ch. 10. 12.
17. Matt. 18.
Rom. 14. 17.
vv. 15, 16, 20.
1 Thess. 4. 2.

12 Ἐάντα μοι ἔξῃστιν, ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα συμφέρει· πάντα μοι ἔξῃστιν, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐγὼ ἐξουσιασθήσομαι ὑπὸ τίνος. 13 Ἡ Τὰ βρώ-fects,—sanctification and regeneration, or, as one might rather have expected from what is said at ch. i. 30, justification and sanctification; but it should seem, as Calvin supposes, that it is placed last, as presenting the weightiest sense; or, as Billr. expresses it, 'the term which presents the weightiest sense is placed last, the emphasis being accumulated on the predicate.' Be that as it may, the three great and inestimable benefits here denoted have been justly regarded by some Expositors as forming a sort of ἐν διὰ τριῶν, since, as Stenerson observes, they are so closely connected together, that one cannot be present without the others, nor can they be distinguished except in thought, being united by an indissoluble bond. Notwithstanding this, however, the three terms are (as Calv. observes) employed by way of more forcibly deterring the converts from relapsing into the state from which they had departed.—ἀπελούσασθε is not well rendered as if it were in the Passive. It is a middle verb with a reflexive force (like the Heb. conjugation Hithpael), and may be compared with κόπτομαι, ἀγάλλομαι, λαυθάνομαι, βιάζομαι, the literal sense being, 'ye have washed yourselves (i. e. had yourselves washed),' viz. of the Christian baptism. And so in Acts xxii. 16 it is said, βάπτισαι (submit yourselves to baptism) καὶ ἀπολούσαι τὰς ἀμαρτίας σου, i. e. 'be washed in the laver of regeneration in baptism,' alluded to in Tit. iii. 5. Eph. v. 26. Heb. x. 23. It is the more important to attend to the full import intended to be conveyed by ἀπλ., considering that the two terms following are meant to represent Christian baptism as carried out in its effects—Christian justification and sanctification. Accordingly, it would seem that in order to unite and blend the three into one, we are (with Hyper. and Est.) to consider the expression as denoting also the spiritual ablation as the effect of the corporeal ablation in baptism, the washing in the 'Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness' (Zech. xii. 1), whereby the stoning blood of Christ is connected with the sanctifying influences of his Holy Spirit, and productive of moral regeneration; to which there is an allusion in ἡγιασθ., at which understand τῷ Πνεύματι τοῦ Θεοῦ (see John xiv. 26. xv. 26); and thus, as St. Paul commences with the first-attained spiritual grace in baptism, so he concludes with the sustaining perfecting energy of the Holy Spirit, necessary throughout the whole of our Christian course. Calvin has pointed out the just distinction here made between the offices of Christ and that of the Holy Spirit, in adjusting which it is important to attend to the reference in ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τῷ—Ἰησοῦ, which reference, I am now of opinion, is to ἐδικαιώθητε, as Est. very well renders, 'per meritum Domini,' &c.; though the more literal version would be, 'in regard of Me, for My sake,' as in John xiv. 26, where see my note.

12. πάντα μοι ἔξῃστιν, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed, that these words are supposed (by an ellipsis of ἀλλ' ἴρις μοι) to be the words of an objector, and such as were probably often used by those who wished to indulge in sensuality, and in eating meats offered to idols; and who sought to justify their conduct under the pretence of Christian liberty. By 'all things' are meant all things which the Apostle has here in view; i. e. all kinds of food. To this the answer is, ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα συμφέρει, where the ἀλλὰ has both a concessory and an exceptive force; q. d. 'True: all things are given us to enjoy; but οὐ πάντα συμφέρει, all meats are not expedient to be eaten, because they may throw a stumbling-block in the way of others;' meaning, as Billr. says, that, 'even in matters indifferent, Christian liberty must not be pleaded,—much less in matters which are in themselves unlawful and improper.' In short, in the words following (where Paul repeats the objection, in order to answer it more fully), the sense may be thus expressed (with a due regard to the Paranomasia and the Antithesis):—'I have power over all meats; but none of them shall have power over me,' i. e. 'so as to make me a slave to my appetites.' Thus, then, are intimated two considerations, by regard to which Christian liberty is to be regulated. In the first place, all must be done for the benefit and edification of the Church (comp. ch. x. 23), or, in other words, nothing must be done to give offence; and, secondly, Christians must so use the goods of life, as to be at all times ready to relinquish them for higher objects, τὰ ἑμέ.

13. τὰ βρώματα—βρώμασιν] acil. ἔσται, i. e. ἀνήκει, 'are meant for.' Here the foregoing sentiment is further illustrated by examples, and an objection anticipated; q. d. 'All aliments are meant for the sustenance of the body, and the body is fitted to the reception and digestion of them.' Or rather it may be regarded, with some Expositors, as another argument of the opponent, containing an excuse for indulgence in sensuality. The words following, τὸ δὲ σῶμα, &c. contain Paul's answer, in which the words τὸ δὲ σῶμα—σώματι are meant to reply to τὰ βρώματα—βρώμασι, and ὁ δὲ Θεός—αὐτοῖς το ὁ δὲ Θεός καταργήσιν. It is true, that, in the first case, there seems no direct answer; but, in fact, the argument needed none, as it would be like arguing from the use to the abuse of any thing. The Apostle, therefore, it would seem, waves this, and replies to the apology in the peculiar case for which it was, no doubt, often pleaded, namely, fornication; and which may have been meant by the opponent to be implied in what was said. The answer, then, of the Apostle is this: 'But [be that case of the body and meats as it may.] it will not apply to natural appetites of another kind; for the body was not made for fornication, (i. e. 'There exists no necessity for satisfying the natural appetites in this case, as in that of food: the body was made to require food for its existence, but the gratifying of the other appetites is not necessary to existence,') but τῷ Κυρίῳ, i. e. for his service, which implies obedience to his will. 'Now the will of God (says the Apostle elec-

ματα τῇ κοιλίᾳ, καὶ ἡ κοιλία τοῖς βρώμασιν· ὁ δὲ Θεὸς καὶ ταύτῃ καὶ ταῦτα καταργήσει. τὸ δὲ σῶμα οὐ τῇ πορνείᾳ, ἀλλὰ τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ ὁ Κύριος τῷ σώματι· <sup>14</sup> ὁ δὲ Θεὸς καὶ τὸν <sup>1</sup> Acts 2, 24. <sup>2</sup> Rom. 6, 5, 6. <sup>3</sup> 2 Cor. 11, 1. <sup>4</sup> 2 Cor. 4, 14. <sup>5</sup> 1 Rom. 12, 13. <sup>6</sup> Eph. 1, 22. <sup>7</sup> 2 & 4, 15, 16. <sup>8</sup> 2 & 4, 17. <sup>9</sup> 2 Cor. 5, 20. <sup>10</sup> ch. 12, 27. <sup>11</sup> 1 Cor. 2, 24. <sup>12</sup> Matt. 19, 5. <sup>13</sup> Eph. 5, 31. <sup>14</sup> ὁ δὲ Θεὸς καὶ τὸν Κύριον ἡγεῖρε, καὶ * ἡμᾶς ἐξεγερεῖ διὰ τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ. <sup>15</sup> Οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι τὰ σώματα ὑμῶν μέλη Χριστοῦ ἐστίν; * Ἄρας οὖν τὰ μέλη τοῦ Χριστοῦ ποιήσω πόρνης μέλη; Μὴ γένοιτο! <sup>16</sup> * Ἡ οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ὁ κολλώμενος τῇ πόρνῃ ἐν σῶμα ἐστίν; * Ἔσονται γάρ, φησιν, οἱ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν· <sup>17</sup> ὁ δὲ κολλώμενος τῷ Κυρίῳ ἐν πνευμᾷ ἐστί. <sup>18</sup> Φεύγετε τὴν πορνείαν! Πᾶν ἁμάρτημα, ὃ ἐὰν ποιήσῃ ἄνθρωπος, ἐκτὸς τοῦ

where) is your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication.' 'Yield not your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin; but yield yourselves unto God—and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.' Rom. vi. 13

The words καὶ ὁ Κύριος τῷ σώματι admit of more than one sense. Most modern Commentators explain τῷ σώματι 'for raising and glorifying the body'; but far preferable to so harsh an interpretation is that of the Fathers and early modern Commentators, which supposes the sense to be that 'the body is dedicated to the service of Christ as its proprietor.'

14. ὁ δὲ θεὸς—δυνάμει αὐτοῦ] Here the Apostle replies to the second argument of the opponent, namely, ὁ δὲ θεὸς—καταργεῖται. It is well observed by Heyden., that the sentence would have been more exact in inverse order, and with Particles of comparison, thus: ὁ δὲ θεὸς ἰσχυρὰ ἡμᾶς διὰ τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, καθὼς καὶ τὸν Κύριον ἔσται. Be that as it may, the argument stands thus:—'How, then, can you maintain that our body is utterly to perish, and therefore that while we live, we may do as we please? Our bodies are not destined to come to nought, but to rise to immortality,—an immortality of glory and felicity: but lust renders them unfit for the resurrection to life and bliss with Christ (see Phil. iii. 21, and John v. 29). Who, then, will suppose impure pleasures a thing indifferent, when they, for a transitory delight, plunge a man into an eternity of woe?' Ἡμεῖς καὶ ἰσχυρὰ contain an adjunct notion of 'raising up to glory and felicity.'

15. The Apostle now reverts to the foregoing subject, and uses another and still more powerful argument against fornication; namely, that Christians are members of Christ's mystical body. Here (observes Bp. Warburton, Serm. ix. 356) St. Paul, in order to expose the enormity of fornication amongst Christians, considers every man as a member of Christ's spiritual body, and every man living in fornication as the member of a harlot; a profanation which renders the criminal unworthy of the spiritual union with Christ. But then, to make the Corinthians still more sensible of this profanation, he sets before them the closeness of that spiritual union, which, in his accustomed manner, he enforces by analogy to the thing profaning; just as, in another place of this Epistle, he exposes the profanation of the Lord's Supper when joined to an idol-feast, by a comparison between what those two rites had, or were supposed to have, in common. But the union of concubinage not so well suiting his purpose as that of marriage, he employs the latter to enforce the enormity of the former, and, without stopping to change the terms, continues the use of the word harlot, to predicate of her, what is strictly true only of a wife, namely, that 'he which is joined to her is one body.'

— τὰ σώματα ὑμῶν.] Meaning 'yourselves, both body and soul.' At μέλη Χριστοῦ supply σώματα, 'the members of Christ's mystical body,' namely, the Church, of which He is head, and the rest are members inserted by Baptism, and dedicated to his service in the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

— ἀρας οὖν τὰ μέλη, &c.) "Ara is not (as Krause regards it) pleonastic, as is clear from its prominent position; but we have here two clauses blended into one. Prof. Scholfield, indeed, regarding this use of ἀρας as 'uncouth,' would (with Valcknaer) read, from several ancient MSS., ἀρα. But it is far more likely that an uncouth reading should be altered into an easy one, from conjecture, or pass into it by accident (since ἀρα οὖν often occurs in the New Test.), than that so plain a reading as ἀρα should inadvertently be changed into the difficult one ἀρας. Besides, the Pauline vigour of the expression, which our tasteless Critics took for uncouthness, sufficiently attests its genuineness. Here, then, St. Paul employs the same comparison as at iii. 16; and, in calling the body the temple of the Holy Ghost, he uses the same image as Philo Judæus; who, in speaking of the first man, thus describes his body: οἶκος γάρ τις, ἡ νῦν ὑπὸς ἐκτεταίνεται ψυχῆς λογικῆς.

16, 17. We have here a further illustration of the preceding.

17. ἐν πνεύμα] scil. σὺν αὐτῷ, for ἐν ἑστὶ σὺν αὐτῷ κατὰ τὸ πνεῦμα, 'is one heart and soul with him' (see Acts iv. 32), as intimate friends are said to be ψυχὴ μία. Comp. 1 John iii. 24.

18. ἐκτός τοῦ σώματος] This must be understood comparatē (being expressed by popular hyperbole), espec. if αἰς τὸ ἴδιον σῶμα αὐτοῦ. be understood, as it is by many recent Commentators, of injuring the body by wasting its health and strength : an argument, however, which would be more suitable to a heathen moralist, than to the great Apostle; and which, in fact, is adduced, in reference to intemperance of every kind, by Socrates ap. Xen. Mem. i. 5, 3. See also Ecclus. xix. 2, 3. We may suppose, that, while meaning to include the idea of injuring (and so the expression sinning against is used in σώματος ἐστὶν ὁ δὲ πορνεύων εἰς τὸ ἴδιον σῶμα ἁμαρτάνει.

m ch. 2. 16.
2 Cor. 6. 16.
Eph. 2. 21.
Heb. 8. 6.
1 Pet. 2. 5.
n ch. 7. 23.
Acts 20. 25.
Gal. 3. 13.
Heb. 9. 12.
1 Pet. 1. 18.
2 Pet. 2. 1.
Rev. 5. 9.

19 <sup>m</sup> **Ἡ οὐκ οἶδατε, ὅτι τὸ σῶμα ὑμῶν ναὸς τοῦ ἐν ὑμῖν ἁγίου Πνεύματος ἐστὶν, οὗ ἔχετε ἀπὸ Θεοῦ, καὶ οὐκ ἐστὲ ἐαυτῶν;* 20 <sup>a</sup> ἡγοράσθητε γὰρ τιμῆς· δοξάσατε δὴ τὸν Θεὸν ἐν τῷ σώματι ὑμῶν, [καὶ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι ὑμῶν, ἅτινά ἐστι τοῦ Θεοῦ.]

VII. 1 Περὶ δὲ ὧν ἐγράψατέ μοι, καλὸν ἀνθρώπων γυναῖκός μὴ ἅπτεσθαι· 2 διὰ δὲ τὰς πορνείας ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα ἔχεται, καὶ ἐκάστη τὸν ἴδιον ἄνδρα ἔχεται. 3 Ἡ γυναικὶ ὁ ἄνθρωπος τὴν ὀφειλομένην εὐνοίαν ἀποδιδότω ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ ἡ γυνή

a 1 Pet. 2. 7.

a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoëtigen. on Luke x. 30), the Apostle chiefly intended that of disgracing and polluting the body, by using it for purposes not intended by its Maker, rendering the person thereby unfit for a spiritual union with Christ (v. 18), and profaning what was meant to be dedicated, like a temple, to holy uses, as the Apostle more particularly mentions in the next verse.

19. τὸ σῶμα ὑμῶν] for ὑμεῖς, though σῶμα is used for the argument's sake. Τοῦ, scil. ὑποκ.

— οὐκ ἐστὶ ἑαυτῶν] A popular mode of expression, meaning 'ye are not at your own disposal, but Christ's'; thus intimating, that, to abuse the body, is to abuse what is not their own.

20. ἡγοράσθητε τιμῆς] lit. 'ye have been bought off, or redeemed, by a price paid;' 'ye are bound to his service, as a bought slave is to that of his purchaser, or of him who has purchased his redemption.'

— δοξάσατε δὴ, &c.] 'make your body, then, subservient to the glory of God,' i. e. 'consecrate both body and soul to his service.' Ἄτινά ἐστι τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'which are both, of them, God's,'—namely, 'by right of creation, and still more of redemption.'

The words καὶ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι—Θεοῦ, not found in several uncial, and 5 cursive MSS., the Vulg., Copt., and Æthiop. Versions, and several Fathers, are cancelled by Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but defended by Matthæi, who has shown that the evidence of the Fathers is contradictory, and not of any great weight. It must, however, be confessed that, though they seem almost necessary to complete the sense, and correspond to vv. 16, 17, 19, yet they may have been added for that reason. I should have placed them in double brackets, were it not for the deficiency of the cursive MSS., and the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version.

VII. Having concluded the reprehensory portion of the Epistle, the Apostle now proceeds to answer certain questions, which, it seems, had been proposed by the Corinthians, on matrimony and other kindred subjects. Whether that concerning the expediency and necessity of marriage, and the validity of a Christian's marriage with a Pagan, proceeded from the Jewish Christians or from the Gentile converts, is a disputed point. The former is the more probable, if, at least, the inquiries in the Letter were made in disparagement of marriage; for the Jewish converts, most of them, held the opinions of the Essenes on matrimony. These several questions, then, the Apostle answers, vv. 1—16, and after discussing another question concerning virgins, and subjoining some general counsel respecting other conditions of life, vv. 17—20, he adds his Apostolical counsel, both to the unmarried (vv. 25—38) and to widows, vv. 39, 40.

1. καλὸν ἀνθρώπων, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that, from the context, καλὸν cannot have the sense pulchrum, = honestum, morally good, but must mean σύμφωρον, expedient, namely, for the reason mentioned at v. 32, for the avoiding of care and anxiety. It is obvious that this is not an authoritative decision, but a friendly counsel, and that not treating the question on general grounds, but solely with reference to those times.

2. διὰ τὰς πορνείας] The full sense is, 'on account of the fornications [that might otherwise be committed].' A brief mode of expression, similar to that at ver. 5, διὰ τὴν ἀκαρδίαν ὑμῶν, 'on account of the incontinency into which ye might otherwise have fallen.' The plural here may be referred to the various kinds of lasciviousness mentioned supra vi. 9, 10, or rather to the prevalence of lewdness in the Christian Church which might thus arise.

— τὸν ἴδιον ἄνδρα ἔχεται] The words ἑαυτοῦ and ἴδιον are the same in sense; but here, as at Eph. v. 22, 25, the Apostle has chosen so to vary the term, as to employ ἑαυτοῦ for the husband, and ἴδιον for the wife; though the Class. writers use the former alone in both cases. Whether there be, as I have thought, any emphasis on the words, is doubtful; they are used without any at Eph. v. 22, 25, and 1 Pet. iii. 1 and 5; as also in the only two instances I have noted out of Scripture,—namely, Boeckh. Inscript. Gr. t. i. p. 853, ἡ γυνὴ τὸν ἴδιον ἄνδρα—ἐν ταμίᾳ ἀνάστηται (prevailed on to rise). See my note on Thucyd. i. 126, 11, and t. ii. 378, τὴν ἴδιαν γυναῖκα.

3. τὴν ὀφειλομένην εὐνοίαν] MSS. A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and 5 cursives, with the Vulg., Ital., and other later Versions, and some Fathers, have ὀφειλὴν, which has been adopted by all the Critical Editors except Matthæi. But external authority is, through the deficiency of cursive MSS., insufficient; and internal evidence cannot decide the point, since it may be urged both ways. As to the text rec. being, as the Editors say, a gloss on ὀφειλὴν, that is far from being certain. Nay, considering the commonness of the expression debitum conjugale, the contrary may be nearer the truth; or rather ὀφειλὴν might be an alteration of an ordinary Greek phrase into a Classical one; though εὐνοία is a term sufficiently suitable, and is so used by Joseph. Antt. xvii. 3, 1, and xvi. 7, 3, vii. 12, 4, and Dio Chrysa. p. 52

τῷ ἀνδρὶ. * Ἡ γυνὴ τοῦ ἰδίου σώματος οὐκ ἐξουσιάζει, ἀλλ' ὁ ἀνὴρ ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ ὁ ἀνὴρ τοῦ ἰδίου σώματος οὐκ ἐξουσιάζει, ἀλλ' ἡ γυνή. <sup>b</sup> Μὴ ἀποστερεῖτε ἀλλήλους, εἰ μὴ τι ἂν ἐκ <sup>b</sup> Joel 2. 18. <sup>c</sup> Zeach. 7. 8. <sup>d</sup> 12. 13—14. συμφώνου πρὸς καιρὸν, ἵνα σχολάσγη τῇ [νηστεία καὶ τῇ] προσευχῇ καὶ πάλιν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ ‡ συνέρχησθε, ἵνα μὴ πειράξῃ ὑμᾶς ὁ Σατανᾶς διὰ τὴν ἀκρασίαν ὑμῶν. <sup>e</sup> Τοῦτο δὲ λέγω <sup>c</sup> vv. 12, 35.

Such an alteration might easily creep into the Vulgate and the Latin Fathers, and from thence into some Greek ones, and finally into the copies of the Western recension. Of the Greek Fathers, Chrys., whose authority is alleged for ὀφειλὴν, did not so read. The expression only occurs in his paraphrases; which rather confirms the suspicion of ὀφειλὴν being a mere emendation. From the commencing words of his Exposition it is plain, that he read ὀφειλομένην τιμὴν, as, indeed, do some MSS., but evidently by a gloss on ἐννοίαν. As to the text. rec. being, as Alf. supposes, a euphemism for the same thing, it is no wonder that, as he says, Meyer will not concede this; for what sober-minded Critic can concede any thing so improbable? That τῇ ὀφειλῇ was in the text in the earliest age, and long before the period when it began to be tampered with, is attested by the presence of the word in the Pesch. Syr. Version.

4. The words of this verse are exegetical of the former (giving a reason for the precept), and depend on ὀφειλομένην preceding. In each of the clauses of this sententia bimensbris the verb ἐξουσιάζει has a peculiar force, from brevity of expression; the full sense being,—that neither of the two parties has any separate power, any power to the exclusion of the other from the thing in question,—since, as says Grot., the great jurist as well as Commentator, 'in any matter of partnership, no one of the parties has a complete right,' i. e. separate from the other. Here, then, exists a confessed harshness of expression; for a pure Greek author would have written instead of ἀλλ' ὁ ἀνὴρ,—ἀτὴρ or δίχα τοῦ ἀνδρός, and instead of ἀλλ' ἡ γυνή,—ἑτέρα or δίχα τῆς γυναίκος. As it is, the harshness in question has produced such an obscurity as to give rise to the notion (and a strange one it is) of Parvus, Est., and others, as though the power each had were not such as to bind the other. Certain it is, the present passage shows remarkably the difference existing on this head between Christianity and heathenism. According to the latter, the husband's right was regarded as full and complete; the wife's as next to nothing; which sufficiently appears from a multitude of passages that might be adduced from the Classics, only one of which it is necessary for me to select, Eurip. Med. 235, on the subject of Medea's enumerating the various miseries of women: ἂν πρῶτα μὲν διὰ χρημάτων ὑπερβολὴν ἵδωσιν πρὸςθεῖναι, δισπότῃν τε σώματος λαβεῖν, where the term δαστ. implies that the wife had not the reciprocal right.

5. The Apostle now returns to the exhortation at v. 3.—εἰ μὴ τι is equiv. to the Hebr. אִם עֵת. 'Εκ συμφώνου, for ἐκ τοῦ συμφώνου, or ἐκ συμφωνίας, = συμφωνίας.—Πρὸς καιρὸν contains a preceptory limitation of the Apostle, applying to both parties; though we find, from Ecclesiastical history, that it was sometimes not observed in the early Christian Church. On the force of σχολάζειν see my Lex. in v. The words τῇ νηστεία καὶ (not found in 7 uncial MSS. and a few cursives [to which I can add only Lamb. 1182], besides several Versions and Fathers) were rejected by Mill and Bengel, and have been cancelled by all the Critical Editors except Matth. The external evidence here is insufficient; and the internal cannot decide, since it is itself doubtful, drawing two ways; yet it is rather against than for the words. The case is very similar to that at Mark ix. 29; and in both the reading is an open question.

— συνέρχασθε. The reading of MSS. and Editions here varies. The early Editions and several MSS., with some later Versions and Fathers, have συνέρχασθε, which has been edited by Scholz; but συνέρχασθε was edited, from several MSS. and early Versions, by Beza, 5, Schmidt, and Elzevir, and thus was introduced into the textus receptus, and was edited by Matth. Again, ἦτε, which is found in A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and 7 cursives, and in several Fathers, is edited by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. I cannot yet venture to receive it, because there is a great deficiency of cursive copies to confirm the uncial; and internal evidence will not supply their place, inasmuch as it is equally balanced; for though συνέρχ. may be a Critical correction of ἦτε, it may be also a pleonasm; and it is difficult to say which is the more probable. Under these circumstances I cannot adopt the new reading, but retain συνέρχασθε, which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and which seems to have been read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator. I have, however, adopted σχολάσγη for σχολάζ., with all the Critical Editors, on strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence.

— μὴ πειράξῃ. i. e. 'may not throw you into carnal temptation.' This does not necessarily imply (as Eatius, Camerarius, Pott, and Winer suppose) that the temptation would be with effect, or successful (though the word has that sense at Gal. v. 1); but there is merely denoted great danger, as at Matt. vi. 13, μὴ εἰσενέγκῃς ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν.

6. τοῦτο δὲ λέγω, &c.] Commentators are not agreed whether this is to be referred to what follows, or to what precedes; or, if to what precedes, whether to what immediately precedes, ver. 5, or to that a little further off, at vv. 1, 2. The latter method is preferable, and the words may be referred to μὴ ἀποστερεῖτε and καὶ πάλιν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ συνέρχασθε at ver. 5, or to ver. 2, and then συνγινώσκω may be rendered, with some ancient and several modern Interpreters, indulgentes. Yet they are better referred to ver. 1. But there is no reason why the τοῦτο δὲ λέγω may not be meant to apply both to

d Matt. 19. 12. κατὰ συγγνώμην, οὐ κατ' ἐπιταγὴν <sup>7</sup> ἠθέλω γὰρ πάντας ἀνθρώπους εἶναι ὡς καὶ ἐμαυτὸν. ἀλλ' ἕκαστος ἰδίου χάρισμα ἔχει ἐκ Θεοῦ, ὃς μὲν οὕτως, ὃς δὲ οὕτως.

<sup>8</sup> Λέγω δὲ τοῖς ἀγάμοις καὶ ταῖς χήραις, καλὸν αὐτοῖς ἐστὶν εἰ μὴ μὲνῶσιν ὡς καὶ ἐγώ. <sup>9</sup> εἰ δὲ οὐκ ἐγκρατεῦνται, γαμήσωσιν. <sup>10</sup> ὅτι τοῖς τῶσαν κρείσσον γάρ [ἐστὶ] γαμῆσαι ἢ πυροῦσθαι. <sup>11</sup> τοῖς δὲ γεγαμηκόσι παραγγέλλω οὐκ ἐγὼ, ἀλλ' ὁ Κύριος, ἡ γυναῖκα ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς μὴ χωρισθῆναι. <sup>12</sup> (ἐὰν δὲ καὶ χωρισθῇ, μενεῖτω

what precedes and what follows on the subject of marriage; and thus the sense will be,—‘But I say what I say, or am saying.’ This view is, I find, adopted by Dr. Peile, who refers the τοῦτο to the Apostle’s one great concession as to marriage, made first at ver. 2, and again, by implication, at ver. 3, and finally (and explicitly), at ver. 9, as conveyed by the word γαμησάτωσαν. It is not necessary to render συγγν. ‘consequence’ (with many eminent Commentators), but ‘permission,’ as in our English Versions generally. See my note on Thucyd. vii. 15, 3. The Apostle means, in explanation of what he is saying on this subject, to apprise his readers that he is speaking of what is allowable or expedient, not what is enjoined to be done; q. d. (as Billr. explains) ‘You will learn, from what I have enjoined, not what you must do, but what you may do.’

<sup>7</sup> ἠθέλω γάρ, &c.] ‘for I could wish’ = θέλω. The words of this verse are semi-parenthetical; the sentiment being just after resumed with the same expression, λέγω δέ: and, accordingly, ver. 8 ought not to commence (as it does in almost all editions) a new section.

The phrase εἶναι ὡς καὶ ἐμαυτὸν must, as Expositors are agreed, be taken with limitation to mean, ‘have the same mastery over their appetites and passions as he had,’ so as to be able to remain in virtuous celibacy, while it was by circumstances required. At ἕκαστος—ἐκ Θεοῦ, the rendering of ἰδίου, ‘his own,’ is not quite accurate, since there is no Article at χάρισμα, which there is in Jos. Antt. xvi. 2, 2, ἀποκαθίσταντας τῇ πόλει τὸν ἰδίον (scil. αὐτῇ) κόσμον. The words have been best rendered by the Arabic Translator, ‘Unusquisque donum habet a Deo, sibi peculiare,’ ‘hath a gift peculiar to, and proper for, him.’—χάρισμα means, probably, τὸ κεχαρισμένον, ‘what has been bestowed upon any one;’ so that the words may be rendered: ‘quilibet donum habet peculiare, a Deo sibi concessum.’ The ἀγκράτεια is, observes Chrys., ‘called by Paul a ‘gift,’ out of modesty, as not claiming any merit from continency.’

<sup>8</sup> The Apostle now briefly recapitulates what has been before said.

—τοῖς ἀγάμοις] Some doubt has been entertained as to the exact sense here. The expression ἀγαμος properly signifies unmarried, without determining whether the person to whom it is applied, has ever been married. And such is commonly supposed to be its use here, to denote both bachelors and widowers. But the best Commentators, from Grotius downwards, are of opinion that it denotes those who have no longer a wife; i. e. widowers; observing that, as the usus loquendi did not permit the Apostle to write χήρους, so he employed the general term in a special application. The case of those who have never married is, say they, entered upon at ver. 25. And as to the opposition alleged between οἱ ἀγαμοὶ and οἱ γεγαμηκότις at ver. 10, and ὁ ἀγαμος and ὁ γαμήσας at vv. 32, 33, the connection, they observe, is there different. At μὲνῶσιν sub. ἐγκρατεύονται from ἐγκρατεύονται just after.

<sup>9</sup> εἰ δὲ οὐκ ἐγκρ.] ‘if they have not the ability to practise continence.’

<sup>10</sup>, <sup>11</sup>. The Apostle now answers their inquiries as to the preservation of the marriage bond among Christians.

<sup>10</sup>. παραγγέλλω—Κύριος] The sense is commonly supposed to be, ‘It is not so much I who command, as the Lord,’ or, ‘not only I command, but the Lord also.’ It does not seem, however, that the Apostle meant even to include himself, when he used the strong term παραγγέλλω. The positive command of the Lord could require no reinforcement from the Apostle; and to his Muster therefore (in whose code of morality the preservation of the marriage bond formed a new and striking feature, in strong contrast with the levity of divorce then practised under the sanction of the Law) the Apostle wholly refers this positive command, founded on Matt. v. 32; compare xix. 3—10. Or we may suppose that the words οὐκ ἐγώ, ἀλλ’ ὁ Κύριος are added, per orationis locutionem, to show that he here speaks κατ’ ἐπιταγὴν; and therefore the command is not his own, but the Lord’s. So Billr. regards it as a correction of the first position in παραγγέλλω; q. d. ‘not of my own wisdom, but as declaring the command of the Lord.’ So on the other hand, at ver. 12, he says, ἐγὼ λέγω, οὐχ ὁ Κύριος.

—ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς μὴ χωρισθῆναι] ‘not to separate herself;’ for here, and in the next verse, the Passive is used in a Reciprocal sense; which use is regarded by Kuttner as a Hebraism, formed on the Hebrew conjugation Hithpael. And so in Sept. Gen. xiii. 9, we have ἀποχωρισθήναι ἐπ’ ἐμοῦ, 2 Sam. i. 23, οὐ διαχωρισθήσας, and in Justin Martyr, Apol. i., ἐχωρίσθη, as said of a woman. So, too, Jos. Antt. xv. 7, 10, Γυναικὶ δὲ ἔξιστι, οὐδὲ διαχωρίσθαις, καθ’ αὐτὴν (‘of herself’) γαμηθῆναι, μὴ τοῦ προτέρου ἀνδρὸς ἀφιέντος, ‘her husband not having first divorced her.’ Though, as the Law of Moses gave no power to a wife to separate herself, here it seems to be used of mutual separation; which, however, gave no power to the woman to marry again, since it was only like our separation a mensa et thoro. The wife laboured under the same disability by the laws of Greece and Rome. The expression here, μὴ χωρισθῆναι, is closely conἀγαμος, ἢ τῷ ἀνδρὶ καταλλαγήτω) καὶ ἄνδρα γυναῖκα μὴ ἀφίεναι. <sup>12</sup> Τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς ἐγὼ λέγω, οὐχ ὁ Κύριος εἰ τις ἀδελφὸς γυναῖκα ἔχει ἄπιστον, καὶ αὐτὴ συνενδοκεῖ οἰκεῖν μετ' αὐτοῦ, μὴ ἀφίετω αὐτήν. <sup>13</sup> καὶ γυνὴ ἥτις ἔχει ἄνδρα ἄπιστον, καὶ αὐτὸς συνενδοκεῖ οἰκεῖν μετ' αὐτῆς, μὴ ἀφίετω αὐτόν. <sup>14</sup> ἢ ἡγιασται γὰρ ὁ ἀνὴρ ὁ ἄπιστος ἐν τῇ γυναικί, καὶ ἡγιασται <sup>ε</sup> καὶ ἡ γυνὴ ἢ ἄπιστος ἐν τῷ ἀνδρὶ· ἐπεὶ ἄρα τὰ τέκνα ὑμῶν ἀκάθαρτά ἐστι, νῦν δὲ ἁγία ἐστίν. <sup>15</sup> Εἰ δὲ ὁ ἄπιστος χωρίζεται, χωρι-

nected with ἄνδρα γυναῖκα μὴ ἀφίεναι at ver. 11; for the best Commentators are agreed that the words ἰάν δι—καταλλάγητω are parenthetical. As to the two terms ἀφίεναι and χωρίζεσθαι, a husband when divorcing his wife was said ἐκβάλλειν, or, by a milder term, ἀποπέμπτειν, or, by the mildest, ἀφίεναι. The first term is most used in the Old Test. as Gen. xxi. 10. Wisd. vii. 27. On the contrary, a wife who, from whatever cause, left her husband, was said ἀπολείπειν or, χωρίζεσθαι, 'to separate herself from him'; for the wife could not send away the husband, but only leave the house.—Καταλλάττεισθαι and διαλλ. are by the best writers used of reconciliation of every kind, both public and private; see note on Rom. v. 10. From the use of καταλλ. and the air of the context, it is plain that the Apostle is not here speaking of formal divorces, effected by law, but of separations arising from misunderstandings, or otherwise.

12. Here St. Paul answers to the third point on which he had been consulted; namely, whether the marriage of a Christian and a non-Christian ought to be dissolved. This the Apostle decides in the negative.—τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς, scil. γαμουμένοις, 'the rest [of married persons]'.—Ἐγὼ λέγω, οὐχ ὁ Κύριος, many Expositors consider the words as equiv. to, 'This is only my private opinion'; 'this is not founded upon any revelation from Christ, and forms no part of his doctrine delivered personally while he was on earth.' But this mode of explanation is open to strong objections; see Heydenreich. Certainly ἐγὼ λέγω must not be limited to private opinion, as if apart from inspiration; for the Apostle speaks with authority, as in the full persuasion and consciousness of inspiration, espec. when he concludes his decision (ver. 17) with καὶ οὕτως ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις πάσαις διατάσσομαι. Our Lord, indeed, could not, without anticipating the designs of the Deity, touch on this question; but left it, together with many others, to be decided by the Apostles, under the guidance of that Holy Spirit, who was 'to lead them into all truth,' as the Apostle was fully conscious of when declaring at ch. ii. 16, ἡμεῖς δὲ νοῦν Χριστοῦ ἔχομεν.—The expression συνενδοκεῖ οἰκεῖν is not well rendered 'be pleased' (as in E. V.), or, 'well pleased,' as it is by Mackn., or, as it is by Wakef., 'mutually agree.' The truth is, that the Prep. is merged in the Verb (as in the Latin consentio when followed by an Infinitive) to jointly produce the sense of being 'disposed to do a thing.' Accordingly, the term is best rendered 'consents to live with;' for, as Hobbes observes (in his Human Nature, c. xii.), 'when the wills of more than one concur to one and the same action, this concours of their wills is called consent.'

14. The Apostle now gives a reason why diversity of religion could not authorize separation; and that by an anticipation of the objection, 'Shall I not be polluted by such close union with a profane person?' To which the answer is: 'No; the believing wife is not polluted by the unbelieving husband, but rather the unbelieving party is sanctified by the believing.'—ἡγιασται ὁ ἀνὴρ ὁ ἄπ. ἐν τῇ γυν., scil. πιστῇ, 'for the non-believing husband has been made clean (has become clean) in the person of his believing wife.' Of these words,—which involve no little obscurity,—the view of the sense taken by Chrys., Grot. and others, who suppose the term ἡγιασθαι to be here simply put for οὐκ ἔστιν ἀκάθαρτος, 'is not quite unclean,' is good as far as it goes, but does not go far enough. It is true, that the ἡγιασθαι here spoken of is to be taken in a limited sense; and yet not to be entirely confined (as it is by many expositors) to the case of matrimony, as though it were meant: 'He is sufficiently clean for her to live with him as a wife.' We may suppose, that the ἡγιασμός in question is confined, not to any one particular, but meant to be general,—and considered (as Est. suggests) as analogical, and consequently imperfect; the simple sense being, that the person 'is not regarded in the sight of God as wholly unclean' (see James v. 16). Indeed, the very union of such an one with a Christian wife could not but in some measure separate him from heathens, and bring him somewhat nearer to God, and the worship of God 'in spirit and in truth.' The general sense fully drawn forth may be expressed as follows: 'for the non-believing husband has been, as it were, sanctified by the believing wife, and the non-believing wife by the believing husband [so that the one party incurs no pollution, and the other derives great benefit]; FOR [otherwise if one, i. e. the non-believing, party were not sanctified], your children would be accounted impure and profane; but now (i. e. in the case supposed) they are considered holy, and form part of the people of God; it being, of course, taken for granted that they are brought up by the Christian parent as Christians.

15. After having, at vv. 12, 13, directed that the Christian wife should not be the first to separate, if the other party be willing to live with her, the Apostle shows, in this verse, what is to be done by the Christian wife, if the Pagan husband be the first to break the marriage bond. She is directed to let the unbelieving party, if he will separate, separate. We are not, however, to suppose (with Grot. and others) that the marriage

ζέσθω. οὐ δεδούλωται ὁ ἀδελφὸς ἡ ἡ ἀδελφή ἐν ταῖς τοιαύταις
 1<sup>h</sup> 1<sup>o</sup> Pet. 3. 1. ἐν δὲ εἰρήνῃ κέκληκεν ἡμᾶς ὁ Θεός. 16<sup>h</sup> Τί γὰρ οἶδας, γύναι,

was, in such a case, ipso facto dissolved, so that the believing party might contract a fresh one. This is alike at variance with the letter and the spirit of our Lord's decision (Matt. v. 32); and, indeed, with the Apostle's own words in this Chapter; see vv. 10, 11, 30, and Rom. vii. 1—3. The sense, therefore, seems to be, that the conjugal union is not to be dissolved by reason of difference in religion; yet if the unbelieving party be disposed to separate, the believing party may blamelessly submit to such separation. Χερσιζέσθω is to be taken in a popular acceptance; q. d. 'let him separate himself: bring no action to recover your matrimonial rights.'

—οὐ δεδούλωται] 'is not held bound,' viz. so as to be under obligation to do what the context suggests, which is to go and live with him after this separation on his part, or to seek to be reconciled with him. Est., Calv., Grot., Sclater, and Mackn. subjoin, 'or to remain single,' namely, as not held bound by the conjugal tie. That, however, is more than can be gathered from the context, and lies open to several grave objections, which I have, after Wolf and others, stated in my Rec. Syn. Moreover, such could not be true of the female believing party, because, according to the laws under which the marriage contract was formed, she could not marry again until after her husband had given her a bill of divorce. Perhaps his forming another marriage might be equivalent to divorcing her; but committing adultery after separating from her was, I apprehend, such as to dissolve the marriage, and leave the deserted party free. Be that as it may, I still agree in opinion with Bulling., Wolf, and Hamm., that Paul meant no such inference as the above to be drawn from his words. Indeed, to have decided on a case which was mixed up with the public laws of Greece and Rome would have embroiled him with the magistracy, and therefore it was the part of prudence for him to say nothing. The words subjoined to the above, ἐν δὲ εἰρήνῃ κέκληκεν ὁ Θεός, admit of more than one sense, according as the reference is supposed to be. By some they are regarded as a general admonition to the cultivation of peace with all men: by others, as an admonition to the cultivation of peace with God, Rom. v. 1, and Phil. iv. 7. But it should rather seem that the reference is special, and to what was just before said. It is not, however, strictly speaking, a limitation of the liberty just given; but rather a general counsel, which, if acted on, would materially tend to prevent the person from having any occasion to use that liberty, or freedom of action, whatever it might be; namely, by cultivating such a meek, forbearing, and peaceable spirit, as should afford no occasion for conjugal strife, or thus provoke a separation. And this salutary counsel the Apostle enjoins in the words before us, of which the full sense is: 'However, God hath called us to peace,' i. e. a state of peace, so as to be in peace; for we have here a case of constructio pragmatica per breviloquentiam in the use of ἐν for eis (see Winer's Gr. Gr., p. 351), εἰρήνη being the abiding condition in which the called must continue. This interpretation is strongly confirmed by the words following, τί γὰρ οἶδας, γύναι, εἰ τὸν ἄνδρα (thy husband) σώσεις; in which the Apostle suggests a reason,—and that a very strong one,—why the believing party should not promote needless separation, but in every way cultivate peace; which reason is,—that by this conduct the unbelieving party may probably be gained over to the Christian faith.

16. 'Redit Apostolus ad præceptum, vv. 12—14, datum, rationem afferens [ex spe bonâ] quæ homines posset ad præceptum illud religiose servandum excitare.' (Stenerson.)

—τί γὰρ οἶδας—σώσεις:] Here is another reason for avoiding carelessness separation, and cultivating peace; namely, from the hope that thus the believing party may possibly bring over the unbelieving to the Christian faith, and thus put him into the way of salvation. The εἰ will be for 'annon,' like the Latin 'an,' for 'annon,' an idiom denoting an alternative between two possible things; sometimes one clause only being expressed, and the other implied therein. See Kuhn., and Jelf, Gr. Gr. § 877, b, who limit the idiom to Verbs of reflexion, trying, knowing, as here; q. d. 'how knowest thou whether thou shalt save him, or not?' = 'whether thou shalt not save?' See Dr. Peile. So, too, the words were taken by Chrys., Theophyl., Theodor., and Œcumen., and also by Fathers, Greek and Latin, and by the modern Expositors, from Thom. Aquin. downwards, except De Lyræ, and, hesitatingly, Est.; but without hesitation, Meyer, De Wette, and Alf., who pronounce that the sense 'is not a ground for remaining united in hope that, &c., but a ground for consummating the separation.' They maintain this view from the position of the words, by which the term in both clauses holds a subordinate place, rather subjective, as to the person addressed, than the main object in the mind of the writer. Mere German sophistry—dust in the balance, when weighed against the reasons for the other view, deduced from the logic of the passage, and ably propounded by the ancient Interpreters, and, of the modern Expositors, by Thom. Aquin., Calv., Hyper., Bulling., Crell. (whose notes are masterly, and full of instruction), espec. Calv., who remarks, 'Magnum et præclarum bonum est, si mulier lucrificat maritum; atqui non ita desperatæ sunt infideles, quin adduci ad fidem possint: sunt quidem mortui; sed Deus etiam mortuos suscitare potest. Quando igitur spes aliqua præficiendi superest, neque scit pia mulier, possint sancta sua conversatione virum reducere in viam, omnia experiri debet priusquam eum relinquat: quamdiu enim in ambiguo est salus hominis, propensiores in bonam spem nos esse debet.' Besides, the passages of Joel ii. 14, Jonah iii. 9, Sept. (almost certainly in Paul's mind), confirm the first mentioned. And it is in vain that Alf. there also propounds this argument of straw—that the Verb is in the emphatic position; a wholly gratuitous supposition. That the Sept. use εἰ once, Eccles. iii. 21, to express 'uncertainty,' will not prove that it must be so taken here. No modern Expositor has so ably treated the question as Heyd., who proves, almost to demonstration, the falsity of the interpretation of De Lyræ εἰ τὸν ἄνδρα σώσεις; ἢ τί οἶδας, ἄνερ, εἰ τὴν γυναῖκα σώσεις;

 17 Εἰ μὴ ἐκάστῳ ὡς ἐμέρισεν ὁ Θεός, ἕκαστον ὡς κέκληκεν ὁ Κύριος, οὕτω περιπατεῖτω καὶ οὕτως ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις πάσαις διατάσσομαι. 18 Περιτετμημένος τις ἐκλήθη μὴ ἐπισπάσθω.
 ἐν ἀκροβυστίᾳ τις ἐκλήθη μὴ περιτεμνέσθω. 19 Ἡ περιτομὴ οὐδὲν ἐστὶ, καὶ ἡ ἀκροβυστία οὐδὲν ἐστίν, ἀλλὰ τήρησις ἐντολῶν Θεοῦ. 20 Ἐκαστος ἐν τῇ κλήσει ἣ ἐκλήθη, ἐν ταύτῃ μείντω.
 21 Δούλος ἐκλήθη; μὴ σοι μελέτω (ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ δύνασαι ἐλευθερος γενέσθαι, μᾶλλον χρήσαι·) 22 ὁ γὰρ ἐν Κυρίῳ κληθεὶς

1 Gal. 5. 6.
 2 4. 15.
 Col. 2. 11.

1 John 8. 35.
 Rom. 6. 15,
 22.

ch. 9. 21.
 Gal. 6. 12.
 Eph. 4. 6.
 1 Pet. 2. 12.

from various considerations, espec. its being at variance with the context, and with the purpose of the Apostle in this whole Chapter, and the extreme improbability that Paul should have used such an argument. As to Alford's argument that v. 15, 'is not parenthetical,' we do not say that it is; but we do say,—as is evidently the fact—that it contains matter (as Heyd. observes) 'incidenter solummodo, et exceptionis loco interjecta.'

17—24. This portion is digressive; the Apostle therein incidentally touching on other conditions of human life, which ought likewise not to suffer change by reason of the transition from Paganism to Christianity; showing by those examples, that the Gospel does not dissolve, or interfere with, civil relations, or any other obligations before contracted, or which may be incumbent on men by their situation in life. At the same time this portion forms, as Hyper. remarks, a general conclusion to the whole of the foregoing disputation. Accordingly, εἰ μὴ is for ἀλλὰ, or πλὴν; as at Matt. xii. 9. Rom. xiv. 14. Gal. i. 7, and often in the Class. writers; and thus it is, as Billr. observes, 'introductory of a limitation arising from what is immediately to follow.' What precedes (continues he) holds good in so far as (in all cases in which) what I am about to mention does not occur.' In this way Paul takes occasion in what follows more fully to illustrate the point,—that each ought to retain those relations under which he stood when he was called.

17. καὶ οὕτως ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις. π. δ.] A brief mode of expression, introducing two examples illustrative of the sense, in which something is left to be supplied to make up the sense; q. d. 'And so I ordain [not in your case only, but] to be done in all the Churches [which I govern]. At ver. 18 we have an illustration by example of the preceding precept. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Any one is [we will suppose] circumcised: [then] let him, &c. At μὴ ἐπισπάσθω supply τὴν ἀκροβυστίαν. Compare 1 Macc. i. 15, and especially see Celsus de Med. v. 2. 25.

19. We have here the reason for the injunction at ver. 18, and that by an argument drawn from the non-necessity of the thing, and its uselessness as compared with something far more excellent.

—ἡ περιτομὴ οὐδὲν, &c.] Οὐδὲν ἐστὶ is equiv. to οὐδὲν λογίζεσθαι at Gal. v. 6, and οὐδὲν ἀφαιεῖ at Rom. ii. 25. The meaning is, 'Circumcision is of no moment, and uncircumcision of no moment.' After ἀλλὰ τήρησις ἐντολῶν Θεοῦ the sense is left imperfect by a kind of intensive apopopesis, by which something, supposed to be obvious to every attentive reader, is left to be understood from the context, or may be said to be inherent in it; as supra iii. 7, οὐτε δ' οὐτεὶν ἰστί τι, οὐτε δ' οὐτεὶν, ἀλλὰ δ' αὐτῶν Θεός, where supply ἰστί τι, i. e. μίγα, as here. This view is placed beyond doubt by Gal. v. 6, ἐν γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ οὐτε περιτομὴ τι λογίζεσθαι, οὐτε ἀκροβυστία, ἀλλὰ πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη: vi. 15, καὶ νῦν κτίσιν, i. e. the being 'a new creature' by spiritual regeneration. 'Hence (observes Est.) it appears that these three things are at least concomitantly the same, [and ought to be considered no otherwise than in connexion,] namely, the keeping of the commandments of God, faith,—which worketh by love (and obedience), and the new creature. It is proper, however, to bear in mind that οὐδὲν must here be taken comparatē, in the sense, nothing that can avail for the ultimate end in view; not, absolutely nothing in itself; for otherwise the rite of circumcision would not have been commanded by God. Thus it is by Phot. ranked with matters that are any thing only by being commanded.' Accordingly, all we can imagine the Apostle to have meant must be, that the things in question were comparatively immaterial,—except so far as men placed dependence on these things as available to the great concern;—in which case they would really be nothing, only shadows as compared with the substance in the Gospel.

20. Here, and in the next verse, a general precept is first laid down, then followed by a special one, introduced by way of example, and to limit and explain the sense of the former. Μὴ σοι μελέτω is an idiomatical expression, signifying, by an ellipsis of πρὸς τοῦτον, 'let not this be a trouble to you: be not solicitous about this [as though it could affect your acceptance with God]; for grace knows no distinctions of bond or free.'

21. μᾶλλον χρήσαι] Something is here left to be supplied from the context; and this is, by most of the ancient and by many modern Commentators (espec. the earlier ones), supposed to be τῇ δουλείᾳ. But the words, to be so taken, must be not a little strained from the more obvious sense. I still prefer to supply τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ, a mode of interpretation at least older than the time of Chrys., since he admits that some took the words of freedom (q. d. εἰ δύνασαι ἐλευθερωθῆναι, ἐλευθερώσθην) and also adopted by Calvin, Hyper., and Crell., of whom the last-mentioned Commentator well points out, that 'the Apostle introduces the ἀλλ' εἰ—χρήσαι, lest he should be thought to take away all δοῦλος, ἀπελεύθερος Κυρίου ἐστίν ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ ἐλεύθερος κλη-θείς δοῦλος ἐστὶ Χριστοῦ. <sup>23</sup> Ἡμῶς ἡγοράσθητε μὴ γίνεσθε δοῦλοι ἀνθρώπων. <sup>24</sup> Ἐκαστος ἐν ᾧ ἐκλήθη, ἀδελφοί, ἐν τούτῳ μενέτω παρὰ [τῷ] Θεῷ.

<sup>m 1 Tim. 1.</sup> <sup>12.</sup> <sup>25</sup> m Περὶ δὲ τῶν παρθένων, ἐπιταγὴν Κυρίου οὐκ ἔχω· γνώμη
 δὲ δίδωμι, ὡς ἡλεημένος ὑπὸ Κυρίου πιστὸς εἶναι. <sup>26</sup> Νομίζω

distinction between slavery and liberty.' Now he does take it away, as far as concerns religion; but not as regards commodum et incommodum. Wherefore, he shows, that 'the case of slavery is not exactly the same as that of circumcision and uncircumcision, since, although the two latter are of no moment in common life, and in religion are ἀδιάφορα,—yet slavery and liberty, though, as respects religion, of themselves they matter not, yet in common life involve an essential difference.' In which view Calvin is of opinion, that the sense is simply this: 'If, in place of slavery, thou canst obtain freedom, this will be more convenient for thee.' I should prefer to supply the term δυναμίς from δύνασαι, if I could be sure that χρησάι was meant to be rendered use. But it is to be borne in mind that χρησάι is capable of many senses, and, among the rest, it frequently has that of having a faculty of being, or being in a certain state, or condition. Thus ἐλευθερία χρησάι would signify, 'become a free man' (a sense confirmed by a passage of Æschyl. Agam. 953, χρησάι δουλείῃ, 'to become a slave'); and thus μᾶλλον will mean, the rather, in preference to some other thing. We have here first a deeply important truth, and then an inference from it; q. d. 'Christ bought you at the price of his own blood; accordingly be ye no longer (i. e. no longer make yourselves) slaves to men, so as to be in bondage to them, performing their behests, to the danger of withdrawing yourselves from your bounden duty to Christ as his bondmen, to the great detriment of your souls, by the tyranny exercised over your bodies.'

<sup>22</sup> ὁ γὰρ ἐκ Κυρ., &c.] This is closely connected with μή σοι μὲλ. at ver. 21, and the sense is, 'for the Christian slave is the Lord's freedman (i. e. in a moral and spiritual sense); and in like manner the Christian freeman is the slave of Christ,' i. e. metaphorically, by being bound to obey his precepts. Comp. Rom. vi. 20—22.

Almost all our English Translators render ἀπελεύθερος, freeman; whereas the true sense is freedman; as the Vulgate and Pesh. Syr. render. It may, indeed, be asked, Is not the master, too, an ἀπελεύθερος Κυρίου? True; but, as Photius has acutely remarked, 'the Apostle places the parallel in this light, the better to comfort the slave, by suggesting a point of superiority over the master.' In fact, the whole is intended, as Calvin says, 'ad servorum consolationem et simul retundendum ingenuorum fastum.'

<sup>23</sup> τμηῖς See Note on vi. 20.
 — μὴ γίνεσθαι δοῦλοι ἀνθρ.] 'do not be blindly followers of men, by conforming to their opinions,' &c. Probably with allusion to the false teachers, above adverted to, and in order to caution the Corinthians against taking an unnecessary yoke, by subjecting their consciences to such dogmatical directors. He then, at ver. 24, again repeats, on account of its importance, the general intinction, with which he had begun to treat on this subject, and with which he concludes,—subjoining, however, for better understanding, the phrase παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ, which has been variously explained, and, indeed, admits of more than one sense. The most probable is, 'conformably to the will of God, and as living in his presence.'

<sup>25</sup> περὶ δὲ τῶν παρθένων, &c.] The Apostle now returns from his digression; and having before treated of the married and the widowed, now adverts to the unmarried of both sexes; for such is the sense here of the expression παρθένος, as is plain from the context. And that the word is used of males as well as females is certain, and well might, since the word was originally an Adjective of two genders.

— ἐπιταγὴν Κυρίου οὐκ ἔχω] meaning, 'I have no special command of Christ [issued by him while on earth] to urge.' This deficiency, then, the Apostle proceeds himself to supply.

— γνώμην δὲ δίδωμι] Some interpret, 'I give my counsel and private opinion.' Others, 'I give my decision.' The former sense is preferable, and it leaves nothing wanting; for surely the very private judgment of an inspired Apostle, even when not suggested by a special revelation, may be thought sufficient to decide in extraordinary cases, on which Christ left no command. Indeed, this may seem meant to be suggested in the words following, ὡς ἡλεημένος—πιστὸς εἶναι, espec. if they be interpreted (with the best Expositors), 'As one who hath been so graciously dealt with by the Lord, as to be entrusted by him with the office of Apostle,' equiv. to ἐδοκιμασμένος ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ πιστευθῆναι τὴν εὐαγγέλιον, 1 Thes. ii. 4; see ix. 17. Gal. ii. 7. 1 Tim. i. 11, 12; a sense strongly confirmed by the similar words 2 Cor. iv. 1, ἔχοντες τὴν διακονίαν ταύτην, καθὼς ἡλεημένοι. The construction is this:—ὡς (οὕτως) ἡλεημένος ὑπὸ Κυρίου [ἐστί] πιστὸς εἶναι, 'as being one who has been so graciously dealt with [as to be favoured with the Holy Spirit, and entrusted with the Apostleship], inasmuch that I am worthy of entire credit.'

<sup>26</sup> νομίζω οὖν, &c.] The Apostle now declares what this γνώμη is; and the sense of this irregularly constructed sentence may be this: 'I consider, then, that this is good, by reason of the present necessity,—namely, that it is good for a man so to be [as he is]. An example of the idiom is adduced by Heydenreich from the Acts Theol. At ὅτι καλὸν ἀνθρώπῳ τὸ οὕτως εἶναι, there is an anacoluthon (as Acts xxvii. 10, θεωρῶ ὅτι μετὰ ὑβρίων—εἶσεσθαι τὸν πλοῦν), for propriety of language would rather have required either καλὸν εἶναι without ὅτι, or καλὸν εἶσθαι.

οὖν, τοῦτο καλὸν ὑπάρχειν διὰ τὴν ἐνεστῶσαν ἀνάγκην, ὅτι καλὸν ἀνθρώπῳ τὸ οὕτως εἶναι. <sup>27</sup> Δέδεσαι γυναῖκί; μὴ ζῆτει λύσιν λέλυσαι ἀπὸ γυναικός; μὴ ζῆτει γυναῖκα. <sup>28</sup> Ἐὰν δὲ καὶ † γήμης, οὐχ ἡμαρτες· καὶ ἐὰν γήμῃ ἢ παρθένος, οὐχ ἡμαρτε θλίψιν δὲ τῇ σαρκὶ ἔξουσιν οἱ τοιοῦτοι· ἐγὼ δὲ ὑμῶν φειδομαι.
<sup>29</sup> Τοῦτο δὲ φημι, ἀδελφοί· [ἔτι] ὁ καιρὸς συνεσταλμένος τὸ n Rom. 12.

 1 Pet. 4. 7.
 3 Eod. 12.
 40—44.

— διὰ τὴν ἐν ἀνάγκην] The sense seems to be, 'because of the present afflicted state of the Church.' 'Ἀνάγκη' is used both in the Scriptures and the Classics for θλίψις, to denote affliction and calamity in general, and, of course, any state of affliction. Here some understand the difficulties of life, and the inconveniences of matrimony. But, then, why should ἐνεστ. have been prefixed? It is in vain to attempt to change this from a special admonition, intended for that time, into a general one for all ages. The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed, that what is said (as espec. appears from ver. 29 seqq.) must have reference to the persecutions for the Gospel's sake, which were then beginning; though at the same time it may, I think, also advert to those peculiar difficulties, in which a religion so much at variance with the customs of the world would involve its professors,—difficulties inseparable from a state of society, where some order of things was struggling for the mastery with the ancient and long accustomed one. Now, in such a situation the married would be liable to many more troubles than the single.

27, 28. We have here the conclusion to the whole preceding discussion.

27. δέδεσαι γυναῖκί; &c.] The terms δέδεσαι and λείψασθαι are in the best writers used of matrimony, with allusion to the vinculum implied. Here it has been debated whether by λείψασθαι ἀπὸ γυναικός we are to understand the dissolving of marriage by death or lawful divorce, or of the being without a wife. The expression itself, from its nature, suggests the former sense; while the admonition following points to the latter. So that the expression was probably meant of both, and should be rendered free; which (as in the case of fitted and fit) will express both senses,—namely, freed and free. The best Commentators are agreed, that the scope of the words of this verse is to prevent the Apostle's meaning in the foregoing γνώμη from being mistaken; q. d. 'Understand not my recommendation of a single life to at all countenance the breaking of the bonds of marriage that have been already formed.' So far, then, from this being (as a recent learned Expositor avers) the γνώμη itself, it is, as Calv. points out, a 'moderatio sententiae, ne quis inductus calibatus commendatione illuc mentem flecteret.'

28. ἐὰν δὲ καὶ γήμης, &c.] By this the Apostle means to correct any misapprehension of what was just before said, as though he had (after the manner of many false teachers at that time, see 1 Tim. iv. 3) almost forbidden wedlock as unlawful.

— γήμης] Several uncial MSS. have λάβης γυναῖκα; but that, as I have shown on Luke xiv. 20, is a vain alteration. The reading γαμήσης [found in some uncials and several cursives (I add nearly all the Lamb. and Mus.

copies), as also several Greek Fathers], and which has been received into the text by Lachm. and Tisch., is probably the true one, since the internal evidence of its Hellenistic phraseology strongly confirms it.

— οὐχ ἡμαρτες, &c.] Wakef. here understands by ἡμαρτ. simply the doing amiss,—a sense not unfrequent in the Class. writers, but which is here forbidden by the context; from which it is plain, that what is here said is directed against those false teachers who (as we learn from 1 Tim. iv. 3) forbade marriage, as if it were sinful, and in no case a state of grace.

— θλίψιν τῇ σαρκὶ] namely, the man, by his being encumbered with the various cares attendant on matrimony, and the charge of children; the woman, by her having to perform, besides the duties of a wife, the duties of a mother, with great pain bearing, and with much trouble bringing up, children. As respects the words which follow, ἐγὼ δὲ ὑμῶν φειδομαι, I am now of opinion that, of the two interpretations stated in my note, the second is not in reality confirmed by the passage of 2 Cor. there adduced; and it is somewhat forced and frigid. More of simplicity, and probably of truth, is there in the interpretation first stated, which was adopted by almost all the Greek Fathers, as it has been by Est. (who explains the term φειδομαι to here mean, 'having them spared the afflictions and troubles of matrimony'), notwithstanding that Augustin (whom he is so accustomed to follow) and almost all the Latin Fathers adopt the second interpretation; and certainly the use of the Present tense is greatly in its favour. Render: 'I [would] wish to keep you free from these evils;' thus answering to τίλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀμειψιμους εἶναι at ver. 32.

29—35. The Apostle here more fully intimates what he meant by the expressions θλίψιν τῇ σαρκὶ ἔξουσιν, and ἐγὼ δὲ ὑμῶν φειδομαι, treating on the former in vv. 29—31; and on the latter in vv. 32—35.

29. The Apostle, in this and the next two verses, means to inculcate a sitting loose to the things of this world, for the reason subjoined,—that we cannot long keep what we now possess.

— τοῦτο δὲ φημι, ἀδελφοί· [ἔτι] So I now edit, since, although the ἔτι has been cancelled by almost all the recent Editors, it may very possibly be genuine. It is found in all the MSS. in the other passage where this formula occurs,—namely, 1 Cor. xv. 50, and in the great bulk of the MSS., including all the uncial ones except two here. However, it is omitted in almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, also in Cov. 3, 4, 5, not noticed by Mill; and its authenticity is doubtful.—τοῦτο δὲ φημι, like λέγω δὲ τοῦτο, is a formula of transition, introducing a strengthening of what has been before said, or a farther explanation thereof.

λοιπόν ἐστιν ἵνα καὶ οἱ ἔχοντες γυναῖκας ὡς μὴ ἔχοντες ὦσι 30 καὶ οἱ κλαίοντες, ὡς μὴ κλαίοντες· καὶ οἱ χαίροντες, ὡς μὴ

— ὁ καιρὸς συνισταμένος—ἴστιν] Not inconsiderable would be the aid afforded us towards determining the import of this disputed expression, if we could fully determine the scope of this and the next two verses; but that is by no means the case, nor indeed can the import of the words be certainly ascertained, except by making out what is the sense intended by the Apostle in the expression συνισταμένος. Of the two senses that have been assigned to it, that most approved by the recent Expositors is 'distressful,' which derives some support from the expression ἡ ἰσχυρὰ ἀνάγκη, supra, ver. 26, compared with 2 Tim. iii. 1, ἰσχυροῦνται καιροὶ χαλεποί. This sense is, moreover, supposed to be deducible from the signification that the verb bears,—namely, to hem in, reduces to straits. That, however, needs better proof; to supply which want the Commentators who support that view of the sense are obliged to resort to the corresponding use of angustus in Latin. But that affords no direct evidence; because angustus invariably signifies 'narrow,' and never 'short.' More attention might seem due to the passages adduced from 1 Macc. iii. 6. v. 3. 2 Macc. vi. 12. Yet these are not exactly to the purpose. The only other passage is from Symmachus's Version of Ps. lxxii. 21, συνεστῆλετο ἡ καρδία μου. But there, as plainly appears from the Hebrew, it is not distress that is meant, but exacerbation. In short, however agreeable to the preceding context the above interpretation may be, far preferable is the sense, assigned by others, 'contracted,' 'short,' the correctness of which interpretation on philological grounds I have already shown in my Recens. Synop., my Greek Test., and my Lex., to which last I refer the reader. Thus a very suitable sense arises, whereby the Corinthian converts are reminded of the shortness of life, and the transitory nature of all earthly things, even in their best estate; and so are admonished to sit loose to earthly enjoyments, remembering how short the time is as to the remainder of life. See Ps. lxxxix. 47, and Comp. Eurip. Bacch. 375, βραχύς αἰὼν ἐπὶ τούτῳ δὲ τίς ἂν μεγάλη διάκων τὰ παρόντ' οὐχὶ φέροι; espec. Pindar, Pyth. iv. 509, οὐδὲ μακύνων τέλος οὐδέν (nullo rem procrastinans) ὁ γὰρ καιρὸς πρὸς ἀνθρώπων (quod ad homines attinet) βραχὺ μέτρον ἔχει. I would now remark the peculiar suableness of this sense to the following context, espec. considering that this is called for by the formula, serving to usher in what is now said,—namely, τοῦτο δὲ φημι, which has been unfortunately unattended to by almost every Commentator, though it would have been not a little serviceable to them in fixing the scope of the words. On again fully weighing the matter, I am now of opinion, that it has no reference to the preceding context, at least as regards θλίψιν τῇ σαρκὶ ἔξουσιν: for that saying required neither explanation nor corroboration,—nor, if referred to marriage only, did the argument depend on the time (to which the above Commentators refer what is here said), viz., a time of distress and anxiety, it being no other than an universal truth (as are those at vv. 32, 33, and 34, which are introduced as illustrating what the Apostle meant by the ἀμείριμον ἔσθαι), applicable more or less to all times. The only true mode of considering the τοῦτο δὲ φημι is, that it constitutes (as infra, ch. xv. 50, the only passage of the New Test. in which it is found besides the present) a formula, serving to introduce some weighty and important argument, or truth, bearing on the whole subject treated of, including both what has been said, and what might have been said. Now here the subject in question is, as Thom. Aquin. well saw, the bono vivendi modus, both as regards those who are married and those who are marrying. And this is all that is adverted to in the next clause, and probably all that the Apostle at first intended. But, after giving that seasonable admonition,—telling them that it behoved those who have wives to sit as loose to the world, and to be as holy in all manner of conversation, as if they had none, he diverges to a more general admonition as to other modes of life that may likewise prove ensnaring.

With respect to the next words, τὸ λοιπὸν ἴστιν, they may be construed either with the preceding or the following. In the latter case they will have the sense 'reliquum est, ut' &c., as the Vulgate renders; ἵνα here denoting the final ut; q. d. 'There yet remains the obligation that,' &c.—τὸ λοιπὸν will be for ἐν τῷ μέλλον, as λοιπὸν in 2 Tim. iv. 8, equiv. to κατὰ τὸ λοιπὸν μέρος χρόνου. This seems confirmed by the true force of ὁ καιρὸς in this context, 'the time of man's sojourning on earth,' the period of his probation, as regards the working out of his salvation; 'each man's to-day' (Heb. iii. 13), or 'day of grace'; also by a due regard to the weighty admonition following, which is aptly introduced by the τὸ λοιπὸν,—if at least it be regarded (which seems required by the following context) as inferential. Considering, however, that this is a force of the expression unprecedented, and requiring proof, it seems best to acquiesce in the former construction,—the sense of 'shortness' being implied in the rendering, 'as to the remnant of it, brief as it may be, which persecution may leave to us.'

29. ἵνα καὶ οἱ, &c. 'ἵνα here has been variously rendered, according to the different views adopted of the preceding words, either 'when,' or 'that.' But it rather seems to denote, as often, result, consequence, end; the sense being, 'So that they who have wives will be as those who have them not;' at least according to what most recent Commentators consider as the force of ὥσι here and throughout the whole passage. And such may be the sense intended; but from the air of the context, and the words which follow the whole passage (namely, παράγει γὰρ τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου), it would rather seem to be: 'In order that they who have wives may (or should) be as though they had them not.' A very similar admonition, and similarly pointed, occurs in 2 Eadr. xvi. 40–44, which seems to have been in Paul's mind. Comp. what is said by Arrian, Diss. Epict. iv. 7.

30. καὶ οἱ κλαίοντες—ὡς μὴ χαίροντες] This has reference partly to the grief felt from χαίροντες καὶ οἱ ἀγοράζοντες, ὡς μὴ κατέχοντες. <sup>31</sup> καὶ οἱ <sup>ο</sup> Pa. 22. a. James 1. 12. 2. 14. 1 Pet. 1. 24. 1 John 2. 17. 1 Tim. 2. 2. a. χρώμενοι τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ, ὡς μὴ καταχρώμενοι. παράγει γὰρ τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου. <sup>32</sup> Ἐθέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀμερίμνους εἶναι. Ὁ ἀγαπῶς μεριμνᾷ τὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, πῶς ἀρέσει τῷ Κυρίῳ. <sup>33</sup> ὁ δὲ γαμήσας μεριμνᾷ τὰ τοῦ κόσμου, πῶς ἀρέσει τῇ γυναικί.

the loss of those most dear to us, or the joy experienced at their recovery, or preservation to us; though also, in a general way, to whatever events befalling us that occasion sorrow, or call forth joy; and the admonition inculcated (when separated from the peculiar turn of the expression) is, that 'the passions should be, though not apathetic, yet so moderated by Christian feelings as to seem scarcely to exist at all.' So Aristot. Rhet. ii. 15, says of the aged, καὶ οὐτε φιλοῦσι σφόδρα, οὐτε μισοῦσι· καὶ φιλοῦσιν ὡς μισοῦσιν, καὶ μισοῦσιν ὡς φιλοῦσιν.

Of the next words, καὶ ἀγοράζοντες, ὡς μὴ κατέχοντες (scil. ὧσι), the sense is,—'And that those who buy, and sell, and get gain (in other words, 'obtain possession of wealth'), may be as those who are not long to retain their possessions,—namely, as persons who have a mere life-interest (and that precarious) in their possessions, no certain tenure of possession, no abiding condition (Heb. xiii. 14).

<sup>31</sup> καὶ οἱ χρώμενοι τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ, ὡς μὴ καταχρώμενοι] Dr. Peile here objects to the received Version, on the ground that, "had such been the Apostle's meaning, his caution would have been, 'let them not abuse,' not 'let them be as though they did not abuse this world.'" And he proposes to render as follows: 'And they that have the use of this world, as having no hold upon their use of it.' In support of this version he alleges the principle, that καταχρώμενοι signifies 'having the use-simple,' as opposed to χρώμ., 'having merely the usufruct.' Yet even that principle would not be inconsistent with the other version. Accordingly Budæus, as cited by Steph. Thes., adopts, with the significance abusing, also the comparison suggested by Dr. Peile, his words being, non ut perpetui possessores, qui quovis modo uti et exhaurire, quasi jure suo, possunt.' This view, however, is liable to the objection of taking for granted what has to be proved; and, even could that be done, it would make the Apostle only say the same thing in other words. As to the objection urged against the received Version, it has little or no force, since it proceeds on a straining of the words; for the sense of the ὡς is not 'though,' but, taken with μὴ κατεχ., it signifies 'as persons not using,' &c. Even less force is there in the objection urged by Bp. Pearce, that 'not to abuse the things of this world is equally a duty, whether the time the Apostle speaks of be long or short:' which, however true in itself, is not to the present purpose; for the shortness of the time and the uncertainty of the final catastrophe, is surely a strong reason why the things of the world should not be abused, or (to employ a less invidious term) used to excess, lit. 'used to the uttermost.' Comp. a similar passage in 1 Pet. iv. 7. 'And those who use this world as though they used (or rather, I might say, abused) it not.' (See note infra ix. 18.) Thus is conveyed a passing censure at the too luxurious way of living among certain Christians at this seat of Grecian profligacy. Moreover, the interpretation I adopt is borne out by the reading of almost all the most ancient MSS. and some Versions (and which has been received by almost all the recent Editors), τὸν κόσμον (τούτων), since the construction with Accus. (which is very rare) is never employed except in the sense 'to use to the utmost,' 'to use up,' which is found in Lysias, p. 153, 46, and Dionys. Comic. Ὀμων. frag. 2. Of course the construction will be, χρώμενοι [τῷ κόσμῳ] ὡς μὴ καταχρ., τὸν κόσμον. The reason for this, not philosophic apathy but, sitting loose to the things of this world, is suggested in the next words, παράγει τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κόσμου, where the expression τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κ. is not, as many recent Commentators take it, for κόσμος; but τὸ σχῆμα has reference to that external appearance of this worldly scene, which, as we say, makes a figure. Comp. Plato, de Rep. ix. 4, σχήματα ποιεῖν, and Philostr. Vit. Ap. viii. 7, καὶ τί τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου; Indeed, taking the term here in combination with the word following, παράγει, we may trace a dramatic metaphor, with allusion to those grand scenic spectacles, for which Corinth, as well as Athens, was so celebrated. Accordingly, the sentiment here intended may be, that 'the world, and all its fairest forms, is constantly passing away, like the ever-shifting scenes in a theatre;' and thus is impressed the important truth, that the distinguishing characteristic of the world is transitoriness. Comp. a similar sentiment in Sophocles ap. Stob. Serm. 172, ἀλλὰ χαρτοῖσι τε χάρει καὶ κακοῖσιν υἱοχαλῆαι μὴ λίην. γίνωσκε δ' ὅλος νοσηρὸς ἀνθρώπων ἔχει, where νοσηρὸς = state, condition, answers to the σχῆμα of the present passage.

<sup>32</sup> θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀμειν. &c.] The δι is not adversative, but continuative; the Apostle here recommending celibacy by a further argument; and that, as Hyper. says, from three considerations; 1. ab utili; 2. ab honesto; 3. à pio. Moreover, as he observes, the representation is rendered the more forcible by being expressed in the form of a wish.

Ἀμειν. is, of course, to be understood comparatively; viz. 'as much as your respective conditions in life may permit;' q. d. 'my object in speaking thus is to keep you as far as possible unentangled with worldly cares.' The words following are an illustration by example; and what is said must be taken emphatically. The unmarried person, more especially, employs his thoughts so to act, as to approve himself to the Lord; while the married person devotes his chief attention to worldly cares. Πῶς ἀπείκει τῇ γυν., i. e. may promote her domestic comforts, and amply provide for her and her children, which brings a multiplicity of cares. So Menander, cited by Wetstein: τὸ γυναικί ἔχει, αἰνᾷ τε παίδων, Παρμένειν, πατέρα, μερίμνας τῇ βίῳ Πολλὰς φέρει.

34 <sup>q</sup> <sup>10</sup> <sup>20</sup> <sup>30</sup> <sup>40</sup> <sup>50</sup> <sup>60</sup> <sup>70</sup> <sup>80</sup> <sup>90</sup> <sup>100</sup> <sup>110</sup> <sup>120</sup> <sup>130</sup> <sup>140</sup> <sup>150</sup> <sup>160</sup> <sup>170</sup> <sup>180</sup> <sup>190</sup> <sup>200</sup> <sup>210</sup> <sup>220</sup> <sup>230</sup> <sup>240</sup> <sup>250</sup> <sup>260</sup> <sup>270</sup> <sup>280</sup> <sup>290</sup> <sup>300</sup> <sup>310</sup> <sup>320</sup> <sup>330</sup> <sup>340</sup> <sup>350</sup> <sup>360</sup> <sup>370</sup> <sup>380</sup> <sup>390</sup> <sup>400</sup> <sup>410</sup> <sup>420</sup> <sup>430</sup> <sup>440</sup> <sup>450</sup> <sup>460</sup> <sup>470</sup> <sup>480</sup> <sup>490</sup> <sup>500</sup> <sup>510</sup> <sup>520</sup> <sup>530</sup> <sup>540</sup> <sup>550</sup> <sup>560</sup> <sup>570</sup> <sup>580</sup> <sup>590</sup> <sup>600</sup> <sup>610</sup> <sup>620</sup> <sup>630</sup> <sup>640</sup> <sup>650</sup> <sup>660</sup> <sup>670</sup> <sup>680</sup> <sup>690</sup> <sup>700</sup> <sup>710</sup> <sup>720</sup> <sup>730</sup> <sup>740</sup> <sup>750</sup> <sup>760</sup> <sup>770</sup> <sup>780</sup> <sup>790</sup> <sup>800</sup> <sup>810</sup> <sup>820</sup> <sup>830</sup> <sup>840</sup> <sup>850</sup> <sup>860</sup> <sup>870</sup> <sup>880</sup> <sup>890</sup> <sup>900</sup> <sup>910</sup> <sup>920</sup> <sup>930</sup> <sup>940</sup> <sup>950</sup> <sup>960</sup> <sup>970</sup> <sup>980</sup> <sup>990</sup> <sup>1000</sup> <sup>1010</sup> <sup>1020</sup> <sup>1030</sup> <sup>1040</sup> <sup>1050</sup> <sup>1060</sup> <sup>1070</sup> <sup>1080</sup> <sup>1090</sup> <sup>1100</sup> <sup>1110</sup> <sup>1120</sup> <sup>1130</sup> <sup>1140</sup> <sup>1150</sup> <sup>1160</sup> <sup>1170</sup> <sup>1180</sup> <sup>1190</sup> <sup>1200</sup> <sup>1210</sup> <sup>1220</sup> <sup>1230</sup> <sup>1240</sup> <sup>1250</sup> <sup>1260</sup> <sup>1270</sup> <sup>1280</sup> <sup>1290</sup> <sup>1300</sup> <sup>1310</sup> <sup>1320</sup> <sup>1330</sup> <sup>1340</sup> <sup>1350</sup> <sup>1360</sup> <sup>1370</sup> <sup>1380</sup> <sup>1390</sup> <sup>1400</sup> <sup>1410</sup> <sup>1420</sup> <sup>1430</sup> <sup>1440</sup> <sup>1450</sup> <sup>1460</sup> <sup>1470</sup> <sup>1480</sup> <sup>1490</sup> <sup>1500</sup> <sup>1510</sup> <sup>1520</sup> <sup>1530</sup> <sup>1540</sup> <sup>1550</sup> <sup>1560</sup> <sup>1570</sup> <sup>1580</sup> <sup>1590</sup> <sup>1600</sup> <sup>1610</sup> <sup>1620</sup> <sup>1630</sup> <sup>1640</sup> <sup>1650</sup> <sup>1660</sup> <sup>1670</sup> <sup>1680</sup> <sup>1690</sup> <sup>1700</sup> <sup>1710</sup> <sup>1720</sup> <sup>1730</sup> <sup>1740</sup> <sup>1750</sup> <sup>1760</sup> <sup>1770</sup> <sup>1780</sup> <sup>1790</sup> <sup>1800</sup> <sup>1810</sup> <sup>1820</sup> <sup>1830</sup> <sup>1840</sup> <sup>1850</sup> <sup>1860</sup> <sup>1870</sup> <sup>1880</sup> <sup>1890</sup> <sup>1900</sup> <sup>1910</sup> <sup>1920</sup> <sup>1930</sup> <sup>1940</sup> <sup>1950</sup> <sup>1960</sup> <sup>1970</sup> <sup>1980</sup> <sup>1990</sup> <sup>2000</sup> <sup>2010</sup> <sup>2020</sup> <sup>2030</sup> <sup>2040</sup> <sup>2050</sup> <sup>2060</sup> <sup>2070</sup> <sup>2080</sup> <sup>2090</sup> <sup>2100</sup> <sup>2110</sup> <sup>2120</sup> <sup>2130</sup> <sup>2140</sup> <sup>2150</sup> <sup>2160</sup> <sup>2170</sup> <sup>2180</sup> <sup>2190</sup> <sup>2200</sup> <sup>2210</sup> <sup>2220</sup> <sup>2230</sup> <sup>2240</sup> <sup>2250</sup> <sup>2260</sup> <sup>2270</sup> <sup>2280</sup> <sup>2290</sup> <sup>2300</sup> <sup>2310</sup> <sup>2320</sup> <sup>2330</sup> <sup>2340</sup> <sup>2350</sup> <sup>2360</sup> <sup>2370</sup> <sup>2380</sup> <sup>2390</sup> <sup>2400</sup> <sup>2410</sup> <sup>2420</sup> <sup>2430</sup> <sup>2440</sup> <sup>2450</sup> <sup>2460</sup> <sup>2470</sup> <sup>2480</sup> <sup>2490</sup> <sup>2500</sup> <sup>2510</sup> <sup>2520</sup> <sup>2530</sup> <sup>2540</sup> <sup>2550</sup> <sup>2560</sup> <sup>2570</sup> <sup>2580</sup> <sup>2590</sup> <sup>2600</sup> <sup>2610</sup> <sup>2620</sup> <sup>2630</sup> <sup>2640</sup> <sup>2650</sup> <sup>2660</sup> <sup>2670</sup> <sup>2680</sup> <sup>2690</sup> <sup>2700</sup> <sup>2710</sup> <sup>2720</sup> <sup>2730</sup> <sup>2740</sup> <sup>2750</sup> <sup>2760</sup> <sup>2770</sup> <sup>2780</sup> <sup>2790</sup> <sup>2800</sup> <sup>2810</sup> <sup>2820</sup> <sup>2830</sup> <sup>2840</sup> <sup>2850</sup> <sup>2860</sup> <sup>2870</sup> <sup>2880</sup> <sup>2890</sup> <sup>2900</sup> <sup>2910</sup> <sup>2920</sup> <sup>2930</sup> <sup>2940</sup> <sup>2950</sup> <sup>2960</sup> <sup>2970</sup> <sup>2980</sup> <sup>2990</sup> <sup>3000</sup> <sup>3010</sup> <sup>3020</sup> <sup>3030</sup> <sup>3040</sup> <sup>3050</sup> <sup>3060</sup> <sup>3070</sup> <sup>3080</sup> <sup>3090</sup> <sup>3100</sup> <sup>3110</sup> <sup>3120</sup> <sup>3130</sup> <sup>3140</sup> <sup>3150</sup> <sup>3160</sup> <sup>3170</sup> <sup>3180</sup> <sup>3190</sup> <sup>3200</sup> <sup>3210</sup> <sup>3220</sup> <sup>3230</sup> <sup>3240</sup> <sup>3250</sup> <sup>3260</sup> <sup>3270</sup> <sup>3280</sup> <sup>3290</sup> <sup>3300</sup> <sup>3310</sup> <sup>3320</sup> <sup>3330</sup> <sup>3340</sup> <sup>3350</sup> <sup>3360</sup> <sup>3370</sup> <sup>3380</sup> <sup>3390</sup> <sup>3400</sup> <sup>3410</sup> <sup>3420</sup> <sup>3430</sup> <sup>3440</sup> <sup>3450</sup> <sup>3460</sup> <sup>3470</sup> <sup>3480</sup> <sup>3490</sup> <sup>3500</sup> <sup>3510</sup> <sup>3520</sup> <sup>3530</sup> <sup>3540</sup> <sup>3550</sup> <sup>3560</sup> <sup>3570</sup> <sup>3580</sup> <sup>3590</sup> <sup>3600</sup> <sup>3610</sup> <sup>3620</sup> <sup>3630</sup> <sup>3640</sup> <sup>3650</sup> <sup>3660</sup> <sup>3670</sup> <sup>3680</sup> <sup>3690</sup> <sup>3700</sup> <sup>3710</sup> <sup>3720</sup> <sup>3730</sup> <sup>3740</sup> <sup>3750</sup> <sup>3760</sup> <sup>3770</sup> <sup>3780</sup> <sup>3790</sup> <sup>3800</sup> <sup>3810</sup> <sup>3820</sup> <sup>3830</sup> <sup>3840</sup> <sup>3850</sup> <sup>3860</sup> <sup>3870</sup> <sup>3880</sup> <sup>3890</sup> <sup>3900</sup> <sup>3910</sup> <sup>3920</sup> <sup>3930</sup> <sup>3940</sup> <sup>3950</sup> <sup>3960</sup> <sup>3970</sup> <sup>3980</sup> <sup>3990</sup> <sup>4000</sup> <sup>4010</sup> <sup>4020</sup> <sup>4030</sup> <sup>4040</sup> <sup>4050</sup> <sup>4060</sup> <sup>4070</sup> <sup>4080</sup> <sup>4090</sup> <sup>4100</sup> <sup>4110</sup> <sup>4120</sup> <sup>4130</sup> <sup>4140</sup> <sup>4150</sup> <sup>4160</sup> <sup>4170</sup> <sup>4180</sup> <sup>4190</sup> <sup>4200</sup> <sup>4210</sup> <sup>4220</sup> <sup>4230</sup> <sup>4240</sup> <sup>4250</sup> <sup>4260</sup> <sup>4270</sup> <sup>4280</sup> <sup>4290</sup> <sup>4300</sup> <sup>4310</sup> <sup>4320</sup> <sup>4330</sup> <sup>4340</sup> <sup>4350</sup> <sup>4360</sup> <sup>4370</sup> <sup>4380</sup> <sup>4390</sup> <sup>4400</sup> <sup>4410</sup> <sup>4420</sup> <sup>4430</sup> <sup>4440</sup> <sup>4450</sup> <sup>4460</sup> <sup>4470</sup> <sup>4480</sup> <sup>4490</sup> <sup>4500</sup> <sup>4510</sup> <sup>4520</sup> <sup>4530</sup> <sup>4540</sup> <sup>4550</sup> <sup>4560</sup> <sup>4570</sup> <sup>4580</sup> <sup>4590</sup> <sup>4600</sup> <sup>4610</sup> <sup>4620</sup> <sup>4630</sup> <sup>4640</sup> <sup>4650</sup> <sup>4660</sup> <sup>4670</sup> <sup>4680</sup> <sup>4690</sup> <sup>4700</sup> <sup>4710</sup> <sup>4720</sup> <sup>4730</sup> <sup>4740</sup> <sup>4750</sup> <sup>4760</sup> <sup>4770</sup> <sup>4780</sup> <sup>4790</sup> <sup>4800</sup> <sup>4810</sup> <sup>4820</sup> <sup>4830</sup> <sup>4840</sup> <sup>4850</sup> <sup>4860</sup> <sup>4870</sup> <sup>4880</sup> <sup>4890</sup> <sup>4900</sup> <sup>4910</sup> <sup>4920</sup> <sup>4930</sup> <sup>4940</sup> <sup>4950</sup> <sup>4960</sup> <sup>4970</sup> <sup>4980</sup> <sup>4990</sup> <sup>5000</sup> <sup>5010</sup> <sup>5020</sup> <sup>5030</sup> <sup>5040</sup> <sup>5050</sup> <sup>5060</sup> <sup>5070</sup> <sup>5080</sup> <sup>5090</sup> <sup>5100</sup> <sup>5110</sup> <sup>5120</sup> <sup>5130</sup> <sup>5140</sup> <sup>5150</sup> <sup>5160</sup> <sup>5170</sup> <sup>5180</sup> <sup>5190</sup> <sup>5200</sup> <sup>5210</sup> <sup>5220</sup> <sup>5230</sup> <sup>5240</sup> <sup>5250</sup> <sup>5260</sup> <sup>5270</sup> <sup>5280</sup> <sup>5290</sup> <sup>5300</sup> <sup>5310</sup> <sup>5320</sup> <sup>5330</sup> <sup>5340</sup> <sup>5350</sup> <sup>5360</sup> <sup>5370</sup> <sup>5380</sup> <sup>5390</sup> <sup>5400</sup> <sup>5410</sup> <sup>5420</sup> <sup>5430</sup> <sup>5440</sup> <sup>5450</sup> <sup>5460</sup> <sup>5470</sup> <sup>5480</sup> <sup>5490</sup> <sup>5500</sup> <sup>5510</sup> <sup>5520</sup> <sup>5530</sup> <sup>5540</sup> <sup>5550</sup> <sup>5560</sup> <sup>5570</sup> <sup>5580</sup> <sup>5590</sup> <sup>5600</sup> <sup>5610</sup> <sup>5620</sup> <sup>5630</sup> <sup>5640</sup> <sup>5650</sup> <sup>5660</sup> <sup>5670</sup> <sup>5680</sup> <sup>5690</sup> <sup>5700</sup> <sup>5710</sup> <sup>5720</sup> <sup>5730</sup> <sup>5740</sup> <sup>5750</sup> <sup>5760</sup> <sup>5770</sup> <sup>5780</sup> <sup>5790</sup> <sup>5800</sup> <sup>5810</sup> <sup>5820</sup> <sup>5830</sup> <sup>5840</sup> <sup>5850</sup> <sup>5860</sup> <sup>5870</sup> <sup>5880</sup> <sup>5890</sup> <sup>5900</sup> <sup>5910</sup> <sup>5920</sup> <sup>5930</sup> <sup>5940</sup> <sup>5950</sup> <sup>5960</sup> <sup>5970</sup> <sup>5980</sup> <sup>5990</sup> <sup>6000</sup> <sup>6010</sup> <sup>6020</sup> <sup>6030</sup> <sup>6040</sup> <sup>6050</sup> <sup>6060</sup> <sup>6070</sup> <sup>6080</sup> <sup>6090</sup> <sup>6100</sup> <sup>6110</sup> <sup>6120</sup> <sup>6130</sup> <sup>6140</sup> <sup>6150</sup> <sup>6160</sup> <sup>6170</sup> <sup>6180</sup> <sup>6190</sup> <sup>6200</sup> <sup>6210</sup> <sup>6220</sup> <sup>6230</sup> <sup>6240</sup> <sup>6250</sup> <sup>6260</sup> <sup>6270</sup> <sup>6280</sup> <sup>6290</sup> <sup>6300</sup> <sup>6310</sup> <sup>6320</sup> <sup>6330</sup> <sup>6340</sup> <sup>6350</sup> <sup>6360</sup> <sup>6370</sup> <sup>6380</sup> <sup>6390</sup> <sup>6400</sup> <sup>6410</sup> <sup>6420</sup> <sup>6430</sup> <sup>6440</sup> <sup>6450</sup> <sup>6460</sup> <sup>6470</sup> <sup>6480</sup> <sup>6490</sup> <sup>6500</sup> <sup>6510</sup> <sup>6520</sup> <sup>6530</sup> <sup>6540</sup> <sup>6550</sup> <sup>6560</sup> <sup>6570</sup> <sup>6580</sup> <sup>6590</sup> <sup>6600</sup> <sup>6610</sup> <sup>6620</sup> <sup>6630</sup> <sup>6640</sup> <sup>6650</sup> <sup>6660</sup> <sup>6670</sup> <sup>6680</sup> <sup>6690</sup> <sup>6700</sup> <sup>6710</sup> <sup>6720</sup> <sup>6730</sup> <sup>6740</sup> <sup>6750</sup> <sup>6760</sup> <sup>6770</sup> <sup>6780</sup> <sup>6790</sup> <sup>6800</sup> <sup>6810</sup> <sup>6820</sup> <sup>6830</sup> <sup>6840</sup> <sup>6850</sup> <sup>6860</sup> <sup>6870</sup> <sup>6880</sup> <sup>6890</sup> <sup>6900</sup> <sup>6910</sup> <sup>6920</sup> <sup>6930</sup> <sup>6940</sup> <sup>6950</sup> <sup>6960</sup> <sup>6970</sup> <sup>6980</sup> <sup>6990</sup> <sup>7000</sup> <sup>7010</sup> <sup>7020</sup> <sup>7030</sup> <sup>7040</sup> <sup>7050</sup> <sup>7060</sup> <sup>7070</sup> <sup>7080</sup> <sup>7090</sup> <sup>7100</sup> <sup>7110</sup> <sup>7120</sup> <sup>7130</sup> <sup>7140</sup> <sup>7150</sup> <sup>7160</sup> <sup>7170</sup> <sup>7180</sup> <sup>7190</sup> <sup>7200</sup> <sup>7210</sup> <sup>7220</sup> <sup>7230</sup> <sup>7240</sup> <sup>7250</sup> <sup>7260</sup> <sup>7270</sup> <sup>7280</sup> <sup>7290</sup> <sup>7300</sup> <sup>7310</sup> <sup>7320</sup> <sup>7330</sup> <sup>7340</sup> <sup>7350</sup> <sup>7360</sup> <sup>7370</sup> <sup>7380</sup> <sup>7390</sup> <sup>7400</sup> <sup>7410</sup> <sup>7420</sup> <sup>7430</sup> <sup>7440</sup> <sup>7450</sup> <sup>7460</sup> <sup>7470</sup> <sup>7480</sup> <sup>7490</sup> <sup>7500</sup> <sup>7510</sup> <sup>7520</sup> <sup>7530</sup> <sup>7540</sup> <sup>7550</sup> <sup>7560</sup> <sup>7570</sup> <sup>7580</sup> <sup>7590</sup> <sup>7600</sup> <sup>7610</sup> <sup>7620</sup> <sup>7630</sup> <sup>7640</sup> <sup>7650</sup> <sup>7660</sup> <sup>7670</sup> <sup>7680</sup> <sup>7690</sup> <sup>7700</sup> <sup>7710</sup> <sup>7720</sup> <sup>7730</sup> <sup>7740</sup> <sup>7750</sup> <sup>7760</sup> <sup>7770</sup> <sup>7780</sup> <sup>7790</sup> <sup>7800</sup> <sup>7810</sup> <sup>7820</sup> <sup>7830</sup> <sup>7840</sup> <sup>7850</sup> <sup>7860</sup> <sup>7870</sup> <sup>7880</sup> <sup>7890</sup> <sup>7900</sup> <sup>7910</sup> <sup>7920</sup> <sup>7930</sup> <sup>7940</sup> <sup>7950</sup> <sup>7960</sup> <sup>7970</sup> <sup>7980</sup> <sup>7990</sup> <sup>8000</sup> <sup>8010</sup> <sup>8020</sup> <sup>8030</sup> <sup>8040</sup> <sup>8050</sup> <sup>8060</sup> <sup>8070</sup> <sup>8080</sup> <sup>8090</sup> <sup>8100</sup> <sup>8110</sup> <sup>8120</sup> <sup>8130</sup> <sup>8140</sup> <sup>8150</sup> <sup>8160</sup> <sup>8170</sup> <sup>8180</sup> <sup>8190</sup> <sup>8200</sup> <sup>8210</sup> <sup>8220</sup> <sup>8230</sup> <sup>8240</sup> <sup>8250</sup> <sup>8260</sup> <sup>8270</sup> <sup>8280</sup> <sup>8290</sup> <sup>8300</sup> <sup>8310</sup> <sup>8320</sup> <sup>8330</sup> <sup>8340</sup> <sup>8350</sup> <sup>8360</sup> <sup>8370</sup> <sup>8380</sup> <sup>8390</sup> <sup>8400</sup> <sup>8410</sup> <sup>8420</sup> <sup>8430</sup> <sup>8440</sup> <sup>8450</sup> <sup>8460</sup> <sup>8470</sup> <sup>8480</sup> <sup>8490</sup> <sup>8500</sup> <sup>8510</sup> <sup>8520</sup> <sup>8530</sup> <sup>8540</sup> <sup>8550</sup> <sup>8560</sup> <sup>8570</sup> <sup>8580</sup> <sup>8590</sup> <sup>8600</sup> <sup>8610</sup> <sup>8620</sup> <sup>8630</sup> <sup>8640</sup> <sup>8650</sup> <sup>8660</sup> <sup>8670</sup> <sup>8680</sup> <sup>8690</sup> <sup>8700</sup> <sup>8710</sup> <sup>8720</sup> <sup>8730</sup> <sup>8740</sup> <sup>8750</sup> <sup>8760</sup> <sup>8770</sup> <sup>8780</sup> <sup>8790</sup> <sup>8800</sup> <sup>8810</sup> <sup>8820</sup> <sup>8830</sup> <sup>8840</sup> <sup>8850</sup> <sup>8860</sup> <sup>8870</sup> <sup>8880</sup> <sup>8890</sup> <sup>8900</sup> <sup>8910</sup> <sup>8920</sup> <sup>8930</sup> <sup>8940</sup> <sup>8950</sup> <sup>8960</sup> <sup>8970</sup> <sup>8980</sup> <sup>8990</sup> <sup>9000</sup> <sup>9010</sup> <sup>9020</sup> <sup>9030</sup> <sup>9040</sup> <sup>9050</sup> <sup>9060</sup> <sup>9070</sup> <sup>9080</sup> <sup>9090</sup> <sup>9100</sup> <sup>9110</sup> <sup>9120</sup> <sup>9130</sup> <sup>9140</sup> <sup>9150</sup> <sup>9160</sup> <sup>9170</sup> <sup>9180</sup> <sup>9190</sup> <sup>9200</sup> <sup>9210</sup> <sup>9220</sup> <sup>9230</sup> <sup>9240</sup> <sup>9250</sup> <sup>9260</sup> <sup>9270</sup> <sup>9280</sup> <sup>9290</sup> <sup>9300</sup> <sup>9310</sup> <sup>9320</sup> <sup>9330</sup> <sup>9340</sup> <sup>9350</sup> <sup>9360</sup> <sup>9370</sup> <sup>9380</sup> <sup>9390</sup> <sup>9400</sup> <sup>9410</sup> <sup>9420</sup> <sup>9430</sup> <sup>9440</sup> <sup>9450</sup> <sup>9460</sup> <sup>9470</sup> <sup>9480</sup> <sup>9490</sup> <sup>9500</sup> <sup>9510</sup> <sup>9520</sup> <sup>9530</sup> <sup>9540</sup> <sup>9550</sup> <sup>9560</sup> <sup>9570</sup> <sup>9580</sup> <sup>9590</sup> <sup>9600</sup> <sup>9610</sup> <sup>9620</sup> <sup>9630</sup> <sup>9640</sup> <sup>9650</sup> <sup>9660</sup> <sup>9670</sup> <sup>9680</sup> <sup>9690</sup> <sup>9700</sup> <sup>9710</sup> <sup>9720</sup> <sup>9730</sup> <sup>9740</sup> <sup>9750</sup> <sup>9760</sup> <sup>9770</sup> <sup>9780</sup> <sup>9790</sup> <sup>9800</sup> <sup>9810</sup> <sup>9820</sup> <sup>9830</sup> <sup>9840</sup> <sup>9850</sup> <sup>9860</sup> <sup>9870</sup> <sup>9880</sup> <sup>9890</sup> <sup>9900</sup> <sup>9910</sup> <sup>9920</sup> <sup>9930</sup> <sup>9940</sup> <sup>9950</sup> <sup>9960</sup> <sup>9970</sup> <sup>9980</sup> <sup>9990</sup> <sup>10000</sup> <sup>10010</sup> <sup>10020</sup> <sup>10030</sup> <sup>10040</sup> <sup>10050</sup> <sup>10060</sup> <sup>10070</sup> <sup>10080</sup> <sup>10090</sup> <sup>10100</sup> <sup>10110</sup> <sup>10120</sup> <sup>10130</sup> <sup>10140</sup> <sup>10150</sup> <sup>10160</sup> <sup>10170</sup> <sup>10180</sup> <sup>10190</sup> <sup>10200</sup> <sup>10210</sup> <sup>10220</sup> <sup>10230</sup> <sup>10240</sup> <sup>10250</sup> <sup>10260</sup> <sup>10270</sup> <sup>10280</sup> <sup>10290</sup> <sup>10300</sup> <sup>10310</sup> <sup>10320</sup> <sup>10330</sup> <sup>10340</sup> <sup>10350</sup> <sup>10360</sup> <sup>10370</sup> <sup>10380</sup> <sup>10390</sup> <sup>10400</sup> <sup>10410</sup> <sup>10420</sup> <sup>10430</sup> <sup>10440</sup> <sup>10450</sup> <sup>10460</sup> <sup>10470</sup> <sup>10480</sup> <sup>10490</sup> <sup>10500</sup> <sup>10510</sup> <sup>10520</sup> <sup>10530</sup> <sup>10540</sup> <sup>10550</sup> <sup>10560</sup> <sup>10570</sup> <sup>10580</sup> <sup>10590</sup> <sup>10600</sup> <sup>10610</sup> <sup>10620</sup> <sup>10630</sup> <sup>10640</sup> <sup>10650</sup> <sup>10660</sup> <sup>10670</sup> <sup>10680</sup> <sup>10690</sup> <sup>10700</sup> <sup>10710</sup> <sup>10720</sup> <sup>10730</sup> <sup>10740</sup> <sup>10750</sup> <sup>10760</sup> <sup>10770</sup> <sup>10780</sup> <sup>10790</sup> <sup>10800</sup> <sup>10810</sup> <sup>10820</sup> <sup>10830</sup> <sup>10840</sup> <sup>10850</sup> <sup>10860</sup> <sup>10870</sup> <sup>10880</sup> <sup>10890</sup> <sup>10900</sup> <sup>10910</sup> <sup>10920</sup> <sup>10930</sup> <sup>10940</sup> <sup>10950</sup> <sup>10960</sup> <sup>10970</sup> <sup>10980</sup> <sup>10990</sup> <sup>11000</sup> <sup>11010</sup> <sup>11020</sup> <sup>11030</sup> <sup>11040</sup> <sup>11050</sup> <sup>11060</sup> <sup>11070</sup> <sup>11080</sup> <sup>11090</sup> <sup>11100</sup> <sup>11110</sup> <sup>11120</sup> <sup>11130</sup> <sup>11140</sup> <sup>11150</sup> <sup>11160</sup> <sup>11170</sup> <sup>11180</sup> <sup>11190</sup> <sup>11200</sup> <sup>11210</sup> <sup>11220</sup> <sup>11230</sup> <sup>11240</sup> <sup>11250</sup> <sup>11260</sup> <sup>11270</sup> <sup>11280</sup> <sup>11290</sup> <sup>11300</sup> <sup>11310</sup> <sup>11320</sup> <sup>11330</sup> <sup>11340</sup> <sup>11350</sup> <sup>11360</sup> <sup>11370</sup> <sup>11380</sup> <sup>11390</sup> <sup>11400</sup> <sup>11410</sup> <sup>11420</sup> <sup>11430</sup> <sup>11440</sup> <sup>11450</sup> <sup>11460</sup> <sup>11470</sup> <sup>11480</sup> <sup>11490</sup> <sup>11500</sup> <sup>11510</sup> <sup>11520</sup> <sup>11530</sup> <sup>11540</sup> <sup>11550</sup> <sup>11560</sup> <sup>11570</sup> <sup>11580</sup> <sup>11590</sup> <sup>11600</sup> <sup>11610</sup> <sup>11620</sup> <sup>11630</sup> <sup>11640</sup> <sup>11650</sup> <sup>11660</sup> <sup>11670</sup> <sup>11680</sup> <sup>11690</sup> <sup>11700</sup> <sup>11710</sup> <sup>11720</sup> <sup>11730</sup> <sup>11740</sup> <sup>11750</sup> <sup>11760</sup> <sup>11770</sup> <sup>11780</sup> <sup>11790</sup> <sup>11800</sup> <sup>11810</sup> <sup>11820</sup> <sup>11830</sup> <sup>11840</sup> <sup>11850</sup> <sup>11860</sup> <sup>11870</sup> <sup>11880</sup> <sup>11890</sup> <sup>11900</sup> <sup>11910</sup> <sup>11920</sup> <sup>11930</sup> <sup>11940</sup> <sup>11950</sup> <sup>11960</sup> <sup>11970</sup> <sup>11980</sup> <sup>11990</sup> <sup>12000</sup> <sup>12010</sup> <sup>12020</sup> <sup>12030</sup> <sup>12040</sup> <sup>12050</sup> <sup>12060</sup> <sup>12070</sup> <sup>12080</sup> <sup>12090</sup> <sup>12100</sup> <sup>12110</sup> <sup>12120</sup> <sup>12130</sup> <sup>12140</sup> <sup>12150</sup> <sup>12160</sup>

νομίζει, ἐὰν ἡ ὑπέρακμος, καὶ οὕτως ὀφείλει γίνεσθαι—δ θέλει ποιεῖτω, οὐχ ἁμαρτάνει γαμείτωσαν. 37 Ὁς δὲ ἔστηκεν ἐδραῖος ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, μὴ ἔχων ἀνάγκην, ἐξουσίαν δὲ ἔχει περὶ τοῦ ἰδίου θελήματος, καὶ τοῦτο κέκρικεν ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ τοῦ τηρεῖν τὴν ἐαυτοῦ παρθένον, καλῶς ποιεῖ. 38 Ὡστε καὶ ὁ ἐγκαμίζων καλῶς ποιεῖ· καὶ ὁ μὴ [ἐκ]γαμίζων κρείσσον ποιεῖ.

39 Ὡς δὲ ἐστὶν ὁ ἀνὴρ αὐτῆς, ἐλευθέρα ἐστὶν ὅς θέλει γαμηθῆναι, μόνον ἐν Κυρίῳ. 40 Μακαριωτέρα δὲ ἐστὶν ἐὰν οὕτω μείνῃ, κατὰ τὴν ἐμὴν γνώμην—δοκῶ δὲ κατὰ Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ ἔχειν.

37. 37] acil. ὁ πατήρ.—Ἰστηκεν ἰδραῖος, 'stands fixed in his purpose.' A stronger expression than ἰδραῖος γίνεσθαι would be, which occurs in 1 Cor. xv. 58, in which there is a metaphor derived (as in Eph. ii. 22, and iii. 17) from a statue standing firm on its pedestal (as in Stob. Sermon. i. 4, ἀνδρίας μὴ ἐπὶ βάσει, σπονδαῖος δὲ ἀνὴρ ἐπὶ καλῇ προαιρέσει ἰστών, ἀμτακίτης ὀφείλει εἶναι). The expression implies the absence of all wavering in mind as to whether he is incurring the imputation of ἀσχηροσύνη.—The two clauses, μὴ ἔχων ἀνάγκην, καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἔχει π. τοῦ ἰδ. θελ., are opposed to each other; so, however, that the latter is exegetical of the former; and the general sense is, that 'he feels at full freedom as to his own wish (to keep his daughter), καὶ τοῦτο κέκρ. ἐν τ. κ. α.,' and has come to this determination in his own mind ('I mean, for to keep his daughter unmarried), he does well.'

38. Conclusion from the whole of the foregoing discussion.—ὥστε, 'accordingly,' 'such being the case.' For text, rec., ὁ δὲ μὴ, I have now, with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., edited καὶ ὁ μὴ, from A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and several ancient cursives, confirmed by all the ancient Versions, and by internal evidence, since the text, rec. is, I agree with Alf., 'a correction for contrast; though I do not agree with him in rendering the καὶ—καὶ by 'both—and' (as equiv. to τε—καί); and his rendering of κρείσσον ποιεῖ, 'does well even in a higher degree,' involves an unprecedented idiom, and is forced and frigid. Still less can I agree with Billr. and De Wette, that Paul had intended to write καλῶς ποιεῖ, but, currente calamo, wrote κρείσσον ποιεῖ. This style of Grecism is best accounted for on the principle of Hebraism; for in Hebr. י—often occurs; and very frequently the use of י = Greek δέ, and occasionally for quin tamen = 'however; as in Judg. xvi. 15; in short, like καὶ for καὶτοι. See many examples in Gesen. Lex. in v.

For ἐγκαμίζων in the latter clause of the sentence, Griesb., Scholz, and Lachm. edit γαμίζων. But to be consistent, they ought to have received γαμίζων in the former clause, from nearly the same authorities as those for γαμίζων in the latter part of the sentence; and so Tisch. did in his first edition. The reading, however, in both instances may be regarded as a mere alteration proceeding from the Alexandrian Critics, who considered ἐγκαμ. as unclassical, which indeed is the case; but for that very reason the reading is the more likely to be genuine. Hence

I thought fit to retain ἐγκαμ. in both clauses, which Tisch. has in his second edition restored, —one among the multitude of his wisser second thoughts in that edition.

39. The Apostle now subjoins an admonition respecting viduēs (probably in answer to some inquiry), tending to check their hastily forming second marriages.

—δίδ. νόμον.] The νόμ. is not in A, B, D, and 2 cursives, the Cod. Amst. of the Vulg., and some copies of the Ital., also the Copt. and Basin. Versions, with some Fathers; and internal evidence is against it. Yet it must have been in the text at the time of the framing of the Pesh. Syr. Version, which renders, 'bound by the Law.' I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and it may have been removed by Critics, to improve the antithesis between δίδεται and ἐλευθέρα ἐστίν.

—ἐλευθέρα ἐστίν.—γαμ.] A popular idiom, like one in our own language.—μόνον ἐν Κ., 'so that it be consistent with her obligations as a Christian; i. e. as Theodoret remarks, to one δομίστω, εὐσεβεῖ, 'only with a Christian; such a regulation being, as Augustine ably shows, necessary to prevent the recurrence of those unequal marriages expressly forbidden at 2 Cor. vi. 14.

40. ἐὰν οὕτω μείνῃ] 'as she is' (namely, unmarried), by the same ellipse, as supra, v. 26, ὅτι καλὸν ἀνθρώπῳ τὸ οὕτως εἶναι, prob. a colloquial idiom. The phrase κατὰ τὴν ἰ. γνώμην, signifies 'conformably, agreeably to the judgment I have expressed' (namely, supra, v. 25). No wonder is it that the Roman Catholic Commentators, almost to a man, should maintain that St. Paul, in what is said supra, vv. 6—9. 25—40, recommends a single life, and commends a monastic one. It is truly observed by Prof. Stenerson, that Luther was almost the first Expositor to show clearly, that, so far from the latter being commended, the contrary may rather be supposed. See a good summary of the great Reformer's arguments in the Professor's note. In the next words, δοκῶ δὲ κατὰ—ἔχειν, there is an ellipse of ἐμὲ or ἐμαυτοῦ, the words being, as Dr. Peile says, equiv. to δοκῶ δὲ μοι καμῆ. The sense, somewhat disputed, is not, as Roennm. and Slade, 'I trust that I have; for δοκῶ must at least denote full persuasion, though modestly expressed. So Aristoph. Ach. 904, τρία δοκῶ γ' ἐν ἐπὶ προσβαλεῖν, where Mitchell rightly remarks, that 'δοκῶ thus followed by an Infinitive, and espec. when accompanied by μοι, denotes, not that doubtful state of mind to which a Acts 18. 30.

 32.
 Rom. 14. 5.
 10, 14. 32.
 b Gal. 6. 2.
 1 Tim. 6. 4.

VIII. 1 <sup>a</sup> Περὶ δὲ τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων, ὠδαμεν—(ὅτι πάντες γινώσκον ἔχομεν—ἢ γινώσκis φυσικοῖ, ἢ δὲ ἀγάπη οἰκοδομεῖ· 2 <sup>b</sup> εἰ [δέ] τις δοκεῖ εἶδέναι τι, οὐδέπω οὐδὲν ἔγνωκε καθὼς δεῖ

the present use of language attaches the word to think, but more frequently a full assurance and conviction, as in Aristoph. Pac. 13, and Ran. 1420. Plut. 1186.' This is sufficient to fully answer those who call in question the continual inspiration of the Apostle. With respect to the expression Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ, Bp. Middl. thinks it cannot be taken of the Holy Spirit in the personal sense, but must mean 'divine guidance.' And Wakef. lowers it still further, to 'a divine spirit'; i. e. (as Bp. Middl. on Rom. viii. 9 thinks the phrase may mean) 'a godly frame of mind.' But it must surely imply 'Divine aid,' by the influence and inspiration of the Holy Spirit, sent from God.' That Πνεῦμα Θεοῦ may be equivalent to τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ, the Bishop himself would not deny, since it falls under his own Canon, c. iii. § 6, of nouns in regimine, in which 'the Article is either prefixed to both the governing and the governed nouns, or else is omitted before both.'

VIII. In this Chapter the Apostle (doubtless in answer to some previous inquiry) proceeds to treat of the use of meats which had been offered to idols. By τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων at ver. 1 is meant,—as appears from the resumption of the subject of previous inquiry and present determination,—τῆς βρώσεως τῶν εἰδωλ.—εἰδωλόθυστα does not merely mean 'meat actually sacrificed to idols,' but also 'that part of the victim which was reserved for the use of the Priests;' and from which they often entertained their friends, or gave part to the poor, or sometimes had it sold in the market. Accordingly, it was often purchased to be placed on table at hospitable entertainments, to which Christians might be, and were, invited, and which therefore it became a question whether they ought to eat; for, as the animal, when alive, had been formally consecrated to the use of the god, and had been partly offered on his altar, so the meat might all, in a certain sense, be said to be offered to the idol. In deciding this matter, the Apostle seems to allude to certain plausible arguments employed to justify the use of it; ex. gr., that the idol was not a god, but a mere stock, or stone; and that if this their opinion of the idol was notorious,—their participation of the meat, in the temple consecrated to its worship, could not involve any acknowledgment of its godhead, and therefore could be no more a sin than eating a common meal. This sophistry he confutes, and shows that, though idols were mere 'vanities,' yet, by participating in feasts made of meats which had been offered to them, Christians occasioned a scandal to their weaker brethren, and ought therefore to abstain. These sophistries are alluded to in the word ὠδαμεν (q. d. 'You know, it seems, as well as I'), and are espec. glanced at in the words ὅτι πάντες γινώσκον ἔχομεν, q. d. 'for we all, it seems, you as well as I, have knowledge.' What that knowledge is, appears from the words a little after,—this being no other than what is spoken of at the resumption of the interrupted sentence at ver. 4, ὅτι οὐδὲν εἰδωλον ἐν κόσμῳ, καὶ ὅτι οὐδεὶς Θεὸς ἑτερος, εἰ μὴ εἷς,—words which probably—at least the first clause—formed part of the letter of inquiry sent by the Corinthian Church to Paul, as was well seen by Calv., Hyper., Beza, and recently by Mackn. and Billr. The latter clause may not have been in their letter, but was probably in the mouth (by way of justification) of those who participated in the eating of idol-meats. They boasted of having the knowledge of the one true God; and, on that ground, took the liberty of eating idol-meats; as did the persons at Pergamos, see Rev. ii. 14. The term ἡ γινώσις would seem, from a comparison with ver. 7, and γινώσκis just before, to signify 'the knowledge.' But the words ἡ γινώσις—οἰκοδομεῖ form a gnome generalis, and, as such, must have a general application. Accordingly, we may take ἡ γινώσις and ἡ ἀγάπη as coming under the denomination of nouns used in the most abstract sense: this seems the most probable mode of accounting for the use of the Article. At all events, the sense arising is precisely the same, as referring to knowledge (both secular and religious), when taken by itself, and unaccompanied with love carried into action. Here, then, the Apostle means to say, that of knowledge (espec. that in question) it is the too common effect, when standing alone, to puff a person up with vanity or spiritual pride. Certainly, we cannot suppose the Apostle to mean (as some explain) that it is the necessary tendency of knowledge to puff up; for religious knowledge, if it be sound and true, and secular or human knowledge (as Calv. and Est. have well remarked), 'as being derived from God (the author of all good), does not by its own nature or tendency engender selfish pride and carelessness that others should be benefited; but by the occasion it affords to the professor of abusing it, when there is not the fear of God, and a desire to instruct and edify others. Those who are devoid of that restraining principle must, and do, abuse all the gifts of God (such as health and strength, riches and honours) to the fostering of pride and arrogance. But, when that is the case, we are not to vituperate the gifts (for that would dishonour the Giver), but throw the blame on the persons who, by abusing the gifts, alone are to blame.' Hoc (adds Calv.) propter quosdam sententios dictum est, qui contra omnes artes doctrinasque liberales furiosè clamitant; quæsi tantum ad inflandos homines valeant, ac non utilissimæ sint, tanquam communis vitæ instrumenta.' Of οἰκός, the sense is, 'promotes the edification of themselves, and the furtherance of the Gospel;' by a metaphor derived from the Old Test., where they who increase the happiness of society, or of individuals, are said to build them up, Pa. xxviii. 6. Prov. xiv. 1. See Rom. xiv. 19. 1 Cor. x. 23, and ch. xiv. We have here, as Beza observes, an architectural metaphor.

2. In this verse the sentiment at ἡ γινώσις φυσικοῖ is amplified, as in the next verse that at ἡ ἀγάπη οἰκοδομεῖ is expanded. (Pott.)
 — εἰ [δέ] τις δοκεῖ εἶδέναι [τι] The δέ, not found in A, B, and 7 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), and some γινώσκειν· <sup>3</sup> εἰ δέ τις ἀγαπᾷ τὸν Θεόν, οὗτος ἔγνωσται ὑπ' αὐτοῦ.)

 —<sup>4</sup> ἐπεὶ περὶ τῆς βρώσεως οὖν τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων, οἶδαμεν ὅτι οὐδὲν εἰδωλὸν ἐν κόσμῳ, καὶ ὅτι οὐδεὶς Θεὸς ἕτερος εἰ μὴ εἷς. <sup>5</sup> δ Καὶ γὰρ εἶπερ εἰσὶ λεγόμενοι θεοί, εἴτε ἐν οὐρανῷ εἴτε ἐπὶ [τῆς] γῆς (* ὥσπερ εἰσὶ θεοὶ πολλοὶ, καὶ κύριοι πολλοί) <sup>6</sup> ἄλλ' ἡμῖν εἷς Θεὸς ὁ πατήρ, ἐξ οὗ τὰ πάντα, καὶ ἡμεῖς εἰς αὐτόν καὶ εἰς Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα, καὶ ἡμεῖς δι' αὐτοῦ.

Versions and Fathers, has been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., rightly; for the reasons which I have assigned on James i. 26.

—δοκεῖ εἰδέναι τι] 'fancies that he knows something [great]; meaning, 'is as it were a doxastophor, who is vain of his knowledge, and rests in it, without applying it to practice, by the discharge of his duty to men. Such a person as yet knoweth nothing; neither that, nor any thing else, as he ought to know it, i. e. completely,—namely, because he neglects the true end and use of real knowledge,—practice; and neglects to duly resort to the Fountain of all knowledge,—the light of God's revealed Truth.

3. αὶ δέ τις ἀγαπᾷ τὸν Θεόν] Namely, as Est. explains, by possessing that ἀγάπη just mentioned, whereby he may love God, and consequently his neighbour, for God's sake; studying to make his knowledge, and other endowments received from God, tend to the glory of God and the benefit of his brethren. The words following, ἔγνωσται ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, I would not (with Beza, Pott, Heydenr., and others) explain to mean, 'is made to know,' 'is taught by him'; for although the sentiment arising would be true,—yet, as has been pointed out by Winer, Gr. N. T., p. 215, this is philologically untenable. The sense rather seems to be, 'is known and approved by him,' i. e. 'is recognized as one of his people.' A sense confirmed by Gal. iv. 9, γινώσκεις Θεόν, μάλλον δὲ γνωσθῆναι ὑπὸ Θεοῦ, i. e. 'acknowledged and approved, recognized by him, as belonging to his people'; see more in note there; and, also, the able notes of Hyper. and Calv. on this verse.

4. We have here a resumption of the sentiment above pronounced, together with a concession. The Apostle at vv. 4—6 refutes the arguments urged in defence of eating idol-meats: espec. that the heathen gods are non-existent,—are no gods. This he grants and confirms, but shows, at ver. 7, that the conclusion thence deduced is false.

By εἰδωλόν is meant, not the image itself of the god worshipped under the image, but the so-called gods, deæstæ, thus termed by the Jews in contempt; q. d. a mere 'shadow,' 'a non-entity,' μάταια, 'vanities,' non-existent, much less divine.—Οὐδὲν ἐν κόσμῳ ἔστι is a popular phrase, similar to one in our own language, denoting literally, 'nothing in the world' [mere stocks and stones], things which have no real existence in reum natura, much less Divinity. So Isa. xli. 24, thus apostrophizes idols: 'Behold, ye are of nothing, and your works are nothing.' See also 1 Kings xii. 21. Jer. iii. 9.

5. καὶ γὰρ εἶπερ, &c.] This is meant for explanation, and to anticipate an objection. By λεγόμενοι is meant νομιζόμενοι, i. e. (by the power of the emphasis) only those accounted, not really, such; μὴ φύσει θεοί; as Gal. iv. 8, Comp. Jos. Antt. xvi. 2, 4, τὰς θυσίας—ἀπὸ τοῖς νομιζομένοις προσάγουσι θεοῖς, and Philo, p. 122, οἱ δὲ λεγόμενοι δεσπόται δόξῃ μόνον, οὐ πρὸς ἀλλήθειας νομιζόμενοι ἀνάγκη δ' ὅτι ὑπὸ ἡκούσιν καὶ δοῦλον οὕτως ἡγαγόμενα ἐν τῇ παντὶ εἶναι καὶ κύριον γίνονται ἀπὸ τῆς οὐκ ἀρχῆς καὶ ἡγαγμένων εἰς ὁμοίαν.

Εἴτε ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ εἴτε ἐπὶ γῆς are enumerations of the constituent parts of the κόσμος preceding.—For τῆς γῆς, the reading γῆς is confirmed by Matt. xxviii. 18, ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, though there the MSS. B, D, and 90, have τῆς γῆς, which Lachm. there has received, though here, on the authority of the very same MSS. and others, he edits, as does Tisch., ἐπὶ γῆς—a glaring inconsistency.

—θεοὶ πολλοὶ, καὶ κύριοι π.] Here the θεοὶ are the same with the οἱ λεγόμενοι θεοὶ before; and not to be distinguished from the κύριοι, by which name the gods and goddesses both of Greece and Rome were called. By the same term (denoting power and dominion) the Hebr. ἔλ was used to designate the Canaanitish gods and goddesses adopted by the Israelites; and sometimes the Tyrian Hercules, and such other deified mortals, become tutelary deities; see Bp. Warburton's Divine Leg. vol. vi. p. 388.

6. The connexion of this passage with the preceding, and the scope of the argument, are well expressed by Billr. as follows: 'As respects the eating of flesh offered in sacrifice to idols, we know that there is no idol-god in the world, and that there is no God but one (viz. Jehovah). Although, then, there be what are called gods, whether they be in heaven or on earth, as, indeed, there are gods many and lords many (to the heathen, according to the ideas of the heathen), yet is there to us but one God (i. e. there is only one Being whom we acknowledge as Divine) and one Lord.'

—ἐξ οὗ τὰ πάντα, καὶ ἡμεῖς, &c.] 'from whom, as Creator and First Great Cause, all things have their origin, and we [exist] for Him (i. e. for his service and glory, see Col. i. 16); and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom (i. e. as the immediate and efficient cause) are all things, and we by Him'; i. e. are what we are; 'language (as Dr. Pye Smith observes, Script. Test. vol. iii. 332) in perfect accordance with the uniform testimony of Scripture, which regularly attributes all the operations of the Deity ad extra according to an established constitution of Divine wisdom to the Father, as the supreme Origin, and to the Son, and to the Spirit, as Immediate and Effective Agents.'

By δι' αὐτοῦ, as applied to God the Son, the ancient Commentators understand to be denoted mediately the creation of all things,—and, as respects Christians, a twofold creation, both f Rom. 14. 14, 22. ch. 10. 28. 7 Ἐὰν ἡ γνώσις τινὲς δὲ τῇ συνειδήσει τοῦ εἰδωλοῦ ἕως ἄρτι ὡς εἰδωλόθυτον ἐσθίουσι, καὶ ἡ συνειδήσις αὐτῶν, ἀσθενὴς οὖσα, μολύνεται. 8 Ἡ βρώμα δὲ ἡμᾶς οὐ παρ-

 h Rom. 14. 17. ἰστησι τῷ Θεῷ οὔτε γὰρ ἐὰν φάγωμεν, περισσεύομεν οὔτε ἐὰν μὴ φάγωμεν, ὑστερούμεθα. 9 Ὡς βλέπετε δὲ μήπως ἡ ἐξουσία ὑμῶν αὕτη πρόσκομμα γένηται τοῖς ἀσθενούσιν. 10 ἐὰν γάρ τις ἴδῃ σέ, τὸν ἔχοντα γνώσιν, ἐν εἰδωλείῳ κατακείμενον, οὐχὶ ἡ συνειδήσις αὐτοῦ, ἀσθενοῦς ὄντος, οἰκοδομηθήσεται εἰς τὸ τὰ εἰδωλόθута ἐσθίειν; 11 καὶ ἀπολείται ὁ ἀσθενῶν ἀδελφὸς ἐπὶ

i Rom. 14. 18, 20. Gal. 5. 13. k Rom. 14. 15, 20.

natural and spiritual. Others, however, and espec. almost all the recent Commentators, with reason recognize only a moral creation; explaining καὶ ἡμῖν δι' αὐτοῦ, 'and we [Christians] are by him [what we are];' i. e. regenerated and saved; see 1 Pet. i. 21. As to the Socinian perversion, founded on the distinction here recognized between the Father and the Son, the Apostle, by thus calling the Father the one God, does not exclude Jesus Christ from being the God of Christians, any more than he excludes the Father from being Lord by calling Christ 'the one Lord.' In short, as Dr. Pye Smith (Script. Test. vol. iii. p. 352) proves, 'the Deity of Christ can no more be denied because the Father is here called the One God, than the dominion of the Father can be denied because the Son is called the One Lord.' By this mode of expression it is intimated that Father and Son are one God and one Lord in the unity of the Godhead.

7. In this verse the Apostle briefly refutes what had been urged in the way of excuse on the part of those who had knowledge; and that on the ground that it was not sufficient for them if they knew they were doing rightly, unless they had respect to their brethren likewise (Calv.); q. d. 'You rightly hold that there is but one God, and that the heathen idol-gods are non-entities; but this knowledge the weak have not, and therefore ye do not act rightly.' (Hyper.)

— ἡ γνώσις] 'the knowledge of this,'—namely, that an idol is nought, has no virtue, whether to sanctify or to pollute. In the remaining words of the verse we have a declaration a contrario, and meant to show how it is that all have not this full knowledge: the complete sense being, 'But some, in the secret persuasion of the idol's being something (i. e. a real being), even yet eat of the food, as if it were food offered to some really existing demon; and [their perception of right and wrong being weak and ill-informed] their conscience is, as it were, defiled,—stained in its purity, [and they feel self-condemned:]' i. e. by doing what they believe to be wrong.

8. βρώμα δὲ ἡμᾶς, &c.] This we may, with the best Commentators, regard as spoken in the person of the Corinthians, and as containing the other plea (and that derived ἐκ rerum naturæ), by which they justified their eating idol-meats; q. d. 'But food (i. e. the eating, or the abstaining from certain meats) does not recommend us to the favour of God;' comp. Rom. xiv. 17. To advert to the phraseology;—παριστάνει signifies properly 'to introduce any one to the notice of another,' his superior; and, from the adjunct, 'to recommend to his favour.' So Arrian, Æpict. i. 16, αὐτὰ ἐπαίρειν, ἢ παρστήσαι. Περισσεύομεν καὶ ὑστερούμεθα signify, 'are we the better or the worse [Christians].' The inference (left to be supplied) is,—Therefore it matters not, whether we sit down to table at idol-feasts or not.' To which the Apostle answers, βλέπετε δὲ, &c.; q. d. [True:] 'but be careful, lest the exercise of this liberty of yours, &c.; for such (as the ancient and many modern Commentators explain) is the sense of ἐξουσία, as denoting what is claimed as a right, though it may be an abuse of right. Thus it is shown to be sinful infra x. 15—23.

10. ἐὰν γὰρ—ἰσθίω;) Here we have an illustration by example; q. d. 'Thus, for instance, if any one thus weak see you, who have this [boasted] knowledge, sitting at table in an idol-temple, will not his conscience [weak and wavering as he is] be emboldened, so as to eat what has been offered to idols?' The general sense, however, hinges on the rendering of οἰκοδομῶ, which Weta, Rosenm., Pott, De Wette, Meyer, and Alf., render by the usual sense, ædificabitur,—implying reference to ἀσθενεῖς ὄντος, an irony, involving something very far-fetched and jejune; espec. since irony were here out of place. Hence I still prefer to render it, with many of the most eminent Expositors, 'will be confirmed,' or 'emboldened;' as Mal. iii. 15, οἰκοδομούνται ποιοῦντες ἄνομα, and Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6, αἱ νοθείαι τὴν ἑκείνων οἰκοδομῶν αὐτόν. A Classical writer would have said, ἐπαρθίσαι; for ἐπαρθίσαι often means, to be, as we say, boosted up to do any thing, excited, induced. There is, indeed, a sensus pragmaticus, the full sense being, 'he will be confirmed in his opinion as to the lawfulness of eating idol-meats,' &c.; and thereby be emboldened and induced to do what his conscience tells him is wrong,—to eat idol-meats. The word is well rendered by Schlichting, 'erigetur et excitabitur;' and he acutely remarks, 'qui enim ædificatur erigi solent.'

11. καὶ ἀπολείται] 'and thus by thy knowledge will thy weak brother perish,' &c. 'Ἀπολ.' is a very strong term, probably adopted in order to make an antithesis with ἀρτίζωον; the last clause being intended to place in the strongest point of view the enormity of the offence. And yet the exact amount of evil done (and consequently of guilt incurred) was, as appears from the next verse and ver. 7, inflicting a wound on the conscience of the weak brother, by inducing

τῇ σῇ γνώσει, δι' ὃν Χριστὸς ἀπέθανεν. <sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> Οὕτω δὲ ἁμαρτάνοντες εἰς τοὺς ἀδελφούς, καὶ τύπτοντες αὐτῶν τὴν συνειδήσιν ἀσθενοῦσαν, εἰς Χριστὸν ἁμαρτάνετε. <sup>13</sup> <sup>m</sup> Διόπερ, εἰ βρῶμα <sup>m</sup> <sup>14</sup> <sup>21</sup> σκανδαλίζει τὸν ἀδελφόν μου, οὐ μὴ φάγω κρέα εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, <sup>3</sup> <sup>Cor. 11. 39</sup> ἵνα μὴ τὸν ἀδελφόν μου σκανδαλίσω.

him to do that which he could not reconcile with his conscience. The word must therefore be understood of grievous injury to the soul, and such as, except by the special grace of God, would prove fatally ruinous.

12. What is here said, is meant to further illustrate the enormity of the offence; q. d. 'that the injury and wrong done to the weak brother is regarded as an offence against Christ, by impeding the progress of his Gospel.'

— ΤΥΠΤΩΣ ΑΥΤΩΝ, &c.] ΤΥΠΤ., 'smiting,' 'wounding,' is a strong term, used figuratively to denote inflicting 'deep mental perturbation'; as in 1 Sam. i. 8. and Prov. xxvi. 22.

13. διότι, i, βλάπτει, &c.] We have here the conclusion of the whole reasoning; expressed, however, by the Apostle, through modesty, not in the form of a command (though meant to be such), but, per κοινωνίαν, in his own person. Chrys. and Theophyl., in order to draw forth the full sense here intended, remark, that the Apostle does not say, 'If my brother take reasonable cause of offence, but, if he take offence any how, and not only, I will not eat meats offered to idols; but, no meat at all;' and again, 'not, for a day or two, but, for all my life;' and not merely, ἵνα μὴ δουλώσω, but ἵνα μὴ πᾶσις σκάνδαλισω.' And to the same purpose are the annotations of Augustin, Bulling., and Est. But thus the sense is quite strained; for in so bringing in the term reasonable before cause, and any how after the term take offence, they make the Apostle to express more than, I apprehend, he intended. Still more does this apply to the view taken by Est. who, under the idea of meat, includes not only flesh, but also fish; without a particle of authority: not to say that fish was never sacrificed to idols. It is the meat to be regretted that Expositors so eminent as the above should thus have pressed beyond due bounds a passage which, from its hyperbolical character, required more than ordinary caution; since their interpretation would, if carried out into practice, go far to destroy all that 'liberty' wherewith Christ hath made us free; though, indeed, to determine the true import of the words in question, and their just application for all times, is a point of no inconsiderable difficulty. As a foundation for a correct exegesis, the literal sense should here be laid down with the utmost precision; which, I trust, it may be thus; 'wherefore, if meat (meaning the eating of the meat in question, namely, idol-meat) causeth my brother to stumble [in his Christian course] I shall by no means eat meat for ever [as long as I live] in order that I may not cause my brother to stumble.' Of course, the expression οὐ μὴ φάγῃ εἰς αἰῶνα, from the very nature of the οὐ μὴ-εἰς αἰῶνα, must be regarded as hyperbolical, and requiring due limitation, so as not to be extended to all cases without exception; as, for instance, cases in which life or health is imperilled. Nay, it may be meant only to express in a forcible manner, that 'he would rather never eat meat at all, than cause his brother to stumble, or, it may be, fall in his Christian course.' Comp. Rom. xiv. 21 and Gal. v. 7. At all events, the present passage is to be regarded in the light not of an injunction, but of an admonition,—namely, as to what is fit and becoming in a considerate spiritual person to do; in short, what St. Paul wishes should be done. Certainly, in the application of it for direction in the Christian course, there will be need of no little circumspection, so as not to extend it beyond any case similar to that of eating, or not eating, idol-meat. If carried as far as the words might seem to warrant, Christian liberty would be wholly lost sight of. For, it is truly observed by Prof. Stenersen, 'there are not a few fanatics who, resting on their own opinions only, account several articles of food unlawful, which are not only not unlawful, but confessedly lawful, and such as may be taken with a safe conscience, so that it be with thankfulness to God; and, accordingly, from which, if any one should abstain, in order that he might avoid wounding their consciences, he would not only confirm their superstitions, by his own example, but even omit to do those things which it might be his duty to do.'—'Again, others (continues he) there are who, although they do not go so far as to pronounce actions permitted by God to be evil, yet they would circumscribe Christian liberty within such narrow limits, that not only would Christians firmer in faith be too much subjected to the yoke of other men less competent to judge, but even the faith itself (the doctrine of faith) would be imperilled, if such persons were always to be listened to. (Comp. Gal. ii. 11 seqq. iis. 3—5.) Accordingly we are to have respect both to the persons themselves who account any food unlawful; and see whether they condemn it from the mere pride of differing from others, or whether, through the weakness of their mind, they only hesitate in uncertainty as to the lawfulness, or otherwise; also we must have regard to the notions which they follow, whether they be derived from Holy Scripture [properly understood] or merely from their own opinions; and, moreover, we must have respect to the times and seasons [at which such dogmas are broached] whether they be not such that, if one were to give way to the persons in question, there might be just fear lest the doctrine of faith should be endangered; and whether in such a case one ought not to follow the example of Christ, our pattern, who, although he knew that he was grievously offending the Pharisees, yet did many things lest he should confirm their perilous superstitions, in order that he might take the occasion of teaching them truer doctrine.' The above observations place this not unimportant matter on its proper footing, and merit the serious attention of all sober-minded Christians of whatever denomination: especially as they are confirmed

a Acts 9. 3.
17. & 22. 14.
17. 18.
& 22. 11.
ch. 4. 15.
& 15. 8.
2 Cor. 12. 13.

IX. <sup>1</sup> Οὐκ εἰμι † ἀπόστολος; οὐκ εἰμι † ἐλεύθερος; οὐχὶ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν ἑώρακα; οὐ τὸ ἔργον μου ὑμεῖς ἐστε ἐν Κυρίῳ; <sup>2</sup> Εἰ ἄλλοις οὐκ εἰμι ἀπόστολος, ἀλλὰ γε ὑμῖν εἰμι· ἡ γὰρ σφραγὶς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀποστολῆς ὑμεῖς ἐστε ἐν Κυρίῳ. <sup>3</sup> Ἡ ἐμὴ ἀπολογία τοῖς ἐμὲ ἀνακρίνουσιν αὕτη ἐστὶ·

by the authority of great names in exegetical theology, however widely differing in doctrines. Suffice it to instance Erasmus, Calvin, Hyper., and Melancth.

IX. 1—27. In continuation of the same subject;—the extent of Christian liberty, and the limits of Christian self-denial.—Paul in this chapter treats of the spirit of self-denial,—of which he shows that he had set them an example, by having abstained from many things of far greater consequence than they were called upon to relinquish, that he might not offend weak brethren, 1—18. He then exemplifies the practice of the self-denial in his own case, by first establishing his full claims to be obeyed, on the ground of an Apostleship of a nature fully equal to the other Apostles, and then showing, that he sometimes waived the rights and privileges of Apostleship, and abstained from demanding them, lest he should offend the prejudices of the weak: he then shows that he requires nothing from them that he had not himself done, and continued to do; and points at his own conduct as an example for their imitation.

1. οὐκ εἰμι ἀπόστολος; οὐκ εἰμι ἐλεύθερος; MSS. A, B, and C survive (I add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), and some Versions and Latin Fathers, make ἡ. precede ἀπόστ.; which was approved by Grot., Beza, Matth., and Bengel, and has been received into the text by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But external authority is insufficient, and not made up by internal evidence, which draws two ways. The above Editors urge that the dimas requires this; there being, they think, a gradation from St. Paul's right as a man to his right as an Apostle. But that is taking for granted what requires to be proved, that a climax was meant: it would rather seem that the sense intended is, as Crell. points out, 'Am I not an Apostle, and hence free to exercise the rights and privileges of apostleship?' Wets. and Matth. have ably vindicated the text. rec., though some of their arguments are inconclusive. Est. indeed maintains that the preceding and following context call for ἐλεύθ.—ἀπόστολος: but that is a matter of doubtful disputation. As to Meyer's opinion, adopted by Alf., that the transposition arose from οὐκ εἰμι ἀπόστ. having been omitted by mistake, and then reinserted first, as the weightiest and first treated,—it takes too much for granted; any Rince uses the same argument in defence of the text. rec. The argument in favour of the new reading most worthy of attention (though Alf. sets lightly by it) is, that the transposition was adopted to bring the weightiest question into prominence. But that it should have crept into all the copies but eleven, is improbable. The words οὐκ εἰμι ἀπόστ. are meant to anticipate an objection of the anti-Pauline faction,—that Paul was not one of the Apostles, and therefore had not any such authority. The words of the answer to which, by the interrogation with a negation, have the force of a strong affirmation; namely, that he has seen Jesus Christ in the flesh; which must be understood, not (as some recent Commentators explain) of those visions of an ecstatic kind mentioned at 2 Cor. xii. 1, but of the transaction on the road to Damascus (Acts xii. 13—15), as the course of argument requires. For, as Billr. observes, 'Paul is here vindicating his claim to the dignity of an Apostle, in virtue of which he stood upon a par with the other Apostles; and the justness of this depended upon whether he had received the apostolic office from Christ, in the same way as they had received it.' In short, as Whitby remarks, 'The Apostles being chosen to be witnesses of the resurrection, it was requisite that Paul likewise should have seen him risen. Hence the language addressed to him by Ananias, Acts xxii. 13—15, and his own declaration to Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 26. Accordingly we find that Christ was seen of him, xv. 8; nay, often appeared to him after his resurrection, Acts xviii. 9. xxii. 18.' In the words following, οὐ τὸ ἔργον—Κυρίῳ, St. Paul proves his Apostleship ad effectus; namely, from having, in the actual exercise of that office, converted them to Christianity; which, without Divine assistance, (a proof of his Divine mission) could not have been done. Therefore, by so doing ἀποστολικὴν διακονίαν παπλήρωκε.—By ἐν Κυρίῳ is meant, 'in the business of the Lord and his religion.'

2. εἰ ἄλλοις—ὑμῖν εἰμι.] It is well observed by Chrys. and the Greek Commentators, that Paul here speaks κατὰ συγχώρησιν; i. e. 'granted that I am not an Apostle to others, or, if there be any who doubt of my Apostleship, you at least cannot doubt it, to whom I have approved myself as such:' probably glancing at some who had denied him to be an Apostle, though they acknowledged him as a Teacher.

—ἡ γὰρ σφραγὶς, &c.] These words are confirmatory of the preceding. Σφραγὶς, as it properly denoted the impression made by a seal,—which, being affixed to writings, is a proof and evidence of their authenticity,—so it came to mean generally a demonstration. Thus the sense is, 'Your being in the Lord (i. e. your conversion to Christianity) is a decided proof of my Apostleship' (ἀποστολῆς γὰρ διακονίας ἀποστολικῆς), as a seal is of the authenticity of a writing; or as a seal, put by a workman on his work, proves it to be his work; compare 2 Cor. iii. 2.

3. Ἡ ἐμὴ ἀπολογία—ἐστὶ] Expositors are not agreed whether what is here said, refers to what precedes, or what follows. Most think the latter; but, though a good sense thus arises, it is more agreeable to the course of the argument to refer it to what precedes; as is done by the most eminent Expositors, ancient and modern. See Calvin and Hyper. 'Ἀπολογία and ἀνάκρ.' are

4<sup>b</sup> Μὴ οὐκ ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν φαγεῖν καὶ πιεῖν ; 5<sup>b</sup> μὴ οὐκ ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα περιάγειν, ὥς καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι, καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ Κυρίου, καὶ Κηφᾶς ; 6<sup>a</sup> ἢ μόνος ἐγὼ καὶ Βαρνάβας οὐκ ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν τοῦ μὴ ἐργάζεσθαι ; 7<sup>c</sup> Τίς στρατεύεται ἰδίοις ὀφωνίοις ποτέ ; τίς φυτεύει ἀμπελῶνα, καὶ

b ver. 14.
1 Thess. 2. 8.
2 Thess. 1. 6.
c Matt. 11. 12.
d 1 Thess. 3.
e 2 Thess. 3.
f John 11. 15.
g 1 Pet. 5. 2.
Deut. 20. 6.

forensic terms, used by Paul in order to glance at the arrogance of those who sat in judgment (ἀνακρ.) on his Apostleship, debating on his claims; as if, because he had waived the use of his privilege of Apostle, he was no Apostle, but only an ordinary minister.

4. Having vindicated his Apostleship, he adverts to his rights and privileges therein; which, however, he shows, by examples, he had often forborne to use.

— ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν φαγεῖν, &c.] Ἐχομεν is by the best Commentators taken for ἔχω. By φαγεῖν καὶ πιεῖν is meant maintenance suitable to the situation which they held; a right originally granted to the Apostles by our Lord, Matt. x. 9.

5. ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα περιάγειν] A similar use of περιάγειν occurs in Demosth., p. 958, 15, τρεῖς παῖδας ἀκολούθου περιάγειν, and Theopomp. ap. Athen. 260, περιήγοντο δύο καὶ τρεῖς τταυρομένοντι. Juv. Sat. i. 122, 'circumducitur uxor.' The term γυναῖκα admits of the sense either a wife, or a woman. But the former is more likely to be the sense here intended; and this is confirmed by what Clem. Alex. says,—namely, that the Apostles carried about their wives with them out of the Church funds. That he did not take γυν. in the sense woman, is clear from this, that he adduces these words by way of confuting the opponents of clerical matrimony. And though (led away by the ascetic superstition of his age) he adds, that they did not live with them as wives, but as sisters, yet that is refuted by what he himself subjoins,—namely, that several of the Apostles had children. The above view of the sense has been adopted by almost every modern Commentator of note (except Est., and the other Roman Catholic Expositors), among whom Calv., Hyper., Bulling., Grot., Wolf, Whitby, Mackn., Heydenr., Fott, and Stenerson, merit especial attention. They have clearly shown how untenable is the interpretation, 'a woman.' That the ancient Fathers should have adopted it is no wonder, considering the spirit, which arose at a very early period of the Church, of depreciating matrimony, and exalting celibacy. So great, indeed, was the solicitude to exclude aught in Scripture that might at all countenance clerical marriages, that the text here was tampered with, to make it bear a sense such as should exclude the hated doctrine; but in vain, for the MSS. almost universally have the received reading, which is also confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version. In order, however, the better to determine what is the exact import of the words ἀδελφ. γυν., it will be proper to pay especial attention to the construction, which is peculiar, and which is the more important to be determined, as having some bearing on the sense. Now it may come under the case of appositio epepnetica (on which see Matth. Gr. § 431, and Jelf, Gr. § 467), occurring in Eph. i. 7, and ii. 15. Sometimes, however, the apposition is not so much for explanation's sake, as to note the purpose to which the foregoing substantive serves, as in Hdot. i. 205, γαφύρας ζυγυύων ἐπὶ ποταμοῦ, διὰ βασιλιν τῷ στρατῷ, 'to serve for passage to the army.' Æschyl. Agam. 953, ὅσαι τις ἀρβύλας Ἀλφειῷ—ἔμβασιν ποδῶ, 'serving for something to slip the foot in' (equiv. to a slipper). And so Anaxand. Incert. Frag. i. 5, ἔχει γυναῖκα δίσκουαν, 'a wife as a mistress [to domineer].' And to this purpose is the Homeric γυνὴ δίσκουα, 'a wife to govern the family,' and γυνὴ ταμὴν, 'a wife to keep the house,' to be a housekeeper. And such is, I apprehend, the force of the apposition in the present passage. Thus the true sense appears to be, 'to carry about with them [on their journeys] a sister [a Christian woman], a wife,' i. e. supposing the apposition to be epexegetic; but, if it be to denote purpose, we may render, 'as' or 'for a wife'; an expression prob. resorted to for the purpose of including, in the argument for a right to maintenance, such as being not married might yet require,—the domestic care and attention of some woman 'in loco uxoris.' It is probable that the person—whether wife or otherwise—was taken about for the purpose also of ministering to the Grecian wives, or maidens, to whom otherwise the doctrine of the Gospel could not have obtained access.

6. ἢ μόνος ἐγὼ, &c.] meaning, 'or am I only and Barnabas to be made exceptions to the general rule,—that Apostles have the privilege,' &c. P. Doddr. supposes μόνος ἐγὼ to point at some peculiar spleen, which had arisen against the two Apostles of the uncircumcision. But it would rather seem that this was espec. expected from them, by the circumstances under which they had begun and carried forward the work of evangelization; which had led them first to adopt, and afterwards to persevere in, the method of subsisting by their own labour, and, prob. with the same view, of practising celibacy. The drift of the Apostle, in adverting to his having waived this liberality, was, prob., that the Corinthians might see, as in a glass, the impropriety of their selfish exercise of their liberty in eating εἰδωλόθρυτα.

7—14. The Apostle here adduces arguments for the right in question, and illustrates it by three examples; two taken from common life, and the custom of the Gentiles, the third from the injunctions of the Mosaic Law.

7. τίς στρατεύεται ἰδ. ὀφ. π.;] 'Who ever serves as a soldier at his own expense?'—At καὶ ἐκ τοῦ καρποῦ αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἐσθίει; we may suppose either an ellips. of μέρος τι, by a Hebraism, or a partitive construction, more or less common to all languages. Ἐσθίειν has here the sense 'to feed oneself,' as 2 Kings iv. 42, and Judith x. 5. xiii. 11. On the construction, see my Lex. The apposition, left to be supplied, is, 'So neither ought the Apostles.'

ἐκ τοῦ καρποῦ αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἐσθίει; ἢ τίς ποιμαίνει ποίμνην, καὶ ἐκ τοῦ γάλακτος τῆς ποίμνης οὐκ ἐσθίει; <sup>8</sup> Μὴ κατὰ ἄνθρωπον ταῦτα λαλῶ; ἢ οὐχὶ καὶ ὁ νόμος ταῦτα λέγει; <sup>9</sup> Ἐν γὰρ τῷ Μωϋσέως νόμῳ γέγραπται· Οὐ φιμώσεις βοῦν ἀλοῶντα. <sup>10</sup> Μὴ τῶν βοῶν μέλει τῷ Θεῷ; <sup>11</sup> ἢ δι' ἡμᾶς πάντως λέγει; δι' ἡμᾶς γὰρ ἐγράφη, ὅτι ἐπ' ἐλπίδι ὀφείλει ὁ ἀροτριῶν ἀροτριάειν, καὶ ὁ ἀλοῶν τῆς ἐλπίδος αὐτοῦ μετέχειν ἐπ' ἐλπίδι. <sup>12</sup> Εἰ ἡμεῖς ὑμῖν τὰ πνευματικά ἐσπείραμεν, μέγα, εἰ ἡμεῖς ὑμῶν τὰ σαρκικά θερίσομεν; <sup>13</sup> Εἰ ἄλλοι τῆς ἐξουσίας ὑμῶν μετέχουσιν, οὐ μᾶλλον ἡμεῖς; Ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐχρησάμεθα τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ ταύτῃ· ἀλλὰ πάντα στέγομεν, ἵνα μὴ ἐγκοπὴν τινα δώμεν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ

8—11. To human enactments are now subjoined Divine sanctions; there being, too, a conclusio à minori ad majus.

8. κατὰ ἄνθρωπον] i. e. by a reference to the practice of men and the sanction of human law, as opposed to arguments drawn from Scripture; q. d. 'Is the principle I speak of—that the labourer is worthy of his reward—a principle of human law [only], or is it not also recognized in the Divine law of Scripture?' The γὰρ has reference to the affirmation implied in the immediately foregoing interrogation; q. d. '[Yea:] for, &c.

9. μὴ τῶν βοῶν] Supply μόνον, suggested by the emphasis, whence also is implied, 'and not of men also?' For perspicuity, however, there is added, ἢ δι' ἡμᾶς πάντως λέγει; 'Or saith he it [not] espcc. for us [men]?' q. d. 'may not men learn much from this?—namely, that (by an argument à minori ad majus) the ministers of the Gospel have a right to maintenance?' Then the words following, ver. 10, directly affirm what was only before indirectly propounded.

10. καὶ ὁ ἀλοῶν, &c.] With these words both the ancient and modern Interpreters have been perplexed. The numerous varr. lectt. only show that the ancients felt the difficulty, and endeavoured to remove it in the same manner as have some moderns,—namely, by Critical conjectures. Griesbach and others edit (from a few MSS. and some Versions and Fathers) ὅτι ὁφ. ἐπ' ἐλπίδι ὁ δ. d. καὶ ὁ ἀλοῶν, ἐπ' ἐλπίδι τοῦ μετέχειν. But I agree with Rinck, that this is 'magis facilius intellectum quam verius.' And he truly remarks, that no one would have added the somewhat obscure words τῆς ἐλπίδος αὐτοῦ, by way of explanation, and least of all in an inverse order. Besides, external authority for the two alterations is insufficient; being for the first A, B, C, and 9 cursives; and for the second, A, B, C, and 3 cursives; and I can make no addition from the Lamb. and Mus. copies. However, I find both readings in Cor. 2, though omitted to be noticed by Mill: so that it may have place in other cursives, equally ill collated as that ancient and choice MS., which I have recollated throughout. In short, the passage needs not emendation, but explanation; and the following will, I apprehend, be found the true construction and interpretation: καὶ ὁ ἀλοῶν (ὀφείλει ἀλοῦν) ἐπ' ἐλπίδι (τοῦ) μετέχειν τῆς ἐλπίδος αὐτοῦ, 'And he that reapeth ought to reap in hope to partake of [the fruits of] his hope.' So Horace speaks of the husbandman as 'spe suus dura ferentem;' where we have an argutè dictum united with a paronomasia, such as is frequent in St. Paul. Of this sense of ἐλπίς (as denoting the object of hope), see other examples in my Lex. In this phrase the ἐπὶ denotes the ground of hope,—that on which it is founded and rests: and μετέχειν is put for ἔχειν or χρῆσθαι, as in Heb. v. 13. Herodot. vi. 107. Xen. Econ. xvii. 6. So Thucyd. (vii. 69) has ἡλικίας μετέχων.

11. The Apostle, continuing the above agricultural figure, now proceeds to show, by another argument à minori ad majus (similar to that at Rom. xv. 27), that, on principles of commutative justice, ministers are fairly entitled to a competent provision; q. d. 'If, for instance, we [the ministers of the Gospel] have committed to you, as it were, the seed of spiritual and religious instruction, is it a mighty matter (i. e. an unreasonable thing) that we should reap and enjoy the carnal and temporal supports you can supply us with?' The argument proceeds on the inequality of that which is given and that received.—At μέγα supply μῦτι εἰς, and ἔργον, expressed in Eurip. Inc. Frag. 401, τὸν λαβόντα τῶν λόγων καλὰς ἀπορροὰς, οὐ μὲν ἔργον εἰ λέγειν. This ellipsis (which occurs also at 2 Cor. xi. 15) is rare in Greek; while in the Latin, magnus, so used, is common.—τὰ σαρκεὰ θερ., 'enjoy the corporeal supports of your substance.'

12. εἰ ἄλλοι, &c.] Another argumentum à minori ad majus. By ἄλλοι are meant these who had casually visited and evangelized the Corinthians; and of whom some probably settled at Corinth, and became the ψευδοδιδασκῆται, false teachers, so often alluded to by St. Paul, and whose own conduct, in this respect, was directly the reverse of the Apostle's, evincing both tyranny and rapacity.

—τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ ὑμῶν] The best Commentators are, with reason, agreed that ἐξουσία here signifies right, as in Matt. xxi. 23. Acts xxvi. 10, and elsewhere; and moreover, that ὑμῶν is a Genit. of object for als ἡμᾶς, as ἐξουσία κυριατέων, 'power over spirits,' in Matt. x. 1, and ἐξ. πάσης σαρκός, in John xvii. 2. However, the true ratio idiomatis may be, that as μετέχουσιν ἐξουσίας is a compound phrase, equivalent to ἐξουσιασάουσι, it may take the same regimen as that would,—namely, the Genit.

—ἀλλὰ πάντα στέγομεν] Στίγος (cognate

τοῦ Χριστοῦ. <sup>13</sup> <sup>k</sup> Οὐκ οἶδατε, ὅτι οἱ τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζόμενοι ἐκ
 τοῦ ἱεροῦ ἐσθίουσιν οἱ τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ προσεδρεύοντες τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ συμμερίζονται; <sup>14</sup> οὕτω καὶ ὁ Κύριος διέταξε τοῖς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον καταγγέλλουσιν, ἐκ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ζῆν. <sup>15</sup> <sup>l</sup> Ἐγὼ δὲ οὐδενὶ ἐχρησάμην τούτων. οὐκ ἔγραψα δὲ ταῦτα, ἵνα οὕτω γένηται ἐν ἐμοί· καλὸν γάρ μοι μᾶλλον ἀποθανεῖν, ἢ τὸ καύχημά μου ἵνα τις κενώσῃ. <sup>16</sup> <sup>m</sup> Ἐὰν γὰρ εὐαγγελιζώμαι, οὐκ ἔστι μοι καύχημα· ἀνάγκη γάρ μοι ἐπικεῖται· οὐαὶ δέ μοι ἐστὶν ἐὰν μὴ εὐαγγελιζώμαι. <sup>17</sup> <sup>n</sup> εἰ γὰρ ἐκὼν τοῦτο πράσσω, μισθὸν ἔχω·
 εἰ δὲ ἄκων,—οἰκονομίαν πεπίστευμαι. <sup>18</sup> <sup>o</sup> Τίς οὖν μοι ἐστὶν ὁ;

<sup>k</sup> Num. 18.
<sup>l</sup> Deut. 12. 1.

<sup>1</sup> Acts 18. 2.
<sup>2</sup> 20. 2.
<sup>3</sup> ch. 4. 12.
<sup>4</sup> 2 Cor. 11. 10.
<sup>5</sup> 1 Thess. 2. 9.
<sup>6</sup> 2 Thess. 2. 8.

<sup>m</sup> Rom. 1.
<sup>n</sup> Acts 9. 6.

<sup>o</sup> ch. 9. 14.
<sup>p</sup> 4. 1.
<sup>q</sup> Col. 1. 26.
<sup>r</sup> 2 Cor. 11.

with τίγω, tego signifies properly, 'to keep out,' or 'off' (as a ship when it is not leaky), or 'to keep in,' as a vessel to hold liquid. Hence it comes to mean continue and sustain. See my note on Thucyd. ii. 94, 10. Kypke well explains: 'Sed continemus nos, que [omnia] nempe alios offendere possint: 'ὅς ἡρώμεθα τῇ ἰξουσίᾳ ἡμῶν, namely, that of receiving a stipend.—ἰγκότης δάμων is for ἰγκόπτεσθαι, 'should hinder the [success of] the Gospel; i. e. 'by the people grudging the expense of my maintenance, and imputing to me interested motives.'

13. Here we have another argument in proof of his Apostolic rights, derived from the Mosaic Law.—τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζ., is for ἱερατεύοντες, 'qui sacris operantur,' meaning those who officiate in the worship of the Temple. Wetst. compares Hom. Od. i. 101, οἳ τὰ θεοῖσι ἱερὰ τε δίδουσι. The words οἱ τῷ θεῷ προσεδρεύοντες, &c. form a parallelism; though the superior priesthood, who especially attended at the altar, seem by those words to be designated, as by τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζ. the inferior. See Chrysost. On προσεδρ., see note at vii. 35, and comp. προσεῖχιν τῷ θεῷ. in Heb. vii. 13.

14. Here we have further argument in vindication of the above right.—διέταξε, for διέταγμα ἰπώσις, or ἰσοδοτία, namely, at Matt. x. 10, and Luke x. 7. In τοῖς καταγγέλλουσιν we have a Dut. of reference, instead of an Accus. with Prepos. With the sentiment comp. Joseph. Bell. v. 13, 6, ἄλλων, ὅς δὲ μὴ ἀδείας καταχρησάσθαι τοῖς θεοῖσι ἐπὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ τοῖς τῷ ναῷ στρατευομένοις ἐξ αὐτοῦ τρέφεσθαι.

15. Having thus asserted his right, the Apostle now shows that he has not used this right, and why.—ὁ δὲ οὐδενὶ, &c., the ἰγὼ (as at xi. 23. xv. 9) is emphatic: 'I at least, (I for my part,) whatever others may do.—οὐδενὶ τούτων, i. e. none of the things which pertain to that right, and are included in it (see vv. 4, 5), i. e. neither money, nor its equivalent.—ἵνα οὕτω γένη. ἐν ἐμοί, 'that this should be done in my case.'

—ἢ ἵνα τις κενώσῃ meaning, 'rather than any one should be enabled to make void my boasting [namely, that I am burdensome to none], by being enabled to assert that I took pay.'—τὸ καυχ., meaning, 'that whereof I may be proud.'

16. The full sense here intended may be thus expressed in paraphrase: ['I say matter of glorying; for though I should preach the Gospel (i. e. in simply preaching the Gospel, without reference to a personal interest in its success), I have no ground for boasting.—ἀνάγκη γάρ μοι Vol. II.

ἰπικός, 'for a [moral] necessity lies upon me [so to do], if I would avoid punishment for disobedience; q. d. 'do it I must,' for οἰκονομίαν πεπίστευμαι where observe the inversion of construction for ἡ οἰκ. πεπίστευται μοι, as Rom. iii. 2. Comp. Thucyd. vii. 57, ἐνὶ βίῃ δὲ τοῖς Κρησὶ—ἰπὶ τοῖς Ἀπὸικον ἀκοντας μετὰ μισθοῦ ἰλθαῖν, where see my note.

17. This verse is supplementary to the preceding, with which it forms a slight digression, suggested by τὸ καύχημά μου, ver. 15; at the same time that it furnishes the equiv. term ὁ μισθός, ver. 18; as though the Apostle, on returning thither from his digression, had said, 'What then is that wherein I glory, and find my recompense for my utmost services in evangelizing the world?' For that μισθὸν ἔχω is nearly identical with καύχημα ἔχω will be seen by a comparison of Rom. iv. 2, 4 (Dr. Peile). The above annotation is supported by, perhaps founded on, the matter contained in my Recens. Synopt., and espec. the admirable exegesis there adduced from (Ecumen. (chiefly formed on the Commentary of Chrysost.), by which the words are understood to denote 'something which any one has done without being impelled by Divine injunction and command, which, if he had not done, he would have incurred punishment; but which he has undertaken of his own accord, and thus looks for a suitable reward.' It is, of course, implied in the particular 'do it I must,' that he is doing no more than it is his strict duty to do, and so cannot call himself other than δοῦλος ἀχρεῖος, Luke xvii. 10, 'without any claim for reward.'

18. The import of this verse mainly depends upon the force assigned to the expression μισθός, on which some difference of opinion exists. Most Expositors take it in its ordinary sense, and Wetst., Rosenm., and others, here recognize an acutè dictum; q. d. 'What, then, is my reward? why, truly, to receive no reward at all.' But, though such terms do occasionally occur in the writings of the Apostle, they are not to be supposed unnecessarily. And here the sentiment would not suit the context; for the οὖν is here meant to introduce a conclusion from the foregoing premises. That sense, too, is forbidden by the phrase ἵνα θῶμαι, which rather denotes the means, than the mode. It is best, with the ancient, and the early modern Commentators generally, to consider μισθός here used, by metonymy, for the cause of reward, the ground of boasting; for the two are, in the present passage, interchanged; q. d. 'What, then, is my μισθός; ἵνα εὐαγγελιζόμενος ἀδάπανον θήσω τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, εἰς τὸ μὴ καταχρήσασθαι τῇ ἐξουσίᾳ μου ἐν τῷ εὐαγγε-

p Gal. 5. 12.
Matt. 18. 12.

q Acta 16. 3.
21. 22, etc.

λίῳ. 19 ῥ' Ἐλεύθερος γὰρ ὢν ἐκ πάντων, πᾶσιν ἐμαυτὸν ἐδού-λωσα, ἵνα τοὺς πλείονας κερδήσω. 20 ῥ Καὶ ἐγενόμην τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ὡς Ἰουδαῖος, ἵνα Ἰουδαίους κερδήσω τοῖς ὑπὸ νόμον ὡς ὑπὸ νόμον, μὴ ὡν αὐτοὶ ὑπὸ νόμον ἵνα τοὺς ὑπὸ νόμον κερδήσω ῥ Gal. 2. 2.
ch. 7. 23.

claim of reward,' or 'ground of glorying,—the thing in which I am superior to the other Apostles? namely, this, that I preach the Gospel to you without charge, and do not use my power of living at your expense.' See Calv. and Hyper. —καταχρ. is usually taken for χρησάσθαι, compound for simple. Yet that the compound should here be used without some cause, can hardly be supposed. It would rather seem that the Prep. κατὰ is, as often, intensive; and the sense intended is 'ut percutat,' 'that I may use to the uttermost:' meaning (as Calv. suggests) to intimate, that the pressing his right in a case like this would be a kind of abuse of it. In fact, καταχρ. here seems to correspond to καταχρ. supra vii. 31 (by a kind of significatio praeferentiae), the full sense being, 'so as to not use (or rather I might say abuse) my power.'

19. Having, at vv. 2—18, spoken with reference to the question οὐκ εἰμι ἀπόστολος (showing that he had, for avoiding offence, waived his right as Apostle, and preached the Gospel cost-free), the Apostle now adverts to the other and subsequent question, οὐκ εἰμι ἐλεύθερος; (Pott.)

—ἐλεύθερος ἐκ πάντων i. e. 'under no obligation to serve them.'—ἐμ. δούλ. i. e. acting as their servant, declining no labour, and making myself subservient to their wills, becoming τοῖς πάνσι τὰ πάντα; 'and that not for an unworthy end, as a flatterer, but that I might,' &c.

—τοῖς πλείονας The article means 'the more,' i. e. more than he otherwise would.—κερδ. may be rendered, 'might gain over to Christianity.' Comp. Matt. xviii. 9, 15. 1 Pet. iii. 1.

20, 21. Here is shown the nature of the δουλαία just mentioned.—ὡς Ἰουδαῖος, namely, by the observance of Jewish rites and ceremonies. See Acts xxi. 26, and xvi. 3. By τοῖς ὑπὸ νόμον would seem meant the very same as the foregoing τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις: to avoid which unsuitability we must suppose either, with most Expositors, that by the former are to be understood Jews properly so called, by the latter Jewish proselytes from Gentilium; or, with Theodor. and Bülling., suppose the former to designate those Jews who, though they had received the Gospel, were still enslaved to the observance of the law. Billr., however, on the ground of no reference being made in the context to the Jewish proselytes, is of opinion, that the Apostle has reference to one and the same object; only that, after having mentioned it in general terms, he adduces it again in its most striking features. This view long ago occurred to Chrys., and has been since not disapproved by Est. Of later Commentators, it has also been adopted by Prof. Stenerson, who regards the latter words as a periphrasis of the former, and as subjoined by the Apostle for the purpose of intimating why it had been necessary for him to live among Jews in a manner different from the way in which he lived among Gentiles. I still continue to prefer the interpretation first mentioned, adopted by Chrys., Theophyl., and Est., as being recommended by its greater simplicity. On carefully reconsidering the question as to the authenticity of the words μὴ ὡν αὐτοὶ ὑπὸ νόμον, I have now admitted them without brackets; since internal evidence is so entirely in their favour, as to compensate for the deficiency of external; though I have not been able to find them in any of the Lamb. or Mus. copies. As to the MSS. which have them being interpolated from the Vulgate, as Matthæi avers, that could not well be the case with the MS. B; the interpolation might take place from the Italic Version; but it is far more probable that the words were lost through the carelessness of scribes, copying from an ancient uncial MS. written in columns, where the words would form a line corresponding to the preceding, also ending in ὑπὸ νόμον.

21. τοῖς ἀνόμοις i. e. τοῖς μὴ ὑπὸ νόμον, ver. 20,—namely, the Gentiles, οἱ νόμον μὴ ἔχοντες, Rom. ii. 12, 14. To these he became ἀνομος, by not observing the Mosaic Law. This use of the word ἀνομος, however, being somewhat irregular, the Apostle explains it by the parenthetical clause μὴ ὡν ἀνομος Θεῷ, which signifies, 'not as though I were under no Divine Law,' ἀλλ' ἔννομος Χριστῷ, 'but under law towards Christ, and the precepts of the Christian religion.'

—μὴ ὡν ἀνομος Θεῷ meaning, as appears from the antithetic term ἔννομος, 'not as being [absolutely] under no law, as regards God, in respect to God.' The readings Θεοῦ and Χριστοῦ, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 7 uncials and 9 cursives, I still regard as not entitled to be received. That of Θεῷ is, Dr. Peile remarks, both unauthorized and uncalled for, as neither simplifying the construction nor helping the sense. But neither can I approve of the reading adopted by Dr. Peile, and expressed in his paraphrase, namely, Θεῷ—Χριστοῦ, which he in vain seeks to confirm from a passage of Rom. iii. 23, ὅμοις δὲ Χριστοῦ. The confirmation in question would hold good had the Apostle written, μὴ ὡν ἀνομος Θεῷ, ἀλλ' ἔννομος, ὡς Χριστοῦ, scil. ὡν: but this he did not write. Moreover, the sentiment thus arising, however true in itself, would not be hujus loci. Dr. Peile was, I presume, induced to read as above from not sufficiently attending to the scope of this parenthetical clause, which, as all the best Expositors are agreed, was meant to soften the seeming harshness of the foregoing expression, ἐγενόμην ὡν ἀνομος, and prevent any misconception thereof by suitable explanation. Hence Paul says (as Calv. expresses it), 'so Legem semper retinuisse, ut [Christo] esset Χριστῷ) ἵνα κερδήσω ἀνόμους. <sup>22</sup> * Ἐγενόμην τοῖς ἀσθενέσιν <sup>† Rom. 15. 1. & 11. 14. ch. 10. 33.</sup>

 [ὡς] ἀσθενῆς, ἵνα τοὺς ἀσθενεῖς κερδήσω. τοῖς πᾶσι γέγονα [τὰ] πάντα, ἵνα πάντως τινὰς σώσω. <sup>23</sup> † Τοῦτο δὲ ποιῶ διὰ <sup>† Gal. 3. 7. Phil. 2. 16. 1 Tim. 4. 7.</sup> τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἵνα συγκοινωνῶς αὐτοῦ γένωμαι. <sup>24</sup> * Οὐκ οἴδατε, subjecta.' And so Est. understands. The evident antithesis and paronomasia between the terms ἀνόμοι and ἄνομοι has occasioned some harshness that must be allowed for.—Εὐαγγελιστὴς Χριστῷ may be best rendered, with Est., by 'inlaw, within law,' Christo, quod Christo attinet' (as opposed to ecclésiastes before).

<sup>22</sup> τοῖς ἀσθενέσιν] The best Expositors are agreed, that this has reference to the less instructed, and therefore superstitiously scrupulous, both of Jews and Gentiles. See supra viii. 11, 12. To these Paul accommodated himself in things indifferent. The ὡς is cancelled by Lachmann and Tischendorf, on the authority of only A and B, and the Vulgate Version; an authority, however, insufficient; notwithstanding that internal evidence is quite against the word. I can, however, add one MS. to the two above mentioned,—namely, the Lamb. 1185, a very curious MS. evidently copied from a very ancient original, and of the Alexandrian text.

—τοῖς πᾶσι γέγ.] To sum up the whole, the Apostle says, τοῖς πᾶσι (scil. καὶ Ἰουδαίοις, καὶ ἀστέροις, καὶ ἀσθενοῦσι) γέγονα τὰ πάντα, i. e. (as Post explains) εὐπρότεροι (sensu bono) ἡμεῖς τρεῖς τρεπόμενοι, πρὸς πάντας εὐεργετοί, παντοῖος γέγονα.—By γέγ. τὰ πάντα is meant, with the qualification suggested by the context, that 'he became to all, all that they wished,' viz. as regarded things indifferent. The same qualification at πάντα is to be understood at ch. x. 23, where by πάντα are meant 'all things of the kind adverted to,' namely, τὰ ἀδιάφορα, 'things indifferent.' The τὰ before πάντα is omitted in A, B, C, F, G, and 4 cursives; to which I add Lamb. 1194; and propriety of language might rather reject it: yet Joseph. Ant. xvii. 10, 7, says, ἀνεπιφανῆ τοῖς πᾶσι εἰς τὰ πάντα. But Paul might use it to strengthen the antithesis; or Revisers might insert it, for that purpose; or Critics might remove it, because involving a breach of propriety. Under these circumstances, there is no good authority to cancel.

—ἵνα πάντως τινὰς σώσω] Of ἵνα σώσω the sense is, 'that I might put into the way of salvation, by conversion to the Christian faith.' As to πάντως, Dr. Poole acknowledges that our English Version, 'by all means,' conveys the double sense omnino saltem, which I have recommended; but he thinks the Apostle's meaning was, 'that so I may not fail to save some.' But that rendering is liable to the objection of expressing what is left to be implied, and omitting that which is expressed. Perhaps πάντως may be rendered with more brevity, and equal fidelity, by 'at any rate;' as in Plato, p. 497; Aristoph. Eq. 252; Xen. Cyrop. ii. 1, 13; and Thucyd. v. 41. Of τινὰς the meaning is best conveyed by rendering, not, with Beza, Est., and others, quosvis, any, but some, meaning, by implication, some few at least; a sense which the word bears in Jos. Bell. i. 16, 4, βουλευθεὶς δ' ἐξ αὐτῶν καὶ (εἰς) παριστώσαι τινες.

<sup>23</sup> τοῦτο δὲ ποιῶ—γένομαι] q. d. 'This conduct I pursue (i. e. these compliances I make) for the Gospel's sake (i. e. for its further propagation), to the end that I may, with you, be partaker of its benefits.'—For τοῦτο, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit πάντα, from 7 uncials and 6 cursive MSS.; to which I can only add the Leicester MS., omitted by Wets. Internal evidence is quite against τοῦτο: but I believe the true reading to be ταῦτα: and the two words ταῦτα and πάντα are often confounded by the scribes, (see Luke xii. 31. 1 Cor. x. 11, and the var. lectt.) and sometimes, where the two words occur, πάντα has been added unnecessarily, because implied. Πάντα cannot well be the genuine reading, because, as Dr. Mill says, 'nec omnia fecit, aut facere potuit Paulus propter Evangelium.'

—ἵνα συγκοιν. αὐτοῦ γένωμαι] Some ancient and modern Commentators pass over the ἐν as if pleonastic. But this it is not; nor is it so in any of the three other passages where συγκοιν. occurs in the New Test., namely, Rom. xi. 17. Phil. i. 7, and Rev. i. (where see my notes.) The ἐν here has reference, not to ὅμῳ (as it was supposed by the framers of our Common Version, and by Whitby), but to what is implied in the term συγκοιν., namely, ἄλλοις, 'the rest,' the other participants in the Gospel, of course including the Corinthians. But this participation I would not understand, with Chrys., of the ancient Commentators, and, of modern ones, Doddr., Billr., and others, to be participation in the work of diffusion or dissemination of the Gospel, but participation in all its benefits, both in this world, and in that which is to come. 'This (observes Olshausen) Paul would have obtained even had he preached ἄκων, but he included the sincere self-denying mode of acting, that he might not become an ἰδοκίμος, ver. 27. Accordingly, the words are to be rendered, 'that thus I might be a joint-partaker (or fellow-sharer) with the rest of the children of God, so as to be with them joint heirs of the grace of God through Christ.'

<sup>24</sup> οὐκ οἴδατε, &c.] To satisfactorily fix the connexion, and trace the course of thought by which the Apostle here passes from the above to the present subject of consideration, is a point of no little difficulty. The connexion laid down by Billr. is too vague and undefined. More of simplicity and probability is there in that given by Theophyl. and Œcumen. (formed on Chrys.), which has been adduced in my Recens. Synop. But it has the disadvantage of not going far enough. I see no reason to alter my opinion, that the subsequent long-drawn agonistical imagery was suggested to the Apostle's mind by the mention of the blessings and benefits, both for time and eternity, of the Gospel; and that on that he founded his exhortation to strenuous exertions in the Christian course. See Phil. iii. 13, 14. Accordingly, the connexion has been tolerably well traced by Whitby; but far better by Crall. thus:—Here commences

ὅτι οἱ ἐν σταδίῳ τρέχοντες πάντες μὲν τρέχουσιν, εἰς δὲ λαμβάνει τὸ βραβεῖον; οὕτω τρέχετε, ἵνα καταλάβητε. <sup>25</sup> Πᾶς δὲ ὁ ἀγωνιζόμενος, πάντα ἐγκρατεύεται· ἐκείνοι μὲν οὖν, ἵνα φθαρτὸν στέφανον λάβωσιν, ἡμεῖς δὲ ἀφθαρτον. <sup>26</sup> Ἐγὼ

the third division of the chapter, in which the Corinthians are admonished, agreeably to the example which he has set them, earnestly to strive after that prize of everlasting life set before them in the Gospel, and so to conduct themselves in things, otherwise in themselves permitted, that they may not prove a stumbling-block to any one. The Apostle declared that, forgetting his own liberty, he made himself the servant of all, to the end that he might be a partaker in the Gospel, i. e. that he might attain its final felicity. Thus he tacitly taught that in no other way can salvation be attained. Hence he further impresses this on their minds, by admonishing the Corinthians so to conduct themselves in their Christian course, that, instead of failing off, they may become possessors of that supreme good set before them in the Gospel; and accordingly to use with the greatest moderation things of themselves free to be used or not used. Now the Apostle argues by a comparison taken from the race-course. As there, although all run, yet not all receive the prize, but one only, who shall have outstripped the rest, and accordingly shall have so run, as one must, who desires to gain the prize; so [in this course of Christian piety] although all run, i. e. do many things that pertain to Christianity, yet not all gain this immortal prize in the race set before them; but those that do, are they who so run as those must run who are desirous of attaining it. The difficulty thus encountered by the above able Commentator Dr. Peile seeks to avoid by tracing the connexion, with Mackn., as follows: 'Now such are not the conditions of the Christian race that is set before you (Heb. xii. 1). There the success of one is no hindrance to the success of another.' This, however, cannot be called a connexion at all, and it moreover compels the learned annotator to assign to the words of the subjoined exhortation, οὕτω τρέχετε, ἵνα καταλάβητε (scil. τὸ βραβεῖον τῆς ἀνεκλήσεως τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, Phil. iii. 14), the strained, yet any thing but apposite, sense: 'Be runners in that race in which ye may be sure to be receivers.' Now, not to say that there is something unseasoned in the sense 'sure to be receivers [of the prize of the heavenly calling]', and which is, besides being set aside by several passages of Scripture, in contradiction to what follows, μήντες αὐτοὶ δόκιμοι γίνεσθαι, as also to what Thom. Aquin. and others think implied in the εἰς δὲ μόνον,—namely, the sentiment in Matt. xxii. 14, πολλοὶ εἰσι κλητοί, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί, far more agreeable to simplicity is it to suppose that the words present to the mind of the Apostle (though not expressed) were those so skilfully supplied from the course of thought by the logical acuteness of Crell. (as above cited) than what Dr. Peile supposes to have been in the mind of the Apostle. Thus, it is worthy of observation, the words of the subjoined exhortation exactly tally with the words supplied as above by Crell.; and agreeably to this view the meaning intended will be,—'as those [and those only] attain the βραβεῖον, so do ye run that ye may attain.' This view I find supported by the authority of Theodoret, and, of modern Commentators, by that of Estius in an able annotation on the whole passage.

25. πᾶς δὲ ὁ ἀγωνιζόμενος, πάντα ἐγκρατεύεται] Here, by a continuation of the same agonistic allusion, the Apostle takes occasion, from what is done by the Heathen ἀγωνιστῆς, in order to secure the wished-for prize, to suggest what is the right course to be pursued by the Christian ἀγωνιστῆς, if he would hope to obtain his crown of glory.—πάντα ἐγκρατεύεται, 'practises ἐγκράτειαν;' with allusion to the preparatory training for ἀγωναί, which lasted ten months. Of the extreme temperance, and even abstinence, here required, three examples are given by Ælian, V. H. iii. 30. 10, 2. 11, 3. So Epictetus, Enchir. C. 35 (cited by the Commentators), graphically describes the thing thus: δι' σ' εὐτακτεῖν, ἀναγκοτροφεῖν, ἀπείχεσθαι πεμμάτων, γυμνάζεσθαι πρὸς ἀνάγκην, ἐν ἔρετα γυμνῷ, ἐν καύματι, ἐν ψυχῇ, μὴ ψυχρὸν πίνειν, μὴ εἶναι, ὥς ἔτυχεν ἀπλῶς, ὥς ἱατρὸς παραδεδωκίαν σπαντὸν τῷ ἐπιστάτῃ, εἰτα εἰς τὸν ἀγῶνα παρίρχεσθαι. Bp. Warburton observes that 'the Apostle here urges another argument for their engaging in the heavenly race, and preferring the pursuit of spiritual things to things temporal; q. d. "The pursuit of the former has not only these advantages of certainly above that of the games, but they are without any peculiar drawback; since the preparation for the spiritual prize is not more severe than that for the earthly.'" Accordingly, to the example of the ἀγωνιστῆς, Paul, as Est. observes, stirs up himself (see ver. 27), as well as others, to do in like manner in the Christian course,—considering that the Crown is in the latter the more glorious, being (as the next words express) no less than an incorruptible one, what is termed, 1 Pet. v. 4, ὁ ἐμαρτύριος τῆς δόξης στέφανος. Comp. Wied. iv. 2, which was probably in the Apostle's mind. From the Schol. on Apoll. Rhod. iii. 123, we learn that, at the Isthmian games (to which the Apostle here espec. alludes), the victors were of old crowned with a wreath of pine-leaves, though in after-times of dry parsley; which circumstance serves to illustrate the allusion in ἀφθαρτον, q. d. 'not withered already, but which will never wither, which will flourish to eternity.' The Apostle is here only speaking of that reward which the candidates especially strove after,—the CROWN; though, as Kasanen. shows from Vitruv. Arch. ix. Præf., that, carried with it certain other and more solid advantages, which to coarser minds would have most weight.

26. ἐγὼ τοίνυν οὕτω τρέχω] Here the Apostle reverts to his own case, that he may thus give to what he inculcates the additional weight of his own example. See Phil. iii. 17. The τοίνυν has a continuative together with a conclusive force, as in Ælian, V. H. iv. 2. Xen. Cyr. i. 1, 2. Mem. i. 4, 13; and the ἐγὼ is here, as often elsewhere, emphatic, being intended to τοῖν οὕτω τρέχω, ὥς οὐκ ἀδήλως οὕτω πυκτεύω, ὥς οὐκ ἄερα δέρων. 27 Ἰ' Ἀλλ' ὑπωπιάζω μου τὸ σῶμα καὶ δουλαγωγῶ μήπως ἄλλους κηρύξας, αὐτὸς ἀδόκιμος γένωμαι.

γ. Rom. 8. 13.
 Col. 2. 6.
 Rom. 6. 12.

point at himself. Render: 'Accordingly, I do, for my part, thus run [whatever you may do].' The Apostle returns to the agonistic metaphor, and, first, that of the racer, in the words οὕτω τρέχω, ὥς οὐκ ἀδήλως: from a careful reconsidering of which clause I see some reason to doubt whether the interpretation I before acquiesced in be (notwithstanding that it is sanctioned by the authority of many eminent modern Commentators) so entitled to preference as that of the ancients, Chrys., Theophyl., and Œcum., and, of modern Expositors, Crell., Hyper., Calvin., Est., Bp. Pearson, Bengel, and Billr., who regard it as put for οὐκ ὡς ἀδήλως ὅντος βραβείου vel σκόπου. According to either interpretation, the adverb must be taken, as often, for a phrase formed from the Adject. and a Preposit. But I should wish to see some proof of ἀδήλως being ever adverb so used.

In ὡς οὐκ ἄερα δέρων we have a pugilistic metaphor. Now there were many ways in which pugilists might beat the air,—namely, either in prælia evasiva, or as a prelude to the contest, or during the contest itself, when aiming a blow, and not reaching their object. So Ariosto, Orl. Fur., canto ii. 51, 'Ferì Gradasso il vento è l'aria vana.' This last seems to be the meaning in the present case. With this metaphorical use of πυκτεύω I would compare Anacr., cited by Casaubon, Anim. ad Athen., p. 782, ὡς μὴ πρὸς ἔρματα πυκταλίζω.

27. ὑπωπιάζω μου τὸ σῶμα] By the body is here to be understood not so much the animal frame itself (though that needs strict discipline, to be brought and kept under the government of the spirit) but the evil passions and carnal lusts of corrupt human nature, which is elsewhere called 'the body of sin,' Rom. vi. 6, and vii. 23, seqq., and which it is there said must be virtually destroyed (expressed by the strong term καταργηθῆ, see note). It is well observed by Est. 'that the Apostle here adverts only to the contest with the flesh; omitting those two other enemies, the world and the devil, because the body or flesh is a domestic enemy (and therefore the most formidable), after subduing which foe easier will it be to vanquish the world and the devil.' As regards the concluding words, αὐτὸς ἀδόκιμος γένωμαι, little likely is it that the Apostle would have chosen to use an agonistic metaphor in a matter so momentous. The term ἀδόκιμος might seem per se to allude, as Commentators tell us, to the previous δοκιμασία, which, as we learn from Faber, Agon. iii. 11, took place before admission to the contest, both as to moral character and adequate fitness for the combat. And the persons who were rejected for the contest were called (as we learn from Philo) ἔκκριτοι: μὴ δοκιμασθέντες, ἀποδοκιμασθέντες. Accordingly the term ἀδόκιμοι would be not unusable. But the comparison in question would not hold good here, because no such previous δοκιμασία in the Christian ἄγων, on admission to the sacred contest, is conveyed at baptism, only repentance and faith being required. If there be any agonistic allusion at all, it would seem rather to be to what took place after the contest, and subsequent to the δοκιμασία, or severe scrutiny, which took place as to whether the laws of the combat had been strictly observed by the victor (and to which there is an allusion in 2 Tim. ii. 6, ἰάν—ἀθλῇ τις, οὐ σταφανοῦται ἰάν μὴ νομίμῳ ἀθλήσῃ); for, if not, even the victorious combatant was cast, which was, Mackn. says, expressed by the term ἔκκρισθαι. Nor would even this view be applicable to the circumstances of the Christian ἄγων, or stadium; since no such after-scrutiny can be necessary to the omniscient Judge. Nay, it is utterly excluded by what the Apostle himself says at 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8, τὸν ἄθωνα ἡγωνίσαι, τὸν δρόμον τιτλίκα' λοιπὸν ('as to all that remains') ἀπείκηται μοι δὲ τῆς δικ: στίφανος. Accordingly, it is best to suppose the agonistic metaphor to be here dropped, and the expression ἀδόκιμος γίνω to simply mean 'become rejectaneous,' by being found unworthy of acceptance unto final salvation, the opposite to συγκοινωνός γενέσθαι ὑαγγελίου, at ver. 23, a view supported by the authority of Chrys. and Theodor. Here I must not omit to notice, what is a matter less of surprise than regret, namely, the opposite extremes to which Commentators have gone in the view taken by them of this passage; some pressing on the sense of the words, as though they conveyed terror on the part of the Apostle lest, &c. This is decidedly the view of the Fathers, both Greek and Latin, and the Latin Commentators, and it has been strenuously maintained by Est. While others almost explain away what is implied in the μὴ, and soften it down so as to express no more than the fear of being reprehensible and liable to great disgrace. So Calvin, Beza, Pareus, and others, who so interpret, say that the term ἔδοξ. does not import reprobatus, as opposed to electus, but is meant to stand in opposition to probatus or probus, as denoting 'reprehensibilis fieri cum magno dedecore benedocendo et male vivendo'—all this, evidently, to save the doctrine of ELECTION; in order to which, similar is the course pursued by Est. Nay, he boldly pronounces that the Apostle does not mean that any one from being elect can become reprobate; a thing he says impossible; for the ETERNAL DECREE of God cannot be changed. He adds, that as to the casting off and eternal perdition of any one for having, though a preacher of the Gospel, not lived agreeably to the Gospel, at least not consistently and perseveringly to the end, his perdition is no other than the effect of Divine reprobation: and that St. Paul did fear this for himself, i.e. he thinks, plain from the words here employed. It is scarcely necessary to say, that this involves no less than a most grievous perversion of the words. And nearly the same censure may be passed on those who (as Scott) maintain that the Apostle then possessed the assurance that he should not, after preaching to others, be himself rejected, as having no title to the crown. This dictum is indeed amongst the 'much which (as Dr. Adam Clarke observes) has been said in opposition to St. Paul's own words.' Suffice it to say, that full assurance on that head, we have every reason to think (from what the Apostle says 2 Tim. iv. 6), he a Exod. 13.

21. & 14. 22.
Deut. 1. 28.
Ps. 78. 13, 14.
& 106. 26.

X. 1. Οὐ θέλω * γὰρ ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, ἀδελφοί, ὅτι οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν πάντες ὑπὸ τὴν νεφέλῃν ἦσαν, καὶ πάντες διὰ τῆς θαλάσ-

obtained by special grace from the Lord,—but at a later period,—at nearly the end of his course, because, as Bp. Bull well points out in his ‘Doctrine of final Perseverance refuted,’ it ‘was then not inexpedient, but necessary to support the holy Apostle under his last fiery trial.’ Not that we are warranted in supposing on the part of the Apostle any absolute doubt as to his perseverance unto the end, or fear as to his final acceptance. The sentiment experienced on that head by the Apostle seems not to have amounted beyond that ‘godly fear’ and cautious distrust of one’s self which so eminently befits the Christian pilgrim throughout the whole of his heavenward course. To which purpose are the words of Rom. xiii. 20, compared with 1 Pet. i. 17, ἐν φόβῳ τὸν τῆς παροικίας ὡμῶν χρόνος ναστράφητε, and Heb. xii. 28, λατρεύοντες τῷ Θεῷ μετὰ αἰδοῦς καὶ εὐλαβίας (meaning, doubtless, godly fear of falling from grace), and espec. Phil. ii. 12, μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου τὴν ταῦτων σωτηρίαν καταργάσασθε, meaning with such a holy fear as may exclude too full assurance or unwarrantable confidence as to the result. Upon the whole, it appears to me that we are not obliged to infer from the μήποτε (or rather μή πως, as I would write, by which the sense will be ne fortè) any sentiment of fear,—but rather that mixed feeling above adverted to, consisting of caution dictated by holy fear, such as to induce any one to take the proper means to effectually prevent some contemplated consequence. In fact, when μή or μή πως is followed by a subjunctive, though the μή is suspended on some participle expressed or understood, it is not always φοβοίμενος, but often in the Class. writers some participle denoting weariness, or caution. Examples were superfluous. It will thus, I think, abundantly appear that we are quite justified in supposing the real sense intended to be, ‘in order that I may not become rejected.’ This is indeed placed, I apprehend, beyond doubt by the expression just adverted to, supra, ver. 23, ἵνα συγκοινωνῶσι αὐτοῦ (scil. εὐαγγελίου) γίνεσθαι, which is the true key to the sense here; for some of the best Commentators, as Crell., Grot., Est., Krause, Pott, Heydenr., and Steners., are with reason agreed, that δόδοκιμος γινέσθαι here is the very contrary to συγκοινωνῶς γινέσθαι τοῦ εὐαγγ.

—μήπως ἄλλοις κηρύξας, αὐτοῖς δόδοκ. γίν.) On re-considering this passage, I see no reason to doubt that the agonistic metaphor terminates at ὑπωπιάζω, and is not carried on (as most recent Commentators have supposed) to the terms κηρύξας and δόδοκιμος. Though Dr. Hamm. (who derived this notion from P. Faber, Agonist. iii. 14) asserts that, in good authors, δόδοκιμος γινέσθαι, and ἀποκηρυχθῆναι, are all one, and are opposed to στεφανουθῆναι. I have never yet been able to find it so used in any author. If it was ever used in re agonistica, it must have been as applied to those who were candidates for being put upon the list of combatants; at least the term would be applicable to those rejected on the score of unfitness to contend. But it is to be borne in mind, that the Apostle had long ago been put on the list of combatants by the great Ἀγωνοθέτης Himself, by whom he was ‘called to be an Apotle.’ It is true that κηρύσσειν, ‘to act the part of a herald,’ was an agonistic term; and I admit that the Apostle may have intended, under the ordinary sense of κηρύσσειν, to include an under-allusion to the herald, some of whose duties did correspond to those of the Christian preachers of the Gospel, such as ‘proclaiming the contest’ (Soph. Aj. 1219), declaring the qualifications required of the combatants.’ But that was indirectly, by reciting, like our clerk, a kind of Si quis? No proof, nor probability, is there that the herald ever used such exhortations, much less encouragements, as Mackn. represents. As to the authority of Faber, it has little or no weight, since, in order to make the passage suitable to his purpose, that of finding an agonistic figure, he is obliged to alter ἄλλοις to ἄλλων; though, as the profoundly learned Valcken. truly observes, ‘the Apostle could not have so written, since it would have been making himself the ἀγωνοθέτης, or bestower of the crown (i. e. as conferred by the hands of the herald), and not the Lord Jesus, to whom he ascribes the bestowal in 2 Tim. iv. 8, ὃν (στεφανῶν) ἀποδόσει μοι ὁ Κύριος.’ It was the ἀγωνοθέτης that designated and pronounced the successful ἀγωνιστῆς victor, and invested him with the ensign of victory, the crown; both of which circumstances may be gathered from Virg. Æn. v. 245, ‘Victorem magna præconis voce (by the voice or proclamation) Cloanthum Declarat, viridique advelat tempora lauro (the laurel-crown).’ He did not (as Hamm. represents) proclaim the names of those beaten; for that were alike unnecessary and cruel. Neither did he, as Hamm. seeks to prove from a passage of Isidor. Epist. liii. [p. 265], dispose and arrange the contest for the prize. That was solely done by the ἀγωνοθέτης, the president of the ἑλληνοδόκται, or by judges of the qualifications of the candidates. Moreover, the words in Isidore are not, as Hamm. represents them, ἀγῶνα τοῖς ἄλλοις διατιθεῖς (ὁ κῆρυξ), but ὅς ἀγῶνα ἄλλοις διατιθεῖται: namely, as said of the doctors and bishops of the Church, inasmuch as, in the sacred ἀγῶνας, it is ordered that the στεφανίτης should be a κῆρυξ, to set in order the Christian contest to others. But he says nothing about (what Hamm. mentions) the binding and loosing, pronouncing some conquerors, and rejecting others as unworthy. However, as several agonistic metaphors have preceded, I am ready to admit an under-allusion on the part of the Apostle to the office and duties, as far as they really correspond, of the herald. Thus ὅς ἀδύλας may stand for ὅς εἰς ἀδύλας, i. e. ‘as to an indistinct object,’ or σκοπεῖν, equiv. to ‘without keeping the goal in view.’ Agreeably to this view, (Ecumen. well explains the term (after Chrys.) by πρὸς οὐδένα σκοπεῖν. So Calv. explains ὅς οὐκ ἀδύλας: ‘recte ad metam dirigere cursum;’ Est.: ‘recte cursum tendens ad metam, ut faciant qui vincere volunt;’ so denoting ‘the going straight to one’s object.’ Comp. Phil. iii. 14.

X. 1. The thread of connexion which I have, partly from Grot., Crell., Wets., and Bp. Pearce, traced between this and the foregoing portion is σης διήλθον, <sup>2</sup> καὶ πάντες εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν † ἐβαπτίσαντο ἐν τῇ νεφέλῃ καὶ ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ <sup>3</sup> καὶ πάντες τὸ αὐτὸ βρῶμα πνευματικὸν ἔφαγον, <sup>4</sup> καὶ πάντες τὸ αὐτὸ πόμα πνευματικὸν ἔπιον ἔπιον γὰρ ἐκ πνευματικῆς ἀκολουθούσης πέτρας ἥ δὲ

b Exod. 14.
14, &c.
Ps. 106. 40.
c Exod. 17. a Num. 20. 11.
d 21. 16.
Ps. 78. 15.

confirmed by the authority of Chrys., Theophyl., Ecumen., and Theodoret. I would further observe, that the vinculum subsists in the agonistic idea suggested by the terms ἐν σταδίῳ τρέχειν, οὐκ ἀσπῶν, καταλαβεῖν βραβεῖον (or στίφανον), and ἀδόκιμος γινίσθαι. Accordingly, 'I have thus adverted to the great spiritual contest in which we are all engaged, and the crown that we are bound to press forward to attain; which nevertheless I count not myself to have as yet secured, finding it still indispensable to use all means, in order that I may not finally miss of that crown of life [which lesson I would impress on you]; FOR I would not have you fail to bear in mind, that, &c.,—namely, the great truth, that all do not enjoy God's favour who possess great external privileges, as will appear from the example of our forefathers.' In virtue of this connexion and the course of reasoning pursued, I have now admitted, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the reading γὰρ (for the received one δι), from 7 of the most ancient uncial, and 8 cursive MSS., the Italic and Vulg. Versions, and several ancient Fathers. The words οὐ θέλω ὑμῶν ἀγνοεῖν (which occur also in Rom. i. 13. 1 Cor. xii. 1. 2 Cor. i. 8. 1 Thess. iv. 18) constitute not a mere formula of transition, requesting serious attention to some important truth, which, though it be not absolutely unknown, has to be seriously laid to heart; it is said by memoirs for θέλω δὲ ὑμῶς εἰδέναι, which occurs in 1 Cor. xi. 3; q. d. 'I would have you duly mindful of this, that, &c. The ὑμῶν subjoined to πατέρες is rightly used, because even the Gentile Christians might regard the Jewish Patriarchs as their fathers, because they were, on their conversion to Christianity, become the seed of Abraham by faith (see Rom. iv. 16), and thus too the Israel of God, Gal. vi. 16.

— πάντες διὰ τῆς θαλ., &c.] The πάντες is not, as many say, pleonastic, but meant to advert to the fact, that not any one of the Egyptians, but all the Hebrews, passed through. So in Exod. xiv. 29, it is said, 'there remained not so much as one of them' (viz. the Egyptians).

2. Having adverted to the historical facts recorded in Exodus, the Apostle now proceeds, as not unfrequently, to point to their spiritual interpretation; and that in order to warn the self-secure and presumptuous readers on Christian liberty, among the Corinthians, that even the people of God, who fell short of their promised reward, had been as highly privileged as those unto whom the Divine purposes of the preceding dispensation had now been clearly made known to the true Israel of God.

— εἰς τὸν Μ. ἐβαπτίσαντο] Of this obscure passage the two most probable expositions are the following: 1. That supported by nearly all the ancient and early modern Commentators, thus expressed by Theophylact: εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν ἐβαπτίζοντο, ἀντὶ τοῦ, αὐτὸν ἀρχηγὸν ἔχον τοῦ τόπου τοῦ βαπτισματος τόπος γὰρ βαπτισματος ἦν, τό τε ὑπὸ τὴν νεφέλῃ εἶναι, καὶ τὴν θαλάσσαν διαλθεῖν. 2. That of almost all modern Expositors, from the time of Hamm. downwards, who take the sense to be, 'were, by passing under the cloud (yielding themselves to its guidance) and through the sea, as it were baptized, or initiated into the religion promulgated by Moses (Moses here standing metonymically for the institutes of the Mosaic religion), and thus entirely recognized his Divine mission, and bound themselves in future to obey his laws.' For baptism, say they, was a symbolical rite, by which any one bound himself unto faith and obedience to any teacher of religion; and the baptism itself was a form of initiation into that religion. Now this, indeed, does express St. Paul's meaning; but not, I apprehend, his full meaning. He did not, I conceive, merely mean to trace a similarity, by tacit comparison, between what the Israelites went through and Christian baptism, but intended to represent the former as typical of the latter; i. e. the being baptized unto Moses, as typical of the being baptized unto Christ. It has been well observed by Bp. Marsh (Lect., p. 384), that 'the Jews, who admitted proselytes by baptism, appear to have generally considered the passage of their forefathers through the Red Sea, not as a mere insulated historical fact, but as something representative of admission to the Divine favour by baptism. They said that they were baptized in the desert, and admitted into covenant with God before the Law was given. Nay, both they and St. Paul seem to have regarded all the circumstances of the Exodus as typical,—namely, either of Christ, or of some rite of his religion.' See also Is. iv. 5. Thus the full sense intended is, that 'by this figurative and typical baptism they entered into covenant with God, and were initiated into the Law, on the point of being promulgated by Moses; by which baptism they became God's Church under that Law, just as by Christian baptism Christians become God's Church under the Gospel.'

3, 4. These verses form one connected sense, consisting of two parts: 1. καὶ πάντες τὸ αὐτὸ βρῶμα πνευματικὸν ἔφαγον, καὶ πάντες τὸ αὐτὸ πόμα πνευματικὸν ἔπιον. 2. ἔπιον γὰρ ἐκ πνευματικῆς ἀκολουθούσης πέτρας ἥ δὲ πέτρα ἦν ὁ Χριστός,—the latter as explanatory of the former. Here as the Apostle had alluded to what had been typical in the ordinance of baptism, so he now alludes to what had been such in that of the Lord's Supper. See Hyper. and Calv.

— βρῶμα πνευματικὸν—πόμα πν.] Some suppose the food and the drink to be called πνευματικόν, because given miraculously from heaven. But the sense must, from the context, be, 'inasmuch as they had a spiritual import, by being typical,'—the food, of Christ ('the true bread from heaven,' John vi. 50), and the drink, of the blessing of the Gospel, including an allusion to the Holy Spirit. See John vii. 37—39.

4 Num. 14. πέτρα ἣν ὁ Χριστός. 5 ἂν Ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐν τοῖς πλείοσι αὐτῶν
 25, 27. εὐδόκησεν ὁ Θεός· κατεστρώθησαν γὰρ ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ. 6 Ταῦτα
 8 28, 34, 35. ὁ Θεός.
 4 Num. 11. εὐδόκησεν ὁ Θεός· κατεστρώθησαν γὰρ ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ. 6 Ταῦτα
 4 28. Ps. 105. 14.

— ἵκον—πέτρας] Pressing on the literal sense of these words, many eminent Commentators have supposed the meaning to be, that the water, at first miraculously drawn from the rock, was afterwards conveyed as miraculously through the desert. They have, however, no better authority for the fact, than some Rabbinical stories adduced by Wets. and Schoëtgen; and the whole is a mere superstitious notion, resting on no solid foundation, and proceeding from utter misapprehension of the figurative language of the Apostle, which is by Theodor., Calv., Wolf, Rosenm., Krause, and Heydenr., rightly understood, not of a natural rock, 'tanquam causa materialis (to use the words of Wolf) ex quâ, but of a spiritual rock, 'tanquam causa efficiens, d quâ illa aqua et potatio profecta sit.' Accordingly, the Apostle here, as before, points out, under Divine inspiration (for the benefit of the Church to all ages) the spiritual interpretation of the facts recorded in the Scripture to which he has just adverted; and the meaning is, that 'Christ, who is typified by that rock, every where accompanied and was present with them, supplying water miraculously furnished; which, as it never failed them, might be said popularly to follow them, as Christ, who supplied it, did; either really, though invisibly, or figuratively and spiritually, by his perpetual and present help and protection.

5. ἐν τοῖς πλείοσι] i.e. 'most, or very many,'—namely, with all but Joshua and Caleb. On which sense of οἱ πλείονες, see note on Rom. v. 19.—οὐκ εὐδόκησεν, α μετοίς, meaning 'was highly displeased with.' Dr. Peile thinks that the collocation of the words [the negative οὐκ being placed first, when, according to the sense, it comes after] is not without its meaning. And objecting to the μετοίς, he would translate literally, 'Yet was not God well pleased with the more part of them; no! he ceased to regard them as the seed of Abraham, his friend.' But, had the Apostle intended to express this sense, he would have written, not οὐκ, but οὐκ ἔτι. Nevertheless, the collocation is not without its force;—though that force is solely to convey an intensity of sense, and intimate the meiosis of expression. Comp. Ia. xli. 8, 'Thou art my servant, I have chosen thee, and not cast thee away;' where Dr. Henderson renders, 'and will not reject thee,' agreeably to the Syr. and Arabic Versions, but not to the Hebrew and Sept.—which require, 'and not cast thee away'—as also in contradiction to his own annotation, in which he regards the words as an example of a statement expressed, first positively, and by negation of the contrary; in which, however, he is again wrong. Dr. Peile's method of treating οὐκ εὐδόκησεν, though inadmissible in the passage of the Apostle, will apply to the words of the Prophet above cited, where the added clause contains a fuller development of the sense conveyed in the preceding; q. d. 'I have not, as in the case of Esau, rejected thee.' Comp. Mal. i. 3 with Rom. ix. 13. In fact, the meiosis is recognized by almost every Commentator of note from Chrys. to Heydenr., and with good reason, since it is called for by the words subjoined, κατεστρώθησαν γὰρ ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, in which we may suppose the true force of the γὰρ to be 'for example,' as serving to adduce a proof of the heavy wrath and indignation which they had provoked: and καταστ. (founded on Numb. xiv. 16, κατέστρωσεν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ) signif. not 'were οὐκ ἐστίν,' but 'were ἀπώθητο, or σπένδω [dead] over the desert;' a usage of καταστ., like πνῆ in Numb. xiv. 16, frequent in the Class. writers (see Hdot. ix. 75, κατέστρωτο οἱ βάρβαροι, and Ælian, Anim. vii. 2, λοιμοὶ δὲ αὐτοὺς ἐφ' ἑνὶ συλλαβῶν κατέστρωσε), and meant to represent death in its most appalling form, here denoting (as Theophyl. says) τὴν ἀθάνατον αὐτῶν ἀπώλειαν. It should seem that this was intended as an awful image of the eternal perdition of the wicked, and meant to serve for an awful warning, by example, to sinners of every age. So also a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wets., says, 'Homines qui in deserto fuerunt ('were' [destroyed]) non habuerunt partem in mundo futuro.'

6. ταῦτα δὲ τύποι ἡμῶν ἐγενήθησαν, εἰς τὰ, &c.] q. d. 'Hæc quæ commemoravi contigit patribus nostris, fuerunt typi quidam ac figure, et exempla eorum, quæ sunt, aut futura sunt, circa nos, qui sumus adscripti in populum Dei; et ita quidem, ut ad nostram doctrinam instructionem et cautelam referenda sint.' (Est.) Billr. here observes: 'As it is elsewhere said, that "such and such a thing has happened in Christian times, in order that the type which was set forth in the Old Testament might be fulfilled,"—ἵνα πληρωθῇ, &c.,—so here, conversely, it is said of certain events in Old Testament history, that "they happened in order that they might be examples for the direction of Christians in subsequent times." So also Bulling. and Hyper. All the best Commentators, indeed, are agreed in confining the purport of the typical correspondence, here and in ver. 11, to things, not persons; though types of persons do occasionally occur elsewhere,—as between the literal and the spiritual Israel; the literal and the spiritual Adam. Hence, Dr. Peile, in assigning to the words the sense: 'Now, in these particulars of their history, they were types of us Christians,' assigns what cannot be extracted from the words without violence, and which, if it could, would be a sense little suitable to the context. That it is not the natural and obvious sense of the words is clear from this, that such never before occurred to any Commentator, ancient or modern. The best Expositors are agreed that the term τύποι has here, and at ver. 11, the twofold sense of type or figure, and example, i. e. warning, or instruction by example, as ἐκτύποι in 1 Tim. i. 16, πρὸς ὑποτύπωσιν (instruction by example), τῶν μολόντων. Moreover, the best Commentators in all ages have taken ἡμῶν here as standing for ἡμῶν, as in a kindred passage of 1 Pet. v. 3, τύποι γινώσκοντες τοῦ ποιμῆνος, and 1 Tim. iv. 12, τύποι τῶν πιστῶν, a use this probably derived from the language of common life. It is, however, to be borne in mind that, as the benefits and blessings under the Old Covenant were meant to be types and exact models of those under the New (spec. as to the Sacra-δὲ τύποι ἡμῶν ἐγενήθησαν, εἰς τὸ μὴ εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἐπιθυμητὰς κακῶν, καθὼς κἀκεῖνοι ἐπεθύμησαν. <sup>7</sup> ἼΜηδὲ εἰδωλολάτραι Ἐξοδ. 32. 8.

γίνεσθε, καθὼς τινες αὐτῶν ὡς γέγραπται Ἐκάθισεν ὁ λαὸς φαγεῖν καὶ πιεῖν, καὶ ἀνέστησαν παίζειν. <sup>8</sup> ἼΜηδὲ πορνεύωμεν, καθὼς τινες αὐτῶν ἐπόρνευσαν, καὶ ἔπεσον ἐν μιᾷ ἡμέρᾳ εἰκοσιτρεῖς χιλιάδες. <sup>9</sup> ἼΜηδὲ ἐκπειράζωμεν τὸν Χρι-στὸν, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐπείρασαν, καὶ ὑπὸ τῶν ὀφειν ἀπώλουντο. <sup>10</sup> ἼΜηδὲ γογγύζετε, καθὼς καὶ τινες αὐτῶν ἐγόγγυ-
Num. 25. 1. 9.
Ps. 106. 28.
Exod. 17. 7.
Num. 31. 4.
Ps. 78. 18.
Deut. 9. 9.
Exod. 10. 2.
17. 2.
Num. 14. 2.
25. 20.
Ps. 106. 28.

ments,—see Chrys. and Ecumen., Hyper. and Bulling.), so also were the judgments and punishments for sin and impenitence; in which latter case the events were at once types, and warnings by example; as in the former, at once blessings spiritual, and ENCOURAGEMENTS to us Christians in running the race that is set before us, copying the patterns of faith set forth to us in the Old Test. (as recited for our learning in Heb. xi.), and espec. looking unto Jesus the great Exemplar, the Author and Finisher of our faith, Heb. xii. 1.

—ἐπιθυμητὰς κακῶν] Here the Apostle is justly supposed to glance at the desire for evil things, inexpedient indulgences of sense, existing in certain of the Corinthians, who boasted of their Christian knowledge, and prided themselves on their Christian liberty, so far as to allow to themselves a participation in the idol-feasts; in consequence of which the Apostle takes occasion to allude to the solemn warning conveyed to the Israelites in what is recorded at Numb. xi. 4—6, of the Israelites, who, dissatisfied with the manna, lusted after the flesh-pots they had left behind in Egypt. In μηδὲ εἰδωλ. γίνεσθε we have a remarkable anacoluthon, which, however, is rendered less harsh than it would otherwise be, by the circumstance that the preceding verse contains an implied admonition, namely, μη γίνεσθε ὡς οἱ ἐπιθυμητὰς κακῶν. Here there is held out a solemn warning, by exemplification of the judgment surely annexed to any approach to idolatry.—καθὼς καὶ serves to indicate the similarity existing in the two cases; a similarity consisting in this,—that as the Israelites wearied the Lord Christ in the above manner, and tempted their own destruction, so did certain of the Corinthians, as self-sufficient boasters of knowledge, and confident in their Christian liberty, tempt their fall by apostasy, through their luxurious habits, by eating even idol-meat for their lusts, and claiming the right to eat it, though to the violation of their Christian principles.

7. The Apostle now applies the above principle to the different vices and sins to which the Corinthians were prone; commencing with that of abusing their Christian liberty, by indulging in the use of meats offered to idols.—εἰδωλ. γίνεσθε, namely, by participating in idol-feasts; as is plain from the rest of the words of this verse, which refer to the sacrificial feast to the honour of the golden calf mentioned at Exod. xxxii. 6.—ἐκάθισεν, 'eat down to table'; according to the ancient posture, afterwards changed to reclining, and adopted from Gentile customs. On the sense of παύειν here, see Rec. Syn., where I have shown that it is best to assign to the word here a general signification (similar to that in Hdor. ix. 11, and 1 Chron. xv. 29. Esdr. v. 3), including leaping, dancing, singing, and all other kinds of festal sport.

8. πορν.] This has reference to all sorts of illicit connexion with women, but with especial allusion to the sin of the incestuous person. For twenty-three, the Hebrew and Sept., with Jos. and Philo, give twenty-four thousand. The best mode of reconciling the discrepancy is to suppose (as do Calv., Bengel, and Mackn.) that in neither of the sacred writers is the exact amount intended, but only a round number given; which, as the number of those who fell probably exceeded 23,000, and came short of 24,000, would be an approximative round number.—Again, the best mode of removing the seeming discrepancy between St. Paul and Moses, as to the particular offence which drew down the heavy wrath of God on the people, is to suppose, that the fornication mentioned by the former accompanied the idolatrous worship of Baal-peor, recorded by Moses, Numb. xxv. 3. In fact, from the account there, it is plain that the people were, as on many other occasions, drawn into the idolatrous worship in question by the meretricious arts of the Moabitish women, with whom they committed fornication.

9. μηδὲ ἐκπειρ. τὸν Χριστόν] For Χρ. MSS. B, C, and 8 cursives, have Κύριον, adopted by Lachm., and Tisch. ed. 1, but removed, and the Χρ. replaced in ed. 2. But Alf. follows Lachm., wrongly; since external evidence is insufficient, and internal evidence is quite against Κύριον. It is manifest that both Κύριον and Θεόν, found in the Alex. MS. and a few others, proceeded from Critical Revisers, who stumbled at Χριστόν, not well knowing how the Israelites could be said to tempt Christ: and both readings partly from those who wished to destroy this proof of the Divinity of Jesus Christ; for, as Bp. Bull (Defens. Fid. Nic. i. 1, 15) has shown, the words of the text rec. prove both the pre-existence of Christ, and his Deity. In fact, he, whom they then tempted, was the same Person whom they now tempted,—their Redeemer, who was then with them as JEHOVAH, and had often appeared to Moses in the form of an Angel; see Calv., Est., Bp. Pearson, and Abp. Magee On the Atonement, vol. ii. 657.—ἐκπειράσαν signifies 'tried the patience and long-suffering of God; namely, by murmuring at their condition and God's dispensations, under the influence of impatience, 'which (as Calv. remarks) seeks to anticipate the designs of God, and refuses to be governed by him; but would bind him down to its own will and pleasure.'

10. In this verse the subject of vv. 6—9 is

J Rom. 15. 4.
ch. 9. 10.
2 Rom. 11.
30.
ch. 1. 5, 9.
1 Thess. 5.
24.
2 Thess. 2. 3.
2 Tim. 2. 11
—12. Heb. 6. 12. 2 Pet. 1. 5. & 2. 2.

σαν, καὶ ἀπόλονται ὑπὸ τοῦ θλοθρευτοῦ. 11 Ἰ Ταῦτα δὲ πάντα τύποι συνέβαινον ἐκείνους· ἐγράφη δὲ πρὸς νοουθεσίαν ἡμῶν, εἰς οὗς τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων κατήντησεν. 12 Ὡστε ὁ δοκῶν ἐστάναι βλεπέτω μὴ πέσῃ. 13 Πειρασμὸς ὑμᾶς οὐκ εἴληφεν, εἰ μὴ carried forward, by a kind of parallelism, yet so as to advert to the same wrong spirit, of demanding all that Christian liberty in its widest extent, and unchecked by Christian expediency, would permit,—namely, a spirit that murmured at the restraints of spiritual authority; such an insubordinate spirit as that of the Israelites. The θλοθρευτής here is the ὁ θλοθρεύων of Exod. xii. 23, the angel of death. The expression is not found elsewhere except in Hesych., who explains it by λυμῶν; though not, I suspect, from this passage, but some other, since the cognate θλοθρευτής occurs in Nicet. Chon. Cod. Græcobarb. p. 701. It was probably a provincialism.

11. ταῦτα δὲ πάντα τέτοις συνέβαινον ἐκείνοις] After the examples enumerated the Apostle repeats the proposition laid down, from which the ratio argumenti is drawn forth. (Hyper.) See also Calv. and Est. As regards the sentiment, we have here an amplification of that at ver. 6; and, as to the construction and interpretation, these depend on the same principles. Here Dr. Peile proposes to render, 'Now in all these things that were befalling them;' which version he attempts to justify in his note. But, in order to fully elicit the sentiment which he regards as intended by the Apostle, he is obliged to advert to what the Greek text might have been, not what it is in all the copies. The proposition which he rejects is called for by the nature of the case; this being an apposition, as often elsewhere, æsthetical (see 1 Thess. v. 8. Eph. i. 7, and ii. 17. Jos. Bell. i. 20, 1), in which case an ὥς is left to be mentally supplied, though it is sometimes expressed, as in Heb. vi. 19. Hdut. iii. 86, προσκύνησον τὸν Δαριῶν ὡς βασιλῆα ('in quality of king'), with which comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 23, 'All these things did Araunah, [as] a king, give unto the king.' With respect to the construction, it is well pointed out by Billr. that 'since ἐκείνοις belongs to συνέβαινον, so after τύποι we must understand ἡμῖν, according to the ἡμῶν, for ὑμῖν at ver. 6.' The reading, however, is controverted. For τύποι MSS. A, B, C, K, and 12 cursives, have τυπικῶς, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch. ed. 1, and Alf. But τύποι was retained by Griesb. and Scholz, and restored by Tisch. ed. 2; rightly; since external authority is insufficient, and internal evidence is against τυπικῶς, which was far less likely to have been, as Alf. supposes, altered to τύποι from v. 1. in all the copies except 16, than to have been introduced, as a plainer reading, from a marginal gloss. This is confirmed by Theodor., who, retaining τύποι with the addition of ὥς, explains by ταῦτα τυπικῶς ἐκ. συνέβη. That the Pesch. Syr. Translator had τύποι in his copy is evident. As to the Latin Versions, they do not really confirm τυπικῶς, since the rendering was a free version. And Fathers in such a case as this are of little weight for τυπικῶς, though they would be for τύποι. Thus Origen (testo Jacks.) always quotes the Subst., never the Adverb. Here, in short, we have a brevity of expression, the full meaning being: 'Now all these things happened to them as types, which would be fulfilled in similar events [as antitypes] to us in our case, and in which it is implied that they are to serve as examples [for warning and admonition],' as it is declared in the next words, the best comment on which is Rom. xv. 4, ὅσα γὰρ προεγράφη, εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν διδασκαλίαν προεγράφη.—τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων, lit. 'the end of the ages,'—namely, of the world's duration, equiv. to συντέλεια τῶν αἰώνων, Matt. xiii. 39. Heb. ix. 26. The coming of Christ was thus designated, as representing the commencement of a new period of the world's existence. For κατήντησεν, MSS. B, D, E, F, G, and 2 cursives, and not a few Fathers, have κατήντηκεν, which is required by propriety of language (the sense being, according to that reading, 'have come, supererogant'); though whether that reading be from correction of critics or error of scribes is far from certain. But the former is the more probable supposition. However, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. have received it into the text; which is as little to be approved of as the wholly omitting all notice of the var. lect.; as is done by Matthæi and Griesb., and, I had almost said, Scholz; for he only adduces the authority of one MS. for it, by a negligence observable in too many other cases.

12. An admonition is now subjoined, founded, by inference, on the examples which had been adduced of the consequences of abusing God's mercy and long-suffering, by any kind of disobedience to his will.

—ὁ δοκῶν ἐστάναι] By ἐστάναι is of course meant 'standing fast;' not, however, so much in acceptance with God by the means of grace, ordinary and extraordinary (as most Commentators, including Mackn., think), as 'standing fast in faith,' as opposed to the swerving from it, by hearkening to the sophistries of the false teachers (comp. Rom. xi. 20, ὅ ἐδὲ τῇ πίστει ἔστηκεν, i. e. 'in the faith as ye have been taught by us'). Comp. infra, ch. vi. 13, στέκετε ἐν τῇ πίστει, with Col. ii. 7. Thus the general sense may be expressed in the words of Hypocritus's paraphrase: 'I grant, indeed, that you have been well instructed and taught, that you possess a solid doctrine of faith, &c.; but what then? It was so with the Fathers, and they fell.' The sentiment is, indeed, a general one; but the Apostle probably chose that form in preference to direct apostrophe; though it is, as all the ancient Commentators are agreed, meant espec. for the proud and arrogant teachers, who, vain of their superior knowledge, fancied that they already stood perfect, were τέλειοι; and yet, as Calv. says, 'sum infirmitatis obliiti, in multa flagitia prolaberentur.'

13. πειρασμὸς ὑμᾶς, &c.] We have here an anticipation of an objection, and a removal of an excuse; q. d. 'These temptations are not, as they are sometimes alleged to be, above human strength; being no more than human nature is subjected to, and may be enabled to bear.' The ἀνθρώπων· <sup>1</sup> πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς, ὃς οὐκ ἑάσει ὑμᾶς πειρασθῆναι | 1 Pt. 1. 5. a.

 ὑπὲρ ὃ δύνασθε· ἀλλὰ ποιήσει σὺν τῷ πειρασμῷ καὶ τὴν ἐκ- | Dan. 2. 17.
 βασιν, τοῦ δύνασθαι [ὑμᾶς] ὑπενεγκεῖν. <sup>14</sup> <sup>m</sup> Διόπερ, ἀγαπητοί | Luke 22. 32.
 μου, φεύγετε ἀπὸ τῆς εἰδωλολατρείας. <sup>15</sup> <sup>o</sup> Ὡς φρονιμοὶ λέγω | John 10. 30
 | 1 Tim. 4. 12. | 1 Pet. 1. 5. | 2 Pet. 2. 9. | m 2 Cor. 6. 17. | 1 John 5. 31.

literal sense is, 'temptation hath not befallen you, but such as is incidental to man,' i.e. human nature. The connexion here, if any there be, has been variously traced. The question is, what may be considered the scope and purpose of the Apostle in these words. Some suppose this to be reprehension for yielding to temptation (as thinking it too hard to bear), and serious admonition against needlessly running into it, as also exhortation to fortify themselves against future assaults. Such is the view adopted by Hyper., Bulling., Est., Grot., Heyd., and Stenersen. While the ancient Commentators in general, and, of the moderns, Calv., Bp. Pearce, Whitby, Krause, and Pott, suppose it to be the Apostle's purpose to suggest motives of consolation under troubles present, or near at hand, and to convey a dissuasive against despondency. And this latter view I long continued to prefer: only I regarded encouragement rather than consolation as the import of the words: and, indeed, whichever mode of considering them be adopted, the words may be supposed to convey a preoccupation of something that had been, or might be, alleged by the persons in question. Upon the whole, after repeated consideration of the subject, I am inclined to think that the Apostle intended to suggest matter for great encouragement, and yet ground for cautious distrust of themselves, as tending to preparedness for more strenuous resistance to evil; the latter, however, only by implication under the encouraging assurance πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεός, and even under the first words, πειρασμός οὐκ εἰληφας, &c., which may be freely rendered, 'as to temptation (of which you plead the severe assaults), there hath none [hitherto] befallen you, but what is incidental to man [and, consequently, such as may be borne by man]. Moreover (δὲ), should severest trials await you, God is [on his part] faithful to his promise [of all needful support and protection]' (see 2 Thess. iii. 3, compared with Heb. x. 23); even the promise of establishment and protection ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ. Comp. Heb. xiii. 5. This, however, involves the reciprocal engagement on the part of man to do his part, by avoiding whatever may bring him into temptation, by resolutely encountering trials in his Christian course, and taking heed to his own steps, that he may not fall; relying on the promise of being upholden by the hand of the Lord, 1s. xli. 10. Ps. xxxvii. 24. The above view I find confirmed by Hyper., Bulling., and Olsh. By ἀνθρώπων is denoted what 'man is subject to,' and, accordingly, what he must make up his mind to bear. To the examples I have already adduced of this use from Æschyl. Pers. 702. Soph. Œd. Col. 588. Thucyd. v. 103, add Jos. Antt. vii. 7, 6. Polyb. i. 6, 1, ἀθρ. κακία, and Jos. Antt. iii. 5, 7 (as said of Moses abiding in Mount Sinai), τὸ θησιος περιπεσόντα ἀποθανεῖν ἀνθρώπων ἡγούμενος. With respect to τῷ πειρασμῷ καὶ τῇ ἐκβάσει, there is no reason to suppose, with Dr. Paley, that the article is generic. This the usus loquendi will not permit; for I cannot find a single instance of either word being used generically, though I have noted a few examples of ἐκβάσις being used with reference, e. gr. Dio Cass. p. 421, 67, ed. Reim. Here the reference is manifest; but I would not express it, with Bp. Middl., by 'the mode of deliverance.' I prefer, with Mr. Green, Gr. N. T., to supply, 'the desired deliverance.' But the true supplementum is, rather, 'the suitable deliverance,' as in the Schol. on Lucian, Timon, 3, προσφυῶν ἐκάστη πλῆρη τὴν ἐκβασιν ἐπιφέρει, 'the event suitable to the stroke of the declaimer.' Chrys., Theophyl., Œcumen., and Phot. here enlarge on the lesson inculcated on the Corinthians, of not trusting in their own strength,—since, moderate as might be the temptation or trial, they would never by themselves finally get through, nor, meanwhile, bear up under them, q. d. 'It is God who gives the power to endure, as well as that speedy deliverance out of the temptation or trial whereby it becomes enduring.' But the above Commentators omit to advert to the believer's asking for this aid and strength to bear, in earnest prayer to him who hath promised to give it to them that ask it in faith, whereby they may be 'strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.' We cannot doubt that (as Dr. Whitby here says) 'God hath engaged to all that enter into covenant with him to enable them to perform the conditions of that covenant, since a covenant upon an impossible condition, he knows, cannot be performed; and all are bound to pray in faith, that God would not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able, by his strength, to bear.'

14. The Apostle subjoins (as an inference from the above examples and warnings) a solemn admonition against idolatry.

—φεύγετε ἀπὸ τῆς εἰδωλ. i. e. 'carefully avoid every approach to idolatry,' such as was contracted in attending on idol-feasts. The Apostle now returns to the subject treated of at ch. viii. —namely, the eating of idol-meats, and shows how far it is lawful, and how far unlawful. He first shows that it is not lawful for them to eat at idol-feasts, since that is a kind of idolatry, 14—24; but that it is lawful for them to eat the flesh that had been so offered, when sold in the market and set on private tables, 25—33. In order to evince the necessity for this abstinence from participation in heathen rites, he lays down the position, that every sacrificial feast is a kind of worship; and consequently attendance at it is an association in the worship of the deity to whose honour the feast is instituted. This he illustrates by two examples; one taken from the Christian Lord's Supper, the other from the sacrifices of the Jews; from which he, at ver. 20, draws the conclusion, that Christians who were accustomed to be present at heathen sacrificial feasts were considered by other heathens as persons favourable to their idolatrous religion, in the same manner as those who were present at κρίνατε ὑμεῖς ὁ φημι. 16 <sup>n</sup> Τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας ὁ εὐλογούμεν, οὐχὶ κοινωνία τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐστὶ; τὸν ἄρτον, ὃν κλῶμεν, οὐχὶ κοινωνία τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐστὶν;

 17 <sup>o</sup> ὅτι εἰς ἄρτος, ἐν σῶμα οἱ πολλοὶ ἐσμεν οἱ γὰρ πάντες ἐκ τοῦ ἐνὸς ἄρτου μετέχομεν. 18 <sup>p</sup> Βλέπετε τὸν Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ σάρκα· οὐχὶ οἱ ἐσθιόντες τὰς θυσίας κοινωνοὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου εἰσὶ; 19 <sup>q</sup> Τί οὖν φημι; ὅτι εἰδῶλον τί ἐστὶν; ἢ ὅτι εἰδωλό-

the sacred feasts of the Christians thereby declared publicly that they belonged to the society of Christians.

15. ὡς φρονίμοις λέγω] An expression (as Theodoret observes) meant to soften the harshness of what he may have to say. The Apostle addresses them as persons of wisdom and judgment, because they valued themselves on their superior knowledge, and in order that he might make his appeals to their reason and conscience more effectual.

16. τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλ.] This is best explained as put for τὸ ποτήριον τὸ εὐλογητόν, or εὐλογημένον, ('the cup for, or over which, we give thanks to God,' the opposition being in the we), and it is supposed to have been a popular phrase to denote the Eucharist, and adopted from what was called 'the cup of blessing' at the Paschal feast; see Note on Matt. xxvi. 6. In οὐχὶ κοινωνία, &c., many Expositors think that ἐστὶ signifies 'is a symbol of.' But it may more simply be taken in the usual sense, and, conjoined with κοιν., be regarded as a popular form of expression. Thus the best Commentators, ancient and modern, adopting a metonymical mode of interpretation, suppose the wording to be equiv. to, οὐχὶ οἱ πίνοντες τὸ ποτήριον τοῦ εὐλογ. κοινωνοὶ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ Χρ. εἰσι; οὐχὶ οἱ ἐσθιόντες τὸν ἄρτον τὸν εὐλογ. κοινωνοὶ τοῦ σώμ. τοῦ Χ. εἰσι; the sense being 'Are not those who participate in the Lord's Supper κοινωνοὶ τοῦ αἵματος καὶ τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, thereby forming one society of worshippers of Christ, and commemorators of his death and sacrifice for sin?' The accusatives ἄρτον and ποτήριον are regarded as put for ὁ ἄρτος ὃν κλῶμεν, &c.; or else κατὰ, 'quod attinet ad,' is supplied. There may, however, be an anacoluthon, as in Soph. Œd. Tyr. 451, λέγω δὲ τὸν ἄρτον τοῦτον, ὃν πάλαί ζητεῖς, οὗτός ἐστιν ἐνθάδε. The argument is, as Hyper. remarks, taken from the rite and the effect of the Christian Lord's Supper, thus: By using the bread and wine we communicate with the body and blood of Christ, and are made one with Christ. Therefore, in the same manner, those who use the food and drink offered to idols, communicate with idols, are made one with idols. In other words, 'as Christians who participate in the Lord's Supper are supposed, by commemorating his expiatory death, to be in communion with Christ, and the Christian society; so, by a parity of reasoning, those who participate in heathen sacrificial feasts must thereby be supposed to be in communion with idols and idolaters, or at least to be favourably inclined to idolatry.'

17. ὅτι εἰς ἄρτος—ἐσμεν] Render, not bread, but loaf; as Gataker long ago pointed out. The loaves, or rather cakes, of Judæa were usually (espec. at the Paschal feast) of a very large size; so that a considerable number may be supposed to have partaken in common of one of them. The sense, then, is: 'for as there is one loaf, so we, the many, become one body;' i.e. 'as the loaf is one, so we, the many (i.e. we all), are one body,' professing ourselves thereby to be all members of that body, of which Christ is the head. Thus it is as if St. Paul had written, 'Ὅσπερ εἰς ἄρτος ἐστίν, οὐ μετέχομεν, οὕτως ἐστὶν ἐν σῶμα (Eph. iv. 4) ὁ ἡμεῖς οἱ πολλοὶ (for ἡμεῖς πάντες) ἐσμεν. The words may be thus paraphrased, with Bp. Warburton, ubi supra: 'Our being partakers of one bread (or loaf) in the communion, makes us, of many, [which we are by nature,] to become, by grace, one body in Christ; the communion of the body and blood of Christ uniting the receivers into one body, by an equal distribution of one common benefit.'

18. βλέπετε τὸν Ἰερ., &c.] Another example to show the force which is inherent in a feast conjoined with religious observances; and that taken from the customs of the Israelites, who used, at festivals, to make an entertainment of the relics of the victims, not only for their servants, but for strangers. (Pott.) By Ἰερ. κατὰ σάρκα are here denoted the natural descendants of Israel as a nation—Jews by birth, who worshipped God by sacrifices, and were as yet unconverted to the Christian religion. The sense of οὐχὶ οἱ ἐσθ., &c., is, 'Are not those, who eat of the flesh of the victims, supposed to be participants in the sacrifice on the altar, and of the benefits of that sacrifice?' For the flesh of the victim was eaten by the priests and the sacrificants; see Lev. viii. 31, and Deut. xii. 6, 7. The application is left to be supplied,—which is, ὅτι καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐσθιόντες τὰ εἰδωλόθута, κοινωνοὶ δαιμονίων γίνεσθαι. Now that was supposed to bring them in *communio*n with the Deity; especially as he was supposed to be personally, though invisibly, present. Indeed, that *communio*n was implied by the benefits, whether real, or, as in the case of the heathens, imaginary, being confirmed by a pact or convention between the sacrificer and his God: see Bp. Warburton, ubi supra.

19—22. The Apostle here shows that, even their own premises being conceded, the conclusion they draw would not follow; since the ground of censure consisted in this,—that the Pagans must necessarily suppose, that Christians who were present at their sacred feasts worshipped the deities to whose honour those feasts were instituted.

19. τί οὖν φημι;—ἐστίν;] By a similar mode of expression it is said, in Plato, Gorg. p. 73, τί δὲ οὖν λέγομεν περὶ τοῦ ὅστιν; Render: 'What is my meaning? That an idol is any thing, i.e. has any divinity; or, that the idol-θυτον τί ἐστιν; <sup>20</sup> ἄλλ' ὅτι ἂ θύει τὰ ἔθνη, δαιμονίοις θύει, καὶ οὐ Θεῷ οὐ θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς κοινωνοὺς τῶν δαιμονίων γίνεσθαι.

<sup>21</sup> Οὐ δύνασθε ποτήριον Κυρίου πίνειν καὶ ποτήριον δαιμονίων οὐ δύνασθε τραπέζης Κυρίου μετέχειν, καὶ τραπέζης δαιμονίων.
<sup>22</sup> Ἡ παραζηλοῦμεν τὸν Κύριον; μὴ ἰσχυρότεροι αὐτοῦ ἐσμεν;
<sup>23</sup> Πάντα [μοι] ἔξεστιν, ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα συμφέρει πάντα [μοι]

<sup>1</sup> Lev. 17. 7.
<sup>2</sup> Deut. 32. 17.
<sup>3</sup> Ps. 106. 37.
<sup>4</sup> Lev. 19. 30.
<sup>5</sup> Deut. 32.
<sup>6</sup> 2 Cor. 6. 15.
<sup>7</sup> 1 Exod. 30. 5.
<sup>8</sup> 24. 14.
<sup>9</sup> Deut. 4. 24.
<sup>10</sup> 24. 14.
<sup>11</sup> 24. 16. 31.
<sup>12</sup> u ch. 4. 13.
<sup>13</sup> 24. 9.
<sup>14</sup> Rom. 14. 15, 20.

meat is any thing? (i. e. differs from other meats.) No; that is not my meaning.

<sup>20</sup>. ἄλλ' ὅτι. Render: '[No;] but my meaning is, that, &c. This ellipsis of οὐχὶ after an interrogation is occasionally found both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. So Arrian, Dia. i. 29, 4, μὴ γὰρ τὸ ἔθνος ἐξήλωκα αὐτοῦ; ἀλλὰ τὴν παιδίαν σώζων ἔρχομαι πρὸς αὐτὰν. Liban. Or. 104, D, κειμένοις ἐπιμβαίνει ἀνδρείος; ἀλλ' ὁ πρῶτος κατενέγκει. The words ἂ θύει—Θεῷ are taken from Deut. xxii. 17. By δαιμονίαι are meant either, as Mede and others explain, the falsely-called deities of the heathens, elsewhere termed εἰδῶλα, or (as Luther, Calv., Beza, Grot., and Billr. are of opinion) evil demons, considered as actual existences, and who are meant at Ps. xcvi. 5 Sept. The former mode of interpretation is adopted by Dr. Peile, in whose hands the objections to it advanced by Calvin and Whitby are lessened, though not removed; inasmuch that, although I am ready to admit it to be an open question, whether to adopt this view or the commonly received one, yet I am inclined to acquiesce in the remark of Billr., that 'the proper authors of idolatrous worship are the evil demons with which, as actual existences, those offering sacrifices come into fellowship, and thereby [in a certain sense] serve them.'

<sup>21</sup>. οὐ δύνασθαι] q. d. 'Ye cannot, consistently; it is not suitable, and therefore not lawful for you.' The inconsistency, Bp. Warburton shows, is this: that they who eat and drink in the feast on that sacrifice are partakers of the supposed benefits of the sacrifice, and consequently are parties to the federal rites which confirmed those benefits; so that the same man could not, consistently with himself, be partaker of both tables,—the Lord's, and that of devils. The inconsistency arising from the Pagan and Christian rites having one common nature (a feast or sacrifice), which, springing from contrary originals, destroy one another's effects.'

Πίνειν ποτήριον and μετέχειν τραπέζης Κυρίου signify, per meritionem, a partaking of the Lord's Supper, and the expression πίνειν ποτήριον alludes to the wine partly poured out and partly drunk at the sacrificial feasts. See Virg. Æn. viii. 278. Now to drink of this vinum libationis was strictly forbidden by the Jewish Rabbis. So, among the Rabbinical citations in Wetstein, Horajoth, fol. 2, 1, 'Quinam est apostata? qui edit morticina et à bestiis discerpta, abominabilia et reptilia, et bibit vinum libationis.' The expression μετέχειν τραπέζης alludes to the banquet set out, from the remains of the victim, for the votaries, in the temple or elsewhere. Krause observes, that τραπέζης depends upon μῖσος understood; of which very rare plena locutio he adduces an example from Lysias. I add Æschyl.

Agam. 490, οὐ γὰρ ποτ' ἤδχον—θανὼν μεθεῖμι φιλήτάτω τάφον μῖσος.

<sup>22</sup>. The Apostle here intimates, that to attempt such an inconsistency must be highly displeasing to God. Παραζηλοῦν may signify either to excite any one to jealousy, or to anger; of which intensive sense of παρά we have an example in παραθήκη, occurring in Dionys. Hal. Ant. vol. i. p. 483. Sylb. The former sense has much to recommend it in the usage of the Sacred writers, but the latter is more agreeable to what follows, μὴ ἰσχυρὸν αὐτοῦ ἐσμεν; in which something is required to be supplied; q. d. 'Are we stronger than he, [that] we can venture to brave his wrath?'] The two senses, however, merge into each other; the jealousy and the anger of God being convertible terms, and accordingly switted in a parallelism at Ps. lxxix. 5, which ought to be thus rendered: 'How long, O Lord, wilt thou be angry?—for ever? How long shall thy jealousy burn like fire?—for ever?' The repetition is required by the context, and admitted by the proprietas linguæ. Indeed we have here an example of the Synthetic or Constructive parallelism, on which see Bp. Lowth, de Sacr. P. Lect. xix., and Bp. Jebb, Sacr. Lit. p. 27. Of course the jealousy here spoken of is to be understood ἀνθρωποπαθὴς; the relation of God to his chosen people being in Scripture often compared with that of the husband to the wife.

<sup>23</sup>. The Apostle now reverts back to the objections at ch. vi. 12, and (to use the words of Bp. Sanderson, in his two Sermons on this text) 'sets bounds to our Christian liberty; first in the power, and then in the exercise of that power; and he encounters the error both of those who would shrink it in, and of those who would stretch it out, more than is meet. He extends our liberty in the power, but restrains it in the use of that power.' In his first Sermon, after showing that by πάντα are meant all things [indifferent], the learned Prelate points out what things are indifferent,—namely, all such things whose expediency or in expediency are fit to be taken into consideration. He then proceeds to show the liberty which all Christians have to the use of things indifferent, and the error of those who restrain it too much, as also the cause of that error. With respect to the former, he shows that it must not be pleaded, except in things lawful. He points out what expediency is, and how it differs from lawfulness. Then he considers what edification is, and shows that it is the measure of expediency, and then concludes by pointing out that in the exercise of our Christian liberty much is left to the discretion of particular persons.

— πάντα μοι, &c.] Μοι, absent from A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and a few cursives, Versions, and x Rom. 15.

1, 2.
ch. 9. 19—22.
2. 13. 5.
Phil. 2. 4, 5, 31.
y Exod. 19. 5.
Deut. 10. 14.
Job 41. 11.
Ps. 54. 1.
& 50. 12.
& ver. 23.
1 Tim. 6. 17.
2 ch. 8. 10.
11.
& ver. 23.
Exod. 9. 29.
a Ps. 24. 1.
& 115. 16.
Jer. 27. 6, 7. Matt. 6. 21, 22.

Fathers, has been cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but without reason; for the suspicion that it may have been introduced from vi. 12 seems ungrounded. I rather agree with Rinck, that the Apostle seems to have here, as often, repeated the same objection in the same words, as at vi. 12. It is surely, as Rinck says, less credible that the Eastern Recension should have repeated μοι from the parallel passage, than that the Western should have ἄρουν ἡ οὐ, probably from mistaking its scope; it simply serving to indicate the κοινωνία, a figure so frequent in the writings of St. Paul. Indeed, I see not how the μοι can well be dispensed with, since in the latter, at least, of the two clauses, it is emphatical, having reference to τὸν ἑαυτοῦ or τρεῖς ἑαυτοῦ, as was seen by Chrysostom and Crellius; and as, indeed, is plain from the next verse. At any rate, πάντα μοι ἔστιν contains the objection of the Corinthians, and the words following, its answer.

24. μηδὲς—ἕκαστος] Many regard this as a general gnome, like the one at 1 Cor. xiii., 'Charity seeketh not her own.' That passage, however, is not of general application; nor is this. Both are to be restricted to the case in question, and the subject-matter. Here there can only be reference to the use of idol-meats, and other ἀδιάφορα. The passage is evidently meant to directly bring forward a sentiment which was only implied in the preceding verse, and the sense is, 'Let no man consider how his actions affect himself only, but also others;' meaning, that we must not consider our own gratification, when it injures the spiritual welfare of others. There is, indeed, the same idiom as that treated of at Rom. viii. 5, ζητείτω here being only a plainer expression for φρονέτω there; and the force of τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ is, 'his own interest,' as in Thucyd. i. 17, τοῖς ἑαυτῶν μόνον προορώμενοι, and vi. 16, τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ μόνον σκοπιῶν. Soph. Aj. 1313, δρα μὴ τοῦμόν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ σὺν.—ἕκαστος, not found in most uncials and a few cursives, as also some Versions and Fathers, has been cancelled by all the recent Editors; and, indeed, internal evidence is against its genuineness.

25. πάν τὸ ἐν μακέλλῳ πωλούμενον ἐστὶ] The Apostle now gives a rule for their conduct as to the eating of idol-meats, by which he both leaves room for Christian liberty, and tempers it with due regard to the spiritual good of others.

—μηδὲν ἀνακρ.] The best recent Commentators consider this phrase as put for μηδὲν κρίας (scil. κρίματος γίνου) ἀνακρ., 'examining no kind of meat, to see [whether it is idol-meat or not].' And the interpretation is supported by the πάν following. See note on Acts xvii. 11.

ἔξεστιν, ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα οἰκοδομεῖ. 24 * μηδὲς τὸ ἑαυτοῦ ζη-τεῖτω, ἀλλὰ τὸ τοῦ ἑτέρου [ἕκαστος]. 25 Πάν τὸ ἐν μακέλλῳ πωλούμενον ἐσθίετε, μηδὲν ἀνακρίνοντας διὰ τὴν συνείδησιν
26 * τοῦ γὰρ Κυρίου ἡ γῆ καὶ τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτῆς. 27 Εἰ [δὲ] τις καλεῖ ὑμᾶς τῶν ἀπίστων, καὶ θέλετε πορεύεσθαι, πάν τὸ παρατιθέμενον ὑμῖν ἐσθίετε, μηδὲν ἀνακρίνοντας διὰ τὴν συνείδησιν. 28 * Ἐὰν δὲ τις ὑμῖν εἴπῃ Τοῦτο εἰδωλόθυτόν ἐστι· μὴ ἐσθίετε, δι' ἐκείνον τὸν μνηύσαντα, καὶ τὴν συνείδησιν [* τοῦ

— διὰ τὴν συνείδησιν] 'on the score of conscience,'—namely, as to whether it be meat that has been offered to idols, or not,—and that, for the reason mentioned in the next verse.

26. τοῦ γὰρ Κ.—αὐτῆς] This passage is taken from Ps. xxiv. 1. The full sense is,—[You need none of you feel scruples in your own minds;] for as the earth and all its productions are the Lord's, so there is nothing naturally impure, but it is only so in the opinion of any one.' Accordingly (to use the words of Billr.), 'as all good things come from God, they are in themselves unexceptionable, if they be used, as coming from God, with thanksgiving.' Comp. 1 Tim. iv. 4.

Πλήρωμα here signifies whatever fills up the world, and is contained therein; all God's creatures, animate or inanimate. Comp. ἐκπλήρωμα θαλάσσης in Ps. cxvi. 11.

28. εἰδωλόθυτόν ἐστι] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἰσθόθυτόν ἐστι, from MSS. A, B, H, the Sahid. Vern., and Euseb. But external evidence is insufficient, since internal cannot be said to be in favour of ἰσθό. That ἰσθ. should have been altered to εἰσθ. in all the copies except three, is incredible, and must induce one to regard ἰσθό as the alteration. I must still regard it as a Critical correction, not however of style, but of matter, in order, as De Wette supposes, to represent what would be said at a heathen's table, where it might be thought rude to use the term εἰσθ., and polite to use the heathen one ἰσθό. Mr. Alf., indeed, objects that that is giving correctors more credit for tact and judgment than they generally show (which is very true), and ascribes the use of the term to the Apostle. The thing thus becomes dramatic; but, at the same time, the Apostle is made to countenance what is morally wrong, and the opposite to his own practice. This, of course, effectually forbids the reception of ἰσθό, which, indeed, there was no need for the Critics to excogitate; for, since the τις evidently points not only at a fellow guest, but at a fellow Christian,—a weak Christian, indeed, superstitiously scrupulous,—wishing to apprise his brother (the strong) Christian of the fact, why should we not suppose the words εἰδωλόθυτόν ἐστι to be spoken aside, or in an undertone, to his fellow Christian, who would be likely to be seated near him? As to the preference to be given, as Alf. thinks, to ἰσθό, on account of its being an unusual term, it is as usual as εἰσθ.; only one is of Classical, the other of Hellenistic use.

— δι' ἐκείνον τὸν μνηύσαντα, κ. τ. ε.] 'on account of (out of deference to the scruples of) him who disclosed [the fact]; yea, for conscience;—' that his conscience may not be wounded (should he partake with you). The next words, τοῦ γὰρ Κυρίου—αὐτῆς, is cancelled by all the Critical Editors, though retained by Dr. Peile. But the violence which he is obliged to use with the words, by all sorts of insertions (one very long), to make them suitable,—verifying what I have said, that the clause cannot be made apposite without supposing the omission of several words to which it might be referred—is calculated to increase rather than diminish the suspicion that they are not genuine, and may justly lead one to suppose that the grounds of their rejection by every Critical Editor, except Matthæi, are not insufficient to justify their being cancelled. It may, indeed, be inquired, how came a clause so worse than superfluous to creep into all the MSS. except 20? To this we may answer, with Bengel, Griesb., and others, that the words are a repetition from v. 26. But whether this solution of the difficulty be satisfactory, may be doubted; and I am inclined, with Jackson of Leicester, to lay hold of the clue held out by Musculus, who is of opinion that the words are genuine, but have merely got out of place through the carelessness of scribes, and have only to be removed from the end, to the beginning, of the verse. But this requires confirmation from MSS., which, when the cursive copies shall have been far better collated, may be supplied.

γὰρ Κυρίου ἢ γῆ καὶ τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτῆς.] <sup>29</sup> συνεῖδησιν δὲ λέγω, οὐχὶ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ, ἀλλὰ τὴν τοῦ ἑτέρου ἵνατί γὰρ ἡ ἐλευθερία μου κρίνεται ὑπὸ ἄλλης συνειδήσεως; <sup>30</sup> <sup>b</sup> Εἰ [δὲ] ἐγὼ <sup>b</sup> Rom. 14. 2 <sup>c</sup> 1 Tim. 4. 4 ἐγὰρ μετέχω, τί βλασφημοῦμαι ὑπὲρ οὗ ἐγὼ εὐχαριστῶ; <sup>31</sup> <sup>c</sup> Εἴτε οὖν ἐσθίετε εἴτε πίνετε, εἴτε τι ποιεῖτε, πάντα εἰς δόξαν <sup>c</sup> Col. 3. 17.

<sup>29</sup> συνεῖδησιν δὲ λέγω, &c.] These words are explanatory of the foregoing διὰ τὴν συνεῖδησιν. The δὲ is resumptive, taking up the preceding train of discourse, as Luke iv. 1. Comp. ch. iii. 29, and Matt. iii. 4, and often in the Class. writers. Render: 'Conscience, to wit, I mean not one's own, but of the other party:' here pointing at the informant—the weak Christian brother; q. d. 'I know that you have no scruples on the subject; and I mean not that with you this need be a matter of conscience.'

—ἵνατί γὰρ ἡ ἐλευθερία, &c.] The sense of this clause has been not a little disputed. By many Expositors the words are regarded as not the words of the Apostle, but an objection of the Corinthians to his directions, in the sense, 'Why is my liberty to be thus judged of, or determined, by other men's consciences, or restrained out of regard to the conscience of others?' q. d. 'I may have it, though I forbear to exercise it, on account of their scruples.' Thus the words following are explained: 'If I partake [of the meat] with thankfulness, why,' &c. But that these are the words of an objector is negated by the γὰρ; and surely to suppose them so without proof were uncritical. Besides, when St. Paul is introducing the words of an objector, he always, I believe, subjoins an answer; whereas none such is found here: for to suppose it at ver. 31 is utterly without foundation; and the supplementum in the place of it, introduced by some, is quite unauthorized. There is every reason, with the ancient and the most eminent modern Commentators, to suppose the words to be those of the Apostle, and intended as a caution (suggested by the use of συνειδήσιν) to the following effect: 'For why is my liberty to be so exercised, as to be condemned by another's conscience [while I do what he thinks wrong, but I believe to be right]? Thus v. 30 may be rendered: 'If I, by [Divine] grace (goodness), be a partaker of this liberty, why should I so use it, as to be evil spoken of for the use of that liberty for which I am thankful?' i. e. 'why am I to occasion censure and give offence by the rash and imprudent use of that liberty, for the possession of which I am thankful?' So Theodoret: οὐχ ὁσίων (φῆσιν) ἄλλον λωβᾶσθαι διὰ τῆς ἐμῆς ταλειότητος. This interpretation is strongly confirmed by the context; and there is nothing philologically unsound in it, for κρίνεσθαι may very well be taken for κατακρίνεσθαι, or βλασφημεῖσθαι. The above view of the sense is supported by the authority of the best Commentators, ancient and modern. See especially Calvin and Estius, and also Dr. Peile.

I cannot omit to remark one peculiarity untouched on by all the Commentators, and yet closely connected with the true interpretation of the passage, and for want of seeing which many have missed the sense. I mean that idiomatical, and perhaps popular or provincial, use of the Present tense, by which it denotes not what is, but what is to be, or ought to be. Nearly allied to this idiom is the use of the Present for the Future, so common in Scripture, and also in the Class. writers.

<sup>31</sup> εἴτε οὖν ἐσθίετε—ποιεῖτε] It has been well observed by Grotius, that 'the scope of the admonition is, to bid the Corinthian converts beware, lest by any act of theirs, under any circumstances, the glory of God (namely, by the spread and influence of the Gospel) should be injured.' The sense comprehends a general admonition, couched under a particular one, and the οὖν is conclusive; what is said in this and the two following verses being the conclusion deduced from what has been brought forward in the three foregoing Chapters. Render: 'Upon these principles, then, act:—In whatever ye eat and drink, and in all your conduct, keep an eye to the glory of God (by promoting his conscientious and sincere worship in Christ) (see Whitby); and do not injure the cause of religion by throwing stumbling-blocks in the way either of unbelievers, to hinder them from embracing it, or of weak and scrupulous believers, to shake their attachment to it.' An exhortation (says Bp. Sanderson, Sermon) not only, in the performance of good works and necessary duties, to intend the glory of God, but even in the use of the creatures, and of all indifferent things; in eating and drinking, in buying and selling, and in all the like actions of common life.'

d Rom. 14.

15.

e Rom. 15. 2.

ch. 9. 19, 23.

a ch. 4. 16.

1 Thess. 1. 6.

2 Thess. 2. 9.

b vv. 17, 22.

Prov. 31.

20—31.

ch. 4. 17.

&amp; 16. 2.

Luke 1. 6.

1 Thess. 4.

1. 2.

2 Thess. 3.

15. &amp; 3. 6.

c Eph. 1. 22.

23. &amp; 4. 15.

&amp; 5. 23. ch. 2. 22. &amp; 15. 27, 32.

Eph. 1. 20—22.

John 14. 26.

Phil. 2. 7—11.

Θεοῦ ποιεῖτε. 32 d' Ἀπρόσκοποι γίνεσθε καὶ Ἰουδαίοις καὶ Ἑλ-λησι, καὶ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ 33 e καθὼς κἀγὼ πάντα πᾶσιν ἀρέσκω, μὴ ζητῶν τὸ ἑμαντοῦ συμφέρον, ἀλλὰ τὸ τῶν πολ-λῶν, ἵνα σωθῶσι. XI. 1 a μμηταί μου γίνεσθε, καθὼς κἀγὼ Χριστοῦ.

2 b Ἐπαινῶ δὲ ὑμᾶς, [ἀδελφοί,] ὅτι πάντα μου μέμνησθε, καὶ, καθὼς παρέδωκα ὑμῖν, τὰς παραδόσεις κατέχετε. 3 c Θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι, ὅτι παντὸς ἀνδρὸς ἡ κεφαλὴ ὁ Χριστὸς ἐστὶ.

32. ἀπρόσκοποι γίνεσθε] The sense is: 'Be none occasion of stumbling, either to the Jews, or Greeks, or Christians.' 'Beware lest the Jews have it to say that you are not sincere worshippers of the true God; lest the Greeks say that you think there is no harm in idolatry; and lest Christians weak in the faith be induced to forsake their Christian profession.' (Rosenm.)

33. καθὼς κἀγὼ, &c.] It is well observed by Chrysostom, that after having struck them with fear by setting forth their heavy responsibility for the injury and prejudice they might occasion to the Jews and the Heathens, the Apostle makes his caution more palatable by proposing himself as an example; q. d. '[I exhort you to no more than I set you an example of]: for I study, &c.

—πᾶσιν ἀρέσκω] i. e. 'I endeavour to please them; I consider what will approve itself to them; avoiding what will throw a stumbling-block in the way of their faith, defile and wound their conscience, lead them into sin, and imperil their souls.'—Ἰδιᾶτα must be taken with due limitation. (See Calvin.) The words seem meant to suggest the principle which alone would make the rule of 'pleasing all men' a safe one,—namely, by not consulting one's own interest, but the spiritual good of one's fellow-Christians.

XI. 1. This verse is closely connected with the last of the preceding Chapter, from which it ought not to have been separated. 'Lest (says Bp. Sanderson) he might be thought to extol himself, and that we might know how unsafe a thing it were to rest barely on his or any other man's example, he leads them higher, and to a more perfect example, even that of Christ; q. d. 'Although my example be little considerable in itself, yet wherein it is guided by the example of Christ, you may not despise it. Nor do I lay it upon you as a rule; I only set it before you as a help and encouragement. My example only shows the thing to be feasible: it is Christ's example only that can show it to be warrantable.' Thus the words κἀγὼ Χριστοῦ are subjoined, in order to preclude the idea of his holding himself up as a primary example.

2. Here commences another section of the Epistle, comprising vv. 2—34 of the present Chapter; in which the Apostle proceeds to notice and reprove other instances of disorder, not to say misconduct, as also of irregularity in Divine worship, which had crept in among the Corinthians, though he commences with a general commendation.

3. θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι, &c.] Here it is the purpose of the Apostle to draw their attention to certain cases in which they had abused their Christian liberty in things indifferent, and thereby occasioned great offence to the Jews, the Gentiles, and even Christians themselves. That they may be the better disposed to obey his present injunctions, he begins with commending their obedience afortems. In θέλω ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι we have a form of serious exhortation to attend to what is going to be said, and implying that it is spoken authoritatively. Thus, in an Epistle of a Roman Proconsul to the Milesian Magistrates, Jos. Antt. xiv. 10, 21, we find βούλομαι εὖν ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι, 'I wish you to mind this.'

—ὅτι παντὸς ἀνδρὸς, &c.] The Apostle (doubtless in answer to some inquiry in the letter of the Corinthians) proceeds to treat of the behaviour of women who were moved by inspiration to speak in their assemblies. And first, as to whether the women ought to have their heads covered. Now this question the Apostle thought proper to deal with as one closely connected both with the subjection of wives to their husbands, and with the honour of the husbands; which would be disgraced by any such impropriety in their demeanour as might be imputed to levity, or such violation of custom as would imply insubordination. See ch. xiv. 34. 1 Tim. ii. 12. Now the custom was, for all married women, as well as single ones, to wear veils in public. Hence to depart from that custom (which was regarded as symbolical of subjection to her husband, and amongst the Jews was a token of modesty) would be to act out of character, and thus occasion disgrace to the husband, and scandal to the Church in the eyes of the heathens. This disorderly practice had, no doubt, first arisen among the Gentile converts; and it has been, with great probability, ascribed to an imitation of the custom of the heathen priestesses, to prophesy, or otherwise discharge their religious functions, unveiled. In fact, it was the custom for all women to attend the sacred rites in the temples with heads uncovered. All this, however, was directly the reverse among the Jews and Jewish converts. Consequently, when the practice arose, it was sure to be imputed by the heathens to immodest feeling, espec. since the women being in the heathen temples unveiled, led to that familiarity between the sexes, which often produced very improper results. Hence it is here strictly forbidden. The Apostle, however, insists first on the argument as regards the dishonour done to the husband, by thus seemingly disavowing his authority; and he contrasts the case of covering the head during public worship, as it regarded the women and the men respectively. Upon the whole, it must be borne in mind, that all that is here said has reference only to those times and places, in which the customs were directly the reverse of our own. And accordingly, it is of no κεφαλὴ δὲ γυναικὸς, ὁ ἀνὴρ κεφαλὴ δὲ Χριστοῦ, ὁ Θεός. <sup>4</sup> Πᾶς ἀνὴρ προσευχόμενος ἢ προφητεύων κατὰ κεφαλῆς ἔχων, καταισχύνει τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ <sup>5</sup> πᾶσα δὲ γυνὴ προσευχομένη ἢ προφητεύουσα ἀκατακαλύπτῃ τῇ κεφαλῇ, καταισχύνει τὴν κεφα-

further importance to us, than as furnishing us with a principle of universal application,—namely, that Christians must not, in externals, rashly recede from decorum; that in things indifferent they should use the same manners and customs as their contemporaries and fellow-countrymen; so that whatever may be accounted as base must be abstained from, though it may in itself have nothing wrong, in order to avoid all suspicion or offence; and, above all, that in public assemblies for religious worship, persons of both sexes should assume such a dress and demeanour as may be according to the custom of the country thought decorous, and suitable to their respective relations to each other, and to the common Head of the Church; 'so that all things may be done decently and in order.'

— κεφαλὴ is here for κύριος, as in Achmet, Onir. cited by Wolf. Had Paul, indeed, written the sentence with rhetorical exactness, he would probably have employed the particles of comparison ὡς and οὕτως, and framed it thus: ὡς πατρὶς ἀνδρὸς ἡ κεφαλὴ ὁ Χριστὸς ἐστίν, οὕτως κεφαλὴ γυναικὸς ὁ ἀνὴρ καὶ ὡς κεφαλὴ γυναικὸς ὁ ἀνὴρ, οὕτως Χριστοῦ ὁ Θεός. It is well observed by Dr. Burton, * that κεφαλὴ γυναικὸς ὁ ἀνὴρ (in which we have a general sentiment, of the authority of the man over the woman, similar to very many occurring in ancient writers) would have been enough for the argument; but that St. Paul adds the analogy of order and subordination in the Church.'

— κεφαλὴ δὲ Χριστοῦ, ὁ Θεός.] The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that Christ is here represented as subordinate to God, because considered as Mediator. Lachm. and Tisch. prefix τοῦ to Χριστοῦ, from several MSS. But that is forbidden by the absence of the Article at κεφαλῇ.

4. The sense of the term προφητεύειν in this and the next verse has been disputed. Some, as T. Aquinas, Beza, Calvin, and Paræus, take it to signify to interpret Scripture under Divine inspiration; others, as Estius, Wells, and Bp. Pearce, to teach and communicate by inspiration the doctrines of revelation. Since, however, the word is, in the next verse, applied to women (who it appears from xiv. 34 sq. were not permitted to teach and preach in public), most Commentators for the last century have adopted the interpretation of Menoch. and Mede, — to sing sacred hymns under the impulse of the Holy Spirit. But such a sense of the word is unauthorized. The first mentioned sense is indeed liable to the same objection as the second; though, in fact, that would seem to hold equally against every possible one; for the Apostle says in the same Chapter, ver. 14, that 'it is a shame for a woman to speaking in the Church.' Bp. Pearce, however, maintains that teaching is consistent with both the above passages; since here it is teaching by divine inspiration (a circumstance quite extraordinary), which is not the case in those passages; for (continues he) 'when St. Paul imposes silence on women in the Church, he means silence not in opposition to any gift of the Spirit, but to the desire, which those who had not the Spirit might have, of instructing others, or being themselves instructed in Christian knowledge.' I see not, however, why he should confine the sense to teaching. It may, I think, denote every other sort of speaking under divine inspiration,—to edification, exhortation, and instruction, in addition to that of praying just before mentioned; all equally fulfilling the prophecy of Joel ii. 28, applied by St. Paul, Acts ii. 17, to the times of the Gospel, namely, that their daughters should prophesy.

— κατὰ κεφαλῆς ἔχων] Supply τι, scil. κάλυμμα, expressed in some MSS. and Versions; or ἱμάτιον, as in Plut. Apophth., ἰβάδιζε κατὰ τῆς κεφαλῆς ἔχων τὸ ἱμάτιον. A yet more remarkable ellipsis is found at Esther vi. 12, 'Ἀμὲν δὲ ἐπίστρεψεν εἰς τὰ ἴδια λυπούμενος κατὰ κεφαλῆς, where ἔχων ἱμάτιον may be supplied to complete the sense. But considering that in the Hebrew we have וַיַּחַד עָלָיו, and that the Septuagint Translators do not usually seek out harsh ellipses, I suspect that after λυπούμενος there has slipped out of the text, ὁ λοιποῦ τελεῖται, ἐκκαλυμμένος, which seems to have been in the text in the time of Origen.

The word κατὰ is here used, because the article worn is supposed to hang down from the head.

— καταισχύνει τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐ.] It has been disputed whether κεφαλὴ here should be taken in a figurative sense, as just before, or in the natural one. Now, since there are here two propositions affirmed, of the man, and of the woman, in the same terms, to interpret one in the natural, and the other in the figurative sense, would be very harsh. Nay, thus the sense of κεφαλὴ would be thrice changed in the compass of three short verses, a thing perhaps unprecedented. And as in the case of the woman, the natural sense is plainly alluded to in the words following, and therefore cannot be excluded; so also it cannot well be excluded in the case of the man. And yet the context (at ver. 3) strongly supports the metaphorical sense, which, indeed, is the most important, and was probably most in the mind of the Apostle. In order to remove the above difficulty, it should seem best to suppose, with Heydenreich, that there is intended a union of the two senses, per amphiboliam, either, as he supposes, by engrafting the metaphorical sense on the natural, or (which is preferable) by understanding the metaphorical sense to be the principal, and the natural the subordinate, or under sense, in the case of the woman. And thus there may also be supposed a double sense of καταισχύνει, denoting, in the former case, 1. to insult, or disparage, namely, by contravening the intentions of the Great Head of the Church, or disobeying her head; 2. to disgrace or dishonour, namely, by acting out of character, and violating common propriety. Now, in the case of the man, to carry the symbol of subjection (i.e. having the head covered up in public) d Num. 8. 18.

Deut. 21. 12.
e 23. 5.

e Gen. 1. 26, 27. & 5. 1.
f 9. & 5. 1.
Pa. 8. 6.
James 3. 2.
g Gen. 2. 18, 21, 22.

h Eccles. 8.
i Matt. 15. 10.
j Heb. 1. 14.

λὴν ἐαυτῆς· ὅτι γὰρ ἐστὶ καὶ τὸ αὐτὸ τῇ ἐξυρμημένῃ. <sup>6</sup> εἰ γὰρ οὐ κατακαλύπτεται γυνή, καὶ κειραίσθω· εἰ δὲ αἰσχρὸν γυναικὶ τὸ κείρασθαι ἢ ξυρᾶσθαι, κατακαλυπτέσθω. <sup>7</sup> Ἄνὴρ μὲν γὰρ οὐκ ὀφείλει κατακαλύπτεσθαι τὴν κεφαλὴν, εἰκὼν καὶ δόξα Θεοῦ ὑπάρχων· γυνὴ δὲ δόξα ἀνδρός ἐστίν. <sup>8</sup> οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶν ἀνὴρ ἐκ γυναικὸς, ἀλλὰ γυνὴ ἐξ ἀνδρός· <sup>9</sup> καὶ γὰρ οὐκ ἐκτίσθη ἀνὴρ διὰ τὴν γυναῖκα, ἀλλὰ γυνὴ διὰ τὸν ἄνδρα· <sup>10</sup> ἐδὲ διὰ τοῦτο ὀφείλει ἡ γυνὴ ἔξουσίαν ἔχειν ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς, διὰ τοὺς ὁργγ-was tantamount to acting like a woman, and consequently disgracing his dignity as a man, in the case of the woman, the Apostle (to represent the dishonour in the strongest point of view) says that if the woman be not covered, (wear a covering,) it is one and the same thing (i.e. as bad) as if her head were shaven; for such is the force of the idiomatical expression καὶ κειραίσθω, 'let her even be shorn;' meaning (by a reductio ad absurdum), 'she may as well be shorn;' so standing for ἐν καὶ τὸ αὐτὸ ἐστὶ [αὐτῇ καὶ] τῇ ἐξυρμημένῃ. Now that was regarded as the greatest possible disfigurement and disgrace to a woman; and was only adopted in extreme grief (see Deut. xxi. 12), or inflicted, as a mark of infamy, on adulteresses or harlots.

7—12. The scope of these verses is further to illustrate the impropriety of such an abandonment of the coil or head-covering, as being alike a dishonouring of the man and a disgracing of the woman; inasmuch as, notwithstanding the woman enjoys the same dignity in things pertaining to religion, yet nature herself requires that the superiority should be conceded to the MAN in domestic and civil affairs; and the Law of God, by its injunctions, confirms those dictates. First, the Apostle, at ver. 7, draws a contrast between the man and the woman, as to the use of head-covering in public. The man (he says) ought not to employ it, as being εἰκὼν καὶ δόξα Θεοῦ,—the image of God, as holding, in delegation from him, the governance of all creatures (Gen. i. 26, 27. Pa. viii. 4, 6. Wisd. ix. 2), including woman. Man is thus considered as a type and image of God, just as a viceroy was called εἰκὼν τοῦ βασιλέως, as if a ray from his brightness. And so in the ancient writers man is often spoken of as an image of God. Accordingly, it is implied that woman is a ray from man's brightness, shining like the moon, with borrowed light, and deriving her glory from him. So in Hom. Od. xviii. 254, Penelope says, 'if Ulysses would return and sway the sceptre,' μυῖθον κε κλέος εἴη ἡμῶν καὶ κάλλιον οὐτως. Thus, then, is implied the duty on the part of the man to consult the glory of God by not abandoning the place of dignity assigned by him. As to the woman, the contrary is meant to be asserted of her. And the sense, if expressed at full length, would be, γυνὴ ὀφείλει κατακαλύπτεσθαι ὅτι δόξα ἀνδρός ἐστίν. The woman is to be δόξα ἀνδρός in the same sense as the man is δόξα Θεοῦ, and with the same additional meaning by implication; i.e. she was created out of him, and for his use, and therefore ought not only to be subject to him, but should so act as to contribute to his credit and honour; see 2 Cor. viii. 23; 1 Thess. ii. 20.

Δόξα is here said, by metonymy, of that which reflects or sets forth this dignity, as in Eccles. i. 19. 2 Macc. xiv. 9. Jos. Antt. iv. 2. 2. On the term εἰκὼν comp. Diog. Laert. vi. 5. 1. Artemid. ii. 37. iii. 31. Luc. Imag. 28. Before γυνή Lachm. and Tisch. prefix ἡ, from 5 uncial MSS. and some Fathers. Internal evidence is in its favour. But propriety would seem to call for the absence of the Article, as in the next and some following verses. It is evidently a Critical alteration, like the ἡ prefixed to γυνή at v. 6, in Cod. B. Alf., indeed, pronounces that ἡ was here removed in conformity with the preceding and following. But that it should have been removed in all the MSS. except eight is incredible.

8, 9. Here are shown the grounds of this inferiority; 1. in respect of nature, by the woman having been formed from the man (Gen. ii. 18—21); 2. in posteriority of creation; 3. in purpose of creation,—namely, to be a help meet for him. Now subserviency implies inferiority.

10. [ἔξουσίαν ἔχειν—ἀγγύλων] There are few passages that have so perplexed the Commentators as the present. The difficulty centres in the meaning of the terms ἔξουσία and ἀγγύλων, which, though in themselves plain, yet seem to yield, according to their ordinary import, no very apposite sense. The former is by almost all Commentators explained to mean a veil. But, from the context, and from its being at ver. 15 interchanged with περιβόλαιον, it should rather seem to mean some article of dress. Indeed that ἔξουσία is the name of the article of dress cannot be doubted, and hence it is best left untranslated; i.e. Exousia. Of this use of the word (exceedingly rare) one example has been adduced by Olearius from Callistratus, who uses the expression ἔξουσία τριχυματος to denote a kind of topping, composed of braids of hair. So also the Latin Imperium is used in the later writers. Here, however, it seems to denote a kind of headgear; which partly, we may suppose, resembled the kerchief of the middle ages, and partly the προσωπίδιον, or ornamental veil, worn by the Theban women; like the ancient couvre-chef (or kerchief), consisting of a piece of cloth of a square form thrown over the head, and tied under the chin, and thereby nearly covering the face, except the eyes; similar to the velamen mentioned by Dicaearchus as worn by the Theban women: ιμάτιον ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς τοιοῦτό ἐστιν, ὥστε προσωπίδιον δοκεῖν πάντες τὸ πρόσωπον κατελιπῆσθαι, οἱ γὰρ ὀφθαλμοὶ διαφαίνονται μόνον. This opinion derives strong confirmation from the reading of Irenaeus and the gloss of Theophylact, κάλυμμα, and that of λους. <sup>11</sup> Πλὴν οὔτε ἀνὴρ χωρὶς γυναῖκος, οὔτε γυνή χωρὶς <sup>h</sup> Rom. 11.

ἀνδρός, ἐν Κυρίῳ <sup>12</sup> ὥσπερ γὰρ ἡ γυνή ἐκ τοῦ ἀνδρός, οὕτω <sup>30</sup> Heb. 1. 2, 3.

some MSS. of the Italic and Vulg. Versions, and some Latin Fathers (as Jerome, Augustin, and Bede), velamen : and so Tertull., though he reads potestatem, explains it by velamen. With respect to the reason for the injunction, as conveyed by διὰ τοῦτο, no view seems so much entitled to attention as that of the ancient Commentators, Greek and Latin generally, thus expressed by Est. : 'Wherefore, on account of what has been said, whereby the pre-eminence of the man over the woman is declared, ought the woman to have the ἱερωσία, or velamen, on her head, as the symbol of the power of the man over her ;' rather, as one should say, of her subjection to him ; for, as Est. remarks, there is a metonymy. And the velamen in question would be no unapt emblem of modest subordination.—But to proceed to the next words, διὰ τοῦτο ἐγγύλιον, these even more than the preceding have given rise to a diversity of opinion, only equalled by the difficulty which they involve,—a difficulty which mainly consists in the circumstance, that another reason is subjoined for the wearing of this velamen quite different from the former. As to what is urged by Pearce and Newcome, that 'a just and sufficient reason having been assigned before, we can scarcely suppose that a new and less cogent one would be subjoined,'—this is surely being too hypercritical, not to say disrespectful to the sacred writer. And certainly there is no reason why the Apostle should not strengthen his injunction by the addition of a consideration which, though less powerful, yet was likely to have material force,—though it would be rather in the way of appeal than of argument. And surely, in the present instance, where propriety and decorum were more particularly concerned, none could be fitter objects by whom to make the appeal, than those 'ministering spirits, sent forth to minister unto those who shall be heirs of salvation' (see iv. 9), and who, by their peculiar characteristics, of parity, humility (see Ia. vi. 2), and preservation of that subordination, in which we have reason to suppose the various orders are placed, would feel peculiarly grieved (from the interest which they take in the concerns of men, considered as the lower family of God, see iv. 9) at any such violation of the customary forms of propriety and decorum as might bring scandal on the Christian name. To suppose, with Dr. Owen and Abp. Newcome, that the words διὰ τοῦτο ἐγγύλιον are a marginal gloss, is running counter to all the MSS., and, indeed, violating probability itself; for the words would, in effect, be no gloss at all. Upon the whole, as we are not authorized to deviate from the received reading, either by cancelling or emending,—so, I apprehend, it involves no such difficulty as should make us abandon the usual interpretation, ably supported by Hyperius. Accordingly, I still continue to maintain the sense, 'out of reverence to the angels,' regarded as ministering spirits attendant in the house of God; and I am now enabled to confirm this by an able remark of Dr. Bright in Lightfoot's Works, vol. i. p. 36, as follows :—'It seems to have been a received opinion among the ancient Jews that some of the good angels used, when they pleased, to be present with some curiosity and interest at the religious assemblies of the Jews. This opinion itself, not improbable to reason, the Apostle might approve and make use of.' Upon the whole, there is, I doubt not, a reference here (as the ancient Fathers were generally agreed) to those good angels who, according to the opinion of the Jews (not derived, as some affirm, from the Platonists, or the Apocryphal book of Tobit, but formed on what they thought implied in what is said in certain passages of the Old Test.), were ministering spirits attendant on the house of God, and symbols of his presence. In reference to the Fathers, as holding the doctrine of the services of angels to men on earth, I ought to have adverted especially to the Constit. Apost. viii. 4, where it is said, that 'there are present in the Church during divine service, together with God the Judge of all (Heb. xii. 23), and Christ and the Holy Spirit, the holy ministering spirits (λαϊτουργικά πνεύματα),' so called in allusion to Heb. i. 14 (on which see my note), οὐκ ἄντι πάντες λαϊτουργικά πν. ; As to those Theologians of our day who deny the real existence of the angels as intelligent beings, to those we leave it to digest, as best they may, the difficulty, thus insuperable, of this passage, and the passage of Heb. i. 14. To have instituted a comparison, as they make the Apostle to have done, between the Son of God, on the one hand, and mere abstract qualities or imaginary beings, on the other, would involve no less than a palpable absurdity. For, if the Apostle regarded angels as only personifications of certain attributes, with what propriety could he have represented them as worshipping the Son of God, or ministering to the spiritual wants of the saints on earth? At the same time, while we hold the Catholic doctrine of the personality and ministry of angels to men, we are not concerned to defend the abuse of it made by the Jews, or the Romanists, or superstitious, and, however learned, yet fanciful, brother Protestants. I regret to be obliged to number so excellent a scholar as Dr. Peile, at least as regards the present passage, with such a class. By understanding, as he does, the words to designate the ministers performing divine service, he only adopts that view which had been long ago rejected, after the most searching examination in every light, by a most competent investigator, sufficiently inclined, for an obvious reason, to find it true,—namely, ESTIUS, the facile princeps of the Romanist Commentators, who, however, decidedly adopts the view which I have taken, in common with all the ancient and the most eminent modern Expositors.

11, 12. As the Apostle had given great pre-eminence to the man, saying that the woman is for him and on account of him, and under him ; so here, lest he should too much elevate the one and depress the other party, he brings in the correction πλὴν οὔτε ἀνὴρ χωρ. γ. ; meaning, that nevertheless there was much to comfort the inferior party, since the superior had the superiority vested in him to use for the benefit of the inferior; and that, upon the whole, the sexes were made so dependent upon each other, that it

1 ch. 10. 15.
Luke 12. 57.
John 7. 27.

1 Tim. 2. 8.
ch. 14. 23, 24.
& 16. 1.
1 Thess. 2.
14.

καὶ ὁ ἀνὴρ διὰ τῆς γυναικός· τὰ δὲ πάντα ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>13</sup> Ἐν ὑμῖν αὐτοῖς κρίνατε· πρέπον ἐστὶ γυναικα ἀκατακάλυπτον τῷ Θεῷ προσεύχεσθαι; <sup>14</sup> ἡ οὐδὲ αὐτὴ ἡ φύσις διδάσκει ὑμᾶς, ὅτι ἀνὴρ μὲν ἐὰν κομᾷ, ἀτιμία αὐτῷ ἐστὶν· <sup>15</sup> γυνὴ δὲ ἐὰν κομᾷ, δόξα αὐτῇ ἐστὶν; ὅτι ἡ κόμη ἀντὶ περιβολαίου δέδοται αὐτῇ. <sup>16</sup> Εἰ δέ τις δοκεῖ φιλόνεικος εἶναι—ἡμεῖς τοιαύτην συνήθειαν οὐκ ἔχομεν, οὐδὲ αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τοῦ Θεοῦ.

<sup>17</sup> Τοῦτο δὲ παραγγέλλων οὐκ ἐπαινώ, ὅτι οὐκ εἰς τὸ κρεῖττον, was their mutual interest to cultivate indissoluble union. (Chrya. and Calv.)—The expression χωρίς may, however, be understood (as it is done by Theophyl.) to intimate a point of superiority on the part of the woman; namely, that though at the first creation the woman was from the man, yet the man is descended from the woman. And thus the sense may be expressed, with Bp. Middl., as follows: 'Notwithstanding (such is the ordinance of God), neither is any man brought into being without the intervention of a woman, nor any woman without that of a man; for as (v. 12) the woman (i. e. women generally) is originally from the man, so the man (i. e. men generally) is brought into being by the intervention of the woman (i. e. women): these and all other things are ordained to be as they are by the wisdom of God.'

<sup>13</sup> ἐν ὑμῖν αὐτοῖς κρίνατε· πρέπον—προσεύχεσθαι;] The Apostle, now returning to his subject, after the slight digression at vv. 11, 12, resorts to another and more popular mode of showing the impropriety of women being unveiled in public worship;—and this, by appealing to men's common sense, and their own private ideas of decorum. Render, not 'judge in yourselves,' but 'within yourselves, each weighing in his own mind what I say.'

<sup>14</sup> The Apostle here adds another proof of the impropriety of the thing in question, deduced from the natural sense of propriety. For ἡ φύσις is best explained of an 'instinctive and natural perception of what is right or wrong;' though some interpret it of use and custom; which, indeed, merges into the foregoing, since use is second nature. It was the national custom of both Hebrews and Greeks for the men to wear their hair short, and the women long.

—ἡ οὐδὲ αὐτῇ] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel ἡ, on the authority of 7 uncial, and 3 cursive MSS., and the Vulg. Version;—an authority insufficient in a case like this, where internal evidence is in favour of the ἡ, which was more likely to be left out than put in. The particle is often so used, as in the received text, by St. Paul, e. g. Rom. vii. 1. xi. 2. 1 Cor. vi. ix. 16. 2 Cor. xiii. 9, and especially 1 Cor. ix. 8, ἡ οὐχὶ καὶ ὁ νόμος ταῦτα, exactly as here.

—ἀνὴρ ἰδὼν κομᾷ] Render: 'lets it grow long,' or, as we should say, 'wears it long.' Mr. Etheridge, in his recent English translation of the Pesch. Syr. Version, renders, 'when a man's hair standeth,' which expresses a sense quite beside the purpose; and the sense 'cum advent capilli,' as the version given in the London Polyglott, is in every way incorrect. Again, that of Schaaf, 'quum crevit' (rather 'creverit'), 'grows long,' well represents the original; but since there is another term conjoined, meaning 'to stand out,' the full sense meant is, 'it grows long and bushy.' It was a custom among the Greeks (with the exception of the Lacedæmonians) for the men to wear the hair short. And the ἄντρια here adverted to is confirmed by the fact, that to wear long hair after the time of being enrolled ἱεῖς was considered as at least a mark of foppishness (see Aristoph. Eq. 580), and carried, moreover, a certain stigma on other and far more serious grounds.

<sup>15</sup> δόξα αὐτῇ ἐστὶν;] meaning, 'it is an ornament to her,' and becomes her. So Galen, cited by Wetstein, says that woman has need of long hair καὶ σκέπης ἵνα καὶ κόσμον.—'Ἀντὶ περιβολαίου,' as a sort of natural covering, or veil. The force of the term περιβ. is admirably illustrated by the description given by a recent traveller (Lamartine) of a Syrian girl, whose hair is described as 'so long and bushy as to completely cover her, like the branches of a weeping willow falling in all directions over its trunk.' This verse of the Apostle must have been in the mind of Milton in one of the most beautiful passages he ever wrote, Par. Lost, iv. 304—306, 'She, as a willow, down to the slender wail'd, Her unadorn'd golden tresses wore Dishovell'd, but in wanton ringlets waved As the vine curls her tendrils.'

<sup>16</sup> εἰ δὲ τις δοκεῖ—εἶναι] Render: 'But if any one thing fit to be contentious [as to this matter], obstinately self-opinionated, self-willed, which seems to be the true sense of φιλόν. here, as in Jos. Antt. xv. 6, 21, φιλόνεικος δὲ τι καὶ γυναικῶν πεποιθὺς.' After εἶναι, there is, we may suppose, left to be understood from the subject-matter φιλόνεικος ἐστὶν τοῦτο μόνον φημί, or such like. And so in a similar case, supra, vii. 15, the verb, instead of being left understood, is expressed, thus: εἰ δὲ χωρίζεται (for which might have been written χωρίζεσθαι δοκεῖ) χωρίζεσθω. By τοιαύτην συνήθειαν understand, not (with Chrya. and Ambrose, and some modern Expositors) the custom of acting contentiously, but, what the greater part of interpreters are agreed is meant, the custom of women praying or frequenting public worship with unveiled heads. 'Thus (observes Abp. Newcome) to the contentious he speaks with authority; to others, with deference.'

<sup>17</sup>—<sup>22</sup> The Apostle now brings forward another exception to the general commendation which he had bestowed on them, as to attention to his directions and ordinances. He complains of their divisions and factions, and, as consequent thereupon, their irregularities in the performance of public worship, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper; which were so great, as almost to contravene the purpose of its institution. In order to remedy these, he reminds them of its first institution and intent.

ἀλλ' εἰς τὸ ἡττον συνέρχεσθε. <sup>18</sup> Ἐκκλησία, ἀκούω σχίσματα ἐν ὑμῖν ὑπάρχειν, καὶ μέρος τι πιστεύει. <sup>19</sup> Δεῖ γὰρ καὶ αἵρέσεις ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι, ἵνα οἱ δόκιμοι φανεροὶ γένωνται ἐν ὑμῖν. <sup>20</sup> Συνερχομένων

1 Cor. i. 10—15. & 2. 1. & 3. 1. 1 Matt. 18. 7. Luke 17. 1. Acts 20. 30. 1 Cor. 12. 1 Tim. 4. 1, 2 2 Pet. 2. 1, 2

17. τοῦτο παρ. οὐκ ἔχ., &c.] The full sense is: 'While I am giving you this direction, I cannot but take occasion to censure you, on the ground that, &c. Several of the most ancient MSS. and most of the ancient Versions have παραγγέλλω and ἵπαινω; which reading was preferred by Bp. Pearce, and has been received by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But I have followed Matth. and Griesb. in retaining the common reading. For the other introduces unnecessarily a great awkwardness of phraseology and a jejune-ness of sense. See Billroth's version. And, as regards the change in question, that might arise either way, namely, from accident, the terminations -ω and -ω being often confounded. Here, however, -ω is required in the latter of the two words, because there is, I believe, no instance of the meiosis here occurring (of which Wets. and Krause adduce several examples from the Class. writers) except in the verb: besides that ἵπαινω is almost required by ver. 22, ἐν τούτῳ οὐκ ἵπαινω. The sense of the words is well expressed by Billroth thus: 'While I declare this, I cannot suppress my displeasure on account of your conduct,—in that ye come together [at the Agapæ] not for the better, but for the worse;' by which must be understood that their coming together tends rather to their deterioration than their improvement.

18. συνερχομένων—ἐκκλησία] Expositors are not agreed whether ἐκκλησία means church, or assembly. The former interpretation is maintained by Grot., Est., Fuller, and Mede. But the arguments they urge only prove that the word may have that sense, not that it must. Nay, the comparison with ver. 20 leads to the contrary conclusion. There is more reason to suppose (with Cameron, Piscator, Wolf, and most of the recent Commentators), that the expression means congregation, or assembly: a sense more suitable to the Apostle's argument, which is to warn them against dissensions in an assembly met together for the worship of God. Besides, συνερχ. ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ here cannot well differ in sense from the repetition of the same thing, συνερχ. ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ at ver. 20, which can only be understood of the assembly. Not to say that there is some reason to doubt whether the word ἐκκλησία had acquired the sense church (as of a building) so early; for (as Olsh. observes) 'the state of the Apostolic Church was as yet such as did not allow of the Christians having ecclesiastical edifices properly so called; and although the term would seem, by the antithesis, to have that sense at ver. 22, yet even there it may only denote an assembly meeting in a particular place, i. e. a sense midway between causa and ecclesia.' The Article, indeed, here might seem to decide in favour of ecclesia; but it is not found in many of the best MSS. and the Edit. Princ., and was thrown out by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; very properly; for it was more likely to be inserted by those who wished to make the sense church certain, than cancelled by those who sought to confirm the sense assembly or congregation. By σχίσματα is meant, not what we understand by 'schisma,' namely, 'separations from the Church,' but ' factions and dissensions in it;' and the expression is synonymous with αἵρέσεις in the next verse.

19. δεῖ γὰρ, &c.] Here δεῖ (like the similar expression ἀνάγκη at Matt. xviii. 7, and xxiv. 6), does not import an absolute necessity; but, as the best Expositors are agreed, a necessity of consequence, or when by Divine permission, on account of preceding causes, certain things must happen. Chrys. and Theophyl., of the ancient, and many of the best modern Expositors, are of opinion, that by αἵρέσεις are meant, not heresies, as to doctrine, or matters of faith, but 'divisions and parties,' as those adverted to supra, i. 10, and iii. 3. Thus we may, with Theophyl., express the sense thus:—'It cannot but be, from the passions of men, and the propensities of human nature, that divisions will occur.'

ἵνα is here by many of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, supposed to have, not the final or causal, but the eventual force; q. d. 'whence it will come to pass, that they who are approved will be made manifest.' Since, however, this is somewhat straining the sense, it is better to take the ἵνα in the final use, to denote end,—namely, as adverting to the purpose of God in permitting this admixture of truth and falsehood in the moral world: a view, indeed, required by the course of reasoning, which has been ably traced by Bp. Warburton, in a Sermon on this text; in which he considers the purpose of God in permitting heresies and dissensions to subsist in the world, and ably vindicates the general course of Divine Providence therein. 'The Apostle (says he) in these words hints at one condition of the moral world, inseparable, as it is at present constituted, from its existence,—a mixture of truth and falsehood, analogous to things salutary and noxious in the natural. But, in both worlds, the good produced by this mixture is so eminent, as fully to support the trite observation, that evil was suffered for the sake of a greater good: a species of which is here mentioned,—the manifestation of the approved.' The learned Prelate then proceeds to consider, 1. who are meant by the approved,—namely, those who so pass through the trial of their faith and Christian charity resulting from communication with heretical opinions, as to be purified in faith and virtue, and generally approved by God, explorati et probati, tried and approved, δεικτοί. Comp. Eccles. ii. 5. And so the word is used in James i. 12. 2. He then goes on to show the nature and end of that manifestation,—its benefits to the approved themselves, and to the Church at large; evincing that thus the evil of heresies, by the gracious disposition of things, is turned to good; and heresy, by a contrary exertion, made to produce faith and charity:

οὖν ὑμῶν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, οὐκ ἔστι Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον φαγεῖν <sup>21</sup> ἕκαστος γὰρ τὸ ἴδιον δεῖπνον προλαμβάνει ἐν τῷ φαγεῖν καὶ ὅς μὲν πεινᾷ, ὅς δὲ μεθύει. <sup>22</sup> Μὴ γὰρ οἰκίας οὐκ ἔχετε εἰς τὸ ἐσθίειν καὶ πίνειν; ἢ τῆς ἐκκλησίας τοῦ Θεοῦ καταφρονεῖτε, in Prov. 17.

5.
James 2.5, 6.

and thus God's general providence, in permitting evil to exist for the sake of good, and in bringing good out of evil, is amply vindicated.

20. συμμερχόμενοι οὖν, &c.] Οὖν is here, as often, resumptive; the Apostle now coming close home to the point he intended to animadvert on, and showing how and in what respect they assembled in worship, not to edification, but to the reverse,—namely, by abuse of the ordinance of the Eucharist.

— Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον] By modern Commentators this is usually supposed to denote the Eucharist, while the ancient Commentators in general, and, of the modern ones, the Roman Catholic Expositors almost universally, and some eminent Protestant ones (as Grotius, Michaelis, Markland, and Bp. Middleton), suppose it to mean 'a (or 'the') Lord's-day meal'; understanding it of the Agapæ, or feasts of charity, which then preceded the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper: and certainly δεῖπνον is frequently used in the sense convivium; and we find Tertullian (cited by Heydenreich) calling the Agapæ a convivium Dominicum. Besides, as Heydenreich remarks, it is clear from the whole context that the Apostle in this passage had in mind the Agapæ; since the abuses he censures are such as do not apply to the Eucharist, but to the Agapæ. And yet, as Heydenreich admits, it can as little be denied that the Apostle had in view, at the same time, the Eucharist, which was added to the Agapæ as a postcoma; for the abuses that prevailed at the Agapæ are chiefly censured on the ground that they made Christians unfit for the worthy celebration of the holy Sacrament, and indeed involved contempt and desecration of that sacred rite, as the Apostle sets forth at large in a representation of the true nature and purpose of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It is therefore best to suppose (with Heydenreich) that the Apostle has reference to the whole of the Lord's-day solemnity, which was composed of both Agapæ and Eucharist,—in imitation of Christ's last repast with his disciples; which consisted of both the ordinary supper, and, after it, the Lord's Supper, then instituted and celebrated for the first time. Hence it is highly probable that in the Apostolic age these Agapæ took place before the celebration of the Eucharist, though in after ages the reverse became customary, and that, as we may suppose, from the abuse of the Agapæ. One may remark the δαιδόντις, or spirit, of the words οὐκ ἔστι Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον φαγεῖν, which should be rendered, 'It is not to eat the Lord's Supper,' i. e. as it ought to be eaten; q. d. 'That cannot be the purpose of your meeting together: the reason for which supposition is given in the words following (v. 21), which contrast what the repast was with what it ought to be; q. d. 'A repast of that kind you do not take; for your meal is not common, but separate; every one eateth his own supper, without waiting for others to join in it.'

21. τὸ ἴδιον δεῖπνον] meaning the supper

which each one had brought to the common meal. Προλαμβάνει (anticipat) has reference to the eagerness with which each one (of the richer sort, we may presume) snatched up the food he had brought, and filled himself therewith, before the poorer class could well touch it; which would cause them (who had brought little or nothing with them) to fare very scantily. This ἄγαν was a kind of εἶσρος, or meal, to which each individual contributed his share. Now in the εἶσρος it was usual for each person not only to contribute his share, but to eat of his own contribution. But in the Christian ἄγαν, though each was to eat of his own portion, yet not exclusively, others near being allowed to partake. Yet, as the rich were few, and the poor (who, we may suppose, brought but little) were many, it might be, that the former, selfishly apprehensive lest, while several were eating with them of their mess, they should themselves get but little,—proceeded to eating their mess before the others, and eat as hastily as possible, that they might get as much as they could; thus defeating the main purpose of the ordinance, which was to promote love and harmony between the οἱ ἔχοντες and the οἱ μὴ ἔχοντες. And as this (which is to be understood of the Agapæ preceding the Lord's Supper) was not an ordinary meal, it was a violation of propriety as well as Christian charity so to act; for though each brought his own supper, yet when it had been thrown into the common stock, it ceased to be his own. Thus the plenty of some shamed the want of others, which occasioned heart-burnings, and so defeated the very end of the ordinance.

— ὅς μὲν πεινᾷ, ὅς δὲ μεθύει] The antithesis may here seem to require μεθύει to be taken, as it is done by several Expositors, of excess in eating. This, however, would involve intolerable harshness. It is better, with Chrys. and others, to include both eating and drinking,—the verb, by a sort of sensus praxiæ, standing in two verbs. The expression is, indeed, as Chrysostom observes, one of great emphasis (otherwise ἐσθίει might have been used); being meant to stigmatize more cuttingly the offence in question, by contrasting the state of the poorer with that of the richer classes. The former are described as having little food, and their drink, if any, water; the latter, as indulging to satiety not only in food, but strong drink. The sense, then, is, literally, 'he is well soaked with drink'; a sense of μεθύειν also occurring at John ii. 10 (where see note). That drunkenness, however, is not here meant, is plain from what is said in the next words,—'Have ye not houses to eat and drink (not get drunk) in, that ye set so light by the Church as to do that there which ought to be done elsewhere?' Or if we (with some eminent Commentators) take ἐκκλ. of the congregation, as at ver. 18, καταφρονεῖτε will have the sense 'hold in contempt, by doing that before all, which must shock the feelings of the well-disposed.'

καὶ κατασχύνετε τοὺς μὴ ἔχοντας; Τί ὑμῖν εἶπω; ἐπαίνεσω ὑμᾶς ἐν τούτῳ; οὐκ ἐπαίνῶ. <sup>23</sup> Ἐγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ <sup>n ch. 15. 3.</sup> τοῦ Κυρίου, ὃ καὶ παρέδωκα ὑμῖν· ὅτι ὁ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς, ἐν τῇ <sup>Gal. 1. 12.</sup> νυκτὶ ἣ παρεδίδοτο, ἔλαβεν ἄρτον, <sup>Matt. 26. 26.</sup> καὶ εὐχαριστήσας ἔκλασε <sup>Mark 14. 22.</sup> καὶ εἶπε [Λάβετε, φάγετε] τοῦτό μου ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμα τὸ ὑπὲρ <sup>Luke 22. 19.</sup> ὑμῶν κλώμενον· τοῦτο ποιεῖτε εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. <sup>Acts 26. 7.</sup> <sup>25</sup> Ὡσαύτως καὶ τὸ ποτήριον, μετὰ τὸ δειπνήσαι, λέγων· Τοῦτο τὸ ποτή-ριον ἡ καυὴ διαθήκη ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ ἐμῷ αἵματι· τοῦτο ποιεῖτε ὡς ἂν πίνητε, εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν. <sup>o John 14. 3.</sup> <sup>26</sup> ὡς ἂν πίνητε, τὸν <sup>Acts 1. 11.</sup>
 θάνατον τοῦ Κυρίου καταγγέλλετε, ἄχρις οὗ ἂν ἔλθῃ. <sup>p Num. 9.</sup> <sup>27</sup> Ὡστε <sup>10, 12.</sup>
 ὡς ἂν ἐσθίῃ τὸν ἄρτον τοῦτον ἢ πίνῃ τὸ ποτήριον τοῦ Κυρίου <sup>John 6. 51.</sup>
 ὡς ἂν ἐσθίῃ τὸν ἄρτον τοῦτον ἢ πίνῃ τὸ ποτήριον τοῦ Κυρίου <sup>1 Cor. 10. 16.</sup>

<sup>22</sup> τοὺς μὴ ἔχοντας;] scil. φαγεῖν; meaning those who had brought scanty provision, and who would thus be put to shame very wrongly; for, if they must struggle with want, they ought to be left to bear it at home, not ashamed with it by rude comparison with the plenty of their richer brethren; for (as a great heathen poet feelingly observes),—'Nil habet infelix pauperis durus in se, Quam quod ridiculos homines fecit!'

— In this verse the Apostle sets forth the impropriety and indecency of the above selfish course, by reference to place and circumstances, showing that the purpose of Christians thus meeting together is not to gratify the sensual appetites; and that, as regards those whose means enable them to do this, they need not, and ought not, to come here to eat and drink to satiety, for that they could do at home. With this abuse the Apostle then places in contrast the true use of the rite to which the Agape was an introduction.

<sup>23</sup> παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τ. Κυρίου, ὃ καὶ παρέδωκα ὑμῖν.] Of these words the sense is well expressed in the paraphrase of Dr. Peile: 'For what I (your first Christian instructor, 1 Cor. iv. 3) received of the Lord, even as I have delivered it unto you, was,' &c. Strange it is, that in the face of the words ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου, several modern Commentators, and most recent German ones, interpret what is here said either of tradition derived from the Apostles, the eye and ear-witnesses of the thing itself, or from the Gospel of the Hebrews, or some other book! The term παρελαμβάνω is surely applicable to information or direction derived in any way whatever; and to limit it to tradition, of whatever kind, is contrary to the intention of the Apostle, and (as Jaeps observes) cuts the nerves of his course of argument. Accordingly the full import intended can only be what I have already laid down. 'The institution which I am now about to treat on is what I myself (the ἑγὼ being emphatic, as xv. 9, et al.) received from the immediate and personal communication of the Lord himself; and, according to the express injunction therein contained, it is appointed for your observance. It is not, therefore, of my own inventing, nor that of any man; but Divinely instituted, and consequently imperatively binding on all Christians.' The sense itself which I have assigned to the terms παρέλ. and παρέδ. is quite confirmed by the same use of those terms, infra xv. 3, on another grand head of Christian doctrine, the resurrection of the dead,—where, however, the very same perversion has been employed, and, in both cases, with an utter forgetfulness of what we read in Gal. i. 11, 20, espec. ver. 12, from a comparison of which with the present verse it is plain, that ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου here is, as Prof. Steners. shows, tantamount to δι' ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ there.

<sup>24</sup> On the exact sense of this whole passage, containing St. Paul's doctrine of the Eucharist, and on the full force of the terms of the institution, espec. the word ἀσπλ. see Notes on Matt. xxvi. 26, and Luke xxii. 19 sq., and espec. Bp. Turton's Roman Catholic Doctrine of the Eucharist considered, pp. 311—332. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel, as might be expected, the words Λάβετε, φάγετε, on strong external, confirmed by as strong internal, evidence. On again carefully considering the question of their authenticity, I am inclined to think them interpolated. On the other hand, I would at ver. 26 retain the τοῦτο, but in brackets, which Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on somewhat strong authority, cancel.

<sup>26</sup> καταγγέλλετε] There is here a signif. prægnaus, 'ye set forth and commemorate.' At ἄχρις οὗ ἂν ἔλθῃ there seems an omission of a clause; q. d. '[And this you are to continue to do] till he come,' at his second coming to judgment.

<sup>27</sup> Ὡστε] 'this being the case,' i. e. such being the intent of the Lord's Supper.

— ἐσθίῃ ἢ πίνῃ] The reading καὶ, instead of ἢ, found in some of the most ancient MSS., almost all the early Versions, and several Fathers, ought to have been admitted into the text by the recent editors, for reasons stated by Dr. Peile. Not a few passages have I noted in Thucyd., in which, though καὶ is found in all MSS., one should have expected ἢ. So lib. i. 22 and 82; v. 10 and 74. vii. 19, and sometimes (though more rarely) where for ἢ some one or other of the editors usually remarks, 'one should have expected καὶ;' and certainly, in the unstudied language of common life, the Particles and and or are, in all languages, often interchanged. At any rate, the Romanists are quite unable to show, from the occurrence of ἢ, that the sacramental bread may be given without the cup.—

ἀναξίως, ἔνοχος ἔσται τοῦ σώματος καὶ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου.
 28 ὁ δοκιμαζέτω δὲ ἑαυτὸν καὶ οὕτως ἐκ τοῦ ἄρτου ἐσθιέτω καὶ ἐκ τοῦ ποτηρίου πινέτω 29 ὁ γὰρ ἐσθίων καὶ πίνων ἀναξίως, κρίμα ἑαυτῷ ἐσθίει καὶ πίνει, μὴ διακρίνων τὸ σῶμα τοῦ Κυρίου. 30 Διὰ τοῦτο ἐν ὑμῖν πολλοὶ ἀσθενεῖς καὶ ἄρρωστοι, καὶ κοιμῶνται ἱκανοί. 31 εἰ γὰρ ἑαυτοὺς διεκρίνομεν, οὐκ ἂν

q Gal. 6. 4.
 2 Cor. 12. 5.
 1 John 2. 20,
 31.

r Ps. 22. 5.
 Prov. 15. 17.

'Ἀναξίως must not be construed with Κυρίου (as some recent Commentators contend), but be taken absolutely. In this representation, of course, must have been chiefly meant the particular kind of abuse just adverted to; and thus the unworthy partaker will principally be (as Billr. explains), 'He who in observing an ordinance which is symbolical of oneness with Christ, and so with all his members (by which what is done unto them is done unto him, see Matt. xxv. 40), yet affronts or injures his brother.' Though to confirm it, as do most recent foreign Commentators, to that, is unwarrantable; for it would seem that, as Calv. points out, St. Paul, as often, here passes from a particular case to a general doctrine. Accordingly the full meaning intended in ἀναξίως will be, ὡς καθήκοντες, 'in a manner unworthy of and unsuitable to the purposes for which this sacred rite was instituted, whether by irreverence or carelessness in the celebration, or want of due previous preparation for it, or the existence of uncharitable or injurious dispositions, at the time of receiving it. However, ἀναξίως is by Iachm. and Tisch. cancelled, on the authority of MSS. A, B, C, and two late Versions; but without any good reason. Internal evidence, indeed, might seem against it; but, when properly weighed, it is not. Far more probable is it that the word should have been omitted in those three MSS., than that St. Paul should have chosen to leave a sense so essential, on an occasion such as the present, 'to be conveyed per ellipsis. And to supply, as must be done in order to the making out of any sense suitable to the foregoing context, the word δοκιμάσας, would involve an almost unprecedented harshness. Moreover, when we consider that ἀναξίως must have had place in the text as early as the time when the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions were formed, one cannot entertain any reasonable doubt of its authenticity.

— ἔνοχος ἔσται τοῦ σώματος καὶ αἵματος τοῦ Κυρίου.] The literal sense is, by an ellipsis, κρίματι, 'he will be guilty with respect to the body and blood,' i. e. guilty of profaning the symbols of the body and blood of Christ, and consequently will be amenable to the punishment due to such an irreverence and abuse of the highest of the means of grace; see James ii. 10: for (to use the words of Billr.) 'as by the power of the Spirit the fruits of Christ's death are in the right observance of the Lord's Supper appropriated to the life of the person through faith, so, conversely, the abuse, knowingly and wittingly, of the Sacrament, renders the person absolutely a present partaker in the guilt of the death of Christ. Comp. Luke xi. 47, 48.' On the authority of A, B, C (and one other cursive MS.), Iachm. and Tisch. cancel τοῦ Κυρίου, but without sufficient authority. Indeed, the words can even less be dispensed with than the foregoing ἀναξίως: and they are confirmed, besides all the MSS. but five, by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions.

28. δοκιμαζέτω, &c.] 'Let, then, each person [previously] examine himself, whether he shall eat it, as he ought to eat the representation of the Lord's body, and see whether he hath the dispositions which the participation in so holy a rite demands; whether he feels a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ, and a suitable gratitude for the sacrifice it commemorates, and is firmly resolved to observe the injunctions of its divine Founder, especially as to being in charity with all men; otherwise he will partake not only ineffectually, but unworthily, and hence guiltily,' of the sacred rite.

29. κρίμα ἑαυτῷ ἑ.] i. e. 'causes, by so eating, condemnation to himself,' and consequently punishment, whether temporal, as in the infliction of sickness or adversity,—or, if that fail of its effect, eternal, in a future state, by being condemned and punished with the impenitent and unregenerate world; see ver. 32.

— μὴ διακρίνων τὸ σῶμα τ. Κυρίου.] meaning, as the best Expositors are agreed, 'not distinguishing between the sacramental elements and symbols of the Lord's body, and the food used at an ordinary meal; a use of διακρ. derived, Ernesti thinks, from the distinguisht of meats according to the Mosaic law, in which persons are said not to distinguish meats, who eat alike of meats both pure and unclean, or forbidden, without distinction, regarding the profane and forbidden as lawful and permitted.

30. διὰ τοῦτο.] 'On this account;' i. e. because of their partaking of the sacrament unworthily: for almost all Expositors, ancient and modern, are agreed, that the Apostle means to make his warning of future punishment for such abuse the more effectual, by adverting to what had already taken place, in the sickness and mortality which had been inflicted. As κοιμῶντες is almost always used in the New Test. of the death of the righteous, we may presume that the Apostle has reference to those who, although they had been visited with the temporal punishment of death, yet had, before they died, made their peace with God by sincere repentance.—Notwithstanding the presumptuous attempts of certain foreign Commentators to explain away the reality of the judicial inflictions of temporal punishments, here adverted to, those inflictions must certainly be considered as proceeding from God, and as altogether supernatural (similar to others mentioned at Acts v. 5, and supra v. 5. 2 Cor. xiii. 2. 1 John v. 16. James v. 14, 15. Rev. ii. 22); being intended to preserve the purity of Christianity, and vindicate the authority of the Apostles. These interpositions, however, were probably confined to the Apostolic age, or at least to a comparatively short period after it.

31. εἰ γὰρ ἑαυτ. διακρ.] The full force of ἐκρινόμεθα. 33 * κρινόμενοι δὲ ὑπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου, παιδευόμεθα, ἵνα μὴ σὺν τῷ κόσμῳ κατακριθῶμεν. 33 * Ὡστε, ἀδελφοί μου, συνερχόμενοι εἰς τὸ φαγεῖν, ἀλλήλους ἐκδέχεσθε. 34 * εἰ δέ τις πεινᾷ, ἐν οἴκῳ ἐσθιέτω. ἵνα μὴ εἰς κρίμα συνέρχησθε. Τὰ δὲ λοιπὰ ὡς ἂν ἔλθω διατάξομαι.

XII. 1 * Περὶ δὲ τῶν πνευματικῶν, ἀδελφοί, οὐ θέλω ὑμᾶς

the γὰρ will appear by tracing its reference thus: '[and no wonder is it that we have so suffered; (it is our own fault:)] for, if we had thoroughly sifted and judged ourselves (i. e. made due discrimination and judgment of our character and conduct when about to partake of the Lord's Supper), we should not have been adjudged to punishment, i. e. suffered such judicial inflictions at the hand of the Lord as we have done.' This version is required by the idiom of the language (see Matth. Gr. Gr., § 608. Buttm. Gr. 126. Herm. on Vig. p. 819); for, where an Imperf. οὐκ ἂν is preceded by an Imperf. without ἂν, such must be the rendering.

32. κρινόμενοι δὲ—κατακριθῶμεν] This seems added to console those who were suffering under sickness so inflicted, and at the same time to impart serious admonition as to the use to be made of this correction from the Lord. The force of the reasoning turns upon the expression παιδευόμεθα: and the full sense, expressed and implied, is: 'But when we are so judged and visited by the Lord, we are not capriciously punished, but "we are disciplined"' (i. e. treated as children by a parent, or scholars by a master, are chastised for their good), namely, by afflictions, in order to our full reformation, that we may not be finally condemned with the impatient and unbelieving world.' Examples of this use of παιδεύεσθαι, not adduced by Expositors, are found in Xen. Hist. v. 3, 7, καὶ μάλιστα γὰρ τῶν τοιούτων παθὼν ἐγὼ φημι ἀνθρώπους παιδεύεσθαι, and Soph. Ecl. Col. 562, οἶδ' ἄ γ' αὐτὸς, ὡς παιδεύσθην εἶδον, 'Ὅστιν σὺ, χῶτι πλείστ', ἀνὴρ, ἐπὶ ζήνῃ "Ἐθλήσα κινδυνεύματ'. Here is to be noticed the direct distinction between κριν. and παίδ., and the indirect one between the Lord and men. A distinction evidently recognized by Theophyl., who after Chrys. remarks, that 'here we have παιδευόμεθα, not κολαζόμεθα, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ πατρὸς νοθευόμεθα (by νοθ. being denoted paternal chastigation for moral good). The term is occasionally so used as in Ps. xxxviii. 11, and repeatedly in Wisd., e. g., i. 9, 10, ὅτε γὰρ ἐπειράσθησαν ('we were tried with affliction') καὶ περ ἐν ἐλπίσι παιδευόμενοι, ἔγνωσαν πῶς ἐν ὀργῇ κρινόμενοι ἀσπίσι ἱβανίζοντο, and xii. 22, κρινόμενοι δὲ προσδοκῶμεν ἔλαος.—To turn from words to things:—the best comment on this passage is the parallel sentiment in Heb. xii. 6—10; with which comp. 2 Cor. vi. 9, and Rev. iii. 9.

33. συνερχόμενοι εἰς τὸ φαγεῖν] scil. εἰς τὸ Κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, to the Agape, and the Lord's Supper which followed it.—ἀλλήλ. ἐκδέχ., the ancient Commentators in general regard this as equiv. to μὴ προλαμβάνετε, wait for each other; q. d. 'Let not the rich hastily consume what they have brought with them, but give a chance to others of participating in it.' The more recent Expositors, however, in general assign the sense, 'receive each other with the hospitality of private guests;' implying a cordial community between the rich and the poor. But that sense of ἐκδέχ. is not found in the Scriptures, and the other is called for by supra v. 21, ἕκαστ.—προλαμβάνετε, to which this is a contrast. So, too, Dr. Peile and Mr. Alf.

34. εἰ δὲ τις πεινᾷ, &c.] meaning, it should seem, 'If any one be so hard to be satisfied, that he cannot sufficiently gratify his appetite at the Agape, let him take an antipast at home; and not make a feast, meant for religious purposes, subservient to the mere gratification of sensual appetite; lest he should so act as to incur condemnation and punishment.'

—τὰ λοιπὰ] namely, other less important points of ecclesiastical discipline, that required to be set in order; though we may, with Billr., refer it to the arrangement of particulars, in respect to those already, as above, set in order.

XII. This and the two next chapters treat of the nature, intent, use, and comparative value of the SPIRITUAL GIFTS in general. In ch. xii. St. Paul shows that all those gifts were alike imparted by the Holy Ghost, and were all for the use of the Church; accordingly that no one should value himself upon his gift, so far as to contemn another who had an inferior one, but that each person should be content to exercise his own particular gift. As to the origin of the abuse in question. The Corinthian Church was richly endowed with the gifts, but not with the graces, of the Spirit. Hence their gifts too often ministered only to strife and disorder, creating pride in some, and exciting envy in others. To remedy these disorders, Paul directs the people's attention to the origin and use of the gifts so conferred; showing that they were all imparted by the Spirit of God, according to his own sovereign will and pleasure, without reference to the merits of the persons themselves; and that they were bestowed, not for the aggrandizement of the favoured individuals, but for the benefit of the Church.

1. περὶ τῶν πνευματικῶν] Some here (as infra xiv. 37) supply ἀνθρώπων, others, χαρισμάτων. Either is suitable to what follows (for the Apostle proceeds to treat fully of both spiritual gifts and spiritual persons); but the latter is the more so, and is confirmed by ch. xiv. 1, and Rom. i. 11, and therefore deserves the preference. And, as Dr. Henderson observes (Lect. on Insp., p. 178), 'it is more in accordance with the Apostle's general use of the word, to understand him as referring to things rather than persons.' That the reference is here to things, not persons, appears, as Billr. remarks, from the analogy of the other sections; all of which are introduced with remarks on things, and not on

b ch. 6. 11. ἀγνοεῖν. <sup>2</sup> οἶδατε ὅτι ἔθνη ἦτε, πρὸς τὰ εἰδωλα τὰ ἄφωνα, ὡς
 Eph. 2. 11, 12. ἂν ἤγεσθε, ἀπαγόμενοι. <sup>3</sup> διὸ γνωρίζω ὑμῖν, ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐν Πνεύ-
 1 Thess. 1. 9. ματι Θεοῦ λαλῶν, λέγει ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦν καὶ οὐδεὶς δύναται
 c Mark 9. 38. εἰπεῖν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, εἰ μὴ ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ. <sup>4</sup> Διαίρεσεις 1 John 4. 2, 3. d Rom. 12. 6. Eph. 4. 4. Heb. 2. 4. 1 Pet. 2. 10.

persons. Comp. v. 1. vil. 1. The Corinthians, it seems, had disputed concerning the relative excellence and dignity of these gifts, and had applied to the Apostle to decide the preference amongst them.

2. οἶδατε ὅτι—ἀπαγόμενοι] These words are meant to suggest the necessity of being well-informed on this important subject; since they have now no longer the excuse of being immersed in the ignorance of heathen idolatry. So far, indeed, from being parenthetical, they serve to open out the subject to be treated of, by reminding the Corinthians of an important truth which they ought to bear in mind.

There seems to be an emphasis on ἦτε in ὅτι ἔθνη ἦτε, q. d. 'ye were (once) heathens, but are now converted to the worship of the one true God.' That, however, depends on the reading, which varies in MSS. and is disputed by Editors. For text. rec. ὅτι, A, C, D, E, J, and 50 cursives (1 add Lamb. 1182, 1184, 1186, 1196, Mus. 16, 184, 5116, and Cov. 3, 5, omitted by Mill), with the Vulg., later Syr., Sahid., and Æthiop. Versions, and not a few Fathers, Greek and Latin, have ὅτι ὅτι, while K, and a few cursives, have ὅτι, without ὅτι. The former reading is adopted by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Tisch., and Alf.; while Lachm. edits ὅτι [ὅτι], as I have now done, from deference to the judgment of my fellow-Editors; though I am not, any more than Lachm., convinced that ὅτι ὅτι is the true reading; especially since internal evidence is in favour of the text. rec. Mr. Alf., indeed, pronounces that it is either a mistake, or a correction to help the construction. It could not be the former, but might be the latter; for the construction would have need enough of being helped. But I cannot believe that Paul would write such slipshod Greek. I should rather think that the reading ὅτι ὅτι was a Critical correction to help the sense; which, however, does not need help; as will appear from the logic of the passage, which is ably traced by Hyper., who, after pointing out that the Apostle's argument is one drawn 'ab effectu, sive a conditione vitæ antea-actæ, quam confert cum præsentis,' adds, 'q. d. Vos omnes quondam fuistis gentes, idololatriæ, sequentes simulachra muta, colentes idola, id agentes, quò vos libido abripiebat propria. At nunc, posteaquam Christum copiosis agnoscere et confiteri, experti estis in vobis alium quendam Spiritum, per quem certò et ad optima quæque ducimini, ut percipere possitis, si quo spiritu antea acti fuistis, nequaquam bonum spiritum fuisse: et conferentes spiritum, quem olim sensitis, cum eo, quem nunc sentitis, potestis discernere quis Spiritus Dei sit, seu quid à Spiritu Dei proficiatur.' I will only add, that the text. rec. must have been read by the Pesch. Syr. Translator.—Ἀράγεςθαί denotes the being hurried away by a force which cannot be resisted: and here it refers to the blind infatuation, by which the heathens were led away into idolatry and vice, like brute beasts that have no understanding. This is especially alluded to in ὡς ἂν ἤγεσθε, 'as ye might be led;' viz. by custom, example, or inclination, just as it might happen.

3. διὸ] 'for which purpose,'—namely, that ye may not be thus ignorant, but have the requisite information: 'for the Apostle,' as Dr. Henderson observes, 'next lays it down as a principle particularly to be borne in mind by those who had been Jews, and might still be exposed to the influence of Jewish impostors pretending to be actuated by the Holy Spirit, that no person who spoke by the inspiration of that Divine Agent, could blaspheme the Redeemer; just as it was equally certain that no one could sincerely profess belief in his Divine character and mission, except in virtue of his spiritual influence.'

—γνωρίζω] 'I give you this rule or principle, to enable you to distinguish concerning spiritual things and persons.' The first οὐδεὶς must be understood chiefly of the Jews, who pretended to the Holy Spirit, and yet denied the Messiahship of Jesus. The phrases ἀνάθεμα Ἰησοῦν, and εἰς αἰὲν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν (of which the former signifies literally 'to call any one fit to be put away from the earth'), are here to be explained, with reference to each other, of utter rejection, and of cordial acceptance of the Gospel.—Εἰς αἰὲν Κύριον (scil. Ἰησοῦν) 'Ihousou imports, 'to acknowledge, publicly and sincerely, that Jesus is Christ the Lord, and thoroughly to embrace his religion.'

The best comment on this passage is 1 John iv. 1-3, where is mentioned a similar mode of distinguishing true from false Christians. St. Paul means, that 'no one can solemnly disavow all belief in the divine mission of Jesus, and have the gifts of the Holy Spirit, however he may pretend to them: and, on the other hand, that there is no one who makes that confession sincerely and heartily, but must have the Holy Spirit, in some degree or other.'

4-6. In the enumeration of the spiritual gifts which occupies these verses, especial attention is to be paid to the three terms, χάρισμα, δακρυλαί, and ἐνέργημα. Of these, the first is confined to the gifts of God freely bestowed; the second, to his, or the Spirit's, operations (so called, as being worked in men by Divine power); the third is to be understood with reference exclusively to the different forms in which the gifts in question were exercised, according to the different functions on which they were employed. In fact, we may regard the expression as meant to denote not only that there are several different gifts, but also that the gifts are distinct, distinctions subsisting between them (so in Plato, p. 207, τινὰ μαῖζονα διειρησέν ἀγνοεῖσθαι τε καὶ γινώσθαι θεῶμεν, and in the Sept. 2 Chron. viii. 14. Eadr. vi. 18, the term διαίρεσις is used to denote the distinct classes and sections of the Priests and Levites), intimating that the Holy Spirit suffered them not to make distinct classes, δὲ χαρισμάτων εἰσὶ, τὸ δὲ αὐτὸ Πνεῦμα· <sup>5</sup> καὶ διαιρέσεις • Εἰρ. 4. 11.

 διακονιῶν εἰσὶ, καὶ ὁ αὐτὸς Κύριος· <sup>6</sup> καὶ διαιρέσεις ἐνεργημάτων • Εἰρ. 1. 12.
 τῶν εἰσιν, ὁ δὲ αὐτός [ἐστι] Θεὸς ὁ ἐνεργῶν τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν. <sup>7</sup> Εἰρ. 4. 7-7 • Ἐκάστῃ δὲ δίδεται ἡ φανέρωσις τοῦ Πνεύματος πρὸς τὸ συμ- <sup>11</sup>

the πνευματικὸς exercising his gifts, moving in a sphere of his own, distinct from that of the others. Comp. Diod. Sic. i. ii. 94, as said of the planets, τῶν πλανητῶν ἕκαστον ἰδίον ἔχειν δρόμον ('course') καὶ διηλλαγμένως καὶ ποικίλως χρῆσθαι τοῖς τάχεσι ('velocities') καὶ τῇ τῶν χρόνων διαίρεσει, the distinct periods of time (assigned to each).—intimating that each revolves in an orbit of its own, and is governed by laws of its own, one not interfering with another. The lesson here intimated by the Apostle is more expressly taught in Rom. xii. 3, 7, 8.

4-12. The Apostle now proceeds to enumerate the serious gifts of different Christian teachers; and that for the purpose of showing that no one of them is to be despised, nor any one to be extolled above the rest; intimating withal, that, however various were the gifts, they were all to be traced to the same Holy Spirit, as their common source. In the fourth and fifth verses he extends the idea of diversity, so as to make it comprehend all the modes in which the gifts were employed, and all the results which followed their exercise, in order the more forcibly to exhibit the unity which pervades the whole of the Divine administration. (Dr. Henderson on Insp.)

It is scarcely necessary to say how utterly inadmissible is the view of certain foreign Commentators for the last half century (see Recena. Synop.), who (for the purpose of removing certain difficulties) suppose the χαρίσματα here mentioned to have been merely natural endowments, improved by use and art. However we may acknowledge the difficulty of determining the exact import, and defining the limits, of the several χαρίσματα, nevertheless there is not the less reason to suppose them to have been all, more or less, supernatural. And, although some of them may seem to imply human agency, yet that is not inconsistent with their being likewise supernatural gifts; since, in all such cases, the co-operation of the human ἐνεργούμενος with the Divine ἐνεργῶν is perfectly agreeable to the analogy of the Gospel system. The first occurring and most important term Πνεῦμα must be understood of the Holy Spirit in the personal sense; and, as all the miraculous powers mentioned in vv. 4-6 are at ver. 11 ascribed to the Spirit, who is thereby recognized as the sole cause of effects a little before severally described to the LORD and to GOD, he is consequently identified with the other two Persons just mentioned: and the Deity, as well as personality of the Holy Ghost, is hence fully proved; and thus the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity firmly established. See Bp. Middl. in loc.

4. διαίρεσις δι' χαρισμάτων] for διάφορα ἵστι χαρίσματα. The word χάρισμα signifies 'any thing which has been freely bestowed' (ἀντιδίδεται) at the pleasure of the donor. In the New Test. the term is confined to God's gifts, as ἐνέργημα is to his operations. Thus it is suggested, that these gifts are not mere natural endowments of mind, or acquired talents, but powers and faculties conferred by Divine influence. With respect to the three terms here employed (namely, χαρισμάτων, διακονιῶν, and ἐνεργημάτων), they are generally regarded as synonymous. And such they, in one sense, are; being, as Chrysostom says, δυνάμεων διαφοράι μόνον, καὶ πράγματα τὰ αὐτά. The difference, I conceive, refers only to the various particular spheres under which the gifts, taken generally, may be considered. Thus (says Dr. Henderson) though they all designate what the Apostle describes as belonging to the subject of which he is treating, they nevertheless mark its several parts with sufficient distinctness to authorize their separate consideration. They were all χαρίσματα, as being freely bestowed (supra ch. ii. 12); they were all διακονίαι, as being connected, more or less, with offices of various kinds belonging to the persons who held the gifts; Apostles, Prophets, Teachers, Workers of healing miraculously, Speakers with and Interpreters of tongues supernaturally. The term διακ. is used perhaps to intimate, that the possession of the gifts, or faculties, carried with it an obligation on the part of the possessors to diligently exert them in the discharge of their particular functions. These offices are adverted to at vv. 7-11, and especially at vv. 28-31. So Dr. Henderson explains the διακονίαι to be 'the different forms in which these endowments were exercised, the functions by which they were called into operation, or the services engaged in by those who possessed them.' They were ἐνεργήματα, since, as I have before said, the gifts, considered as powers or faculties, were worked in men by the power of the Holy Spirit.

6. ὁ ἐνεργῶν τὰ πάντα ἐν π.] I would render, with Hamm. and Whitby, 'who worketh them all in all,' as understanding ἐν πᾶσιν, not, with Heidenr., of things (namely, διακονίαις), or as though πάντα ἐν πᾶσι simply stood for ὅλων (by which the sense would be not a little weakened), but of persons, namely the persons in question, meaning (as Theophyl. says) τοῖς πιστοῖς, true Christians, 'those who have the Spirit, and his influences and gifts.' I doubt not that the ancient translators, though they followed closely the original, and so preserve its uncertainty, understood πᾶσι of persons. And so Beza, Pisc., Calv., Grot. (who follows closely Theophyl.), Estius (after T. Aquinas), and Bp. Pearce. By Abp. Newc., Doddr., and Sclater, however, it is explained to mean 'all persons in whom are the above faculties,' which sense is certainly implied.

7. After finishing the climax produced by the idea of Κύριος having been suggested by the use of the correlative term διακονία, the Apostle returns to the agency of the Holy Spirit, on which he expatiates in the remaining portion of the section. The miraculous endowments, by the exercise of which the influence of the Divine Donor was manifested, were not conferred for the purposes of ostentation and vanity; but each recipient was so favoured, that he might contribute that which, in his particular circumstances, might be

h ch. 12. 2. φέρον. <sup>8</sup> ἡ δὲ μὲν γὰρ διὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος διδεται λόγος σοφίας,
 8. ἄλλω δὲ λόγος γνώσεως κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ Πνεῦμα. <sup>9</sup> ἑτέρω δὲ πίστις
 9 Cor. 8. 7.
 Eph. 1. 17.
 18. 1 Matt. 17. 19. Mark 16. 18.

most advantageous to the interests of the Gospel, ver. 7. (Dr. Henderson.)—ἑκάστῳ δὲ δίδεται, &c., meaning, 'But to each [in particular] is given the manifestation of the Spirit [vouchsafed to him], and that for usefulness (namely, to the Church at large,) [not for ostentation or lucre's sake,] to himself[.]—Φανέρωσι τοῦ Πνεύμ. 'Thus the χάρισμα was (as Br. Sanderson observes) a manifestation of the Spirit, just as every other sensible effect is a manifestation of its proper cause.' The Apostle now proceeds to notice the gifts separately;—a subject to us of the most difficult nature, inasmuch as arduous must be the attempt to settle the exact nature, and mark the discrimination of these χαρίσματα; which is not surprising, since, as Parmus remarks, 'we have lost the things which those terms were intended to denote.' On this subject the earlier modern Commentators (with the exception of Grotius and Lightfoot) are but indifferent guides. In later times more has been accomplished by Vi-tringa, Owen, Whitby, Locke, Lightfoot, Lord Barrington; and espec. Bp. Horsley, Dr. Hales, Canon Townsend, Heydenr., Mr. Greswell, Dr. Henders., Billr., and Olsh. Yet still an obscurity hangs over the subject. The great error which runs through the disquisitions of most of the above learned persons is that of supposing far more of regularity of plan in what the Apostle says, here and at vv. 28—31, than what, I suspect, he intended; though I am ready to admit, with Dr. Henderson, that there is a symmetrical connexion in the enumeration of the gifts. Upon the whole, I agree with him, that 'most of the obscurity complained of has been occasioned partly by want of due attention to the structure of the Apostle's language, and partly by abortive attempts to harmonize the list here with that at the end of the Chapter.' Here, at least (vv. 9—11), the Apostle, I apprehend, did not intend any regular list of the χαρίσματα, but only meant to adduce, by way of example, instances of diversity in those gifts, even where there seemed such a coincidence as might mark them out as belonging to the same class. It is, I should think, clear to demonstration, that no regular list was intended at vv. 29, 30. At ver. 28 there is, indeed, more appearance of it; yet even that, it seems, was not meant to be complete, since there is no mention made of the διακρίσεις πνευμάτων and the ἰερμηνεῖα γλωσσῶν, adverted to at ver. 10. With respect to the list of persons holding offices in the Church, and exercising gifts of a supernatural order, Dr. Henderson observes, that 'it discovers nothing which indicates a design on the part of the Apostle to adhere to the order in which he had classed the miraculous endowments, or to place the one table in juxta-position with the former.' To the latter of these assertions I entirely assent, but not quite to the former. In the passage before us (vv. 9, 10, 11), it would seem that the gifts are, with the exception of πίστις (which is placed alone, as being the fundamental principle on which all the others rested), distributed into four pairs; or we may, with Dr. Henderson, adopt a threefold classification, as follows:

- I. Ἦ: μὲν—λόγος σοφίας.
2. ἄλλω δὲ λόγος γνώσεως.
- II. Ἑτέρω: δὲ πίστις.
1. ἄλλω δὲ χαρίσματα λαμάτων.
2. ἄλλω δὲ ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεως.
3. ἄλλω δὲ προφητεία.
4. ἄλλω δὲ διακρίσεις πνευμάτων.
- III. Ἑτέρω: δὲ γίνη γλωσσῶν.
2. ἄλλω δὲ ἰερμηνεῖα γλωσσῶν.

To advert to the first of these,—λόγος σοφίας and λόγος γνώσεως, the distinction between them is variously explained. The ancient Commentators, in general, supposed the former to denote the faculty of speaking and teaching; the latter, the mere knowledge of the Gospel, without the faculty of communicating that knowledge to others. But thus the word λόγος would, in the latter case, be useless: not to say that it is only those higher endowments, and those by which Christians could be useful to the Church, that are here meant. Heydenr. takes λόγος σοφίας of the gift of teaching and preaching, in a popular way, the fundamental truths of Christianity, and λόγος γνώσεως: 'de facultate ingeniosioribus res altioris indagatis, doctrinas sublimiores aequae arcanas, sermone polito coloribusque rhetoricis ornato tradendi.' And so Neander and Billroth explain γνώσις of the theoretical, and σοφία of the practical, knowledge of the Christian religion. And there is something to countenance this view in the use of the word γνώσις by the earlier Fathers. But how uncertain that interpretation is, may be imagined from the fact, that another class of Expositors entirely reverse the sense, understanding γνώσις of elementary and fundamental, and σοφία of more recondite doctrines and instructions. It would rather seem that λόγος σοφίας and λόγος γνώσεως are simply meant to intimate the qualities requisite for the discharge of those functions connected with the Spiritual gifts corresponding to the terms in question, and, of course, must refer alone to the preaching and teaching, as carried on by the ἀπόστολοι, προφῆται, and διδάσκαλοι. Thus the λόγος σοφίας (especially as it comes first) seems to have reference to the Apostles; and the λόγος γνώσεως to the Prophets and the Teachers. This view is, I find, confirmed by the diligent researches of Dr. Henderson, who, in discussing the signification of λόγος and also of the phrases λόγος σοφίας and λόγος γνώσεως, observes that 'the sense of λόγος which best suits the connexion is that of a faculty or power of communicating to others the things to which reference is made (comp. Eph. vi. 19), and therefore whatever σοφία or γνώσις may denote in this connexion, the λόγος was necessary for its impartation to others.' By σοφία, he shows, is here meant the sublimer truths of the Gospel, directly revealed to the Apostles, of which the λόγος was the supernatural ability rightly to communicate them to others; while λόγος γνώσεως, he shows, consisted in the immediate communication of an exact and competent knowledge of the truths which God had already revealed through the instrumentality of the inspired prophets and apostles, in consequence of which these who possessed it became qualified, independently ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ Πνεύματι· ἄλλω δὲ χαρίσματα ἱαμάτων ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ Πνεύματι.<sup>10</sup> ἄλλω δὲ ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων ἄλλω δὲ προφητεία,<sup>1 John 14. 26. 27. 30-30</sup>

 ἄλλω δὲ διακρίσεις πνευμάτων· ἑτέρω δὲ γένη γλωσσῶν, ἄλλω δὲ<sup>Acts 2. 4. R 16. 25.</sup>

on the use of all ordinary means, forthwith to teach them to the church. 'They differed,' continues he, 'from the Apostles, who possessed the word of wisdom, inasmuch as the latter had new truths revealed to them; whereas it was the department of the former infallibly to explain truths and doctrines which had been previously divulged. They also differed from ordinary teachers,—these being under the necessity of acquiring their knowledge of the great principles of revelation by a diligent study of the holy Scriptures, and all the subsidiary means at their command; whereas the primitive instructors, who were supernaturally endowed with the γνώσις here specified, were at once prepared to discharge the duties of their office. They had imparted to them clear, accurate, and connected views of the Divine dispensations, a profound acquaintance with the more intricate and obscure parts of the ancient inspired oracles, and such enlarged and definite conceptions of the doctrines preached by the Apostles, as enabled them by their ministry greatly to contribute to the instruction and confirmation of the disciples in the faith of the Gospel.'

9. ἰσχύς δὲ πίστις] Supposing πίστις to refer to the gifts which involved the exercise of supernatural powers, we may either, with Chrysa. and Heyden, explain it of the fiducia, or confident reliance on Divine aid, which was always indispensable to the working of miracles, even by the Apostles (see Matt. xvii. 20. xxi. 21. Luke xvii. 5, 6. Mark iv. 40); or, with Dr. Henderson, understand it to denote what is commonly called the faith of miracles, and consequently indispensable to the exercise of all the four species of the χαρίσματα which are ranged under it. Compare Rom. xii. 2. 'We now (says Dr. Henderson) come to the second class of χαρίσματα, of which there are four species, ranged under the general head of πίστις. Though itself a miraculous endowment, and essential to the effective exercise of those which immediately follow in the classification, this πίστις is to be contemplated, not as a separate and distinct gift, but as the immediate source to which these endowments are to be traced, or the fundamental principle by which they are called into operation. It holds the same place in regard to the succeeding χαρίσματα which λόγος does to the two χαρίσματα which precede.'

'The first of the various classes of supernatural gifts placed under this special faith, as their operative principle, is χαρίσματα ἱαμάτων, where the use of the plural has reference to the number and variety of the diseases healed. The second class is designated ἐνεργήματα δυνάμεων.' Between these two particulars it has been thought difficult to mark the distinction; the gift of miraculous healing (which must here be meant) being itself an ἐνεργήμα δυνάμεως. To avoid this difficulty, some, as Mackn. and Heyden, explain ἐνέργ. of an in-working of miracles, i. e. the enabling others to work them: an interpretation, however, philologically invalid, and destitute of all foundation either in reason or analogy; in short, unsupported by any thing in the records of ecclesiastical history. Indeed, as Dr. Henderson observes, 'to thus operate on the human mind is the sole prerogative of him who 'worketh all in all,' v. 6. We can only suppose that the Apostle has reference to miraculous powers in general. The terms are, indeed (what were allowable, from their forming a pair), transposed, as we find from vv. 28, 29; in both which places ἐνέργ. δυν. is placed before the χαρ. ἱαμ., and that as proceeding from genus to species.—Ἐνεργήματα may be considered as descriptive not of the act of performing the miracles, but of the effects of that power by which they were performed. Both words may indeed be taken as a common endiadys, and are equiv. to ἐνεργήματα δυνάμ. miraculous results. Under this expression were, as Olshaus. well observes, included, besides healing, all those especially miraculous gifts mentioned in Mark xvi. 18. Acts v. 1 seq. Add Matt. vii. 22, δυνάμεις πολλὰς ἐποιήσαμεν. The difference between the ἐνέργ. δυν. and the χαρίσμ. ἱαμ. may be what Mr. Alexander on Billroth in loco thinks, namely, that the latter was the power of miraculously and instantaneously performing what was within the reach of human instrumentality by slow degrees and great labour to accomplish; whereas the former was the power of working miracles in cases where no human agency could reach.

10. προφητεία] This, as Dr. Henderson shows, is to be understood of prophecy in its fullest extent; namely, prophesying future events, to the existence of which faculty the New Test. supplies abundant evidence; and in this extent of signification it is not without reason assigned to faith as its operative principle. With this is classed, as a cognate gift, the διακρίσεις πνευμάτων, or faculty of determining (as Chrysostom and other ancient Commentators suppose) on the pretensions of persons to the gift of prophecy and teaching, and, indeed, of spiritual gifts in general, and sometimes (as we find from xiv. 29) on the modes of exercising even acknowledged gifts. This faculty may best be thought to denote the distinguishing [by Divine inspiration] persons possessed of spiritual gifts (especially those of prophecy and teaching) from mere pretenders to them, whether deceiving or being deceived. Their office was not merely to discern and distinguish true from false pretensions, but to expose the latter to the view of others, and hence almost required the additional gift of the προφητεία, in the sense above laid down. The persons in question are here, as at 2 Thess. ii. 2. 1 John iv. 2, 3, called πνεύματα, as professing to speak ἐν Πνεύματι, from the extraordinary impulse of the Spirit.

—γένη γλωσσῶν—ἰερυνία γλωσσῶν] This last-mentioned class and pair of gifts (so placed, doubtless, to intimate the inferior estimation in which the Apostle held them) are the faculty of speaking in various sorts of languages never previously learnt, and the interpretation (doubtless in the vernacular tongue) of what was uttered by the persons endued with the gift of tongues.

ἐρμηνεία γλωσσῶν. <sup>11</sup> Ἐάντα δὲ ταῦτα ἐνεργεῖ τὸ ἐν καὶ τὸ αὐτὸ Πνεῦμα, διαιροῦν ἰδίᾳ· ἐκάστῳ καθὼς βούλεται. <sup>12</sup> Καθάπερ γὰρ τὸ σῶμα ἐν ἑστὶ, καὶ μέλη ἔχει πολλὰ, πάντα δὲ τὰ μέλη τοῦ σώματος [τοῦ ἐνός], πολλὰ ὄντα, ἐν ἑστὶ σῶμα· οὕτω καὶ ὁ Χριστός. <sup>13</sup> Καὶ γὰρ ἐν ἐνὶ Πνεύματι ἡμεῖς πάντες εἰς ἐν σῶμα ἐβαπτίσθημεν· εἴτε Ἰουδαῖοι εἴτε Ἕλληνες, εἴτε δούλοι εἴτε ἐλεύθεροι· καὶ πάντες εἰς ἐν Πνεῦμα ἐποτίσθημεν. <sup>14</sup> καὶ

These two gifts did not necessarily go together (i. e. the latter with the former), though (as we may infer from xiv. 5, 13) they sometimes accompanied each other.

11. πάντα δὲ ταῦτα—βούλεται meaning: 'Now that One and the same Spirit inworketh all these [diversities of gifts], dividing and distributing to each [of the persons favoured with them] separately his own gift, as he pleaseth.'

12. καθάπερ γάρ, &c. Under a metaphor derived from the mutual dependence of the various parts of the human body, the Apostle (as at Rom. xii. 4, 5) inculcates the lesson, that all true members of the Christian body should so act as to form one united whole, each mutually contributing to the common benefit of the Church Universal. Render: 'For as the body is but one, and [yet] hath many members, and all the members of this one body, many as they are, are but one body, so also is Christ (i. e. his Church) but one.'—τοῦ ἐνός is omitted in 7 ancient uncials, and 6 cursives (I add Lamb. 1184), and some Versions, and is cancelled by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and, indeed, internal evidence is rather against it; but there is no sufficient authority for removing it.

13. καὶ γὰρ ἐν ἑνὶ Πν., &c. Render: 'For through [the operation of] one Spirit we all have been baptized into (or unto) one body,' i. e. so as to form one body. On the sense intended in this verse, I am still of the same opinion as formerly, and see no good reason to desert the ancient and generally received interpretation. By so doing we become involved in a maze of discordant interpretations all liable to more or less of serious objection, and requiring us to cancel the sic before Πνεῦμα, which word, indeed, is in a few ancient MSS. and some Versions and Fathers not found, and has been removed from the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., yet not on just critical grounds; though indeed, were the word away, that circumstance would not weaken the evidence existing for the common interpretation. And as to the argument from the usus loquendi, urged by those who adopt the novel interpretations, that is not so weighty, in the case of the Pauline Epistles, as is the evidence of the context, which here almost requires us to take Πνεῦμα, not of spirit or mind, but of the Holy Spirit, in his Divine influences and gifts of grace,—though not, I apprehend, as some contend, the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, for that is excluded by the term πάντες, which must confine the sense to those ordinary operations of the Spirit given to every man to profit withal, by illuminating, sanctifying, and otherwise making its recipients 'meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.' Again, I see no reason to reject the opinion of almost all the ancient, and the greater part of the modern Expositors, that the words of the verse have especial reference to the communication of the gifts of grace conferred in the two sacraments of baptism and the supper of the Lord. This view Chrysa. adopts, though, for homiletic edification, he mixes up the other. It has been adopted, and ably supported, by Estius, and scarcely less so by Heydenr., who well states the objections to the other modes of interpretation, the principal of which he shows would make the Apostle express the same thing in other words. There is surely no difficulty in supposing ἐποτίσθ. sic ἐν Πνεῦμα put, per synecdochen, of a part for the whole of the eucharistic solemnities, leaving one species to be understood from the other, namely, food from drink, as in the case of σώματα, supra, x. 16 and 21. I would render sic ἐν Πνεῦμα ἐποτίσθημεν, not 'drink into,' but 'in,' equiv. to 'of one spirit.' Upon the whole, the sense of the verse cannot be better expressed than in the words of Estius (where he closely follows Chrysa. and Theophyl.) as follows: 'omnes fideles, velut unius corporis membra, quemadmodum regenerationem habent communem per baptismum, ita nutritionem quoque communem habere per eucharistiae sacramentum.' And this view of the sense is confirmed by Hyper., Calv., and Beza. Of these Hyper. well remarks, that 'Spiritum accipi in recto usu sacramentorum, et Spiritum in illis agere aliquo modo indicatur.' And Calvin yet more precisely and ably: 'Loquitur (apostolus) de baptismo fidelium, qui per gratiam Spiritus est efficax: multis enim literalis tantum est baptismus, symbolum absque effectu. Sed fideles rem simul percipiunt cum sacramenta, adeoque respectu Dei semper hoc verum est, baptismum institutionem esse in corpus Christi. Et optimum temperamentum tenet hic apostolus quum hanc quidem baptismi naturam esse docet, nos coadunare in Christi corpus. Ne quis tamen externo symbolo hoc fieri imaginaretur, addit esse opus Spiritus Sancti.' And he proceeds to explain (agreeably to the view of the sense above laid down) sic as put for ἐν, ὅ, showing the meaning to be, that 'the participation of the cup imports that we all drink of the same spiritual drink; for we drink that vivifying blood of Christ, that we may have a common life with him' (see John vii. 37 seqq.), which is the case when he lives in us by his Spirit.

14. In this and the next two verses the parallel is further developed and illustrated. Of καὶ γὰρ τὸ σῶμα—πολλὰ the sense is, 'It is not one member, however important, which constitutes the body, but all together,' an argument often employed by orators to excite large bodies of men to unanimity and concord. The Apostle had probably in mind the well-known apologue in γὰρ τὸ σῶμα οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν μέλος, ἀλλὰ πολλά. <sup>15</sup> Ἐὰν εἴπῃ ὁ πούς· "Ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ χεὶρ, οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐκ τοῦ σώματος· οὐ παρὰ τοῦτο οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ σώματος. <sup>16</sup> καὶ ἐὰν εἴπῃ τὸ οὖς· "Ὅτι οὐκ εἰμὶ ὀφθαλμός, οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐκ τοῦ σώματος· οὐ παρὰ τοῦτο οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ σώματος. <sup>17</sup> Εἰ ὅλον τὸ σῶμα ὀφθαλμός, ποῦ ἡ ἀκοή; εἰ ὅλον ἀκοή, ποῦ ἡ ὁσφρησις; <sup>18</sup> Νυνὶ δὲ ὁ Θεὸς ἔθετο τὰ μέλη, ἐν ἑκαστὸν αὐτῶν, ἐν τῷ σώματι καθὼς ἠθέλησεν. <sup>19</sup> Εἰ δὲ ἦν τὰ πάντα ἐν μέλος, ποῦ τὸ σῶμα; <sup>20</sup> νῦν δὲ πολλά μὲν μέλη, ἐν δὲ σῶμα. <sup>21</sup> οὐ δύναται δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμός εἰπεῖν τῇ χειρὶ· Χρεῖαν σου οὐκ ἔχω· ἢ πάλιν ἡ κεφαλὴ τοῖς ποσὶ· Χρεῖαν ὑμῶν οὐκ ἔχω. <sup>22</sup> Ἀλλὰ πολλῶ μᾶλλον τὰ δοκοῦντα μέλη τοῦ σώματος ἀσθενέστερα ὑπάρχειν, ἀναγκαῖά ἐστι· <sup>23</sup> καὶ ἃ δοκοῦμεν ἀτιμότερα εἶναι τοῦ σώματος, τούτοις τιμὴν περισσοτέραν περιτίθεμεν καὶ τὰ ἀσχήμονα ἡμῶν εὐσχημοσύνην περισσοτέραν ἔχει. <sup>24</sup> τὰ δὲ εὐσχήμονα ἡμῶν οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχει. Ἀλλ' ὁ Θεὸς συνεκέρασε τὸ σῶμα, τῷ ὑστεροῦντι περισσοτέραν δούς τιμὴν, <sup>25</sup> ἵνα μὴ ᾖ σχίσμα ἐν τῷ σώματι, ἀλλὰ τὸ αὐτὸ ὑπὲρ

Æsop, which was probably derived (together with most of his others) from the Æsæ, that ever-fertile source of fable.

15. ἐὰν εἴπῃ ὁ πούς, &c.] So it is said in a similar passage of Dionys. Hal., καὶ λέγουσιν οἱ μιν πόδες, ὅτι πᾶν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς τὸ σῶμα ἐπικείται.

—οὐ παρὰ τοῦτο—σώματος·] 'it does not on this account form no part of the body;' παρὰ here signifying propter, as Thucyd. ii. 141. The phrase παρὰ τοῦτο is also found in Deut. xiii. 5, Plut. Camill. 128. Xen. Mag. Eq. i. 5, Dio Cass. 171, 96. 320, 98. The foregoing is the sense, according to the punctuation which I have adopted, with several eminent Editors and Translators, and as is required by the proprietas linguæ. Those who adopt the interrogation are obliged to sink the second οὐ by calling in the rule that two negatives make an affirmative; which principle will not apply in a construction like the present.

18. νυνὶ δὲ, &c.] Here we have another argument, from the ordination of God. (Calv.) 'But as they are now constituted, God hath placed the members, each of them in the body in that situation, and for that office, which it hath pleased him.'

19. εἰ δὲ ἦν, &c.] 'But if all the members were one member, where would be the body?' q. d. there would be no body.

20. Here we have a repetition, in order the more strongly to impress the great truth, on which the whole question turned.

21. So far it has been shown what is the office of the inferior members; namely, to minister to the body at large, and not to envy the superior ones. Now, from the converse Paul lays it down as the duty of the worthier members not to despise the inferior, whom they cannot do without. (Calv.) The general sense intended in vv. 21—30 is, that 'as the body consists of many members, disposed according to the pleasure of God (vv. 14—20),—and as all, in their different ways, are equally useful (vv. 21—26), so is it in the Church, wherein God has appointed various offices (vv. 27—30); and hence all should keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.'

22. τὰ δοκοῦντα μέλη τ. σ. ἀσθενεῖν.] It is not agreed whether this refers to the eyes, or the brains, or the lungs and intestines. But there is no reason why it should not have reference to all such parts as are at once fragile, and yet indispensable to the functions of the whole body.

23. ἀτιμότερα] By this is meant 'the lower parts of the trunk of the body,' espec. as Abp. Newcome thinks, 'the ducts by which nature throws off what is redundant;' to which add, that γαστήρ is evidently implied; as also in Dionys. Hal. 1239, 12, Καθὰπερ ἐν τοῖς σώμασιν ἡμῶν ἡ λειδορουμένη [ἡ γαστήρ] ὑπὸ τῶν πάντων τρέφει τὸ σῶμα τριφομένη, καὶ σώζει σωζομένη. Τιμ. περισσ. meaning, 'the more studiously clothing and cherishing them with raiment.' The words καὶ τὰ ἀσχήμονα, &c., form a sort of parallelism on the former, to introduce the paronomasia between συχ. and εὐσυχ. Comp. Diod. Sic. lib. v. 32, τὰ πρόβατα τοῖς ἵπποις τὴν σκίπην ἅμα καὶ εὐσχημοσύνην περιποιεῖ.

24. οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχει.] Sub. ἵνα αὐτοῖς τιμὴν περισσ. περιτίθεμεν. By the term εὐσχημόνα St. Paul adverts to the face, hands, &c.—ἀλλ' ὁ Θεός—τιμῇ. 'But God hath attempered [the various parts of] the body, by bestowing more abundant care and attention on any meaner part.' By συνεκέρασε it is intimated, that 'God hath so attempered by such a wise adjustment of the various offices, and peculiar benefits, of the several members of the body, as to form one harmonious whole.' On this force of συγκερ. see my note on Thucyd. xvi. 18, 5, ἐνυγκραθέν. With τὸ αὐτὸ μερίμν. (which is a rare phrase) comp. τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν in Rom. xii. 16; xv. 6. Phil. ii. 2.

25. σχίσμα] 'division, separation,' by which the members would want mutual aid.

τὰ κρείττονα· καὶ ἔτι καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ὁδὸν ὑμῖν δείκνυμι.

XIII. 1. <sup>a</sup> Ἐὰν ταῖς γλώσσαις τῶν ἀνθρώπων λαλῶ καὶ τῶν ἀγγέλων, ἀγάπην δὲ μὴ ἔχω, γέγονα χαλκὸς ἡχῶν ἢ κύμβαλον ἀλαλάζον. <sup>b</sup> <sup>c</sup> Καὶ ἔὰν ἔχω προφητεῖαν, καὶ εἰδῶ τὰ μυστήρια πάντα καὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γνῶσιν καὶ ἔὰν ἔχω πᾶσαν τὴν πίστιν, ὥστε ὄρη μεθιστάνειν, ἀγάπην δὲ μὴ ἔχω, οὐδὲν εἰμι. <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> Καὶ

<sup>a</sup> 1 Pet. 4. 8. <sup>b</sup> Matt. 7. 22. & 17. 20. <sup>c</sup> 21. 31. <sup>d</sup> Mark 11. 22. <sup>e</sup> Luke 17. 6. <sup>f</sup> Rom. 12. 7. ch. 12. 8, 9, 26. <sup>g</sup> 14. 1, 6-9.

have the lesser.' The Imperat. has often this sense of per me licet. The next words may be rendered, 'And yet a more excellent way show I now unto you.' I agree with Mr. Alf., that 'Paul is not framing a comparison between Love and the Gifts,—but pointing out the only way in which gifts can be made effectual in the highest sense.' And in very nearly the same manner I long ago explained this passage in my Recens. Syn.

XIII. 1. This verse ought not to have been separated from the last of the preceding chapter; since it is closely connected with it. In order to fully expose the error of the Corinthians, in overvaluing and priding themselves on spiritual gifts,—without due regard to the graces of the Spirit, and ordinary usefulness as regarded their Christian brethren,—the Apostle now declares the most illustrious of them to be as nothing compared with charity; his object being to fix the attention of the Corinthian Church on the intrinsic superiority of Christian charity to all the supernatural gifts he had enumerated, the most illustrious of which are nothing compared with LOVE. Render: 'Even if I speak by the languages of men, yea, of angels; equiv. to 'If I can speak,' or 'could speak,' as the Pesch. Syr. Version renders; and so in the next words, 'and should not have love, I am become (no better than),' &c. It is not necessary to debate whether the angels have a language or not. It was sufficient for the Apostle to suppose this; espec. as that was the opinion of his countrymen, some of whom even thought that certain of their Rabbis had attained a knowledge of it, which they supposed was the key to all mysteries; particularly since all that the Apostle means is the highest imaginable faculty of a miraculous character.

—ἀγάπην] Render, not charity (for that does not correctly represent the sense of ἀγάπη, and suggests a wrong idea, as if almsgiving were meant), but love, in its most general sense; not meaning, however, as some explain, 'love to God and man,' but, as is required by the context,—wherein are described the properties of this ἀγάπη,—'the principle of love,'—of course to man, but at the same time 'Christian love;' i. e. such a love to man as is founded, as to its ultimate object, on love to GOD, and regard to his will (see John xiv. 21, 23);—his will being, that his rational creatures, dependent as they are on each other by various mutual wants, should love each other. In the next words the epithets ἡχῶν and ἀλαλ. are ill rendered in E. V. 'Sounding' is too indefinite to express ἡχῶν, and 'tinkling' is almost the reverse of what is called for by ἀλαλ. From the use of ἀλαλ. (derived from ἀλαλέ, the 'shout,' or 'halloo,' for the battle), St. Paul may be supposed to have had in mind two military instruments, the former, corresponding to ἡχ., either the trumpet itself, or a brazen wind-instrument like our French-horn, the as of Virg. Æn. iii. 140. The epithet ἡχῶν may best be rendered 'pealing,' with reference to the long-sustained sound of the trumpet, or horn. And so we speak of 'the pealing organ.' Possibly, however, by χαλκ. St. Paul meant some brazen instrument producing sound by being struck in the manner of a bell with us; an opinion confirmed by Nonnus, Dionys. l. xiv. and xix. (cited by Wetzl.), κύμβαλα δινέουσα ('twirling') βαρύβρομα, διζυγί, χαλκῶ, which points to an instrument like our double kettle-drum. Though, even, according to this view, the same epithet will apply. So we say 'to ring a peal.' With respect to ἀλαλ., it is as difficult to frame such a rendering as shall suit alike the tone of the instrument, and the sense which ἀλαλ. is capable of expressing. 'Clanging' will exactly suit the former; but how that sense can be extracted from ἀλαλ., I am unable to imagine. That term is not fitted to express any tone but one long sustained. Yet that is not adapted to the sound of the κύμβ., which would require the epithet ἡχῶν. So Athen., p. 361, αὐλῶν βόμβος, καὶ κυμβάλων ἡχος, clanging. Upon the whole, I would render by 'sonorous,' equiv. to 'noisy,' a sense confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. sonum edens, and the Arabic Vers., strepitans. Be that as it may, the purpose of the Apostle is not, as certain learned Commentators suppose, to compare the persons in question to the instruments spoken of by some Class. writers, by comparing philosophers, who dilated much on virtue, and did not practise their own maxims, to musical instruments which yield fine sounds, but are themselves devoid of the sense of hearing, or feeling, the music they make. That view ill accords with the context, which requires the sense assigned by the Greek Commentators, and some eminent Latin ones, as Primasius and Est., who explain it to mean that the persons do no good either to themselves or to others: 'cum enim carant charitate, quæ edificat, non utique dono linguarum utuntur ad aliorum edificationem.'

2. The true key to the interpretation of this verse is to keep in view, that the Apostle is here adverting to the highest of those spiritual gifts before mentioned, which the persons whom he was addressing could aim at,—namely, that of the προφηταί, those possessed of the λόγος σοφίας, or the λόγος γνώσεως. The πίστις is the same as that at xii. 9 (where see note), but may be supposed to be of the most exalted kind,—namely, a faith of miracles. In ὥστε ὄρη μὲθ. is an hyperbolical expression, founded on that of our Lord at Matt. xxi. 21, 22, and elsewhere.—Οὐδὲν εἰμι, i. e. 'I am entitled to no distinction on that account.'

3. In order to perceive the full import of this

o Prov. 10.
13.
2 Cor. 6. 6.
Gal. 5. 22.
Eph. 4. 2.
Col. 1. 11.
2 Tim. 2. 15.
1 Pet. 4. 8.

ἐὰν <sup>ἀλλ</sup> ψυμῶ πάντα τὰ ὑπάρχοντά μου, καὶ ἐὰν παραδῶ τὸ σῶμά μου ἵνα καυθήσωμαι, ἀγάπην δὲ μὴ ἔχω, οὐδὲν ὠφελοῦμαι.
4 c Ἡ ἀγάπη μακροθυμεῖ, χρηστεύεται· ἡ ἀγάπη οὐ ζηλοῖ· ἡ verse, it is necessary to advert to the scope of the Apostle in the whole chapter. He is here exerting himself to lessen the too great anxiety of the generality of the Corinthian Christians for the χαρίσματα above mentioned; and, in order to do this the more effectually, he brings forward a certain principle, which, he says, is more efficacious than them all,—namely, ἀγάπη.

The Apostle speaks in the first person singular (rather than the second person plural, Ye, or the first person plural, We) in order as much as possible to avoid giving offence; especially as he meant, in describing Christian charity, to obliquely censure the uncharitable spirit of many Corinthian Christians of the highest spiritual endowments. This indirect censure is discernible in the manner of distributing the various particulars, which form the component parts of the great and comprehensive virtue here inculcated,—namely, into two parts; the former consisting of negations, the latter of affirmations; the first showing what Christians ought not to be (though too many of them are); the second what they ought to be, and must be, if they hope to be accepted of God.

The present is, indeed, a portion of Scripture of such great importance, that a more particular statement of its plan may be not unacceptable. In the first four verses of this chapter the Apostle shows in the strongest terms, and illustrates by the liveliest images, the transcendent superiority of Christian Love over even the most illustrious spiritual gifts; and, in order to show the indispensable necessity thereof in order to attain acceptance with God, he sets himself to establish the important truth, that however those gifts might edify others, Christian charity could alone benefit ourselves. Having said thus much in commendation of this Divine principle, he proceeds, in vv. 4—7, to describe it; and that by pointing to its effects and properties, as the marks by which it may be distinguished from counterfeits, or such as are only (as alms-giving) a part, and not the whole. The remaining verses of the chapter are illustrative of the superiority of Christian charity to every other principle, even the graces of Faith and Hope, highly essential as these are to salvation; and that on the ground both of its permanency, as compared with the temporary nature and purpose of spiritual gifts, even of the most illustrious kind,—and also of its own intrinsic excellence, as rich in blessings to man, which redounds to the glory of God.—In the words ἐὰν ψυμῶ, &c., and ἐὰν παραδῶ, &c., the Apostle seems to have intended to give an example of two of the most remarkable of those external marks of religion, in its principal parts,—love to God, and to man; and thus to show that if even these be of no worth, it must a fortiori be true of others. On the force of ψυμ.—see my Lex.

—ἐὰν παραδῶ—καυθήσωμαι] Alluding, it is thought, to what is said at Dan. iii. 28. of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, that they 'yielded up their bodies to be burned, that they might not serve any god except their own God.'

Here, then, is supposed the very laying down one's life, by martyrdom, in the most excruciating tortures, to bear testimony to the truth of our religion. That this, however, may be done from fanaticism, obstinacy, vain-glory, and such other carnal motives, the records of Ecclesiastical History amply prove.

4. Having said thus much in commendation of this divine principle of Love, finely designated by Milton as 'the golden key, which opens the palace of eternity,' the Apostle proceeds to describe it; and that as a man would gold, by showing its effects and abstract properties, and the marks by which it may be distinguished. Of these characteristics no less than fifteen particulars are brought forward. And even these are not to be regarded as all that could be adduced, but as so many apt accomplishments of the grace of Christian love, just as we have at ch. xii. exemplifications of the spiritual gifts: in short, such specimens of the grace in question, as those of the fruits of the Spirit, Gal. v. 16 seqq. Of the terms which express these specimens, the two first seem designed to give a general view of the subject; those following, a special one, comprehending the particulars therein contained. Of these two, the first, μακροθυμεῖ, 'is long-suffering,' denotes the enduring patiently all kinds of evil, as contrasted with a spirit quick in taking affront, and bitter in retaliating a supposed injury, as the second, χρηστεύεται, signifies 'to be, or to show oneself χρηστός,' which has the same extent of signifi. as our Adjective good, denoting 'benevolent, benignant, gentle, kind-hearted.' Chrys. has here a masterly explanation of χρηστεύεται, from which the following scholium of Theophyl. is derived: 'Ἐπειδὴ δὲ τινες οἱ οὐκ εἰς φιλοσοφίαν τῇ μακροθυμίᾳ κίχνηται, ἀλλὰ τολμάκι τοῦτε κατ' αὐτὸν ὀργίζονται διαγυλῶντες καὶ ἐρωμένονοι, ὥς ὅθιν μακροθυμοί, μάλλον αὐτοὺς ποιοῦντες ἑκαταστοῖ τῇ ὀργῇ· διὰ τοῦτο φησι, τὸ χρηστεύεται, ἀντὶ τοῦ, χρηστόν ᾗθως καὶ ἀκακὸν ἐνδείκνυται. The same matter occurs, but in a more complete form, in Ecumen. Thus evil is overcome with good—and the maxim is far superior to the boasted 'Bear and forbear' of the Philosophers. Comp. supra vi. 6, and Gal. v. 22.

—οὐ ζηλοῖ] This seems directed against the envious spirit with which the possessors of the higher gifts were viewed by those who had the lesser, or none at all.—οὐ περιτριυέται. Most ancient and many modern Commentators (especially the more recent) explain it (by a reference to its derivation from the old Latin perperus, and the Æolic πέπρωτος), 'to act precipitately and rashly;' a signifi. confirmed and illustrated by Wets., with numerous examples from the Class. writers, and which has much to recommend it; but is here scarcely agreeable to the context. Hence we may rather adopt the sense assigned by some ancient, and several eminent modern Commentators, 'vaunteth not itself,' = ἐλεζομένηται, a signifi. of the word found in Polyb. and Marc. Anton. It would seem that περ-

ἀγάπη οὐ περπερεύεται, οὐ φυσιοῦνται, <sup>5</sup> οὐκ ἀσχημονεῖ, οὐ <sup>d ch. 10. 24.</sup> ζητεῖ τὰ ἑαυτῆς, οὐ παροξύνεται, οὐ λογιζεται τὸ κακόν. <sup>6</sup> οὐ <sup>Phil. 2. 4. 21.</sup> χαίρει ἐπὶ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, συγχαίρει δὲ τῇ ἀληθείᾳ. <sup>7</sup> πάντα στέγει, <sup>1 Tim. 2. 10.</sup> <sup>1 John 2. 16.</sup> <sup>17.</sup> <sup>e Ps. 10. 5.</sup> <sup>f 10. 4.</sup> <sup>Rom. 1. 32.</sup> <sup>g 1 John 5. 2.</sup>

περιέται, as well as φυσιοῦνται, denotes 'pride, and vanity, on account of certain external advantages.' And it is obvious how inconsistent such dispositions are with the love here inculcated, inasmuch as they sow the seeds of hatred and variance. Comp. Rom. xii. 3.

5. οὐκ ἀσχημονεῖ] Of this term the expositions are very various, and mostly unsatisfactory. The earlier modern Expositors take the sense to be, 'non agit inverecundè,' 'doth not behave itself unseemly;' while most of the recent Commentators explain it (after Grot.), 'avoids whatever in the opinion of men may be base or unseemly.' The former interpretation is the simpler and more natural, and may very well include the latter. The word is, indeed, properly a dramatic term, and was used of an actor who did not support the σχῆμα, or deportment, suitable to his assumed character. The meaning, then, would be, 'avoids all such conduct as may be indecorous, or, in common estimation, unbecoming the professors of pure religion:' comp. Rom. xii. 17. This, however, is not sufficiently suitable to the context, where the term properly groups with the preceding, and seems to form the highest stage in the climax at περιερίεσται, φουσίουται, and ἀσχημονεῖ. And as περιερίεσται and φουσίουται denote affections of the mind, so that may refer to the result of such in gesture and action. Thus it is said, Prov. xix. 1, 'he that is perverse in his lips, acts as a fool;' or, as it ought to be rendered, 'who is a fool,' or 'plays the fool.' Thus ἀσχημονεῖν here seems to denote 'the eagerly catching at applause, and the arrogance associated therewith. So Calv. well explains, 'non exultat ostentatione inepta;' i. e. unbecoming the Christian character, whose prime virtue is humility; see Eph. iv. 2. Thus ἀσχημονεῖ is said per metonymiam, for ἀφρονεῖ, 'plays the fool [by boasting].' So 2 Cor. xii. 11, γίγνατο ἀφρων καυχώμενος. So Plut. on self-praise. οὕτως οἱ πεινῶντες ἐπαίνων—αὐτοὶ τῇ φιλοδοξίᾳ—ἀσχημονοῦσιν.—The next three terms, οὐ ζητεῖ τὰ ἑαυτῆς, οὐ παροξύνεται, and οὐ λογιζεται τὸ κακόν, are connected together, and seem meant to illustrate the preceding; and if so, they relate to the same subject;—thus denoting not (as they are commonly explained) selfishness in general,—but that species of it which is a constant concomitant of pride, and consists in men making claims on others beyond what their merit will justify;—the very character of the proud man, who is, in fact, ever ready to take offence where none is meant, prone to suspect evil or injury to be intended; and, as it were, keeps a note-book for future retaliation; which two last traits seem meant in οὐ παροξύνεται, and οὐ λογιζεται τὸ κακόν, of which the first should be rendered, 'is not prone to exasperation,' or 'bitter anger;' and the second, 'does not enter down the evil, or wrong, for future avengement.'

6. οὐ χαίρει ἐπὶ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ] Render: 'rejoices not over iniquity;' i. e. at its commission.—συγχαίρει δὲ τῇ ἀλ. Here the συ is not, as many suppose, pleonastic; nor can be said to be absolutely put for ἐπὶ, since of this use there is no proof. Meyer, in order to preserve the force of συγχ., renders, 'rejoices with the Truth;' ἡ ἀλήθ., he says, being thus personified, and 'meaning (says Alf.), the spread among men of the Truth of the Gospel, and, indeed, of the truth in general.' But I cannot digest this harsh personification, more suited to a Pindaric Ode, than to the plain, but sweetly running prose of this lovely Chapter. Besides, this interpretation is forbidden by the former member of the antithesis, which is thus destroyed. Moreover, there is no need to resort to this personification, since, while adopting the literal rendering, 'rejoiceth with the truth,' we have only to suppose it a brief, and somewhat uncouth mode—quite Johannine—of expressing the full sense, 'rejoiceth with (= at) the existence of true and genuine virtue;' q. d. 'rejoiceth not in any [reported] iniquity, but in any truly existing virtue.' The Antithesis is confirmed, and the idiomatic use of the terms ἀδικ. and ἀλ. is placed beyond doubt, by Rom. ii. 8, ἀπεχθύνει μὲν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, καὶ δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ, where see note. And to the same purpose, I find Estius explain. How easily the two terms truth and virtue may be interchanged will sufficiently appear, if we consider that (as Bp. Warburton finely observes, Sermon on 2 Pet. i. 4-7) 'Truth and Virtue are twin-born sisters, and, with only a name of distinction, participate of one common nature; Truth being speculative virtue, and Virtue only practical truth.' Comp. John iii. 21, ὁ ποίῳ τὴν ἀλήθειαν.

7. We are now come to the affirmative particulars.—στρίγει. In order to avoid what seems tautology, if the word be explained according to its usual sense, dearseth, Expositors have proposed various other senses, only one of which, however, is entitled to attention; namely, legis, rectis, covers, suppresses; as in Eccles. viii. 20; and 1 Pet. iv. 8, πρὸ πάντων δὲ τὴν εἰς ταυτοῦς ἀγάπην ἑκτινὴ ἔχοντες, ὅτι ἡ ἀγάπη καλύψει πλῆθος ἁμαρτιῶν. Yet it would be difficult to justify the sentiment, 'charity suppresseth all things;' for surely the kindness thus shown to one, and he an offender, would be cruelty to society at large. Hence it is better to adhere to the ordinary sense of στρίγει, supported as it is by all the ancient Versions and the usus loquendi of the Apostle. So 1 Thess. iii. 1, 5, μηκέτι στίγνοντες, 'no longer enduring.' Or rather the term is here to be taken as at supra ix. 12, ἀλλὰ πάντα στίγομεν, 'we have in all things abstained from the use of this power or right to be maintained at the expense of our converts.' And such seems the sense here intended; namely, that true Charity puls up with much abridgment of her Christian liberty, rather than give needless offence to others by the demand of her proper rights, on the use of things lawful; see supra x. 23, and Bp. Sanderson's Sermon on that text. It is plain that the πάντα here must be taken with the same limitation (according to the circumstances of the case) as in the words following.—πάντα πιστάται, i. o.

f vv. 10, 13.
Luke 22. 22.
Gal. 5. 6.
ch. 12. 10.
28—30.
8 & 14. 30.
Acts 2. 4.
8 & 19. 6.
Jer. 40. 7.
Heb. 8. 13.
8 & 9 Cor. 3. 18.
8 & 5. 7.
Phil. 3. 12.
1 John 3. 2.
Num. 12. 8.
Matt. 5. 8.
8 & 18. 10. Rom. 8. 18. 1 John 3. 2. Rev. 22. 4.

πάντα πιστεύει, πάντα ἐλπίζει, πάντα ὑπομένει. <sup>8</sup> Ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει· εἴτε δὲ προφητεῖαι καταργηθῇσονται· εἴτε γλώσσαι, παύσονται· εἴτε γνώσις, καταργηθήσεται. <sup>9</sup> Ἐκ μέρους γὰρ γινώσκουμεν, καὶ ἐκ μέρους προφητεύομεν <sup>10</sup> ὅταν δὲ ἔλθῃ τὸ τέλειον, τότε τὸ ἐκ μέρους καταργηθήσεται. <sup>11</sup> Ὅτε ἡμῖν νήπιος, ὡς νήπιος ἐλάλουν, ὡς νήπιος ἐφρόνουν, ὡς νήπιος ἐλογίζομεν· ὅτε δὲ γέγονα ἀνὴρ, κατήργηκα τὰ τοῦ νηπίου. <sup>12</sup> Ὡς βλέ-

‘animated by such a spirit as is disposed to hope, and, as far as plain facts will permit, to believe the best’ of others. Such a spirit as, in the words of Seneca, Epist. v. 11, ‘quidquid dubium est, humanitati inclinatur ad melius.’—‘πάντα ὑπομένει, the best comment on this may be found in the words of 2 Tim. ii. 10, πάντα ὑπομένει (endure) διὰ τοῦ ἐκλεκτοῦ, ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ σωτηρίας τύχωσι.

8. To show the paramount pre-eminence of Love above spiritual Gifts, the Apostle, in conclusion, adduces another, and the strongest, ground of superiority (thus showing it to be really the καθ’ ὑπερβολὴν ὁδὸν he had termed it supra xii. 31),—namely, in its sempiternity;—its eternal abiding, when other graces have passed away; it remaining in time, and enduring to eternity.

—οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει] i. e. ‘is never to cease.’ Meaning that, as it is heavenly in its nature, so it is eternal in its duration; and whereas prophecies, tongues, &c., are but for a time, charity is to remain for ever.

—εἴτε δὲ προφητεῖαι, &c.] The εἴτε is mostly interpreted that the sense may be, ‘Whatever portion of these spiritual gifts be possessed by any one.’ But it seems rather to be, ‘Whatever spiritual gifts of this kind there may be;’ meaning, all imaginable ones, and in every conceivable degree.—Καταργηθῇσονται. Render: ‘shall be done away,—namely, by being no longer of any use. Ἰνῶσιs here simply denotes the spiritual gift so called.

9, 10. Here the Apostle states the reason why these and such like spiritual gifts will cease and be done away,—namely, because they will be partly useless, and partly imperfect,—and accordingly will have to be superseded by the perfect knowledge to be enjoyed in heaven.

9. Ἐκ μέρους] It is here meant, that both the endowments and the use of these spiritual gifts are alike imperfect, as compared with that degree of both which is imaginable, or with the complete discoveries of another world.

11. ‘We have here,’ as Hyper. says, ‘a confirmatory probationis à simili;’ ‘for,’ continues he, ‘this truth, that the thing must necessarily be so, the Apostle now illustrates by two similitudes derived from common life; one taken from the state of boyhood as compared to manhood, the other from the view of objects through an obscure medium, as compared with one through a pellucid one.’

—ὡς νήπ. ἴφρ.] i. e. ‘I was affected as a child,’ had the dispositions, feelings, and understanding of a child.—Ὡς νήπ. ἔλογ., i. e. ‘I reasoned about things with a childish ignorance’ and misapprehension.

—κατήργηκα τὰ τοῦ νηπίου] ‘I dismissed, disannulled, did away with the things, trifles, toys of the boy.’ So Hom. Od. i. 236, where Mentor says to Telemachus, οὐδὲ τί σε χεῖρ Νηπιάας ὀχέειν (to take up with childish play), ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἐστὶ τηλικού (i. e. νήπιος) ἴσος. See also Philostr. Vit. Ap. i. 17, p. 22, and Horat. Carm. iv. 10, 7. The application (left to be supplied) is,—‘Such will be the attainments in knowledge of the heavenly state, as compared with that imparted by the most exalted spiritual gifts.’

12. Here we have the application of the above similitude.—βλέπομεν γὰρ ὅτι δι’ ἰσότρον ἐν αἰνίγματι. Some obscurity has here been occasioned by an intermingling of the natural with the metaphorical sense, and of the thing itself together with that with which it is compared. Thus βλέπομεν, while properly belonging to the latter, is used for γινώσκουμεν; and ἐν αἰνίγματι, which properly belongs to the former, and for which one would have expected ἀνδρώων, is used of the latter. ‘Ἐν αἰνίγμ., denotes, as Hesych. explains, ἐν παρακαυσίᾳ, ‘by guess,’ as in attempting to solve a riddle. By ἰσότρον is to be understood some of those transparent substances, like the lapis specularis, which the ancients, in the then imperfect state of the arts, used in their windows for glass; such as thin plates of horn, transparent stone, and such like. These are called by Strabo διστῆραι; and from Pliny we learn that some were clear as crystal; a circumstance confirmed by a passage of Philo Jud., p. 1052, D, τοῖς ὑάλε λιανὴ διαφανέσι παρακλυσίωσι. It is true, that no other example has been found of this use of ἰσότρον for διστῆρον (so Hesych. explains the term διαθρον by διστῆρον, διαφανέσι, the only instance that can be adduced of the Adjective, from which came the Subst. διστῆρον); and this may, perhaps, be numbered among the peculiar idioms occurring in St. Paul’s writings. Yet κάτοτρον is so used in Philo, de Decal., p. 198, 34, in a similar sentiment: ὅτι γὰρ διὰ κάτοτρον φαντασιόονται τὸ νοῦν Θεὸν δρῶντα καὶ κοσμοποιούντα. Through these substances they saw, indeed, the object, but somewhat obscurely, and not, as through glass, with perfect clearness. A similar comparison occurs in a Rabbinical writer, Jebamoth, fol. 49, 2, ‘Omnes prophete videntur per speculum non lucidum: Moses magister noster vidit per speculum lucidum.’—πρόσωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον. An expression occurring in Judges vi. 22, to signify what is seen on the closest inspection. ‘Ἐργινώσομαι,’ ‘I shall thoroughly know.’ Καθὼς καὶ ἔπαυσα, ‘even as I am (lit. have been) known by God’ (importing, thoroughly and comπομεν γὰρ ἄρτι δι' ἐσώπτρου ἐν αἰνίγματι, τότε δὲ πρόσωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον ἄρτι γινώσκω ἐκ μέρους, τότε δὲ ἐπιγινώσκωμαι καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγινώσθην. <sup>13</sup> Νυνὶ δὲ μένει πίστις, ἐλπίς, ἀγάπη, τὰ τρία ταῦτα· μέζων δὲ τούτων ἡ ἀγάπη.

XIV. <sup>1</sup> Διώκετε τὴν ἀγάπην· ζηλοῦτε δὲ τὰ πνευματικά, <sup>a</sup> ch. 12. 31.
μᾶλλον δὲ ἵνα προφητεύητε. <sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Ὁ γὰρ λαλῶν γλώσση, οὐκ <sup>b</sup> Acts 2. 4.
<sup>c</sup> 10. 46.

pletely); even that God 'who spieth out all our ways; nor is there a thought in our hearts but he knoweth it altogether.'

13. νυνὶ δέ 'But as things now are,' as the case now stands for the present. On which sense of the expression (found at 1 Cor. xv. 20, and Eph. ii. 13) see my notes on Thucyd. i. 122. iii. 43. iv. 126. The δέ is resumptive; vv. 8—12 being in some measure parenthetical, and merely illustrative of what is said in the first. The Apostle here resumes the subject before treated of, i. e. the superiority of Charity,—the ground of which superiority, though not expressed, is hinted at in the words νυνὶ μένει,—meaning, that the πίστις and ἐλπίς only remain in use now, in the present state only (for ἄρτι); but the ἀγάπη will be exercised in another world, and to all eternity,—when faith will be superseded by sight, and hope swallowed up in fruition. As the Apostle has before mentioned three gifts as a specimen of a particular class which were to cease, so he here specifies three which are to be permanent in the Church. Yet there is a peculiarity, by the emphasis in the expression 'these three': with which I would comp. Thucyd. vi. 73, 'Ἑρμ., καὶ Ἡρακλ., καὶ Συμμ., τοῦτους τρεῖς. Aristoph. Nub. 425, 'Ἄλλ' ὅτι δὴν' οὐν νομίζεις πῶς θεὸν οὐδὲνα πλὴν ἄπερ ἡμῖς, τὸ Χάος τοῦτι, καὶ τὰς Νεφίλας, καὶ τὴν γλῶτταν, τρία ταῦτα; Of course 'these three' point at the peculiar spiritual graces, in place of the spiritual gifts, to be withdrawn when no longer needful to the Church.

— μεῖζων δὲ τούτων ἡ ἀγάπη 'not meaning' (observes Bp. Bull, Harm. Apost. p. 11), 'that the superiority is due to love only on account of its enduring to another life, but also because in this present life it is, as the Apostle admits at ver. 2, far more useful and excellent;' accordingly, on this ground it is pronounced greater than either of the two others. Thus it is finely characterized by our great epic Poet (Par. Lost xii. 586), 'as the soul of all the rest.' Justly is it placed by the Apostle paramount, both for duration, since (to use the words of Whitty) 'it continues when faith shall end in vision (2 Cor. v. 7), and hope in fruition (Rom. viii. 23 seqq.), and for perfection, as rendering us more like unto God and most beneficial to man.' Comp. Matt. v. 45. Gal. v. 6. James ii. 14—17. Besides, as Calv. observes, 'Faith and hope benefit the believer himself; charity diffuses itself to others. Faith and hope savour of imperfection; charity will remain even in a state of perfection.'

XIV. 1. 'This and the two preceding Chapters are more than any other parts of the New Test. useful for showing the reality, and for making us acquainted with the nature, of that most astonishing proof of the Divine original of the Gospel, which was set before the world in the supernatural gifts wherewith multitudes of the first Christians were endowed. For from the account, accidentally given in these chapters, of these gifts, and of the persons who possessed them, of the manner of their communication and operation, and of the uses for which they were intended, we understand that they all proceeded from the Spirit of God, and were most astonishing in their operation; that in every Church great numbers of persons possessed these gifts, having received them either by an immediate illapae of the Holy Ghost, or by the imposition of the Apostles' hands; that the spiritual men exercised these gifts openly before all the world, for the confirmation of the Gospel; and that the heathens who came into the Christian assemblies (see ver. 24) had thereby an opportunity to know, and to report to others, that God was really among them. And, although the irregularities which the Corinthians were guilty of in the exercise of their spiritual gifts occasioned at first abundance of trouble to the Apostle, these irregularities are not now to be regretted. By the direction of God they have been the occasion of our receiving certain and full information concerning the existence of the spiritual gifts, the primitive glory of our religion, and concerning the way in which they were exercised by the Apostles, and other spiritual men, for the overturning of heathen idolatry, the establishment of the Gospel throughout the world, and the edification of the Church itself.' Mackn. In this Chapter is brought forward the comparative excellence of tongues and of prophecy (vv. 1—26); and then are subjoined (vv. 26—40) directions for the proper use of each of these gifts.

— διώκετε τὴν ἀγάπην q. d. 'Studiously endeavour to acquire this love.' The metaphor is one derived from the eager pursuit of battle, or the chase.—ζηλοῦτε δέ, &c., 'but [at the same time] be earnestly desirous of spiritual gifts.' The Imperative has here, as often, a preceptive force.—μᾶλλον δὲ ἵνα προφ., 'rather, however, that ye may have that of prophecy;' see note on xii. 10, 28.

2. From what follows, a case is contemplated, which would doubtless often occur,—that the language so spoken was unknown to the congregation, the gift being exercised only as an evidence of the Divine origin of the Christian religion; in which case the Apostle directs that there should be an interpreter.—οὐκ ἄνθρω. λαλεῖ, i. e. 'he, as it were, addresses not men.' It is as if he addressed them not; for, as the Apostle adds, 'no one (nemo fere, next to none, see Pers. Sat. i. 1) understands him.'—ἀλλὰ τῷ Θεῷ, 'but to God [only].'
—πνεύματι δὲ λαλεῖ μυστ., on the exact sense here some difference of opinion exists. The ancient Expositors generally, and almost all the modern ones, suppose it

c Acts 13. 18.
Rom. 12. 8.

d Eph. 1. 17.
Phil. 3. 18.
e ch. 12. 8.
f 13. 8, 9.
Rom. 16. 14.
g Cor. 11. 6.
h Eph. 3. 4.
i 1 Pet. 1. 5.
k 2. 15.

ἀνθρώποις λαλεῖ, ἀλλὰ τῷ Θεῷ οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀκούει, πνεύματι δὲ λαλεῖ μυστήρια· <sup>3</sup> ὁ δὲ προφητεύων ἀνθρώποις λαλεῖ οἰκοδομὴν καὶ παράκλησιν καὶ παραμυθίαν. <sup>4</sup> Ὁ λαλὼν γλώσση ἑαυτὸν οἰκοδομεῖ· ὁ δὲ προφητεύων ἐκκλησίαν οἰκοδομεῖ. <sup>5</sup> Θέλω δὲ πάντας ὑμᾶς λαλεῖν γλώσσαις, μᾶλλον δὲ ἵνα προφητεύητε μεῖζων γὰρ ὁ προφητεύων ἢ ὁ λαλὼν γλώσσαις, ἐκτὸς εἰ μὴ διερμηνεύῃ, ἵνα ἡ ἐκκλησία οἰκοδομῇ λάβῃ. <sup>6</sup> Ἡ Νυνὶ δέ, ἀδελφοί, ἐὰν ἔλθω πρὸς ὑμᾶς γλώσσαις λαλῶν, τί ὑμᾶς ὠφελήσω, ἐὰν μὴ ὑμῖν λαλήσω ἢ ἐν ἀποκαλύψει, ἢ ἐν ὁ γνῶσει, ἢ ἐν προφητείᾳ, ἢ ἐν διδαχῇ; <sup>7</sup> Ὅμως τὰ ἄψυχα φωνὴν δίδοντα, εἶτε αὐλὸς put for ἐν πνεύματι, and to mean, 'although, by the impulse of the Holy Spirit, he speaketh mysteries.' But thus πν. will not yield a sufficiently suitable sense; and the interpretation is forbidden by the doctrine of the Greek Article. It is, therefore, better (with Estius, Hyperius, Vorstius, Abp. Newcome, Bps. Middleton and Pearce, and Dr. Henderson) to take it in the sense mind, 'in his mind'; rendering, with Casaubon, 'Quippe cum nemo intelligat; sed animo loquitur arcana'; for, as observes Casaubon, it being the purpose of speech, 'ut animi sensum declararet aliis; qui ita loquitur ut alii non intelligant, is animo magis quam ore loquitur.'

3. Most of the older Expositors, following the Vulg., regard οἰκοδομῇ, παράκλησιν, and παραμυθίαν, as dependent upon eis understood. This, however, is too arbitrary, and makes the sense not so direct. Hence it is better, with the Syriac Ver., and most of the recent Expositors, to regard the words as governed of λαλεῖ (of which use see examples from Ælian and Æschines in Schleusner's Lex.); the meaning being, 'speaketh what may fill their minds with edification, exhortation, and consolation.' At ver. 4 Grot. and Olsh. observe, that οἰκοδομῇ is the general term, and παράκλησιν and παραμυθίαν constitute its parts. It would rather seem that οἰκοδομεῖ refers to the principal purpose of the προφήτης, which was to speak (as Calv. says) that whereby men might be instructed in piety and faith, in the worship and fear of God, and in the duties of holiness and righteousness. The next terms refer to certain other important purposes of the προφήτης,—which were, to rouse the sluggish, caution the unwary, and comfort the faint-hearted and timorous. So also at 2 Tim. iii. 16, the Apostle, after stating the general purpose of Scripture to be πρὸς διδασκαλίαν, subjoins the particular ones in the words, πρὸς ἔλεγχον, and πρὸς ἐκπαίδευσιν.

4. ἑαυτὸν scil. μόνον, i. e. by the confirmation of his faith; for to speak thus must to himself be an undeniable proof of his being divinely inspired.

5. Θέλω δέ Render: 'vellem autem,' 'I could wish you.'—ἐκτός εἰ μὴ is thought to be a pleonastic form; but, perhaps, it is meant to be more strongly exceptive than εἰ μὴ preceding.—εἰ μὴ διερμηνεύῃ, sub. τις, i. e. 'if there be no interpreter at hand.' Thus it will not be, as Mackn. supposes, at variance with ver. 28. Besides, this is required by the spirit at least of v. 13.

6. By way of illustrating the subject, the Apostle puts the case, that if ἄς, for instance (meaning, per κοινωνίαν, any one of the persons who possessed the above-mentioned χαρίσματα), should visit them, and should merely display the gift of tongues, what would his visit benefit them? Not at all; 'unless,' he adds, 'I should address you ἢ ἐν ἀποκαλύψει—ἐν διδαχῇ,' which words have given rise to not a little discussion. Now in all these forms of expression, the ἐν is by Heydenr. supposed to denote the object of the speaking in question. But it may rather be said to mark the manner;—though, indeed, the two senses merge into each other; q. d. 'in the exercise of,' 'so as to exercise.' It is, however, of more consequence to advert to the meaning of the terms ἀποκαλύψει, γνώσει, προφητεία, and διδαχῇ, on which Expositors are much divided in opinion. Some take them all for Accusatives with eis, in the sense 'so as to explain and make known to you my meaning, either in the way of prophecy, or teaching in general.' a mode of interpretation harsh and inadmissible. The general sense seems plainly this;—that the use of the gift of tongues would be unprofitable, unless it were accompanied with some other gift, which might contribute, in some way or other (see ver. 3), to the edification of the hearers. That the Apostle has reference to the Spiritual gifts above described, is with reason supposed by the best Commentators. But what those are it is not so easy to determine. It would seem most obvious to refer the προφητεία to the προφήταις supra xii. 28, 29. But they undoubtedly correspond to the possessors of the λόγος γνώσεως; and since (as Dr. Henderson observes) the Apostle has distinguished it from doctrina on the one hand, and from revelation on the other, it is plain that he intended it to be taken in the highest sense of the term; namely, of predicting future events; the very sense in which it is used supra xii. 10, where see note. In short, I am inclined to think with Neand., Billr., and Olsh., that the four particulars here specified are to be resolved into two parallel members, the latter part being exegetical of the former. Thus we may render: 'Unless I address you, either in the way of revelation or of knowledge, either by prophecy or by teaching.'

7. Here we have illustrated by example the inutility of discourse delivered in a foreign language without any interpretation. (Heydenr.)—ὅμως, for ὁμοίως (as in Gal. iii. 15).—φωνὴν δίδοντα, &c. This passage contains several musical allusions which I have explained in my Eccles. Syn. More of such musical terms, or at εἴτε κιθάρα, ἐὰν διαστολὴν τοῖς φθόγγοις μὴ δῶ, πῶς γνωσθή-σεται τὸ αὐλούμενον ἢ τὸ κιθαριζόμενον; <sup>8</sup> καὶ γὰρ ἐὰν ἄηλον φωνὴν σάλπιγγε δῶ, τίς παρασκευάσεται εἰς πόλεμον; <sup>9</sup> Οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς γλώσσης ἐὰν μὴ εἴσημον λόγον δώτε, πῶς γνωσθήσεται τὸ λαλούμενον; ἔσσεσθε γὰρ εἰς ἄερα λαλοῦντες.

<sup>10</sup> Τοσαῦτα, εἰ τύχοι, γένη φωνῶν ἐστὶν ἐν κόσμῳ, καὶ οὐδὲν αὐτῶν ἄφωνον. <sup>11</sup> Ἐὰν οὖν μὴ εἰδῶ τὴν δύναμιν τῆς φωνῆς, ἔσομαι τῷ λαλοῦντι βάρβαρος· καὶ ὁ λαλῶν, ἐν ἐμοὶ βάρβαρος.
<sup>12</sup> Οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς, ἐπεὶ ζηλωταὶ ἐστε πνευμάτων, πρὸς τὴν

least metaphors, and some very similar ones, are found in Plutarch de Vitio. Pud. xv.—φωνή is for ἤχη, or phōggon, and is a term applicable both to wind and to stringed instruments.—ἐὰν διαστολὴν τοῖς φθόγγοις μὴ δῶ, 'unless they give a distinction in, or 'to the sounds.' It would seem that the Apostle is not (as many suppose) speaking of the intimation necessary to the distinction of one tone from another; for that would be little pertinent to his argument, which does not respect one who can speak no language, but one who uses a language that is not understood by his hearers. Yet neither can I agree with others, that he is speaking of the law of harmony and melody: for that will as little suit the argument. In fact, as Calv. says, 'non est subtilius disputandum; quia Paulus id tantum sumpsit, quod vulgo percipitur.' Yet he must certainly have adverted to something which strikes the senses of the vulgar; and that, I am inclined to think, is the peculiar characteristic of any tune,—which the ancients denoted by the term melos, using it, in some measure, as we do key. This is confirmed by the expression just after, ἄηλον φωνήν; for without attending to the distinction of tones, the performer surely could not be said to perform on the instrument at all. There would indeed seem to be an allusion to those various and strongly marked characteristics, which among the ancients distinguished different kinds of music, as sacred, domestic, dramatic, or military; inasmuch that any person with a tolerable ear could tell to what class to refer any composition which he heard: whereas, if those characteristics were not observed in the air, he would not know what the tune was meant to be; i. e. to which of the above classes to refer it; which is, I apprehend, what the Apostle means, as is plain from the words following, which contain another illustration of the same kind, but more perspicuous, and meant to explain the preceding.

<sup>8</sup> καὶ γὰρ ἐὰν ἄη, &c.] The Apostle here adverts to a use of musical tunes, in which their distinction was especially necessary, viz. for military purposes. See Thucyd. v. 69, 2, and my note there. Now the military wind instruments of the ancients were not used merely for the purpose of directing the steps in marching, but also for the purpose of signifying to the soldiers, as it were by signals, what they were to do,—whether to advance or retreat, take up arms, or go to quarters; in fact, they performed all that is now done by our trumpets, or bugles.—ἐὰν ἄηλον φωνὴν σάλπ. ἄη, q. d. 'if the trumpetor sound his instrument without proper attention to this distinction of tunes, and thereby make the signals in question indistinct, not distinguishing between that which sounds to arms, and that which signifies a retreat, or other military evolution, no one will know what to do.' So Polyb. xxx., οἱ μὲν αὐληταὶ φυσῶντες ἀδιάφωνα, and Livy, lib. xxv. 10, 'Tuba incensiter inflata, quis aut quibus signum daret, incertum efficiebat.'

<sup>9</sup> The Apostle now passes from the example to the case in point. (Stenerson.)—διὰ τῆς γλώσσης, 'by the tongue,' meaning the organ of speech, as opposed to the musical instrument just spoken of. Εἰς ἄερα λαλεῖν is a proverbial expression, to denote speaking in vain, like the phrase cautis verba profundere in Latin, and a similar one in our own language.

<sup>10</sup> Here we have another illustration by example of the inutility of discourse in a foreign language, in which we must attend to the elliptical and idiomatical cast of the words. The true ellipsis here is, not ὅσα ἀνδρῶν, which would lead to a wrong sense, but ὅσα ἐν θίλοισι; and at εἰ τύχοι must be repeated τοσαῦτα. The formula εἰ τύχοι means literally, 'if it should chance [so to be]'; but, in use, it often merely denotes, by implication, 'for example,' as here and in Philo-Jud., p. 1067, μουσικὸν γὰρ, εἰ τύχοι, καὶ γραμματικόν, &c. The sense may be thus expressed: 'There are, for example, as many kinds of tongues in the world as ye choose (to suppose), if so many there should be.'—καὶ οὐδὲν αὐτῶν ἄφωνον, 'and not one of them formed of inarticulate sounds, but adapted to be significant to the persons who use it.'

<sup>11</sup> ἐὰν οὖν μὴ εἰδῶ, &c.] Render: 'Now, unless I know the meaning of the language [which may be addressed to me], ἔσομαι τῷ λαλοῦντι βάρβ., &c., I shall be, with respect to the speaker of it, a foreigner; and the speaker will be, with respect to me, a foreigner; q. d. 'we shall be mutually ignorant of each other's meaning.' On this sense of βάρβαρος to signify one who speaks in a language the hearer understands not, see note on Acts xxviii. 2, and Rom. i. 14, and my note on Thucyd. iii. 68.—ἐν ἑβρ. for Class. ἑβρ.: so, in a kindred passage of Diog. Laert. Anacharsis says of the Greeks, ἡμοὶ δὲ πάντες 'Ἕλληνες ἐκὐθίζουσι: and Ovid, Trist. v. 10, 'Barbarus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor ulli.'

<sup>12</sup> οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς] There is here an application of the analogy. This must be taken, not with the preceding, but with the following words, and construed with ζητεῖτε. The full force of οὕτω will appear by supplying the ellipsis, as f ch. 13. 10.

20.
Mark 11. 34.

g Eph. 5. 19.
Col. 3. 16.
Ps. 47. 7.

οικοδομὴν τῆς ἐκκλησίας ζητεῖτε ἵνα περισσεύητε. <sup>13</sup> Διόπερ ὁ λαλῶν γλώσση προσευχέσθω ἵνα διερμηνεύη. <sup>14</sup> ἔὰν γὰρ προσεύχωμαι γλώσση, τὸ πνεῦμά μου προσεύχεται, ὁ δὲ νοῦς μου ἄκαρπός ἐστι. <sup>15</sup> Τί οὖν ἐστὶ; Προσεύχομαι τῷ Πνεύματι, προσεύχομαι δὲ καὶ τῷ νοῦ ψαλῶ τῷ Πνεύματι, ψαλῶ δὲ καὶ follows: 'Thus also (to apply this to your case), since you are anxious for, &c., strive,' &c. Ζηλωταὶ ἐστὶ is used for ζηλοῦντα at xii. 31, and xiv. 1. Πνευμάτων is for πνευματικῶν (scil. χαρισμάτων), abstract for concrete, which occurs at ch. xiv. 1. In the next words there is a transposition (for ζητᾷτε ἵνα περισσεύητε πρὸς τὴν οἰκοδομὴν τῆς ἐκκλησίας), the reason for which seems to have been, that as οἰκοδομὴ was the principal thing meant to be enforced, so it is put first.

13. There is here an anticipation of an objection; q. d. 'Of what use, then, will be the gift, and why should that be suppressed, which will be to the glory of God?' The remedy for the evil is suggested in the words following.

— προσευχέσθω ἵνα διερμ. ] Many of the best modern Commentators explain, 'Let him [so] pray, as that he may, or in such a manner that he may (by the words used in his prayer, or by explaining it in a known language), interpret and impart to others what the affluus has imparted to him, and not, out of vain ostentation, utter it in a tongue unknown.' But that sense cannot be extracted from the words without much violence. The most simple, and, it would seem, the true interpretation, however open to some objection, made the most of by Mr. Alf., is that of the ancient, and some modern Expositors, as Calv., Hyper., Erasim., Beza, Grot., Est., Wets.; and, of recent ones, Olsh. and Ruckert, who assign the following sense: 'Let him pray that he may be enabled to so interpret [what he speaks].' See ch. xii. 10, and notes. The words following contain a reason for the above. It was indeed the interpretation of almost all the ancient, and early modern Commentators, until it had been abandoned, though on no sufficient grounds, and another devised by Vorst., Piac., Whitby, Wolf, Bp. Pearce, and others to the time of Rosenm. and Krause. But that, as I have shown, is untenable. No Commentator has expressed the true sense better than Est.; but, as very often, by the aid of Hyper. and Calv.

14. Here the Apostle urges them to aim at higher gifts than speaking with tongues, by pointing out the inefficiency of that gift to general edification. The Pronoun I denotes, per μετασχηματισμόν, any person having the gift of tongues. Hence it is plain that τὸ πνεῦμά μου cannot mean the Holy Spirit, as many Commentators suppose, nor, as others explain, 'my spiritual gift.' The true interpretation is doubtless that of the ancients and most moderns for the last century, 'my mind.' So πνεῦμα is used at Rom. i. 9. 2 Tim. iv. 22, supra v. 3, and νοῦς at ver. 19. Render: 'If I pray in a foreign language (without interpreting my words), my internal spirit prayeth, but my mind (i. e. the meaning of my words) is without fruit, or benefit, to the glory of God, or the good of my hearers; as imparting no grace to them.' See Eph. iv. 29. Comp. Plut. Philop., λαλῶν ἄκαρπος.

Plato, 277, λόγοι δ. Plut. t. vi. 138, ἄκαρπος πρὸς ἀρετήν.

15. τί οὖν ἐστὶ; ] Dr. Peile regards this as a Latinism, founded on quid istuc? to express tardy assent and half reluctant acquiescence. But Latinisms are of rare occurrence in the writings of St. Paul. And the sense which Dr. Peile assigns of quid istuc will suit neither here nor at ver. 26, nor at Acts xxi. 22, without great straining. Accordingly, I would regard it as Hebraistic Greek, for the Classical τί οὖν; without ἐστὶ, quid igitur? which, like our Engl. 'What then?' is formed on the short-cut expression of common life. The answer to the question is made (agreeably to the μετασχηματισμός) in the first person. The exact sense, however, is disputed. Some ancient, and almost all the early modern Expositors, suppose it to be this: 'The best to be done is, to ask of God to be endued with the faculty of divinely-inspired prayer in a foreign language; not with the spirit and soul alone, and to our own edification only, but τῷ νοῦ, with meaning, so as to be understood by others also,' i. e. that we may have, too, the gift of interpretation, as well as tongues; a sense of νοῦ, it is said, required by the context. See ver. 19. But how that word or προσεύξ. can be supposed to contain any such sense as that ascribed to it, however agreeable to the context, I see not. For my own part, I would render as follows: 'What, then, is to be done? I must pray in the Spirit, but I will likewise pray unto the understanding [of what is said];' προσεύξομαι being for προσεύξομαι, which is, indeed, found in several ancient MSS., but is evidently a gloss. Τῷ νοῦ is, as the best Commentators are agreed, a dativus commodi for εἰς τὸ νοεῖσθαι, 'so as to be understood,'—namely, by others. Thus νοῦ will stand for νοῦσαι. Of this use of a voc. intelligentia, in a transitive sense, i. e. as used of what others may understand, examples occur Nehem. viii. 9. 1 Chron. xxv. 7, 8. The means of being so understood by others would be by either himself expressing in a known tongue what he had said in an unknown, or having some one to interpret. Τῷ Πνεύματι may be for ἐν τῷ Πνεύματι, as Jude v. 20, ἐν Πνεύματι ἀγίῳ προσευχόμενοι. If, however, it be thought that the antithesis requires the Dative to have the same force in both places, we may take Πνεύματι as standing, by a common idiom, for εἰς τὸ Πνεῦμα, 'conformably to the motions of the Spirit;' which, it must be remembered, the person could suppress, or resist, at his pleasure; as is plain from ver. 32, πνεύματα προφητῶν προφῆταις ὑποτάσσεται.

— ψαλῶ ] The word may here, as in a kindred passage of James v. 13, be understood not necessarily of a hymn actually sung, but of an extemporaneous composition (perhaps half prose and half poetry) recited. This at least would seem to be the case from the passage of James, where see note. See also Col. iii. 16.

τῷ νοῒ. <sup>16</sup> Ἐπεὶ, ἐὰν εὐλογήσῃς τῷ Πνεύματι, ὁ ἀναπληρῶν τὸν τόπον τοῦ ἰδιώτου πῶς ἐρεῖ τὸ ἀμὴν ἐπὶ τῇ σῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ, ἐπειδὴ τί λέγεις οὐκ οἶδε; <sup>17</sup> σὺ μὲν γὰρ καλῶς εὐχαριστεῖς, ἀλλ' ὁ ἕτερος οὐκ οἰκοδομεῖται. <sup>18</sup> Εὐχαριστῶ τῷ Θεῷ [μου], πάντων ὑμῶν μᾶλλον γλώσσαις λαλῶν <sup>19</sup> ἀλλ' ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ θέλω πέντε λόγους διὰ τοῦ νοός μου λαλῆσαι, ἵνα καὶ ἄλλους κατ-ηχήσω, ἢ μυρίους λόγους ἐν γλώσσῃ. <sup>20</sup> Ἄδελφοί, μὴ παιδία γίνεσθε ταῖς φρεσίν ἀλλὰ τῇ κακίᾳ νηπιάζετε, ταῖς δὲ φρεσὶ τέλει γίνεσθε. <sup>21</sup> Ἐν τῷ νόμῳ γέγραπται· Ὅτι ἐν ἑτερο-h ch. 11. 24.

 & 16. 24.
 Matt. 6. 13.
 & 28. 30.
 Mark 10. 30.
 John 21. 25.
 Rev. 5. 14.
 & 22. 30.

1 Ps. 131. 2.
 Matt. 11. 35.
 & 13. 5.
 & 19. 14.
 Eph. 4. 14.
 Heb. 5. 13.
 1 Pet. 2. 2.
 John 10. 24.
 Deut. 25. 46.
 Lev. 23. 11.
 12.

16. The Apostle now confirms what he has been saying by an example. (Hyper.)

— ἰππὶ, ἐάν, &c. ] Ἐπεὶ here [as also at Rom. iii. 6. xi. 6. 1 Cor. v. 10. vii. 14. xv. 29. Heb. ix. 26. x. 2], and sometimes in the Classical writers, signifies 'since [in that case],' meaning that other case, and so may be rendered 'otherwise.' Ἐάν εὐλογῇς, 'if thou shalt have given God thanks.' τῷ Πνεύματι, 'in the Spirit,' as at ver. 15. τὸ ἀμὴν, 'the (usual) Amen.'

— τοῦ ἰδιώτου ] Here ἰδιώτης may denote a private person, as opposed to one holding any office in the Church. See note on Acts iv. 13; but the context seems to require the sense, 'an ordinary, undistinguished person, one not endued either with the gift of tongues, or (what was a gift distinct from that of tongues) the interpretation of tongues:' the Article here serving to denote the genus, or class of persons so circumstanced; and such is its force in a passage of Posidipp. ap. Athen. p. 376, ὁ μάγειρος ἐάν—πρὸς τὸν ἰδιώτην εἰσῆι. Something peculiar is there in the use of ὁ ἀναπληρ. τὸν τόπον τοῦ ἰδ., where the simple expression ὁ ἰδιώτης, to denote one of the class, might, it would seem, have sufficed; inasmuch that Est. asks: "Quis ita loquitur, ut, regem ipsum significare volens, dicat, is qui supplet locum regis?" But this is stumbling at the idiomatical use of ὁ τόπος, which, similarly to the Latin locus, is used to denote 'condition,' or 'station.' And to the question of Est. it were sufficient to reply: "Tacitus does so, since in his Annal. i. iv. 38, he writes: 'Si locus principum impleam.' And so χώρα is used by the later Greek writers, e.g. Liban. Epist. 239, βιούν ἐν ἰδιώτῳ χώρᾳ." Thus the general sense of the phrase ἀναπλ. τ. τόπ. is, 'to sustain the character of;' usually with the adjunct notion of being really such. On the force of ἀμὴν see my Lex. Εὐχαριστία is equiv. to εὐλογία, both being general terms to denote 'prayer and praise;' and so εὐχαριστεῖς, a little after, is for εὐλογεῖς, though the two terms are properly distinct. See Note on Matt. xiv. 19. Yet it is agreeable to the Jewish idiom, by which doxologies and public prayers to God were styled ἱμῶς.

17. σὺ μὲν γὰρ—οἰκοδομεῖται ] The Apostle means simply to argue, that, as the ἰδιώτης has nothing of the sense of what has been said, he can have learned nothing, nor consequently can be benefited. By the use of καλῶς the Apostle means to show that it is not his intent to depreciate the gift, but only to evince its inferior utility.

18. εὐχαριστῶ λαλῶν ] lit. 'I thank God for speaking,' &c. Μᾶλλον may be understood either of multitude (viz. of tongues), or frequency in their use. But the latter is the more suitable sense, and more agreeable to the usus linguae.—εὐχαριστῶ, &c. This is introduced (like καθὼς just before) to show that he does not depreciate the gift, because he possesses it not. The μου, not found in several ancient MSS. and Versions, and some Fathers, is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz., Lach., Tisch., and Alf. The same phrase, indeed, occurs at Phil. i. 3, and Philem. 4; but it may have been brought in from thence.

19. In πέντε λ. there is an idiom, common to all languages, by which a small certain number is put for a very few. And the same, paucis numerandis, may be said of μυρίους. Διὰ τοῦ ν. μου (or, as is read in many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, τῷ νοῦ μου) is by the best Commentators shown to mean 'ex mentis meae sensu.' See Note supra v. 15. The next words are exegetical of the preceding.

20. After pointing out the true nature and comparative value of the gift of tongues, the Apostle endeavours to repress in them a too great anxiety for its possession,—by showing that to wish for it without regard to the advantage thence resulting, were puerile. And then, using a delicate turn, suggested by the word παιδίων, he adds the impressive admonition, ἀλλὰ τῇ κακίᾳ νηπ., of which the sense is, 'but as respects vice, be even infantile,' or, 'as ignorant as children.' So the Greek proverb, Διαφέρει τοῦ νηπίου καθ' ἡλικίαν οὐδὲν ὁ ἐν ταῖς φρεσὶ νηπιάζων. Comp. Matth. x. 16.

— ταῖς δὲ φρεσὶ τέλ. γίνεσθε ] 'but as to prudence and judgment in approving those things which are excellent, be grown-up persons, by attaining to something of the maturity of your Christian profession.' On this sense of τέλειος, occurring in Eph. iv. 13, and Heb. v. 14, and elsewhere in the best writers, see my Lex.

21. Another argument is now adduced to prove that the gift of tongues ought not to be so magnified, as to be preferred to all others; namely, that in Holy Writ itself we find God, not in kindness promising, but in threatening words declaring, that he would speak unto them in tongues which they should not understand—not to benefit them, but to punish them for their unbelief and disobedience. (Heydenr.) The argument may be thus expressed: 'Since God threatened this as a curse, do not voluntarily bring it upon the Church, merely to make a show of your gifts.'

— ἐν ἱερογλώσσοις ] 'This, while it seems primarily to have related to the languages of those foreign nations by whom God intended to γλώσσοις, καὶ ἐν χεῖλεσιν ἑτέροις, λαλήσω τῷ λαῷ τούτῳ, καὶ οὐδ' οὕτως εἰσακούσονται μου, λέγει Κύριος.

22 Ὡστε αἱ γλώσσαι εἰς σημεῖον εἰσὶν οὐ τοῖς πιστεύουσιν, ἀλλὰ τοῖς ἀπίστοις· ἡ δὲ προφητεία οὐ τοῖς ἀπίστοις, ἀλλὰ τοῖς πιστεύουσιν. 23 Ἐὰν οὖν συνέλθῃ ἡ ἐκκλησία ὅλη ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, καὶ πάντες γλώσσας λαλῶσιν, εἰσέλθωσι δὲ ἰδιῶται ἢ ἄπιστοι, οὐκ ἐροῦσιν ὅτι μαίνεσθε; 24 Ἐὰν δὲ πάντες προφητεύωσιν, εἰσέλθῃ δὲ τις ἄπιστος, ἡ ἰδιώτης, ἐλέγχεται ὑπὸ πάντων, ἀνακρίνεται ὑπὸ πάντων 25 [καὶ οὕτω] τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς

1 Zech. 6. 12.
Isa. 45. 14.

execute vengeance on Israel, might also denote that he would instruct them by persons endued with the gift of tongues, to convince them that those persons taught the true religion.' (Scott.) The words here quoted (taken from Is. xviii. 11, 12) differ considerably from the Sept., but agree in substance with the Hebrew; this being a citation ad sensum, rather than ad litteram, the only material difference being in the substitution of the first person for the third, to make the sense more pointed; except that the words καὶ οὐδ' οὕτως εἰσακ. μου are neither in the Hebr. nor the Sept. Hoffm. suggests that they were taken from the words צוֹמֵן מִמֶּנּוּ of Ps. xii. he says, but the reference is wrong; for Ps. read Is. in the twelfth verse of the same chapter, where the Sept. has καὶ οὐκ ἠθάλησαν ἀκούειν: yet the Pauline reading of the Hebr., I learn from Dr. Henderson, is found in one of the anonymous Greek Versions mentioned by Origen, and prob. extant as early as the age of St. Paul. Hoffm. well observes: 'Hæc ergo clausula propriè continet ætiologiam, cur in alia lingua ad illos locuturus sit Deus, quia scilicet Deum blandè ad eos loquentem, eosque de via ad veram animi quietem gratiosè instituentem, audire noluerint. Paulus autem hanc clausulam immediatè connectit cum iis, quæ ex v. 11 citaverat, eamque sic inflectit: et ne sic quidem (scilicet etiam gentibus barbaris in penam eis immissis) exaudiant me. Id quod etiam Pauli tempore eventum jam comprobatum fuit.' Αἰγεία Κύριος are the words of the Apostle, from the Prophet. See John x. 34.

22. In order further to show the inferiority of tongues to interpretation, the Apostle adverts to the chief purpose which such signs as the gift of tongues was meant to serve,—namely, for the conviction of unbelievers, rather than the edification of believers.

—ὥστε αἱ γλώσσαι, &c.] The full sense is: 'Wherefore the tongues [in question] are [meant] to serve for a sign, or mark, [by which it may be known that the Christian doctrine is true.] Yet these are [intended] not [so much] for believers as unbelievers; whereas the προφητεία, though it is not so much a sign to the unbeliever, yet is especially a sign to the believer; namely, as being a sign and a confirmation of their faith, and an increase of their knowledge.'

23. The Apostle further evinces the inferiority of tongues, by showing the misconstruction which the use of the gift might occasion to the heathens; so that, unless employed in conjunction with interpretation, it might tend rather to the injury than the benefit of the Gospel.

The ἴαν οὖν is not conclusio, but transitio, signifying now if, if for example. By πάντες I would not understand, with most Expositors, 'all together, confusè, tumultuariè,' but simply 'all the persons then present who speak in the exercise of a spiritual gift.' 'Ἰδιῶται should not (with some) be taken as supra v. 16 (for that would be unsuitable to what follows), but in the sense 'persons not conversant with the Gospel.' So Hesychius explains ἰδιῶται by ἀπείρων, and Theodor. by ἀμύητοι. See my Note on Thucyd. vi. 72, 3. The Apostle, we may suppose, is here designating such heathen (strangers) as might occasionally attend, or be induced to go once or twice, out of curiosity; and this by a tacit allusion to two sorts of such persons: 1. those who were well inclined to the Gospel, but un instructed in its doctrines; 2. such as were disposed to reject it, and went merely from curiosity, or to catch up something for censure or ridicule. The words following will have no difficulty, whether referred to both, or to either of those classes, as the case may be. The words οὐκ ἐροῦσιν ὅτι μαίνεσθε; 'will they not say you are frantic enthusiasts?' are evidently meant for both. It is well observed by Mr. Conyb. that 'we must not be led, from any apparent analogy, to confound the exercise of the gift of tongues in the primitive Church with modern exhibitions of fanaticism, which bear a superficial resemblance to it. We must remember that such modern pretensions to this gift must, of course, resemble the manifestations of the original gift in the external features, because these very features have been the objects of intentional imitation.'—At ver. 24 we have the plural changed into the singular, in order that what has now been said, should be referred to either of the above sorts of persons respectively. Ἐλέγχεται is meant for the ἀπιστοί, and signifies, 'he is convicted of error in the notions he had entertained of Christianity, and convinced of his sin in opposing God's true religion; his understanding being convinced, and his conscience awakened.'

24. ἀνακρίνεται intended for the ἰδιῶται, meaning, 'is put on his examination' in foro conscientis as a sinner needing salvation. And no wonder; since the word of God is (as it is said Heb. iv. 12) κριτικὸς ἐνθυμήσεως καὶ ἐνοίων καρδίας, ζῶν καὶ ενεργῆς. Dr. Peile, indeed, is of opinion that the exact force of ἐλέγχεται and ἀνακρίνεται is this: 'He finds himself convicted by all, taken to task by all.' But as to his rendering 'convicted,' for the Common Version 'convinced,' I apprehend that the true καρδίας αὐτοῦ φανερά γίνεται· καὶ οὕτω πεσὼν ἐπὶ πρόσωπον, <sup>m ch. 12. 8-10.</sup> προσκυνήσει τῷ Θεῷ, ἀπαγγέλλων ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς ὄντως ἐν ὑμῖν <sup>Rom. 14. 10. 2 Cor. 12. 10. & 12. 10. Eph. 4. 12, 14, 20. 1 Thess. 5. 11.</sup> ἐστι.

26 <sup>m</sup> Τί οὖν ἐστίν, ἀδελφοί; ὅταν συνέρρησθε, ἕκαστος ὑμῶν ἀνακρ. has here, by a signif. pragmatis, the conjoint sense 'convinced' and 'convicted,' meaning, 'self-convicted of error, and convinced of sin;' 'made so to feel that he is a sinner, needing the salvation of a Saviour, as to desire and seek after that salvation.' For a person may be self-convicted by conscience, but not convinced so as to feel that he has been wrong, and seriously to intend to do right. A distinction this evidently in the mind of Dryden, when, in his Ovid, Metam. l. x. he wrote: 'In vain; for Myrrha stood convict of ill: Her reason vanquish'd, but unchang'd her will.'—ὡπὸ πάντων, 'by all the preachers,' each saying something that comes home to his conscience. See Calv.

25. τὰ κρυπτά—γίνεται.] This may mean (as Mr. Scott explains), 'his secret thoughts are divulged, viz. by being, as it were, spoken to (see Heb. iv. 12), his secret objections answered, his secret sins reprov'd, and the real state of his heart made known to him.' The words καὶ οὕτω before τὰ κρυπτά are not found in 6 uncial, and several cursive MSS., and some Versions, and Fathers, and are cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but they were more likely to have been thrown out by fastidious Critics to remove a tautology, than to have been introduced, as they must, through mistake, originating in the words καὶ οὕτω just after. That such a mistake should have crept into nearly all the MSS., is very improbable. Besides, the words have great propriety, as serving to mark the effects or results of the former; self-knowledge being the necessary consequence of close self-examination, carried on under the power of an awakened conscience and the teaching of the Spirit; for although the generality of Expositors understand the τὰ κρυπτά—φανερὰ γίνεται of the κρυπτά being made known to others, yet it would rather seem (as Calvin also considers it) meant of the person himself. On reconsidering the authenticity of the words, καὶ οὕτω, I am ready to acknowledge that they may not be genuine, for external authority, if we consider the antiquity of the copies that exclude them, is rather adverse; yet it is clear, from what I have urged, that internal evidence is in their favour. Dr. Peile retains them, and supplies 'lastly' after the second καὶ οὕτω, thus recognizing the gradation which I have pointed out. He also well refers, for illustration, to Ps. l. 21; and he evidently adopts my view as to the τὰ κρυπτά being, as Calv. pointed out, the secrets of the person himself, who is labouring under a conviction of sin generally, the sinfulness of his whole nature. Calv. ably illustrates what is said of this secret conviction being produced in the κλειστής (the ignorant sinner and almost unbeliever), through the prophesying in the congregation, by adducing the words of Heb. iv. 12. He then remarks: 'Coarguitur, inquam, infidelis, non quod propheta vel tacita opinione vel ore palam iudicium ferat; sed quia audientis conscientia iudicium suum ex doctrina concepit.

Dijudicatur, quia descendit in seipsum, et habito examine sibi innoscit qui ante sua oblitus erat. Atque id est quod subiecit [Apostolus] continuo, occulta cordis ejus manifesta fieri, neque enim significat reliquias pateferi, qualis sit, sed potius conscientiam expurgasse, et sua, quae antea latebant, mala cognoscant.' But if Calvin's view be correct (and who can doubt it?), it affords very strong confirmation to a suspicion, which I have long entertained, that in the passage of the fore-cited Psalm, the Sept. Translator, stumbling at the harsh ellipsis, αὐτὰς, thought the true one to be σε, supplied from the foregoing verb, εἰλόγησεν. 'And does not conscience, when duly roused, set before, and present the sinner himself—all his evil deeds; which, as long as conscience slumbered, or was torpid (deadened by repeated strokes), were hidden in utter forgetfulness even by the perpetrator; but are now, through the self-knowledge imparted by the Spirit stirring up conscience to its work, made fully manifest?' The next words describe the effects of this conviction of sin and true compunction,—namely, humble and hearty prayer to God for forgiveness and acceptance, or furtherance in his grace, together with an open acknowledgment of the truth of the religion which had before been rejected: for such is implied in the words ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς ὄντως ἐν ὑμῖν ἐστι: of which the full sense is, 'that God is really and actually with you [as you aver];' q. d. 'that the God of the Christians is the true God, and consequently Christianity the only true religion.' The Apostle had here doubtless in mind Isa. xlv. 14, 'They shall fall down unto thee (Sept. προσκυνήσουσι), saying, Surely God is in thee.' Comp. Jos. Ant. ix. 4, 4, θανύμασας τὸν προφήτην ὡς τὸ θεῖον οὕτως (I conjecture ὄντως) ἱναργίως παρῆν.

26. Now follows the conclusion,—that the value of these χαρίσματα is not to be measured by the nature of the gift, considered in itself, but by the mode and degree in which the advantage of others, as well as the possessor, is promoted.—τί οὖν ἔστιν, ἀδελφοί; See note, supra, ver. 15, from which it will appear that the words are not well rendered, as they are, by Dr. Peile, 'What good then is there, brethren, in this?'—a sense quite foreign to the purpose, as may be shown from the following able statement of the sense by Est., who, after translating by 'Quid igitur factu opus est?' ably traces the scope of the words thus: "Transit Apostolus hac interrogatione ad instruendos Corinthios, quo modo et ordine donis a Deo acceptis uti debeant in conventu publico, ut et fructus sequatur, et confusio vitetur. Ac primum generaliter praecepit, 'ut omnia faciant ad edificationem.'" The terms expressing these several gifts are to be explained with reference to what the Apostle has before said concerning them.—ψαλμῶν seems to have reference to the ψαλῶν at ver. 15, and probably denotes an extemporaneous and inspired piece of poetry, adapted either for recitation, or to be sung to some melody. Some eminent Expositors take the words ψαλμὸν ἔχει, διδασχὴν ἔχει, γλώσσαν ἔχει, ἀποκάλυψιν ἔχει, ἑρμηνείαν ἔχει—πάντα πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν γινέσθω. 27 Εἴτε γλώσση τις λαλεῖ, κατὰ δύο, ἢ τὸ πλείστον τρεῖς, καὶ ἀνὰ μέρος· καὶ εἰς διερμηνευέτω. 28 Ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμηνευτὴς, συγátw ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ· ἐαυτῷ δὲ λαλεῖτω καὶ τῷ Θεῷ. 29 Ὁ Προφῆται δὲ δύο ἢ τρεῖς λαλεῖτωσαν, καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι διακρινέτωσαν. 30 Ἐὰν δὲ ἄλλῃ ἀποκαλυφθῇ καθημένῳ, ὁ πρῶτος συγátw n ver. 20.

ch. 12. 10.
1 Thess. 5.
10—21.
1 John 4.
1—8.

ψαλμὸν ἔχει interrogatively; but none of the ancient, or early modern Commentators adopt this view. Indeed, the declarative sense is far simpler, and more agreeable to the context: and by thus understanding the words of what is supposed to be the case, we shall, I think, arrive at an exact idea of the Apostle's meaning. And this mode I can confirm from several passages of the purest Greek writers, e.g. Anaxand. Incert. frag. i. 9, 'Ἄλλ' ἔλαβον ἀσχερὰν,—ἄλλ' ἔλαβον ὠραῖαν τις. Alexid. 'Ισοστ. fr. i. 7, τυγχάνει μικρά τις οὐσα. 16, τὰς ὀφρὺς πυρράς ἔχει τις. Timocl. Διονυσ. fr. i. 13—18, ὀφθαλμία τις, ἰσοί Φινιδάει τυφοί· τίθησκέ τῷ παῖδι, ἢ Νιόβῃ κικούφικεν· χωλός τις ἐστί, τὸν φιλοκτάτην ὀρᾷ· γέρωι τις ἀτυχεῖ, κατέμαθεν τὸν Οὐλίᾳ (where in the early editions the first clauses were pointed as interrogative); but by Meinecke they are, on good ground, regarded as declarative. Finally, from the above passage of Anaxander it appears, that ἕκαστος here stands for ἕκαστός τις, 'each one of you,' namely, that possess the gifts. Moreover, ἕκαστος seems meant to suggest that the χαρίσματα would be distributed among different persons, and by no means all centre in one person. Agreeably to the view of the sense above stated, the full meaning intended by the Apostle may be thus expressed: 'What, then, is to be done [to avoid these evils, and promote the good in view? even this]. Each [we will suppose], namely, of the πνευματικοί, hath ready at hand some one gift or other: either he hath a psalm, or he hath, &c. [Well, be it so,] let him show his gift, but so that all be done unto edification. Keep that in view.' By which, as Bp. Sanderson observes (Serm. p. 549), 'we are to understand, especially in the case of brotherly condescension, a yielding somewhat to the infirmities of our brethren, for charity's sake, when we see it expedient so to do for their own, or the common good.'

27. The Apostle now gives some special directions, by which the gift of tongues may be exercised to edification. The τις is used (like the French on) to denote several persons, as in 1 Pet. iv. 11, εἴ τις λαλεῖ. Thus in both passages it is equiv. to εἴτε τις λαλοῦσι γλώσση, and in both we may supply λαλεῖτωσαν from λαλεῖ. Κατὰ δύο ἢ—τρεῖς means 'two or three [only] at each time of meeting.'

28. ἂν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμ. 'but if there be no one [present] who has the gift of interpretation' (i. e. neither another nor himself); συγátw, scil. ὁ λαλῶν βουλούμενος. By ἐαυτῷ δὲ λαλεῖτω is meant, as Chrys. explains, λαλ. κατὰ δαίμονα, ἢ ἥριμα καὶ ἀφροσύνη; so implying, 'for his own edification only.' Thus at ver. 4 it is said, ὁ λαλῶν γλώσση ἑαυτὸν οἰκοδομεῖ.

29. προφῆται δὲ δύο ἢ τρεῖς λαλ. Render:

'Moreover, let two or three prophets [only] speak.' By οἱ ἄλλοι understand the rest of the prophets who are not speaking,—namely, all but the one who is speaking at any one time. Of διακρινέτωσαν the sense is, 'let them decide on what is spoken, whether it be dictated by the Spirit of truth, or not,'—namely, lest false prophets (of whom St. Paul warns them in his second Epistle, written soon after) should creep in. This office was, we may suppose, generally attached to the prophetic one, and was espec. exercised by those who possessed the gift of the διακρίσει πνευμάτων, spoken of at xii. 10, where see note.

30. ἂν δὲ ἄλλῃ—συγátw The sense (which has been debated) seems to be, as the ancient and early modern Commentators in general explain, this: 'If any revelation be made [by the Spirit] to another [prophet], let the first [prophet] have done speaking.' And in this sense συγ. occurs in Acts xv. 13, and often in the Classical writers, as Polyb. ix. 13, 2. Several more ancient Commentators, however, stumbling at the idea of any one speaking by the Holy Spirit being silent, take συγátw in the sense 'let him permit the first to come to a conclusion,' or, 'let him wait till the first has done speaking.' But so to strain the plain sense of words is by no means the true mode of removing difficulties. Here that may be done without resorting to such means: not, indeed, by sinking (with many recent Commentators) the supernatural in these gifts; but by supposing, that, in the exercise of this office, the prophets were at times so entirely removed from the operation of their own understanding, or the guidance of their own feelings of prudence or propriety, as to need the suggestions of their brethren the other prophets, and sometimes to require being reminded to come to a conclusion (though we need not suppose an obscure one), when running into undue prolixity, which, it is plain from the words following, the Apostle had principally in view. Besides, that a person endued with any spiritual gift had the power, as free agent, of using or not using it, and might be controlled by authoritative admonition (without any disparagement of the respect due to the Spirit), is clear from this, that those who possessed the gift of tongues are commanded to be silent when there was no one by to interpret. It is a just remark of Calvin and Pareus, that whether speaking, or sitting in silence, they were endued, indeed, with the Holy Spirit; but very differently at different times. Besides that general assistance of the Holy Spirit, which they at all times enjoyed, and by which they were enabled to discharge their duty, they were, no doubt, at times sensible of a special illapae of the Holy Spirit; which, being extraordinary, 51 δύνασθε γὰρ καθ' ἓνα πάντες προφητεύειν, ἵνα πάντες μανθάνωσι καὶ πάντες παρακαλῶνται· 32 (καὶ πνεύματα προφητῶν προφήταις ὑποτάσσεται· 33 ° οὐ γὰρ ἔστιν ἀκαταστασίας ὁ Θεὸς, ἀλλ' εἰρήνης· ὡς ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῶν ἁγίων.

34 <sup>p</sup> Αἱ γυναῖκες ὑμῶν ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις συγάτωσαν οὐ γὰρ ἐπιτέτραπται αὐταῖς λαλεῖν, ἀλλ' ὑποτάσσεσθαι, καθὼς καὶ ὁ

1 Tim. 2.
11, 12.
Col. 3. 18.
1 Pet. 3. 1.
Gen. 3. 16.

might, in the case of a silent prophet, demand its requisition to be complied with by a speaking one.

The expression καθήμενος has here great propriety, in allusion to the sitting posture of auditors, as opposed to the standing one of speakers, common both to the Jews and the Gentiles. Comp. a similar use of the term καθ. in a passage of similar character in Jos. Bell. ii. 8, 9, where he says, treating of the customs of the Essenes, δίκαια συγκρατοῦμένων, οὐκ ἀν' ἀληθείαις, ἀκούτων τῶν ἑνῶν,—meaning, that 'he must not speak, if it be displeasing to the other nine'; i. e. must cease to speak, when they wish him to hold his peace.

31. δύνασθε γὰρ, &c. The full sense of the words is, 'For [thus] ye may all [who are prophets] be enabled to prophesy one after another; so that all may [in their turn] receive or communicate instruction, or admonition.'

32. καὶ πνεύματα προφ. προφ. ὑποτάσσεται Expositors are not agreed on the exact sense contained in these words. Some ancient, and most of the best modern ones, regard this verse as asserting the possibility of obeying the foregoing injunctions; q. d. 'The spiritual gifts of the prophets are [not, like the phrenzy of the heathen priests, beyond their own control, but] subject to the prophets, who may exercise them or not, as occasion may require.' Bp. Middleton, indeed, urges that the propriety of the Article would require τοῖς προφήταις; and he adopts the interpretation of Schulz, Rosenmüller, and Schleusner: 'They who are divinely inspired are bound, at proper seasons, to give place to others who have been gifted with the same inspiration.' This interpretation, however, involves no little harshness; it being thus necessary to take πνεύματα προφητῶν for προφ., and to supply τοῖς ἄλλοις. As to the objection urged by the learned prelate, with respect to the absence of the Article τοῖς, it has no force; since, as both the nouns, προφητῶν and προφῆταις, are without the Article, it cannot be necessary to the latter, espec. as what is said may be supposed to be expressed omnino. Moreover, the connexion, as regards what precedes (ὁ πρῶτος συγάτω), is quite in favour of the first-mentioned interpretation. As far as regards what follows, no connexion is necessary, the words of ver. 32 being parenthetical; and the γὰρ which commences at ver. 33 has reference to the injunction and the reason for it at vv. 30, 31; q. d. '[Let this injunction be observed,] for it is the ordinance of that Being who is the Author not of confusion, but of peace and order.' They were meant, I conceive, to anticipate an objection; q. d. 'How can it be proper for any prophet to be thus silenced?' or 'how should he be able to control the suggestions of the Spirit?' To which the answer is, that 'the exercise or non-exercise of their spiritual gifts was at their own discretion (for such, the best Expositors are agreed, must be the sense of πνεύματα, namely, spiritual gifts);—whence it followed, that whatever impropriety, or evil, arose from the undue exercise of the gift must be imputed not to the Spirit, but to the Prophet himself, whose duty it would therefore be to rein in his impetuosity, and yield to another, before he had finished all that he intended to say.'

33. ἀκαταστασίας On the proper sense of the word see note on Luke xxi. 9. It here denotes 'tumult and confusion,' as being opposed to εἰρήνη, 'quietness and order' (τάξις) at ver. 40.—The words ὡς ἐν πάσαις—ἁγίων may be rendered, 'as is the case in all other congregations of Christians.' There is no reason, with many eminent Editors and Expositors, from Bp. Pearce downwards, to connect these words with the words following: for thus the gravity and authority of the Apostle's injunction will be injured, and a great irregularity supposed,—namely, that of introducing an inferior reason first in the sentence. And what example is there of a sentence thus commencing with ὡς? This seems to have been an expedient resorted to from the connexion between these words and the preceding ones being not very obvious. But why should we not consider this (like very many others in St. Paul's Epistles) as a briefly-worded clause, standing in the place of a complete sentence, introduced by an illative Particle? Such is evidently the view adopted by Hyper. and by Calv., who rightly makes it refer to all that has been before said on the observance of order and the cultivation of peace,—expressing the sense thus: 'Nihil vobis hactenus præcepi, quod non observatur in omnibus Ecclesiis; atque ita continetur in pace.'

34. αἱ γυν. ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλ. συγάτ. οὐ γὰρ, &c. This injunction (which, it is almost universally admitted, implies a total prohibition to women to speak at all in the congregation) seems to be contradictory to that at xi. 5. To reconcile which with the former, many Commentators suppose that the Apostle here refers to voluntary discourse, though even spoken with the ordinary aid of the Holy Spirit; but in chap. xi. to praying and prophesying under the extraordinary influence of the Spirit. According to this, the women were to keep silence; i. e. to refrain from speaking in public in the churches, except when they were influenced by an extraordinary inspiration. But to that sense Whitby and Mackn. urge serious objections; and they maintain, that the Apostle at chap. xi. only intended to say now the women should speak if they spoke at all, but here means absolutely to forbid it. Both solutions of the difficulty, however, are open to objections; and there seems to be no safe mode of removing them, but by supposing the προφ. there to mean some such inferior sort of the προφητεία, (perhaps νόμος λέγει. <sup>35</sup> Εἰ δέ τι μαθεῖν θέλουσιν, ἐν οἴκῳ τοῖς ἰδίοις

 ἄνδρας ἐπερωτάτωσαν· αἰσχρὸν γάρ ἐστι γυναιξὶν ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ λαλεῖν. <sup>36</sup> Ἡ ἀφ' ὑμῶν ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐξήλθεν; ἢ εἰς ὑμᾶς

g 2 Cor. 10.

1 John 4. 6.

r 1 Thess. 5.
20.

a Gal. 1. 11,

12.

Rom. 5. 1, 2.

2 Cor. 1. 24.

1 Pet. 4. 12.

μόνους κατήχησεν; <sup>37</sup> Ἐἴ τις δοκεῖ προφήτης εἶναι ἢ πνευματικός, ἐπνυγισκῶτω ἃ γράφω ὑμῖν, ὅτι [τοῦ] Κυρίου εἰσὶν ἐντολαί· <sup>38</sup> εἰ δέ τις ἀγνοεῖ, ἀγνοεῖτω. <sup>39</sup> Ὡς, ἀδελφοί, ζηλούτε τὸ προφητεύειν, καὶ τὸ λαλεῖν γλώσσαις μὴ κωλύετε.

<sup>40</sup> Πάντα εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν γινέσθω.

XV. <sup>1</sup> Ἐγνωρίζω δὲ ὑμῖν, ἀδελφοί, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ὃ εὐηγγε-λισαί μοι ἐστίν.

expounding Scripture,) as should not, by its exercise in public, contravene the order in this passage.

<sup>35</sup> εἰ δέ τι μαθεῖν, &c.] This is meant to exclude the pretence of speaking for the purpose of interrogation, in order to seek instruction; which, as it would produce disorder, is forbidden.

<sup>36</sup> The Apostle fortifies the injunctions contained in this and the two preceding chapters (but chiefly those in the foregoing verses, espec. ver. 33, which refers to the example of other churches) by adverting to a fact,—namely, that the Corinthians had no priority of conversion to plead, nor any superiority over other Churches, which might give them a privilege to deviate from the general practice; as if theirs were the mother Church, or the only Church. There is an allusion to Isaiah ii. 3. The implied inference is, 'You must therefore submit to the custom of the generality.' Now the mention of these irregularities naturally brought to the Apostle's mind the authors and abettors of them,—certain persons who pretended to be endued with the Gift of Prophecy, and other spiritual Gifts.

<sup>37</sup> Δοκεῖ is not well rendered in our common Version, 'seemeth to himself;' and still worse by Mackn., 'is sure;' a sense which the word no where bears. Rather, 'is accounted,' 'is reputed' (as iii. 18, εἰ τις δοκεῖ σοφὸς εἶναι); meaning, 'if any one be really a prophet.' Πνευματικός, for πνευματοφόρος used in Hosea ix. 7, to express πνεύματι, implying the possession of the extraordinary influence of the Holy Spirit. In the words ἐπνυγισκῶτω—ἐντολαί there is a frequent Hellenism; and we may render, 'let him understand, or know, that what I write unto you (i.e. my injunctions) are commands of the Lord;' just as what comes from an Ambassador may be said to come from his Sovereign. The τοῦ before Κυρίου—not found in many of the best MSS. and some Fathers, nor found in the earliest Editions,—is cancelled by Matthæi, Græb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., and is prob. an interpolation.

<sup>38</sup> Ἀγνοεῖ i.e. professes ignorance, or, as it seems, from the antithesis, to mean, 'is not disposed to acknowledge them as such.' Ἀγνοεῖτω, i.e. by a popular idiom (being an example of the permissive imperative), 'per me licet, let him do so, suo periculo; I have no more to say to him.' Comp. xi. 16.

<sup>39</sup>, <sup>40</sup>. Here the Apostle recapitulates the main points of the foregoing arguments, summing them up in one comprehensive precept—μὴ κωλύετε, meaning, 'be no hindrance to, discountenance not.' Εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν,

'in a decorous and orderly manner.' Εὐσχ. refers to the breaches of Ecclesiastical decorum before adverted to; and κατὰ τάξιν to the violation of order and subordination in the ministrations of the Church, with allusion to which the Apostle enjoined Christians (Eph. v. 21) ὑποτάσσεσθαι ἀλλήλοις ἐν φόβῳ Θεοῦ. Comp. also Coloss. ii. 5, βλάπτον ὑμῶν τὴν τάξιν. In short, from the various passages of the Class. writers which I have adduced in Recens. Synop., it is plain that τάξιν was applied to 'discipline and subordination,' both political and religious.

XV. After repressing breaches of decorum, order, and discipline, the Apostle now proceeds to stop the progress of heresy; and especially on that vital doctrine of the Gospel, the RESURRECTION. The Corinthians were, it is plain, tainted both with the Sadducean spirit of Jewish scepticism, and corrupted with the philosophical dogmas of the Grecians; each alike subversive of all expectation of a resurrection,—at least in the sense in which it is here meant by St. Paul, namely, a resurrection of both soul and body in a future state. There were, it would seem, not a few, both of the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Corinth, who entertained notions (founded on the dogmas they had held before their conversion) adverse to, at least, a resurrection of the body; and who had, in fact, brought with them their old tenets into the Christian Church, and had hence corrupted its doctrines. Now the Sadducees, and also the Epicureans and Stoics, rejected alike the resurrection of the body and the soul; while the Essenes the Professors of the Oriental philosophy, and the Platonists in general, agreed in rejecting a resurrection of the body; while all three admitted a resurrection of the soul, at least in words, though there is great reason to think that the Philosophers of that age denied even the resurrection of the soul, at least in their esoteric doctrines. At all events, the various sects of Gentile Philosophers all agreed in rejecting a resurrection of the body. Hence the ill reception which St. Paul met with at Athens from his avowal of this doctrine. It appears, then, that the Corinthian heretics were of two kinds, corresponding to the above two classes; 1. those who rejected a resurrection both of the body and soul; 2. those who disbelieved a resurrection of the body, but admitted one of the soul. The persons of this class, however (namely, the Essenes and the Platonists), rejected a resurrection of the body on different grounds. The latter, taking for granted the absolute physical identity of the raised body with the mortal body σάμην ὑμῶν ὃ καὶ παρελάβετε, ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐστήκατε, <sup>2</sup> ὃ δὲ οὐ καὶ <sup>b Rom. 1. 12</sup>

 σώξεσθε (τίνι λόγῳ εὐηγγελισάμην ὑμῖν, εἰ κατέχετε) ἐκτὸς <sup>ch. 1. 31.</sup>
<sup>Gal. 2. 4.</sup>

before existing, denied the possibility of the thing; the former, taking for granted the moral identity, i. e. the being equally frail and corrupt, thought that if it were possible, it would be most undesirable, and the thing not to be reconciled with the wisdom and benevolence of the Deity. As to the former class,—those who had been Sadducees or Epicureans, and still clung to the same notion,—they endeavoured to justify this departure from what had been revealed by Christ, by taking (as the heathen Philosophers, of the Platonic school, often did) the term ἀνάστασις in a metaphorical and allegorical sense, to designate a bidding adieu to ignorance and vice, and embracing light and truth, also the practical approving of this regeneration by a reformed life. Thus the ἀδύναμις they professed was nearly equiv. to the Stoical ἀναγίνωσις, or παλιγγενεσία. Hence they might well maintain (as did Hymeneus and Philetus), that the resurrection (i. e. of the just), if such was its nature, was already past. The Sadducean notion had been plainly borrowed from the Gentile Philosophers, with whose writings the Jews became conversant soon after their return from the Babylonian captivity; and when the necessity of preserving their liberty against the attacks of the neighbouring monarchs of Syria, Persia, and Egypt, compelled them to form connexions with the Gentile nations of the West, espec. the Greeks and Romans. But, besides the unbelievers, and the half-believers, in the doctrine of the resurrection, there was a third class, composed of those who might be called mis-believers,—inasmuch as, though admitting the doctrine of a resurrection of the body as well as of the soul, they yet felt doubts and scruples as to the time when, and the manner in which, it would take place; and also whether those found alive at the general resurrection would have need to die, or be received into the company of the raised saints and angels without any such change.

Now to the above three classes of person the Apostle is here addressing himself; and he does so in the natural order; i. e. of unbelievers, half (or mis)-believers, and doubting believers as to the doctrine of the resurrection; the first, it should seem, vv. 1—34; the second, vv. 35—50; the third, vv. 51—57. V. 58 contains the inference to be drawn from what has been before said, and contains an earnest exhortation. To advert to particulars:—the errors, or doubts, of the several classes are encountered and corrected by the discussion of the two following questions: I. Whether there will be a resurrection of the dead? This is proved, 1. from Scripture, vv. 1—4; 2. from the testimony of eye-witnesses of Christ's resurrection, vv. 5—12. For the connexion of the truth of Christ's resurrection from the dead with that of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead generally, was of the closest nature; so that what proved one, must prove the other; and the possibility of such a resurrection being once shown, all arguments on the score of the impossibility of the thing would be completely demolished; II. he argues the same question ex absurdo,—i. e. by showing the absurdity of the contrary doctrine: thus; 1. If the dead rise not,

Christ is not risen (ver. 13); 2. it would be absurd to have faith in him, according to the preaching of the Gospel, if he be not risen; 3. the Apostles, who attest his resurrection, must be false witnesses; 4. the faith of the Corinthians, who believe it, must be vain; 5. all the believers, who have died in the faith of Christ, have perished if Christ be not risen; 6. believers in Christ are in a more miserable state than any others, if there be no resurrection; 7. those who are baptized in the faith, that Christ died for them, and rose again, are deceived; 8. the Apostles, and Christians in general, who suffer persecution on the ground that, after they had suffered awhile here, they shall have a glorious resurrection, are acting a foolish part (vv. 30—35). Now here it may be proper to observe, that there seems great reason to suppose (with Cocceius and Gerdes,) that by ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν the Apostle, in his arguments for the resurrection of the soul, means, in a general sense, not merely a resurrection of the body, but also the transition of the soul to a state of bliss in heaven. For, as they show, the Apostle's arguments at vv. 19—35 would be inconclusive, as based on a sophism, technically called fallacia consequentis, unless those, whom he is here immediately encountering, denied the resurrection of the soul as well as of the body; i. e. the doctrine of a future state in general, as did the Sadducees and Epicureans. And consequently ἀνάστ. must be taken as at Matt. xxii. 31. Assuredly the strong expressions, ἀπολίσθαι, and others, would lose their force; since the reply would have been at hand,—that 'the soul might live apart from the body; that thus our better part might ἐνδημῆσαι πρὸς τὸν Κύριον, and consequently our hope would not be utterly cut off, though the particles of flesh should not be restored to life; and, accordingly, there would still remain that anchor of hope for the faithful,—that of preserving the soul in the blissful communion of Christ, and in the fruition of God himself.' Again, how would it follow, from there being no resurrection of the body only, that there would be no such thing as virtue, piety, or faith, since those might nevertheless profit the soul? So that, supposing an immortality of the soul only, it would still be the true interest of man to mortify carnal lusts, and 'to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.' Whereas the contrary doctrine, which denied the immortality of the soul, cut at the root of all virtue, and was calculated to engender immorality of every kind. We are (as Gerdes, well suggests) carefully to distinguish between the persons here had in view. The persons whom the Apostle addresses, informs, warns, and exhorts, are different from those against whose heresy and arts of persuasion he cautions his readers. The latter he no where directly attacks, but confines himself to addressing the former. Otherwise, indeed, his arguments would have been invalid (as addressed to Sadducean Jews, or Atheistical Gentiles); whereas they have their full force, as addressed to persons who acknowledged certain principles on which the Apostle argues. Hence what is said of the resurrection, is meant of the resurrection of o Isa. 53. 5.

Dan. 9. 24.
Zech. 12. 7.
1 Pet. 2. 24.

εἰ μὴ εἰκὴ ἐπιστεύσατε. <sup>3</sup> Παρέδωκα γὰρ ὑμῖν ἐν πρώτοις, ὃ καὶ παρέλαβον, ὅτι Χριστὸς ἀπέθανεν ὑπὲρ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν

Christians, and of the just and pious, not of the wicked (though the Apostle recognizes both at Acts xxiv. 15); their resurrection (which, as it appears, will be after that of the just) being, in some measure, implied in the former, as in the case of the immortality of the soul, in regard to the resurrection of the body.—To pass on to the two other general heads, the Apostle at vv. 35—49, or 50, with reference to the second class above mentioned (namely, those who disbelieved, or at least doubted of, the resurrection of the body, but held a resurrection of the soul), shows that the resurrection in question will be a resurrection of the body as well as of the soul, and informs us what will be the nature of the bodies thus raised, and in what manner the whole will be accomplished. Again, at v. 49, or vv. 50—57 inclusive, he adverts to the third class, and shows the time and manner of the resurrection, and what will become of those who are found alive at that period. Finally, he concludes with a most solemn and impressive exhortation, as to the use to be made of the doctrine he is now communicating.

1, 2. The construction (here somewhat irregular) is: Ἐγνωρίζω δὲ ὑμῖν, ἀδελφοί, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ὃ εὐηγγελισάμην ὑμῖν,—ὃ καὶ παρέλαβετε, ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐστήκατε, δι' οὗ καὶ σώζεσθε—τῷ λόγῳ εὐηγγ. ὑμῖν. Render: 'Now I would have you bear in mind, as to the Gospel that I first preached to you, which, moreover, ye received, wherein, too, ye stand (see Rom. v. 2 and note), whereby also ye are being saved, to what tenor and purpose I preached it to you,—(if ye keep it in mind, [as ye must] unless [with the exception that ye] have believed or embraced the Christian faith in vain).' Such may be considered the general purport of the passage; which forms an exordium, or introduction, to the subsequent matter treated of throughout the chapter,—namely, the resurrection of the dead; on some points of which subject the Corinthians had in their letter requested further information. Accordingly it bears the same relation to the whole chapter as the first 18 verses of John i. does to his whole Gospel. The words are few, but select, and full of point. And, although the composition may seem a little confused, and immethodical, yet that circumstance is by no means to be attributed to negligence,—but rather to somewhat of mental agitation, experienced by the sacred writer in treating on a subject so deeply interesting and momentous. There is much truth in the remark of Bulling.: 'Ad affectum facit, quod per interitum membra, tanquam crebris ictibus, auditorum [rather, lectorum] animos ferit.'—To advert to the phraseology. Ἐγνωρίζω has here, and in the parallel passage of Gal. i. 11, been variously, but, for the most part, unsuccessfully explained. Nay, Translators and Expositors vary in rendering the same words in the two passages. E. V. has here 'declare;' in Gal. 'certify.' Mackn. has 'repeat' here; 'certify' in Gal. Dr. Peile uses in both passages 'certify,' which is the least exact version of all. Declare, in the sense 'to make any thing known,' is greatly preferable, and is more agreeable than any other to the usus loquendi; but it does not well suit the context; and it is opposed to plain fact, for the Apostle had already taught them the doctrine. Hence many of the best Commentators render 'I remind,' and with reason; for, as Chrys. observes, ὁ γνωρίζων τὸ ἥδη γνωρισθὲν, εἶτα εἰς λήθην ἐμπίπτει, γνωρίζει πάλιν εἰς μνήμην ἀγων (by bringing it to memory). And so Theophyl., Beza, and Theodor. explain. The best way of settling the question is, to suppose that here (brevitatis gratia), Paul employs a pregnancy of sense, in which the two significations, declare, and in memoriam revocare, are united. This view I find confirmed by the opinion of the very learned Gerdes, in his Meletemata Sacra (a quarto volume of 600 pages on this chap. only), p. 54, who explains the term by, declarare amplius, adque istis in memoriam revocare. It is obvious, that knowledge of every kind requires to be kept up by attentive reflection; otherwise it will become imperfect, and have to be by instruction restored, or even renovated, so as to make it exact; which was prob. the case with many of those whom Paul was addressing; and consequently he selected the term γνωρίζω, on which see 2 Pet. ii. 12, and note. By εὐαγγέλιον we are to understand the doctrines of the Gospel generally, espec. those of the incarnation and resurrection of Christ, and the like resurrection and redemption of the righteous; see Rom. viii. 11. In ἐστήκατε (which means 'ye have persevered and do persevere') there is either an agonistic metaphor (see Eph. vi. 13), or an architectural one, like ἰδεῖσθαι γινώσκον ἀμειψαντοί, ver. 58, where see note; and comp. Col. i. 23. 2 Cor. i. 24. 1 Pet. v. 8, 9, 12, and see espec. note on Rom. v. 2.—ὃ καὶ παρέλα.—καὶ σώζ. Render: 'Which ye also received (or, "embraced"), in which also ye stand, whereby, too, ye are being saved; or, if there be a climax in the καὶ—καὶ—καὶ, "even being saved." The rendering "embraced" is preferable, because, as supra xi. 23, it denotes, as Olsh. says, "not a receiving from men, but from the Lord himself."

2. δι' οὗ—σώζ. 'are in the way of being finally saved;' 'implying meanwhile,' says Gerdes, 'the process of regeneration, justification, and sanctification, together with the hope by which believers are saved, and glorification, "the end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls."—τῷ λόγῳ εὐηγγελ. ὑμ. Of the term λόγῳ the sense has been not a little disputed. That adopted by Kuttner, and Dr. Peile, sermons, 'the wording and terms,' though supported by the Pesch. Syr. and Ambrose, is open to objection, on the ground of not yielding a sufficiently weighty sense: that of τρόπος, ratione, method, way, though yielding a sense weighty enough, is destitute of proof. Hence I am induced to agree with Beza in thinking that, although Paul speaks as if he meant the wording of his viola vocis instruction, yet in reality he means the matter and substance of the word preached, or rather its general tenor, or scope (Theodor.) as to doctrine, as being the simple, unadulterated doctrine of Christ crucified.—καὶ κατέχευτε, &c., meaning (as Prof. Dobree well expresses freely) 'as you will perceive, if you have not forgotten my words; and ἡμῶν, κατὰ τὰς γραφάς· <sup>4</sup> καὶ ὅτι ἐτάφη, καὶ ὅτι ἐγήγερται τῇ <sup>d Ps. 16. 10.</sup>

 τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ, κατὰ τὰς γραφάς· <sup>5</sup> καὶ ὅτι ὤφθη Κηφᾶ, εἰτα <sup>1sa. 53. 9.</sup>
 τοῖς δώδεκα· <sup>6</sup> ἔπειτα ὤφθη ἐπάνω πεντακοσίοις ἀδελφοῖς ἐφ- <sup>Hos. 6. 2.</sup>
<sup>Mat. 12. 40.</sup>
<sup>Luke 24.</sup>
<sup>Mark 16. 14.</sup>
<sup>Acts 10. 41.</sup>

less, indeed, you,' &c. Of κατέχουσιν, in this rare sense, to keep hold of, remember, the only apposite ex. that I have noted is in Jos. Antt. ii. 5, 4, ταύτης μὲν ἡμνημόνης ('forgot'), τῶν δὲ ἀναιρέτων κατέσχον. The sense which Dr. Peile assigns to εἰσέχουσιν, 'in mere levity,' without sufficient reason, is indeed found in the Class. writers; but here it would be unsuitable to the context, which requires the sense in vain, as has been evinced by the able logic of Crell. and Est., which see; and also the notes of Calv. and Hyper., who well observe, that these two exceptions, εἰ κατέχουσιν and ἐκτός ἐστι μὴ εἰσέχουσιν, have much point: the Apostle meaning thereby to make them at once attentive and docile. They must have believed in vain if they have not truly believed; if they have been careless, they must have heard the Gospel without profit. In short, though the word is capable of several meanings, the only one which suits the context is 'in vain,' μᾶτηρ, meaning that 'their faith will be what is called at ver. 14, κνήρ, or, as it is said ver. 17, ματαια, inasmuch as the holder of this faith fails to attain the end of his faith, even the salvation of his soul,' 1 Pet. i. 9; the doctrine of the resurrection being, as Chrys. and Theophyl. point out, the corner-stone of all Christian faith.

3. After having, in the foregoing brief exordium, paved the way for making a strong impression on the minds of the Corinthians, the Apostle applies himself to the discussion of the weighty subject itself; and he sets forth, in the first place, how that article of the resurrection of the dead is inseparably connected with the rest of the leading points of the Christian faith, which form the one whole Gospel. This truth the Apostle strenuously exerts himself at vv. 3-34 to firmly establish, and to vindicate from every kind of objection; in order to which he, by way of foundation, enumerates certain primary Evangelical truths, as to Christ and his resurrection (which, as such, he had more particularly impressed on the minds of the Corinthians), and he sets forth the inseparable connexion existing between them,—that he may thus be enabled to satisfactorily deduce this inference, that, as intimately united with, and as inseparable from, there is this great doctrine of the resurrection of the dead.

—παρίδωκα γὰρ ὑμῖν ἐν πρώτοις, ὃ καὶ παρίλ[αβον] The recent foreign Commentators, for the most part, explain παρίδωκα, 'I taught,' referring to Rom. vi. 17, and other passages. But the word often signifies to 'communicate to another learner any information or knowledge derived from some common TEACHER.' And this appears to be the sense here intended, such being called for by the words following, ὃ καὶ παρίλαβον, which, notwithstanding the refinements of several recent Expositors (who refer them to information derived from some of the canonical gospels then extant, or others now lost; viz. the apocryphal ones), can only (as I have shown in my note on the kindred passage, supra, xi. 23) be understood of the information derived by the Apostle from the personal and immediate revelation of Jesus Christ, adverted to at Gal. i. 12, and elsewhere, though it may include the instruction communicated by Ananias, and afterwards by the rest of the Apostles, as spoken of in Acts ix. 17-19.

—ἐν πρώτοις] i. e. 'among the principal, fundamental truths of the Gospel.'—ὃ καὶ παρίλαβον. Comp. supra xi. 23, and Gal. i. 12, and note. This is, Hyper. observes, said by way of commendation and confirmation of his doctrine, that he did not invent it, but had simply delivered what he had received from God.

—ἀπὸθεν ἐπὶ τῶν ἁμ[ι]. The ὅτι is not, as some consider it, for πρὶν, but should be rendered 'on account of,' 'for the expiation of;' with allusion to the atonement made for us by Christ suffering in our stead. See Rom. iv. 25. —τὰς γραφάς, meaning such parts of the Scriptures of the Old Test. as have reference to the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Christ,—namely, not only the prophecies of the Messiah, but also the sacrifices, and, in general, the ritual and typical ordinances which prefigured the great Sacrifice. See Is. liii. 4.

4. καὶ ὅτι ἐτάφη] Christ's burial is mentioned, as proving his death, just as the appearing to Cephas and the 500 brethren attested his resurrection.

5. τοῖς δώδεκα] There were then but eleven. But the Apostles were so called, by a figure common to all languages, whereby any body of persons who act as colleagues are called by the number of which the body is properly composed, though it may not be complete at the time.

6. ὤφθη ἐπάνω πεντ. ἀδελφ. ἐφάπαξ] Render: 'he appeared (lit. 'showed himself') to upwards of five hundred brethren at once.' On the time when, and the place where, this remarkable circumstance occurred, no little difference of opinion exists, as will appear from my Recens. Synop. On attentively reconsidering the question in all its bearings, I can no longer agree with the generality of the Commentators, that the appearance here mentioned is that recorded in Matt. xxviii. 16 seqq. After all that the ability of Est., Whitby, and Mackn. was enabled to effect towards establishing this hypothesis, it is one not sufficiently well-grounded to be relied on. Hence I now prefer to suppose, with other Expositors, that the transaction in question is—like that of the appearance to Cephas spoken of in the next verse—one which has not been recorded in the Gospels; and no wonder,—since it was not the purpose of the Evangelists to record all the transactions that could have been recorded respecting the Lord Jesus, and the founding of the Gospel, but only those which seemed to them of the greatest importance. And they might not think this one of that kind; considering that the re-appearance of Christ to his Apostles and disciples was attested by the personal evidence of those many of the five hundred in question, who must, when the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke were written, have been yet alive. Hence I would suppose the ἀπαξ· ἐξ ὧν οἱ πλείους μένουσιν ὅς ἄρτι, τινὲς δὲ καὶ ἐκοιμήθησαν ἡ ἔπειτα ὤφθη Ἰακώβω, εἶτα τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πᾶσιν.

8 ἔσχατον δὲ πάντων, ὥσπερ ἐν τῷ ἐκτρώματι, ὤφθη κάμοι.

† Acts 9. 2,
17.
‡ 28. 11.
ch. 9. 1.

transaction in question to have been one of those not recorded by the Evangelists, otherwise than that it took place at the time when our Lord, having appeared for the last time to the disciples, and having led them forth from Jerusalem to Bethany, and then to the Mount of Olives (where, it seems, the Apostles and disciples were joined to the brethren at large), ascended up to heaven in the sight of them all. In this view I am supported by the authority of Priscus and Gerdes. Heumann is of opinion, that the order of the words has become disturbed, and needs transposition thus: 'Ἐπειτα ὤφθη Ἰακώβω, εἶτα τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πᾶσιν. Ἐπειτα ὤφθη ἰσραὺς πνικτικός., &c.; by which, observes Gerdes, 'neque Thomam inter testes resurrectionis Christi in Paulo recensitos desiderabimus, neque apostolos juxta mare Galilæum versatos, de quibus Johannes ch. xxi.:' a very ingenious conjecture, but not necessary to be adopted, since the Particles ἰσραὺς and ἰσραῖτα are not to be rigidly interpreted, as if Paul intended to place the appearances in question in exact chronological order, but regarded as merely bearing the sense of porro. As to what so many stumble at,—the greatness of the number; it is not greater on this supposition, than on that first mentioned. Nor is the difficulty to be removed by recognizing (with several Commentators) the use of a certain for an uncertain number; still less by adopting the principle suggested by Bp. Warburton, that 'the Apostle introduces his cloud of witnesses with a becoming dignity in the gros,'—for what would that imply? Leaving, then, the number as it stands, and accounting for it as well as we can, we may, with Lightf., Whitby, Gerdes, Heydenr., and Steuensen, suppose that, though the number of the disciples mentioned at Acts i. 15, is only one hundred and twenty, yet that could not be the whole number of believers at that time, but only the number of those who had followed our Lord continually, ver. 21; or rather, as Heydenr. and Steuensen think probable, 'those who were collected together with the Apostles when another Apostle had to be chosen and substituted in the place of the traitor Judas Iscariot.' Accordingly, we are not to understand them to be all the disciples in Judæa, but only all those in Jerusalem. In Galilee and in various parts of the country of Judæa there must have been a considerable number; which may well be supposed to have been at least five hundred. Moreover, though styled brethren, we may suppose that in some their belief might be weak and wavering, and require that confirmation, which the august circumstance of their Lord's visible ascent into heaven was calculated to afford them. Finally, admitting the full number of five hundred to have been co-assistant with the Apostles and disciples at Christ's ascension, we are thus better able to account for the extraordinary number of three thousand persons soon after added to the Church on the day of Pentecost,—partly, we may suppose, by the testimony of those five hundred reaching numerous persons, well disposed to Gospel truth.—οἱ πλείους μένουσιν &c., 'of whom the greater part continue alive, remain yet living, unto this time.' By which it is meant to be intimated that they are surviving eye-witnesses to the august circumstance of the ascension. By the turn of the expression in τινὲς δὲ it is evident that the number of the deceased bore no proportion to that of the surviving. Why then, we may ask, should St. Matthew, the only Evangelist whose Gospel was in existence (and that in its early Hebraic form), have brought forward that which had the testimony of upwards of three hundred eye-witnesses?—τινὲς δὲ καὶ ἰσραῖ. The καὶ not found in A, B, D, E, F, G, and other MSS. and some Fathers, has been cancelled by Tisch., but on insufficient grounds, for internal evidence is quite in its favour, since it might have been omitted by accident, or, as seeming useless, by design; while for its having been inserted no reason can be imagined.

7. ἰσραῖτα ὤφθη Ἰακώβω, εἶτα τοῖς ἀποστ. πᾶσι On further consideration of these words, I am now of opinion, that this appearance to James (which, though unrecorded in the Gospels, was handed down by tradition, and is mentioned by the Fathers) took place, not at that time of the occurrence recorded in Matt. xxviii. 16, 20, but afterwards, in the order in which Grew. has placed the words. The words εἶτα τοῖς ἀποστ. πᾶσι. I would now refer, with Mackn., Grew., and Dr. Burton, to what is recorded in Luke xxiv. 44 seqq. And thus the Particles ἰσραῖτα and εἶτα will not need any difference of explanation. Thus also the foregoing occurrence,—the appearance to the five hundred brethren, will also come in the true chronological order as referred (agreeably to Grewell's arrangement) to what is recorded at Matt. xxviii. 16 as taking place in Galilee; though considering, as Dr. Burton remarks, that it might have been thought that this appearance took place in Galilee (Matt. xxviii. 16), it is best to suppose, with Grew., that the Apostle here too has followed the order of time, and that the occurrence took place at Jerusalem.

8. ὥσπερ ἐν τῷ ἐκτρώματι.—[μοί] There are two points connected with this passage on which Commentators are divided in opinion: 1. on the sense, and the nature of the metaphor ἐκτρώματι; 2. on the force of the Article. As to the former, ἐκτρώμα (thought to be not a pure Attic word, though found in good authors, as Hippocrates, Aristotle, Plato, and Aristides) has always elsewhere the sense which Heyseh. ascribes to it, ἐκβολὴ γυναικός, an abortion. With respect to the latter particular, many Expositors suppose an allusion to the name given (as Sueton. Aug. c. 35, tells us) by the Romans to supererogatory senators, viz. abortivi. To this, however, it is objected by Bp. Middleton, that thus the comparison would not hold good, since an abortion is brought forth dead, and the Apostle was living, both naturally and spiritually. He would therefore take the word to mean a last-born child, ὀστρίον, as often, for ὀστρεόν; with reference to the common notion, prevalent in all the remote parts of England, of the last-born being the 9 ἐγὼ γάρ εἰμι ὁ ἐλάχιστος τῶν ἀποστόλων ὃς οὐκ εἰμι ἰκα- § Eph. 2. 7.

 νὸς καλεῖσθαι ἀπόστολος, διότι ἐδίωξα τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ Acts 8. 3.
 10 ἡ χάριτι δὲ Θεοῦ εἰμι ὃ εἰμι. Καὶ ἡ χάρις αὐτοῦ ἡ εἰς ἐμέ οὐ Gal. 1. 12.
h Rom. 1. 5.
§ 15. 12.
§ Cor. 11. 23.
§ 12. 11. § Cor. 2. 5, 6. Gal. 2. 2. Col. 1. 20.

smallest and weakest of the progeny. But for this sense there is little or no authority; and it would involve a harsh anastrophe. We may rather (with Hyper., Crell., and Newcome) recur to another sense of ἑκτρομα, which has not, perhaps, been preserved in any author; but which, no doubt, existed, and is preserved in Hesych. and the Glossaria, — namely, ἄωρον γέννημα, a child born before the due time. So the Latin abortivus, though it generally means an abortion, yet in Horat. Sat. i. 3, 46, 'ut abortivus fuit olim Siaphus' has this very sense. Now such infants are invariably weak and feeble, scarcely deserving the name of children; which is, I conceive, what the Apostle means to say of himself,—calling himself so, as being an Apostle not formed and matured by previous preparation and instruction, but suddenly called to the office by an instantaneous conversion, as the abortivus is suddenly and prematurely cast from the womb, and brought into the world. It is proper, however, to advert to the force of the Article here. According to the first and third of the foregoing interpretations, the Article seems to have no force; unless we suppose, with Bp. Middleton, that it is meant to apply the term particularly to the Apostle; as in Luke xviii. 13, ἐμοὶ τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ. But this solution of the difficulty presented in accounting for the Article is inadmissible, as producing a sense which few will approve; and that of Mr. Green, p. 226, is much more objectionable, espec. as conveying a very revolting idea. To cancel the τῷ, with Dobree and others, would be to cut the knot. Besides being found in all the copies but a very few of no account, its authenticity is confirmed by a similar passage (imitated from the present) of Simeon Stylites in an Epistle to Basil: ἐγὼ (says he) ὁ ταπεινός καὶ ὑπερταλὴς, τὸ ἑκτρομα τῶν μονάχων. It would seem that Simeon was one of those 'certain persons' mentioned by Theophyl., who understood the sense to be τὸ ὑστατον γέννημα, 'the last-born offspring of a family.' Last-born children were supposed to be born before the due and regular time; and, accordingly, Hesych. explains ἑκτρομα by παιδίον ἄωρον, meaning, 'before the due time;' which is what our Common Version was intended to express; though out of is a sense not proper, since it might include that of beyond the due time. The gloss was doubtless borrowed from a Scholiast, and represents another ancient interpretation, distinct from that of Theophyl., and which I regard as the most ancient of all, and probably, the true one. It is liable to no objection but what may arise from over-nice refinement of erudition, especially as respects the force of the Article, the nice proprieties in the use of which we cannot imagine to have been known to or meant to be expressed by the Apostle. In short, this use of ἑκτρομα seems to have been an idiomatic expression of common life. And, if proof be desired of this use, something nearly approaching thereto is supplied by two passages of Tzetzes, adduced by Dindorf on Steph. Thea. in v., where τὰ ἑκτροματα are opposed to full-grown men; a use evidently formed on the other. To read τῷ (for τινι) with many recent Critics, would introduce an Atticism no where found in the New Test. nor in the Sept.; nor, indeed, in any Hellenistic writer. Whichever of the above two senses be adopted, it is plain that the Apostle applies the expression from deep humility; the Particle ὅσπερ, with which he introduces it, being meant to soften the harshness of the expression, not that of the thing.

10. χάριτι δὲ Θεοῦ εἰμι ὃ εἰμι scil. ἀπόστολος. While, however, thus ascribing whatever he is, or has effected, to the grace of God, (i. e. his gracious aid,) yet, by way of asserting himself to the Church at Corinth, he then adverts to his labours, as greater than those of all the other Apostles, i. e. taken singly, not collectively. Of these see the detail in Gerdes., p. 114 sq. His humility, however, is evinced by his introducing this notice in words implying that they were done by Divine aid,—an aid, he says, which was not fruitless; meaning, by meiosis, was productive of great profit. This is even yet more apparent in the words added, per correctionem, οὐκ ἐγὼ δὲ, ἀλλ' ἡ χάρις, &c. 'It was not I that was the doer, but the grace of God aiding me.' Where, however, we are not to suppose that he represents himself as a mere machine, and God as the only doer. 'He ascribes (as Bp. Beveridge observes) the glory of all he did to the grace of God; yet nevertheless was the person that did it by that grace.' That the words are by no means subversive of free-will in man, is acknowledged even by St. Augustine, de Gratia et libero arbitrio, ch. iii., 'Non ego autem, i. e. non solus, sed gratia Dei mecum. Ac per hoc nec gratia Dei sola, nec ipse solus, sed gratia Dei cum illo.' And though Est. objects to the interpretation on the score of its not making grace sufficiently prominent, yet he grants that in this passage is intimated the co-operation of grace and free-will; so, however, that grace works principally by helping the will and making it operative, though not treating the man as a machine. Comp. Rom. viii. 26, where the meaning is, that 'we of ourselves know not, and therefore need the help of the Spirit to know.' Moreover, as Est. ably reasons, 'auxilium autem non est, nisi agente etiam eo qui adjuvatur.' And he concludes by remarking, that what is here written is as much as to say, 'Non ego principaliter,' or 'non tam ego quam gratia Dei,' comparing the same idiomatical form of expression in Hosea vi. 6, 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice; the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings.' Thus, after all, the doctrine here contained is no other than that found in the kindred passage of Phil. ii. 12, 13 (according to the explanation I have given of those words); and in vain is it that Calvin from this passage strives, totis viribus, to beat down the doctrine of free-will, which even Augustin and Est. (both holding the same doctrinal views with Calvin) admit at least by implication. To effect this, he scruples not to misrepresent what is said by the opponents of his system, by making them say that, 'in the κενή ἐγενήθη· ἀλλὰ περισσώτερον αὐτῶν πάντων ἐκοπίασα—

οὐκ ἐγὼ δὲ, ἀλλ' ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡ σὺν ἐμοί. <sup>11</sup> Εἴτε οὖν ἐγὼ, εἴτε ἐκεῖνοι, οὕτω κηρύσσομεν, καὶ οὕτως ἐπιστεύσατε.
<sup>12</sup> Εἰ δὲ Χριστὸς κηρύσσεται, ὅτι ἐκ νεκρῶν ἐγήγερται, πῶς λέγουσί τινες ἐν ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν; <sup>13</sup> Εἰ δὲ ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν, οὐδὲ Χριστὸς ἐγήγερται· <sup>14</sup> εἰ δὲ Χριστὸς οὐκ ἐγήγερται, κενὸν ἄρα τὸ κήρυγμα ἡμῶν, κενὴ
<sup>1</sup> Acta 2. 24. <sup>22.</sup> δὲ καὶ ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν. <sup>15</sup> <sup>1</sup> Εὐρισκόμεθα δὲ καὶ ψευδομάρτυρες working, half the praise is to be ascribed to God, and the other half left to man.' Whereas the above explanation (which is substantially true) cannot truly be so characterized.

11. Having enumerated separately the effects and testimonies of Christ's resurrection, the Apostle now sums them up in one brief saying, of which the full purport is, 'Whether it be I or they [who] laboured most, [it matters not:] this doctrine [the death and resurrection of Christ] we all preached, and ye professed your belief of it. And having thus attested your full credence, how can ye, consistently, call in question the other doctrine, so closely connected with it, that of the resurrection of man from the dead?'

12. The Apostle now comes more closely home to the point in question; and, having thus far stated it as a fundamental doctrine of Christianity, and a primary article of Christian faith, that 'Christ both died and rose again on the third day,' he now proceeds to show that with this is intimately connected, what certain heretical teachers have presumed to deny,—the doctrine of what is called the resurrection of the dead. Inasmuch that, if the latter be supposed baseless, the former must be supposed equally without foundation; and that, if this one article of the Christian faith be assumed false, all the other articles of the Christian faith,—as baptism, and the atonement of Christ,—must be assumed false likewise. We have here an argumentum ex absurdo, by a conclusion from the foregoing premises; q. d. 'Now Christ really and actually rose from the dead, as has been evinced on irrefragable evidence. How, then, can any deny the possibility of a resurrection? For what has once been, may again be; and, é contrario, ver. 13, if a resurrection of the dead were to be supposed to be a vain imagination, not deserving of our belief, our faith in the resurrection of Christ would be destroyed.' In short, the argument is: 'If, as has been proved, Christ rose from the dead, then the resurrection of the dead is not only possible, but actual;' for the general proposition, that there is no resurrection, is included in the particular one, that Christ is not risen; i. e. the resurrection of others could only need a continuation of that same exertion of omnipotence which raised Him.

13. εἰ δὲ ἀνάστασις—[ἐγγήγερται] Dr. Peile has with reason objected to the interpretation of Mackn. and Burton, which, as he truly observes, 'needlessly involves the Apostle's reasoning,—a reasoning, he adds, 'turning simply upon this plain inference: "If, as some say, there is no such thing as rising from the dead, then has Christ—who died, as I told you, for our sins—not been raised. For (ver. 16, &c.) if there be no rising from the dead, then Christ has not risen. But if Christ has not risen, vain is your faith [in Him], ye are yet in your sins." It is scarcely necessary to say that this is the way in which the verses were long ago explained by me in my Recens. Syn. and in my Gr. Test., though more at large, and proceeding on the profound discussions of Est., Hyper., Calv., Bulling., Heydenr., and, instar omnium, Gerdesius.

14. Here we have another argumentum ex absurdo.—i. e., 'supposing that.' Κενόν is by the ancient and earlier modern, and also some recent Expositors, explained useless, as not attaining the desired end. Most Expositors, however, from the time of Grot. and Mackn., assign to it the sense 'false and unfounded.' The former interpretation seems preferable; but both may be included, the latter as dependent on the former. The sense may be thus expressed: 'If Christ had not risen, our testimony of his resurrection to life and glory would have been false, and an imposture (see ver. 25), and without any benefit to ourselves; and your persuasion of the truth of our report would produce no good to yourselves.'

15. Here we have (as Hyper. observes) a proof of the former argument ab absurdo, as to their preaching being vain; for such it would be, if they brought forward falsehood for truth, and especially falsehood of God, the words τοῦ Θεοῦ being emphatic.—εὐρισκόμεθα δὲ καὶ ψευδ. Render, 'Yea, we should [thus] also be made out to be false witnesses concerning God.' Κενά is by the best Interpreters explained 'concerning;' a signification of the word very rare, but which the Apostle chose to employ, probably as wishing to include the sense 'to the prejudices of,' which falsification would occasion; inasmuch as it would almost imply a want of power in God to raise the dead; for the Gentile Philosophers denied it. So Pliny, Hist. Nat. l. ii. c. 7, "Revocare defunctos ne Deus quidem potest."—ὅτι ἑμάρτην. κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, &c. These words are explanatory of the foregoing clause, showing in what sense the expression ψευδομάρτυρες τοῦ Θεοῦ was meant to be taken. I have, in my Recens. Syn., clearly made it appear that, of the various senses that have been assigned to ἑμάρτην. κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, the only true one is that of the Greek Commentators and the framers of our Common Version, 'against,' i. e. 'to the prejudices and dishonour of God.' It is truly observed by Grot., that 'every testimony is κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, which represents God as having done that which he has not done;' and (as Mackn. observes) 'such a testimony, on the supposition that Christ was not raised, would be a witnessing against God; because, to testify that God raised Christ, Whom He did not raise, was to testify that He had confirmed the preta-

τοῦ Θεοῦ ὅτι ἐμαρτυρήσαμεν κατὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὅτι ἤγειρε τὸν Χριστὸν ὃν οὐκ ἤγειρεν, εἴπερ ἄρα νεκροὶ οὐκ ἐγείρονται. <sup>16</sup> Εἰ γὰρ νεκροὶ οὐκ ἐγείρονται, οὐδὲ Χριστὸς ἐγήγερται. <sup>17</sup> <sup>k</sup> εἰ δὲ <sup>k</sup> Acts 5. 31. Rom. 4. 25. Χριστὸς οὐκ ἐγήγερται, ματαία ἡ πίστις ὑμῶν ἔτι ἐστὲ ἐν ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν <sup>18</sup> ἄρα καὶ οἱ κοιμηθέντες ἐν Χριστῷ ἀπώλονται. <sup>19</sup> <sup>l</sup> Εἰ ἐν τῇ ζωῇ ταύτῃ ἡλικιώτεες ἐσμέν ἐν Χριστῷ μόνον, ἐλεεινότεροι πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἐσμέν. <sup>20</sup> <sup>m</sup> Νυνὶ δὲ Χρι-

<sup>12</sup> Tim. 2.
<sup>12.</sup>
<sup>m</sup> Acts 20.
<sup>22.</sup>
ch. ver. 23.
Col. 1. 15.
Rev. 1. 8.

sions of an impostor, which were a blasphemy against God.'

16, 17. Here we have (as Gerdes. shows) not a mere repetition of the arguments at vv. 13, 14, but something to serve for further illustration; and the conclusion at ver. 17 completes the proof of the resurrection: for (to use the words of Heydenr.) 'πίστις does not here, as before, denote assent to the testimony of the Apostles concerning the resurrection of Christ, but that faith which the Corinthians had accorded to the whole Christian doctrine; or (if it be thought better to understand τὴν πίστιν objectively) the doctrine itself of the Gospel, which would be without any solid foundation, would be of doubtful and ambiguous faith; nay, would be liable to strong suspicion, were the resurrection of Christ taken away, in which we have the plainest demonstration of Gospel truth, and the most certain confirmation of its divine origin.' The Apostle (continues Heydenr.) addresses them by an interchange of persons, speaking first in the second, then in the third, and lastly in the first, per κοινωνίαν. At ver. 17 he points out a new absurdity arising from the denial of Christ's resurrection,—that they would be under the penalty of unforgiven sin, which is inconsistent with the very elements of the Christian system; 'ye are yet subject to, liable to, the penalty of your sins, from their being thus unatoned for,' a sense highly suitable to the Apostle's argument. But the question is, how the expression ἐν ἁμαρτίαις εἶναι comes to mean, as Gerdes. renders, sub reatu esse, and where ἐν has ever the sense sub, as used for ὑπὸ? No where. Gerdes. appeals, indeed, to 2 Pet. ii. 19, τοῦτω καὶ διδούλωται. But that passage will only tend to afford countenance to the idea that ἐν is used here as at Rom. vii. 6, κατηγορ. ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου, ἀποθανόντες ἐν ᾧ κατεχόμεθα, 'by which we were held in bondage.' But that would not here suit the context; for the Apostle is not speaking of the dominion of sin in the members. Gerdes. assigns that as a principal sense, including, as the subordinate one, the punishment of our sins by their being not atoned for. And this sense may quite as well be extracted from the words, by taking ἐν in its usual signif. Accordingly, the meaning of the words will simply be, 'ye still remain in the same condition in which ye were formerly, when no remission of sins was held out to you: as before, so also even now ye are subject to sin and its penalty (eternal death).' Accordingly, the full sense intended seems to be this: 'ye are still in the same state of habitual sin, unrepented of and un-forgotten; and which will ultimately prove perdition when consigned to a state of eternal misery in Hades.'

18. Ἐρα καὶ—ἀπώλονται] Here is pointed out another fatal consequence of the denial of the resurrection; q. d. 'It follows, also, that those who have died in [the faith of, in communion with] Christ (οἱ νεκροὶ ἐν Χριστῷ Rev. xiv. 13) are perished: there is an end of them and of all their hopes; all their labour, toil, and suffering for Christ's sake are thrown away and perish; they are disappointed of their hope of salvation, and are no better, in a worldly view, than if they had not encountered them.'

19. Here (as Crell. and Calv. remark) there is an answer to a tacit objection,—namely, that the Apostles know there will be no resurrection, but preach the doctrine for present advantage. Now this is shown to involve an absurdity; because, by preaching the doctrine in question, they expose themselves to present evil of every kind; and if there is to be no resurrection of the dead, there will be no future state in which they could enjoy any reward. Thus they would act as they do without any motive.

—εἰ ἐν τῇ ζωῇ ταύτῃ, &c.] The μόνον must be construed after ζωῇ. By we is especially meant the Apostles and preachers of the word, though it may be extended to all Christians in that age of persecution. 'Ἐλεεινότεροι πάντων,' 'we are of all men the most to be pitied'; too manifest a truth to need proof or illustration. I would not, with several recent Commentators, regard ἡλικιώτεες ἰσμεν as standing for ἡλικία-μεν. The Participle, far from being pleonastic, adds not a little meaning and significance, and its force may be thus expressed: 'If we, who are hoping in, reposing our hopes in, Christ, look, as to the end of these hopes, to the advantages of this world only.' Whether the ἡμεῖς be referred to the Apostles and preachers of the word, or to Christians in general, this will hold equally good, since, in 2 Tim. iii. 12, it is said that 'all who will live godly in Jesus Christ will (i. e. must) suffer persecution'; nay, 'that they were even hereunto appointed.' 1 Thess. iii. 3. And the bitterness of that persecution, both from the Jews and from the heathen, was such as we can scarcely imagine; though the 'Lives of the Saints,' amidst much matter that is exaggerated, or rests on apocryphal authority, contain much that will help us to form a just idea of the thing. Besides, however, the bitterness of persecution, is also to be included the peculiar bitterness of disappointment as to the full assurance of hope in Christ unto the end (Heb. vi. 11); since the hope of salvation (the 'hope full of immortality') could alone counterbalance the many peculiar trials and tribulations to which Christians were then exposed.

20. Having already shown, from the fact of Christ's resurrection, the possibility of our resurrection, the Apostle now applies himself to establish its certainty; and, after having taken for granted—as being already fully established—the στὸς ἐγγέρηται ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀπαρχὴ τῶν κεκοιμημένων [ἐγένετο].

 n Gen. 2. 17. 21 Ὡς περὶ γὰρ δι' ἀνθρώπου ὁ θάνατος, καὶ δι' ἀνθρώπου
 & 3. 6. ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν. 22 ὥσπερ γὰρ ἐν τῷ Ἀδὰμ πάντες ἀποθνή-
 Rom. 5. 13. σκουσιν, οὕτως καὶ ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ πάντες ζωοποιηθήσονται.
 18. John 11. 26. οἱ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ. 24 Ἔτι τὸ τέλος, ὅταν truth of Christ's resurrection, he proceeds, in the three following verses, to deduce from it some considerations, on which we may ground the most confident reliance of all pious Christians being raised from the dead. These are deduced, 1. from the close consanguinity, as it were, of Christ, as Head of the Covenant, with faithful Christians, his members; inasmuch that a close connexion must be supposed between one and the other, however dissimilar may be the modes, vv. 20—23, inclusive. The Apostle then, at v. 22, draws a parallel between our relationship to Adam and to Christ; and reasons that the fruits of each (death or life) must naturally arise. At v. 23 he intimates that this connexion of Christ with faithful Christians, as of the head and the members, suggests naturally the order in which this resurrection should take place; and as Christ's resurrection was admitted by the persons he is addressing, to have really taken place, so may that of his faithful servants be confidently expected to follow.—vivi δὲ, &c. The full sense is,—‘But as things now are, [this is not the case;] Christ hath risen.’

—vivi δὲ—ἐγένετο] Here Dr. Peile, stumbling at the abruptness of the expression, and the harshness of the construction, would understand the words Χριστὸς ἐγγέρηται ἐκ νεκρῶν to be a mere anagoge of vivi δὲ, to which it may, he thinks, stand in apposition, or be connected with it by an ellipsis of ὅτι or ὅτι. And he would render thus: ‘But now that Christ has been raised from the dead, a first-offering has been made to God of those that have been laid to sleep.’ But apposition cannot here apply; and the ellipsis thus supposed is harsh and unauthorized, nay, needless; for though it may be expressed in a paraphrase, yet he wishes that ἐγγέρηται had been written, and hence expresses it as equivalent. But that is uncritical. Allowance is here to be made for the brevity of the wording, and for the asyndeton,—both being often found in passages like this, where the writer feels deep interest in his subject. The full sense, then, will stand thus: ‘But as things now are [this is not to be feared]; Christ hath risen [and thereby laid open the way to life]; i. e. himself being the first-fruits; an ellipsis of ὡς or γενόμενος, which, indeed, is found in one or two MSS. Thus the asyndeton has the same force, without harshness. From this process of analysis it appears that ἐγένετο, found in the text rec. and the great body of the MSS., cannot stand, since, although external authority is in favour of the received reading, yet internal evidence is quite against it, from the probability of its having been introduced (like γενόμενος) by those who did not understand the force of the asyndeton, and the true construction of the sentence. Moreover, the authority for cancelling ἐγένετο is the more weighty, from the circumstance that the MSS. which have it not are the most ancient, and to these may be added the Ital., Vulg., Copt., Armen., and other Versions, besides several Greek and Latin Fathers. Finally, that the words which I have supplied after vivi δὲ (or, at least, some amounting to the same sense) were left to be mentally understood, was seen by Chrys. and Theophyl. (who here supply τὰ ἄποκα ταῦτα οὐ συμβάλλεται), and, of modern Commentators, by Croll., Gerdes., and Stenerson, who similarly supply.

21, 22. The Apostle here further proves the resurrection of Christ to be the cause, as well as the pledge, of our resurrection; arguing, that ‘since by man (i. e. a human being) sin and death entered into the world; so by Man, by One in human nature, came the resurrection of the dead: as, in consequence of their relation to Adam, all men are born mortal, and at length die; even so, in and by Christ, shall all be made alive.’ In other words: ‘Our connexion with Adam brought us death; our connexion with Christ, life: by the one we became subject to the dominion of death; by the other, being raised from the dead, we shall be delivered from that dominion: the evils inflicted on us by the former will be entirely done away by the latter.’

23. Here we have, as Heydenr. observes, an answer to a supposed doubt, or question, as to the seeming delay, and the tardy period allotted to the awful change in question; q. d. ‘a certain order and fixed period of time is appointed of God for this effect: in due order and succession, and by certain intervals, must this take place to all, and not before the time appointed must that resurrection be expected.’ The Apostle then proceeds to show what that order will be. It is, indeed, not agreed whether by τάγμα be here meant order of time, or of dignity. But the former sense is probably the true one; the meaning being ‘each at the time, and in the manner ordained by God,’—namely, that Christ should rise first, by himself, long before the rest; then, at his second advent, all true Christians.—Οἱ τοῦ Χριστοῦ: as Gal. v. 24, οἱ τ. Χρ. The Apostle says nothing about those who are not Christ’s. Those, we know, will be raised too, and, as it appears, last; but with the ‘resurrection of damnation.’

24. We have now (as Croll. observes) a sort of digression, extending from v. 24 to v. 28; v. 29 connecting with v. 23, the intermediate verses being hypo-parentetical. Still there exists a thread of connexion, which has been well traced by Croll., who supposes what is said at v. 24 to be meant to give a reason for the preceding assertion, and to meet a tacit objection; q. d. ‘Why do you say that those who are Christ’s are to be raised at the advent of Christ? Why

παραδῶ τὴν βασιλείαν τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ ὅταν καταργήσῃ
 πᾶσαν ἀρχὴν καὶ πᾶσαν ἐξουσίαν καὶ δυνάμιν. <sup>25</sup> Ἄδει γὰρ αὐτὸν βασιλεύειν, ἄχρις οὗ ἂν θῇ πάντας τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ. <sup>26</sup> Ἐσχάτος ἐχθρὸς καταργεῖται ὁ θάνατος. <sup>27</sup> πάντα γὰρ ὑπέταξεν ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ. Ὅταν δὲ εἴπῃ ὅτι πάντα ὑποτέτακται, δηλῶν, ὅτι ἐκτὸς τοῦ ὑποτάξαντος αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα. <sup>28</sup> ὅταν δὲ ὑποταγῇ αὐτῷ q Ps. 110. 1.

 Acts 2. 34.
 Eph. 1. 22.
 r Rev. 20. 14.
 s 21. 2.
 t Ps. 110. 1.
 Matt. 11. 27.
 & 23. 13.
 Eph. 1. 22.
 Heb. 2. 8.
 & Ps. 110. 1.
 21.
 ch. 2. 28.
 & 11. 2.

not before, or after? Ans. It must be at his advent, because immediately afterwards his reign must come to an end. But that cannot be till his enemies are utterly subjected and destroyed,' &c. &c.—ἄχρι τοῦ τέλους. Supply ἵσταται. On the exact sense of τέλος some difference of opinion exists. Heydenr. thinks the expression is to be taken for of ἵσταται (as at v. 23 ἀπαρχή is equiv. to ἀπρώτος), meaning 'those who shall rise last,' i. e. either all the rest, except Christ's faithful servants: or, at the termination of the period of the resurrection. Yet either interpretation is harsh: and there is no reason to reject the one adopted by the ancient and most modern Expositors, by which τέλος is supposed to mean 'the end of the world,' or 'of the Christian dispensation,' or 'the world of redemption.' (the economical or mediatorial kingdom of Christ,) or ἔσχατος,—when Christ shall have gained a complete victory over sin and death, wicked angels and wicked men, and shall resign the government of all things to God the Father; adverted to in the words following, ὅταν παραδῶ τὴν βασιλ. τ. Θ; which Grot. illustrates from the custom of Presidents, sent by the Roman Emperor to govern provinces; who, at their return, used formally to restore their authority into the hands of their sovereign.—ὅταν καταργήσῃ δυνάμιν. Some doubt exists as to the persons meant by πᾶσαν ἀρχὴν καὶ πᾶσαν ἐξουσίαν καὶ δυνάμιν. Of course, powers adverse to Christ must be intended; but not, as some suppose, the empires and kingdoms of this world, i. e. human power generally, but such powers as yet impede the consummation of the felicity obtained for us by Christ, and are a hindrance to the Divine counsels for the completion of man's restoration to the favour of God; namely, the kingdom of Satan, & ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους, Col. i. 13. Eph. vi. 12; also sin, misery, and death. See also v. 26. The powers who act in league with Satan, to further his purposes, are called ἐξουσία and δυνάμεις, to suggest their systematic opposition to the kingdom of God and Christ (comp. 2 Thes. ii. 4); and likewise ἀρχή, as being a regularly organized body, in opposition to the ἀρχή of Christ.

<sup>25</sup> Ἄδει γὰρ αὐ. βασιλ.] The ἄδει seems chiefly meant of the necessity of fulfilling the Scriptures, 'which cannot be broken.' This is clear from the words of David, Ps. cx. 1, then introduced.—βασιλεύειν, i. e. reign, as King Messiah.—ἄχρις εἰς, i. e. as long as his mediatorial reign shall continue. And that is not to terminate until he has, as the next words express, brought all his enemies to complete subjection. The words are not those of David, but only adopted from those of Ps. cx. 1, ἵνα ἂν θῶ τοὺς ἐχθρούς σου ὑποπόδιον τῶν ποδῶν σου. See note on Matt. xxii. 44, where the whole verse is cited verbatim. The ἂν before θῇ, not found in six uncial and six small-letter MSS., and several early Fathers, has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.; perhaps rightly, both here and supra, xi. 26, since the ἂν was likely to be introduced by those Critics who deemed it necessary to the sense; though it is not.

<sup>26</sup> ἵσταται—θάνατος] I would render (with the sanction of some eminent Commentators), 'And, last of all, the enemy Death is to be destroyed.' Now as all our enemies and obstacles are generally encountered in the order of difficulty, this suggests an idea of death being the most formidable enemy. Thus what is said is equiv. to, 'He will subject all his enemies,—even, at last, Death, [the greatest.]' Death is here personified, though elsewhere more usually represented under the name 'Αἰδης, or Samiel, or Asmodeus; the meaning, however, being the state of death. The above view of the sense will enable us to explain the next words, πάντα γὰρ ὑπέταξεν ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ, which can only be done by supplying a short clause, taken from the preceding, to which the γὰρ has reference; q. d. 'I say all, since δεῖ πάντας τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ τίθεσθαι, it is predicted of him, that he [i. e. God] hath put all things (by which is necessarily included all persons, all creatures, animate as well as inanimate) under his feet.' The words of the Psalm (viii. 4) were primarily meant of the first Adam, as being the representative of the human race; but are here, and in Heb. ii. 6, referred, in their secondary and mystical application, to the second Adam, Christ. Indeed, the whole Psalm is referred to the Messiah by our Lord himself, Matt. xxi. 16.—Εἰπῇ, sub. ἡ γραφή. Ἀδ. ὅτι ἐκτὸς supply τοῦτό ἐστι. Render: 'It is plain that [this must be] with the exception of him who put all things under him.' This sense of ἐκτὸς occurs in Acts xxvi. 22, sometimes in the Sept., and occasionally in the Class. writers.

<sup>28</sup> ὅταν δὲ ὑποταγῇ, &c.] Of this obscure and disputed passage, the meaning seems to be: 'and when all things shall be subjected to him (i. e. the Son), then shall the Son also himself declare himself to be subject to him that had subjected all things to him;' meaning, that 'when all the designs of the Son's Mediatorial kingdom shall be accomplished, the Son, as Mediator, will become subject to the Father,—i. e. will resign his mediatorial office to the Father, from whom he received it; that God (meaning the Godhead, comprehending Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) may be all in all [to men], i. e. reign without the intervention of a Mediator, which will no longer be necessary. That this passage, when properly understood, gives no support to the Arian and Socinian notions of the Son's nature being inferior to the

τὰ πάντα, τότε καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ὑῖος ὑποταγήσεται τῷ ὑποτάξαντι αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα, ἵνα ᾗ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν. <sup>29</sup> Ἐπει, τί

Father's, has been proved by all the best Expositors, but most fully and ably by Gerdes, and Heydenr.—ἵνα ᾗ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν, meaning, 'that He may be supreme in power'; lit. 'omnia apud omnes creaturas ejus,' a phrase denoting, 'to be possessed of complete power,' equiv. to ἐν ἐκὶ πάντων (or ἐπάνω πάντων) in Rom. ix. 5. See also John iii. 31. Eph. iv. 6, and i. 23, also my note on Thucyd. viii. 95. Clem. Alex. p. 603, Ζεῖν τοι τὰ πάντα, and Themist. p. 275, τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτοῖς ὁ Χ., and Pausan. Arcad. 50, ἀφορώντων εἰς αὐτὸν καὶ τὰ πάντα ἐκείνων ποιούμενων.

29. ἔπει, τί ποιήσουσι οἱ βαπτ. ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν; Here the Apostle resumes the subject he had broken off at ver. 23. At ἔπει there is an ellipsis of ἄλλως, 'Since [otherwise, if that were not the case, i. e. if there were no resurrection]. Of this idiom an example occurs in Joseph. Bell. i. 19, 4, ἔπει, τί δύναται τοῦ σισιμου μίτον; I have pointed accordingly.—On the sense of the obscure words, οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, a considerable diversity of opinion exists. The main points of inquiry are these: 1. Whether βαπτιζόμενοι is to be taken in a literal, or in a metaphorical sense. 2. Whether τῶν νεκρῶν is to be understood literally, or figuratively. 3. What is the force of the ὑπὲρ. Now on every one of these questions the great fault of Expositors has been that of devising certain novel, nay, almost unheard of, significations; and which, even if they could be admitted, are not agreeable to the context and the scope of the Apostle throughout this whole chapter. As to those interpretations which proceed on taking βαπτιζόμενοι in a metaphorical sense, they seem entitled to little attention; and that which explains it 'overwhelmed with miseries and calamities,' cannot be admitted, for want of the addition of some word or words denoting misery or suffering. There is little doubt that the expression is to be taken in the natural sense. Worthy of attention, at least, is the interpretation of some ancient, as Augustin, and many modern Expositors (as Scaliger, Grotius, Heydenreich, and Crell.), by which an allusion is supposed to the practice (in use, as we learn from Tertullian, Epiphanius, and Ambrose, in the first century) of vicarious baptism; i. e. of baptizing a living person in the place of, and for the benefit of, one who had died unbaptized; just as, by some, the Eucharist was administered to the dead. But no certain proof has been adduced that the practice was prevalent so early as the time when this passage was written, or that it was in use at Corinth. Nor is it to be believed that the Apostle would, for the sake of a very precarious argument (for the practice was, doubtless, very rare and secret), countenance so grovelling a superstition,—involving, as Calv. says, 'a profanation of baptism, and drawing it into an abuse quite magical.' Yet surely the interpretation adopted by that able Expositor, 'to be baptized in articulo mortis, besides being destitute of philosophical proof, is liable, in some degree, to the same objection.' And vain is it to urge, with Heydenr., that in such a case the Apostle argues ex concessis, and is using an argumentum ad hominem; for no other argument so used by St. Paul would have the same consequences. Although, therefore, the interpretation, which refers it to vicarious baptism does indeed fit in with the words as they stand (rather, however, by a sort of coincidence than agreement); it cannot be admitted, since, besides being liable to the foregoing fatal objection, it is unsuitable to the context; the sense thence arising, in conjunction with the argument of the context, being not a little frigid. The interpretation most likely to be the true one, must be such as shall depend on no remote or far-fetched allusion, shall be agreeable to the context, and inherent in the words themselves. Now this, if I mistake not, will apply to the one adopted by Chrysostom and the Greek Commentators, and the generality of Expositors in modern times, including Hammond, Burkitt, and Wetst., who explain: 'What will they be doing (i. e. what will they benefit themselves) who are baptized on the score of, i. e. in hope of, the resurrection of the dead?' q. d. 'They will be no better for it, either in this world or the next;' by an argumentum ex absurdo. The only objection that can be urged to this interpretation is, its supposing the ellipsis of τῆς ἀναστάσεως; but as that forms the grand subject of the whole Chapter, there is surely no great harshness in supposing it left to be understood. How simple and agreeable to the context is this view of the sense, will appear from the accurate Analysis of Gerdesius. And that it should be the general interpretation, and such as unlettered persons immediately form in their mind, is a proof that it cannot be really, though it may be grammatically, harsh. This interpretation, then, in its simplicity carries upon it the stamp of truth. There is, with reason, supposed to be an allusion to the confession which preceded the rite of baptism, 'I believe in the resurrection of the dead,' and the interrogation which succeeded its answer in the affirmative, 'Wilt thou be baptized in this faith, i. e. in the hope of a resurrection?' There may also be (as the ancient Commentators think) an allusion to the ancient mode of baptism by immersion; which, while typifying a death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness, had also a reference to the Christian's communion with his Lord, both in death and resurrection from the dead. See Rom. vi. 4, συντάφηναι αὐτῷ διὰ τοῦ βαπτισματος εἰς τὸν θάνατον, &c., and Col. ii. 12. Certainly baptism is, if not a type of the resurrection, yet a sign and seal thereof. We may add, that, as the reception of Christian baptism and the adoption of the religion was one with the recognition of a resurrection of the dead; so, for any persons, professing to be Christians, to disavow that doctrine, was gross inconsistency, ποιήσουσιν οἱ βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν; εἰ ὅλως νεκροὶ οὐκ ἐγείρονται, τί καὶ βαπτίζονται ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν; 30 ἢ τί <sup>2 Cor. 11. 22.</sup> καὶ ἡμεῖς κινδυνεύομεν πᾶσαν ὥραν; 31 * Καθ' ἡμέραν ἀποθνήσκω, νῆ τὴν ὑμετέραν καύχησιν, ἣν ἔχω ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τῷ Κυρίῳ ἡμῶν. 32 * Εἰ κατὰ ἀνθρώπον ἐθνηριομάχησα ἐν <sup>2 Rom. 8. 26. 2 Cor. 4. 10. 1 Thess. 2. 10. 2 Cor. 1. 8. 1ss. 22. 12.</sup> Ἐφέσῳ, τί μοι τὸ ὄφελος; εἰ νεκροὶ οὐκ ἐγείρονται, φάγωμεν καὶ πίωμεν, αὐριον γὰρ ἀποθνήσκομεν. 33 * Μὴ πλα- <sup>2 ch. 5. 6.</sup>

and must deprive them of all benefit from that religion.—To advert to a variety of readings,—for τῶν νεκρῶν, in the next clause, 7 ancient uncial, and 20 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, 1185) have αὐτῶν, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but without sufficient reason; for, though the external evidence is strong, yet the internal is weak for αὐτῶν, which has every appearance of an alteration, to remove a seeming tautology. But, in fact, such repetitions as this are often introduced for the sake of emphasis; or, as here, an intensity of sense; which Calv. recognizes. To regard it, with Meyer and Alf., as 'a mechanical repetition of the above,' is wholly unsatisfactory.

30. τί καὶ ἡμεῖς, &c.] By ἡμεῖς may be understood 'we Apostles,' meaning especially himself. The sense is, 'Why, too, are we encountering jeopardy every hour?' i. e. upon what other hope than of the resurrection of the dead?

31. καθ' ἡμέραν ἀποθνήσκω] 'I die by anticipation.' A strongly figurative and hyperbolic phrase, expressive of his being continually in imminent danger of his life. Comp. Philo, vol. ii. p. 542, καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν, μάλλον δὲ ἔθαν, προκαθνήσκω.

—νῆ τὴν ὑμετέραν καύχησιν] i. e. 'I solemnly protest by the boasting, or ground of glorying, which I have concerning you,' ὑμετ. standing for ὑμῶν. So 2 Cor. viii. 8. Thucyd. i. 33, τοῦτε Λακ. φόβῳ τῷ ὑμῶν πολυμυσίοντες. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 466, 2. 'It was (observes Mackn.) the custom anciently to swear by such things as were the objects of men's greatest affection. The Apostle, therefore, on this occasion swears by what was the subject of his continual glorying,—the conversion, namely, of the Corinthians, whereof God had made him the instrument.' This, however, may be said to be rather solemnly protesting than swearing, i. e. protesting any thing to be as true as some other thing is unquestionably such; which here was the case, as the Corinthians well knew. The appeal made by νῆ, as to the truth, sometimes implies an oath; but that cannot be the case here, as strong protestation was amply sufficient for the purpose.—ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰ. 'The Apostle (as Theophyl. observes) in this ascribing the whole to Christ our Lord, means to suggest, how justly he may expect from his Corinthian converts constancy in maintaining this their faith; for, if he finds matter of boasting in their spiritual improvement, so would he feel a corresponding feeling of shame, if, after all, they should disbelieve the resurrection of the dead.'

32. εἰ κατὰ ἀνθρ. ἰθνηριον. ἐν Ἐφ.] A difference of opinion exists as to the sense of ἰθνηριον, which some Expositors take in a literal, others in a metaphorical acceptance. Most, however, adopt the former view, urging that the air of the passage suggests a reference to some imminent danger. This, they think, is confirmed by the strong language of the Apostle at 2 Cor. i. 8—10, with respect to some extreme peril at Ephesus. 2 Cor. xi. 23. They further urge that Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian so took the word; and that the fact itself,—considering how frequent was this punishment for alleged treason in that age,—is not improbable. This may readily be admitted; but whether the thing actually happened in the case of St. Paul, may be doubted. That it should not have been recorded by St. Luke, would seem strange, and not to be paralleled by the omission of the story of the penitent thief in three of the four Evangelists; though it may be admitted that several important circumstances must have occurred at Ephesus, besides those recorded in Acts xix. As to the air of the context, it suggests, I think, no more than extreme peril of life; for that may well be all that is meant by the expression καθ' ἡμέραν ἀποθνήσκω; and the language of the passage of 2 Cor. xi. 23, is exactly of the same nature, and amounts to no more. As to Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian recording a tradition of the Apostle being exposed to wild beasts, the tradition itself might easily arise from no more than taking ἰθνηρ. here in a literal sense. If, indeed, the expression stood alone, there would be less difficulty in admitting that such might be the sense. But the phrase κατὰ ἀνθρώπον, with which it is associated, alters the case, since that admits of no sense at all suitable to the literal import of ἰθνηρ.; whereas the acceptance in which it is elsewhere used by the Apostle, is such as highly favours the metaphorical sense ascribed to ἰθνηρ. by some ancient and several eminent modern Commentators, who suppose the Apostle to mean only the imminent peril of life which he ran (as we find by Acts xix.) from the opposition of ferocious adversaries. And when we consider that such a use of θνηριομάχην was (as is proved by philological illustrations) usual in that age, being found in Ignat. Epist. to the Romans, c. 5, there is great reason to think that this interpretation is the true one. Κατὰ ἀνθρώπον may thus be regarded as an elliptical expression for ὥστε κατὰ ἀνθρώπον λίγαι, or ὡς κατὰ ἀνθρ. λίγαι, Anglicè, 'to employ a popular phrase.' To the examples adduced of this figurative use of θνηριομάχην I add another, more apposite, from Liban. Epist. 606, 1, & ἰποῖον ἀν περὶ Σακράτην, εἰ κατὰ Σακράτην ἡγρόνουν, ὅτε αὐτῷ τὰ θηρία ἐπὶ κείνῳ, σκυόφανται τρεῖς.

—φάγωμεν καὶ πίωμεν, &c.] The words are derived from 1a. xxii. 13, Sept. Similar sentiments abound in the heathen writers. See Athen. Deipn. viii. 3. Arrian, Exp. Alex. ii. 5, 3. Herodot. ii. 78.

a Rom. 13.
11.
ch. 6. 5.
Eph. 5. 14.

νᾶσθε· φθείρουσιν ἤθη χρηστὰ ὁμίλῳι κακαί. 34 * Ἐκνήψατε δικαίως καὶ μὴ ἁμαρτάνετε· ἀγνωσίαν γὰρ Θεοῦ τινὲς ἔχουσιν πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῶν λέγω.

b Ezek. 37.
2.

c John 13.
24.

35 ὁ ἄλλ' ἐρεῖ τις· Πῶς ἐγείρονται οἱ νεκροί; ποίῳ δὲ σώματι ἔρχονται; 36 * Ἄφρον, σὺ δ' σπείρεις, οὐ ζωοποιεῖται, ἐὰν μὴ

33. Leaving the argumentum ad absurdum, the Apostle now proceeds to direct exhortation and earnest admonition.

— μὴ πλανᾶσθε.] A form appropriate to warning men against falling into error; with allusion, in the present case, to the sins just mentioned. So Philémon, p. 860, 'Be not deceived: Death hath his solemn courts.'

— φθείρουσιν ἤθη χρηστὰ ὁμίλ. κακαί.] Κακαί, for πρός τοὺς κακοῦς. These words are by some supposed to be taken from Euripides; by others, from Menander. They occur in both; the latter prob. deriving them from the former. This is not, however, a regular quotation (for then the metre would require χρηστ' instead of χρηστὰ); and indeed the sentiment had prob. grown, by frequent use, into a popular saying. The implied censure was, no doubt, meant for certain teachers, who encouraged or permitted close intercourse with the heathens, the same probably who had countenanced attendance at the idol-feasts.

34. The Apostle now presses home his admonition. Ἐκνήψειν properly signifies 'to awake from a deep sleep,' especially that of drunkenness, as Gen. ix. 24, and elsewhere in the Sept., as also in the Class. writers; but it is also used, in a figurative sense, of 'sobering from the inebriety of error, and returning to a right mind.' See Rom. xiii. 1. Eph. v. 14. As to the force of the conjoined Adverb, Chrys. and Theophyl. and other ancient Commentators take it as standing for ἐπὶ δικαίῳ, so as to be equiv. to εἰς δικαιοσύνην, i. e. ὥστε δίκαιοι εἶναι. And so Erasmus, Beza, Grot., and Est., as also the Framers of our Authorized Version, and Wakef., explain it; while Luther and Schmid take it in the sense serio, 'rightly,' 'thoroughly.' But this cannot be admitted, since that sense is contained or implied in ἐκνήψ. With the former interpretation Dr. Peile thinks we shall be satisfied, if we compare the use of the Adverb in Thucyd. i. 21, τὰ πολλὰ ὑπὸ χρόνον αὐτῶν ἀπίστωες (so as to become incredible) ἐπὶ τῷ μυθῶδες, and other [similar] passages adduced by Goeller. These are i. 140, τὰς ἐμφυλάδας ἡμαρτὰς χωρῆσαι ('so as not to be foreseen'), and ii. 64, φέρειν χρὴ τὰ δαιμόνια ἀναγκαίως. Poppo adds also iii. 40, ἀθροώμενος, and iv. 62, vii. 63, αἱ. And this use of the Adverb in the early Attic writers is unquestionable. But δικαίως is not, I apprehend, one of the Adverbs so used; neither is the Grecism of St. Paul at all Attic in its character. Hence, although the sentiment may be thought not inapposite, as compared with that of Tit. ii. 12, where we have ἅλα σωφρόνως καὶ δικαίως καὶ εὐσεβῶς ζήσωμεν, yet it involves so much of hyperbaticness, unsupported by any similar use of this or any other adverb in St. Paul's writings, that I still continue to prefer the interpretation of the Arabic Version, which has been adopted by Bullinger, Hyper. Crell., Casaub., Vorst., Sclater, Hamm., Whitby, Bp.

Pearce, Mackn., Gerdes., Dodd., Krause, Heydenr., and Stenersen. Of δικαίως, in this sense, to signify 'ut par est,' as it is just and right you should,' examples are adduced by Alberti and Palairer. And in the passage of Thucyd. ii. 64, ἀναγκαίως should similarly be understood to mean 'as it is necessary for you to do.' It may be further remarked, that the sentiment thus arising is more suitable to the context; for, as Hyper. well saw, the Apostle uses an argument ex æquo, q. d. 'justum et æquum est vos experiri fieri et respiciere, quando tot rationes vos impellunt, et tot occasionibus provocamini.'—ἀγνωσίαν γὰρ Θεοῦ τινὲς ἔχουσιν, meaning persons who, by upholding pernicious errors as to the resurrection, and other fundamental doctrines, show that they know not God aright.—πρὸς ἐντροπὴν ὑμῶν λέγω. A formula of affectionate exhortation; as supra vi. 5.

35. πῶς ἐγείρονται—ἔρχονται:] The Apostle now proceeds to refute two objections (which were probably often urged by cavillers, in the form of puzzling questions) to the doctrine of the resurrection. 1. How can all the different parts of our bodies, which have been resolved into dust, or apparently annihilated by fire,—or have become so mingled with, and converted into, the nature of other animals,—nay, of trees, plants, &c.,—how can these, after having been for so many ages thus dissipated, be at length reunited, and coalesce into one body? 2. If that be possible, with what kind of body are the dead to rise? what sort of body will that be? meaning thereby to virtually deny its possibility. These objections, the Apostle first shows, proceed from folly; and he then introduces a popular illustration of the doctrine, derived from what exists in nature, as respects plants.

36. Here the Apostle first proves, in a popular way, the possibility of the resurrection, by adverting to a similar process going on in the vegetable world (comp. John xii. 24); where the same objection to the possibility might, a priori, be made. Thus he shows that, by a parity of reasoning, the body which dies may be quickened again; and at ver. 42 asserts that it is so. Of course, ἀποθνήσκει is here to be taken, in a popular sense, for 'as it were dies,' namely, by suffering corruption. There is allusion to that mysterious process (as little to be accounted for as the resurrection of the body) going on in the buried and rotting grain, whereby the germ, or bud, fed by the corruption of the roots, springs up into new life.—Ἄφρον. The expression must not be too rigidly interpreted; since it may only convey the idea of inconsiderateness, and want of due thought. Of several passages of the Class. writers that might here be adduced, one must suffice; Ælian de Provid. Frag. p. 1052 (Gronov. Ed. of the Var. Hist.), σὺ δὲ λέγεις ἀποθνήσκει (scil. τὸ θεὸς) μὴ ὅμως προΐσται, ὡς σπέρμα; Similar terms employed by our Lord are probably to be taken with a similar limitation of sense; see the ἀποθάνῃ 37 καὶ ὁ σπείρεις, οὐ τὸ σῶμα τὸ γενησόμενον σπείρεις, ἀλλὰ γυμνὸν κόκκον, εἰ τύχοι, σίτου ἢ τινος τῶν λουπῶν. 38 Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς αὐτῷ δίδωσι σῶμα καθὼς ἠθέλησε, καὶ ἐκάστω τῶν σπερμάτων τὸ ἴδιον σῶμα. 39 Οὐ πάντα σὰρξ ἡ αὕτη σὰρξ· ἀλλὰ ἄλλη μὲν [σὰρξ] ἀνθρώπων, ἄλλη δὲ σὰρξ κτηνῶν, ἄλλη δὲ ἰχθύων, ἄλλη δὲ πτηνῶν. 40 <sup>d</sup> καὶ σώματα ἐπουράνια, καὶ <sup>d</sup> Gen. 1. 16. σώματα ἐπίγεια· ἄλλ' ἑτέρα μὲν ἢ τῶν ἐπουρανίων δόξα, ἑτέρα δὲ

note on Matt. xxiii. 17, μυροὶ καὶ τυφλοί, where see note. The meaning of the passage is thus expressed by Prof. Dobree: 'The living body is, like a seed, organized matter united with a vital principle: when the body dies, and the seed is sown, the organized matter is thrown off, and replaced by other matter of different form and properties.' This is well put, but it keeps out of sight the force of the Pronoun σὺ, which, I agree with Mr. Green, when thus prominently expressed, seems to be this: ['does not thine own experience supply an illustration of this?] for that which thou sowest,' &c.

37, 38. In these verses the Apostle adverts to the other objection involved in the words of ver. 35, τοῖς δὲ σώματι ἔρχονται; and, continuing the same similitude, he shows that it is not necessary that the bodies of the raised should be precisely, and in all respects, the same as when they died; since in like manner, in the case of grain and plants, the body committed to the earth is not the same, but in many respects different, yet essentially the same. Thus the objection raised from the dissipation of the particles of the body which has died loses its force; since it is not necessary to that general identity, that the body raised should be composed of the very same particles; which were indeed inconsistent with what the Apostle subjoins, ἀλλὰ γυμνὸν κόκκον (i. e. the grain apart from the blade and ear, which shall afterwards spring from it); in which expression it seems plainly implied, that the bodies shall differ as the grain and the ear differ, the latter being far more glorious than the former.

38. καθὼς ἠθέλησεν 'God,' observes Doddridge, 'is said to give it this body as he pleases, because we know not how it is produced; and the Apostle's leading thought is, that it is absurd to argue against a resurrection on a principle which is so palpably false as that must be, which supposes us to understand all the processes of the divine works.' The expression ἴδιον σῶμα seems meant to further explain the σῶμα καθὼς ἠθέλησεν, on which the whole sentence seems to turn; q. d. 'God hath ordained that each particular seed should reproduce, not its own body, but one far more glorious, and of a form such as it hath pleased the Almighty to assign to it.'

39—44. In this passage the Apostle, proceeding in his confutation of the objections of his adversaries as to the quality of the bodies to be raised, employs an illustration of what he has been saying, and that by similitude. His main purpose is to inculcate, directly and expressly, the important truth, which at vv. 37, 38 he had only intimated, as it were by implication; namely, that the raised body, though in all essential points the same with the body buried, would be very different and far more excellent. Accordingly the argument is this: that, 'as throughout the works of the whole creation, whether earthly or heavenly, animate or inanimate, a great difference subsists between the bodies of one class, as compared with those of another class; and even those of the same class differ widely; such (ver. 42) will be the case here; so will be the difference, at the resurrection, between the bodies which shall arise, as compared with those that were committed to the earth.' In the verses following, the nature of that difference is pointed out, and the reasons on which it is founded are intimated. It might, indeed, seem that the Apostle has enlarged more on the diversity of the various classes of bodies from each other, than was necessary for the purpose of the illustration in question. But it was done for a good reason; for (as Rosenmüller justly suggests) 'the Apostle means to infer from the vast variety of bodies, yet all bodies, the power of the Deity to produce from a mass of corruption a glorious and immortal body.' And surely, as Locke observes, 'it is not more incomprehensible that a glorious immortal body should arise from a mass of corruption, than that all this variety of splendid forms should arise from nothing.'

As to the precise nature of the difference between the earthly and the glorified body, on this much has been written, but to little purpose. Indeed, the Apostle's words were not meant to teach us, what perhaps no human language could have made comprehensible. It is sufficient for us to be assured that the bodies of the righteous will be raised in a spiritualized state, and yet be, in a certain sense, the same with those that were buried.

39. οὐ πάντα σὰρξ, &c. Σὰρξ is here used for σῶμα, because, as Heydenr. observes, 'corpora animantia tria sunt, sensibilia, animata, ψυχικά, non inanimata, ut plantas et corpora celestia; attemen mortalia, non perennia, ut corpora πνευματικά, ἀθάτα, in resurrectione restituenda.' Δόξα, vv. 40, 41, denotes 'dignity and excellence.' Ἐν φθορᾷ, ver. 43, and ἐν ἀτιμίᾳ, ver. 44, are Adjectival phrases, for the Adjectives φθαρτός and ἀτιμος. And ψυχικός, in ver. 44, as being opposed to πνευματικός (espec. as the expression is used with a reference to the words of Moses respecting the body of Adam, ἐγένετο εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν) must signify 'animal' (lit. 'that which draws in the breath of life,' necessary to the existence of all animal bodies), that which is endued with faculties of sense, and has need of food, drink, and sleep, for its support. So the word is used by Diod. Sic. i. 12, αἷτιος τοῦ ψυχικοῦ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις.—The word σὰρξ after μὲν, not found in very many of the most ancient MSS., uncial and cursive, including all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, some Versions, and Fathers, Greek and Latin,

ἡ τῶν ἐπυγείων. <sup>41</sup> Ἄλλη δόξα ἡλίου, καὶ ἄλλη δόξα σελήνης, καὶ ἄλλη δόξα ἀστέρων· ἀστὴρ γὰρ ἀστέρος διαφέρει ἐν δόξῃ <sup>42</sup> οὕτω καὶ ἡ ἀνάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν. σπείρεται ἐν φθορᾷ, ἐγείρεται ἐν ἀφθαρσίᾳ· <sup>43</sup> σπείρεται ἐν ἀτιμίᾳ, ἐγείρεται ἐν δόξῃ· σπείρεται ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ, ἐγείρεται ἐν δυνάμει· <sup>44</sup> σπείρεται σῶμα ψυχικόν, ἐγείρεται σῶμα πνευματικόν. Ἔστι σῶμα ψυχικόν, καὶ ἔστι σῶμα πνευματικόν. <sup>45</sup> Οὕτω καὶ γέγραπται· Ἐγένετο ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος Ἀδὰμ εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν· ὁ ἔσχατος Ἀδὰμ εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν. <sup>46</sup> Ἀλλ' οὐ πρῶτον τὸ πνευματικόν, ἀλλὰ τὸ ψυχικόν, ἔπειτα τὸ πνευματικόν. <sup>47</sup> Ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος ἐκ γῆς, χοϊκός· ὁ δεύτερος ἄνθρωπος, [ὁ Κύριος] ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. <sup>48</sup> Οἷος ὁ χοϊκός, τοιοῦτοι καὶ οἱ χοϊκοί· καὶ

φ. Phil. 3. 21.
Matt. 13. 43.
Dan. 12. 3.

φ. Gen. 2. 7.
Rom. 8. 14.
John 5. 21.
2d. 33, 20.
Col. 2. 2, 4.

φ. Gen. 2. 19.
John 2. 13.
2d.

has been cancelled by Grieseb., Matthæi, Scholz, Lach., Tisch., and Alf.; perhaps rightly; since internal evidence is against the word.

44. ἔστι σῶμα ψυχικόν, &c.] These words are meant to throw light on what has been said at vv. 42—44; but, as there seems something awkward, Gerdes. would suppose a confusion in the whole passage; in order to effectually remove which he recommends a transposition of vv. 45, 46. This, however, will not be necessary if we suppose, with Photius ap. Œcum. and Heydenr., that the clause ἔστι σῶμα ψυχ.—πνευματικόν with its illustration in ver. 45 is interposed between vv. 44 and 46 (which verses are closely connected together), to show the meaning intended to be affixed to the words ψυχικόν and πνευματικόν. In order to complete the sense, we must supply, from the subject-matter, the words 'to every human being so sown in corruption.'

45. οὕτω γέγραπται] Namely, in Gen. ii. 7; but the quotation terminates at ζῶσαν. Indeed, it is, properly speaking, not a citation, but only an application of the words of Scripture; in which also, for adaptation's sake, πρῶτος and Ἀδὰμ are inserted. To this clause, thus brought forward, the Apostle subjoins an apodosis, in the words ὁ ἔσχατος Ἀδὰμ εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποι., which are formed on our Lord's words at John v. 26; see also v. 21. vi. 33. By ζῶσαν ψυχὴν is properly meant 'a living, sentient creature; but in the application made of the passage by the Apostle, it must mean more; namely, 'a vital principle,' intended for immortality, but lost by sin, and only to be restored by the last Adam, the antitype of the first, i. e. Christ, who is elsewhere so called; see Rom. v. 14.

46. 'In order to see clearly the object of these verses we must keep in view what the Apostle says in the following verses. The two principles, of which the one was operative in Adam, the other in Christ, are repeated in the Christian—the physical, or animal, life is the basis upon which the spiritual erects itself.' (Billr.) And so Hyper., Bulling., and Calv.—ἀλλ' οὐ πρῶτον τὸ πνευμ., &c. Supply σῶμά ἐστι. These words are to be referred, not to ver. 45, which immediately precedes, but to the last words of ver. 44, ἔστι σῶμα ψυχικόν, καὶ ἔστι σῶμα πνευματικόν, since that might suggest a question why the spiritualized body might not have preceded the animal body. To this the answer is (by a reference to the Divine decree), that the animal must precede, the spiritual follow. The reason for this procedure is suggested in the very nature of the terms themselves, ψυχικός and πνευματικός, which imply that the latter is far more perfect than the former: since it is agreeable to the usual course of God's operations, both in the physical and moral world, that the more perfect should succeed the less perfect (and not vices versa), and from the natural to proceed to the supernatural. The Apostle, however, intimates the reason for this procedure more clearly in the verses following.

47. ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος—οὐρανοῦ] The first and second man are here opposed to each other, as at ver. 45 the first and last Adam; and as, in the former case, the second Adam is Christ, so here the second man must be so too. The best Expositors are agreed that ἐξ οὐρανοῦ must refer to the heavenly original of Christ; thus making him superhuman and Divine; see Bp. Bull's Jud. Eccl. Cathol. v. 5, and Dr. Smith's Script. Test. vol. ii. p. 121.

—χοϊκός is a very rare word, found neither in the Class. writers, nor in the Sept., and prob. occurring no where else. It is explained by Hesych. Lex. τῆλινος, 'formed of clay.' Prob. the Apostle had in mind Job x. 9, τῆλινος με ἐπλασας. xxxiii. 6, ἐκ τῆλινος διηρτισμεθα. As χοϊκός and ἐπουράνιος are here opposed, so in Lucian, Icarom. c. 2, are the parallel terms ἐπίγειος and ὑπερεπίφαιος.

48, 49. The full sense here may be expressed in paraphrase as follows: 'As [was] the earthly [man, Adam], such also are [in origin] those that are earthy (i. e. they live in an animal and corruptible body as he did); and [on the other hand] as is the heavenly [man, CHRIST], so are also they that are [to be] heavenly (i. e. to have glorious and immortal bodies). And as we have borne, and do bear (for ἰσφορ. may signify both), in our bodies the image (or characteristics) of the earthy [man, Adam,—namely, in frailty, sin, sorrow, and death]; so shall we [at the resurrection] bear the stamp of the heavenly man, [CHRIST], viz. resemble him in our glorified and immortal frames. The word εἰκὼς is, as Kypke observes, used properly of statues, pictures, &c., formed after an archetype, and consequently representing it exactly.

οἷος ὁ ἐπουράνιος, τοιοῦτοι καὶ οἱ ἐπουράνιοι <sup>49</sup> καὶ καθὼς <sup>h Gen. 2. 2. John 8. 21. Rom. 8. 29. 2 Cor. 3. 18. 2 Phil. 3. 21. 1 John 3. 2. 1 ch. 6. 12.</sup> ἐφορέσαμεν τὴν εἰκόνα τοῦ χοϊκοῦ, φορέσομεν καὶ τὴν εἰκόνα τοῦ ἐπουρανίου. <sup>50</sup> Τοῦτο δέ φημι, ἀδελφοί, ὅτι σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα βασιλείαν Θεοῦ κληρονομήσαι οὐ δύνανται, οὐδὲ ἡ φθορὰ τὴν ἀφθαρσίαν κληρονομεῖ. <sup>51</sup> Ἴδου, μυστήριον ὑμῖν λέγω πάν- <sup>1 Thess. 4. 15—17.</sup>

49. φορέσομεν] Most of the ancient MSS. with the Vulg. and Italic Versions, and several Fathers, chiefly Latin, have φορίσωμεν, which has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but not on good grounds; since, besides that the letters o and ω are very frequently confounded, the course of the Apostle's reasoning requires—as will appear from the able discussions in Crell., Est., and Gerdes,—the Fut. Indicat., and not the Subjunct.; for, as Est. observes, 'it is said of a thing future, i. e. what kind of body we shall receive at the resurrection; there being here a continuation of the doctrine of the resurrection, and a sort of explanation of it' Chrys., indeed, as did Tertullian before him, regards the term as hortative, and consequently doctrinal. But to that view well-founded objections have been stated by Theodor. and Theophyl., who, together with Calv., have shown that the Apostle means not here to speak of acquirement of life, but the resurrection of the just. Finally, the reading -σομεν is confirmed by the most ancient of MSS., the Vat. B, and, of Versions, by the Pesch. Syr.; to which I add all the Lamb., and nearly all the Mus. copies.

50. Thus far the Apostle has shown the possibility that God should give us, at the resurrection, bodies very different from our present ones. He now shows the impossibility that those bodies should be, like our present ones, of flesh and blood,—mortal, frail, and continually changing.

—τοῦτο δέ φημι, ἀδελφοί, ὅτι σὰρξ, &c.] Of this verse (on which Expositors have differed more than might have been expected) Dr. Peile expresses the general sense as follows: 'But this I admit, brethren,—thus far I go along with the objections started at ver. 35,—that this mortal body is not that body in which we may be glorified with him: that would involve a physical and a moral incompatibility, and cannot be.' The above, however, though it aims at presenting the general sense, yet is the less likely to be the true one, from the great violence it does to the words of the original, which, to convey such a meaning, must be not a little strained. Certainly φημι cannot possibly signify admit,—a sense which the word is no where found to bear even in the writers of late Grecism. To express that ὁμολογέω, or some such term, would have been required. Add to this that here the word can only have such a sense as is suitable to the formula which went before it, ch. vii. 29, where see note, and such as is subservient to the introduction of a weighty truth (to which attention is thus drawn) and that bearing on the whole matter treated of both in the preceding and the following context, especially the latter. Now this truth is one the more suitable to be inculcated here, from its important bearing on the general doctrine (namely, the resurrection of the dead) now at large set forth by the Apostle. And so here, as in the other passage, the formula in question has reference both to the preceding

and the following context,—the latter as referred to what is said in the subsequent verses respecting the transfiguration of our mortal bodies. In this view it is remarked by Stenensen, that the formula is one of customary use by the Apostle to intimate that he is going to explain and further unfold something that he had been before saying. Thus here he intimates thereby that he is about to bring forward the sum and substance of the things which have been thus far considered. Upon the whole, it would seem best to suppose the reference to be, as at ch. vii. 29, to both what precedes and what follows, and that explanation of the subject generally, in sum and substance, is what is here intended. Such seems to have been the view taken by Grot., as it certainly was by Bullinger.

—οὐ δύνανται] i. e. 'cannot in the nature of things.' Κληρον. here signifies simply 'possess and enjoy.' The words οὐδὲ ἡ φθορὰ τὴν ἀφθ. κλ. are exegetical of the preceding: 'It is not possible, I say, for those fleshly, corruptible, and mortal frames to enjoy a place fitted for incorruptible and immortal beings.'

51—53. Here commences the third part of the discourse, which is more especially intended for those who, while admitting the doctrine of a resurrection of the body, staggered at the manner, time, and other circumstances. The preceding verse seems to have been intended as a connecting link, to unite what is said from vv. 34—50 inclusive, to what is said at vv. 51—57. Or (as Calvin understands it), having, 1st, shown that there will be a resurrection of the dead,—and, 2ndly, pointed out of what kind it will be, the Apostle now enters into a more minute description of the manner [spec. for the sake of those who stumbled at that only], which he calls a mystery, because it had been hitherto not unfolded in Scripture, and also for the purpose of drawing greater attention to what he is saying.

51. Ἴδου, μυστήριον ὑμῖν λέγω, &c.] Having sufficiently shown how the objections and cavils of the adversaries were to be removed and refuted, and the belief of the faithful fortified, the Apostle now proceeds to communicate, for their information, some new and most important mysteries of the faith; certain verities hitherto quite unknown, and which could be derived from no other source but a Divine revelation,—spec. of the transmutation, and, as it were, transfiguration of those faithful servants of Christ who shall be found alive at the last day, and of the incorruptibility and immortality to be communicated; intermixing some intimations as to the manner and the order of events which shall usher in the last great day. I would regard this verse as forming the connecting link between the portion which precedes and that which follows. The Apostle proceeds to meet the doubts and surmises of certain, who staggered at the circumstances, the how and the when, &c., of this resurrection. In order to clear up which doubts and difficulties, the Apostle appeals to the principle of acknowledged authority [knowing, as the philosophical BACON has well pointed out, that 'of all means to fortify belief the most potent is authority; for others, on reason and experience, will stagger']—and that an authority from which there is no appeal, even to Christ Jesus, the Revealer of the mysteries of God, he who, as 'the Only Begotten Son of God,' hath 'emphatically 'revealed and declared him,' John i., and who, as such, is characterized, at Eph. i. 9, as having 'made known to us the mystery of his will' (even the calling of the Gentiles). Thus the scope and general sense of the Apostle's words may be expressed as follows: 'Now, as to these doubts and difficulties, behold! I have a mysterious revelation to announce to you, which is no other than this, We shall not all, &c.' The general force of the words ἐν ἀτόμῳ, ἐν ῥιπῇ, ἐν τῇ ἐσχάτῃ σάλπυνγι is ably pointed out by Crell., who remarks that the formula, ἐν τῇ ἐσχάτῃ σάλπυνγι, is meant to pave the way for, and in some sense to commend, the sentiment about to be propounded to the attention of the Corinthians. It is well adapted to serve this purpose, since it has the force of calling their attention to what was both new and momentous,—a matter at once of wonder and of joy. By μυστήριον is here meant a thing hitherto unknown, and not to be known without a Divine revelation. 'Ἀλλάσσεσθαι is here put for μετασχηματίζεσθαι, Phil. iii. 21, or μεταμορφοῦσθαι, Matt. xvii. 2. Render: 'We shall not indeed all of us die; but we shall (i. e. must) all be changed (i. e. undergo a transmutation, in order to incorruptibility) before we can enter into heaven;' meaning, 'All must undergo the change necessary to fit them for immortality, both those alive and those dead. The latter, after previous death and corruption, on being again restored to life, shall receive a glorified body; the former without having undergone death and corruption, being alive, shall be so changed, that the mortal body shall be absorbed by an immortal one (2 Cor. v. 4); and those parts of the body, which are incapable of eternal life and heavenly felicity, shall be separated and cast aside; while those, which may furnish the materials of a glorified body, shall remain and be preserved, and assume a form and fashion suited to eternity.'

1<sup>a</sup> 1 Thess. 4. ΤΕΣ ΜΕΝ ΟΥ ΚΟΙΜΗΘΗΣΟΜΕΘΑ, ΠΑΝΤΕΣ ΔΕ ΑΛΛΑΓΗΣΟΜΕΘΑ, 52 <sup>h</sup> ἐν ἀτόμῳ, ἐν ῥιπῇ ὀφθαλμοῦ, ἐν τῇ ἐσχάτῃ σάλπυνγι· (σαλπίσει γὰρ, καὶ οἱ νεκροὶ ἐγερθήσονται ἄφθαρτοι, καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀλλαγῶ-

The use of the first person (we) will not prove that the Apostle thought the day of judgment to be so near at hand, that he and his contemporaries might see it, since (as the best Expositors are agreed) it appears to be used per κοινισμόν; the Apostle here speaking in the person of those alive at the last day, or, at least, meaning thereby to designate such as should be found alive.

52. The Apostle now indicates the manner of this change, as being most sudden; for ἐν ἀτόμῳ (scil. χρόνῳ) and ἐν ῥιπῇ were, say our Expositors, expressions to denote 'the shortest conceivable time.' True; but the latter phrase is not to be dismissed so summarily, it being peculiar, and, from its extreme rarity of occurrence it is not easily to be determined to any fixed sense. The rendering of our Authorized Version,—'in the twinkling of an eye,' has been thought by Wakef. and others unsatisfactory; and they would render, 'in the glance of an eye.' But 'glance' implies reference to some object of vision; which here would be irrelevant. Not to say that the expression ἐν ῥιπῇ ὀφθαλμοῦ admits not of such a sense (which would, indeed, require ἐν προσβολῇ ὀφθ., found in Aristid. and Philo), and can only denote 'the period of time occupied by such a ῥιπῇ ὀφθαλμοῦ,' and thus may well serve to express 'the briefest possible period of time.' As respects the rendering of our Authorized Version,—'twinkling of an eye,' there is no good reason to reject it, the term being well adapted to denote the space of time (the briefest possible) here meant. And this is confirmed by what Jerome says, that 'nostrī interpretati sunt in ictu oculi.' Perhaps he wrote in visione, for visitatione. Such is the use of the term twinkling, by Chaucer in his 'Romance of the Rose,' where it is said of Fortune: 'Now friend, now foe, shall her feeble; For a twinkling turneth her wheel.'—ἐν ἐσχάτῃ σάλπυνγι] To discuss, with some, the number of trumpets to be sounded, is quite irrelevant; though the opinion that there will be seven trumpets has some countenance from a passage of Rev. x. 7, where the seventh trumpet is the solemn announcement that the mystery of God is accomplished. We may here suppose an allusion to the custom both of the Jews and Greeks, by which summons to judicature, or other meetings for civil or religious purposes, were signified by sound of trumpet; yet I cannot agree with Heydenr., who would resolve all into metaphor. We cannot surely venture to infer less from the plain words of the Apostle, than that the Almighty will issue his FLAT for the solemn convocation of the dead and living,—if not by sound of a trumpet literally, yet by some notable external sign; but of what nature, we must not presume to pronounce.—καὶ οἱ νεκροί, &c. In the καὶ there is an implied notion of instantaneous performance. See Pa. xxxiii. 9. cxlviii. 5. Judith xvi. 14. Job v. 20. By ἡμεῖς is meant ἡμεῖς οἱ τότε ζῶντες; the Apostle here, as before, speaking not in his own person, but in that of the persons then alive.—καὶ ἡμ. ἀλλαγῶμεθα, signif. 'and then we shall undergo the change in question, receive incorruptible in the place of corruptible bodies.' This use of καὶ is meant, observes Gerdan, 'to advert first to the resurrection of the dead, and then to the future change before spoken of.' From a comparison of this passage with the parallel one at 1 Thess. iv. 17, it plainly appears that by the ἡμεῖς here is to be understood the ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες, scil. περιλειπόμενοι, there. But from neither expression can it be justly inferred that the Apostle expected to be one of those then living. Expositors, ancient and modern, are agreed that St. Paul speaks κατὰ μετασχηματισμόν, per κοινισμόν, meaning thus to designate those, whoever they might be, who should be then alive.

μεθα·) <sup>53</sup> <sup>1</sup> δὲ γὰρ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσασθαι ἀφθαρσίαν, <sup>1</sup> <sup>2</sup> <sup>3</sup> <sup>4</sup> <sup>5</sup> <sup>6</sup> <sup>7</sup> <sup>8</sup> <sup>9</sup> <sup>10</sup> <sup>11</sup> <sup>12</sup> <sup>13</sup> <sup>14</sup> <sup>15</sup> <sup>16</sup> <sup>17</sup> <sup>18</sup> <sup>19</sup> <sup>20</sup> <sup>21</sup> <sup>22</sup> <sup>23</sup> <sup>24</sup> <sup>25</sup> <sup>26</sup> <sup>27</sup> <sup>28</sup> <sup>29</sup> <sup>30</sup> <sup>31</sup> <sup>32</sup> <sup>33</sup> <sup>34</sup> <sup>35</sup> <sup>36</sup> <sup>37</sup> <sup>38</sup> <sup>39</sup> <sup>40</sup> <sup>41</sup> <sup>42</sup> <sup>43</sup> <sup>44</sup> <sup>45</sup> <sup>46</sup> <sup>47</sup> <sup>48</sup> <sup>49</sup> <sup>50</sup> <sup>51</sup> <sup>52</sup> <sup>53</sup> <sup>54</sup> <sup>55</sup> <sup>56</sup> <sup>57</sup> <sup>58</sup> <sup>59</sup> <sup>60</sup> <sup>61</sup> <sup>62</sup> <sup>63</sup> <sup>64</sup> <sup>65</sup> <sup>66</sup> <sup>67</sup> <sup>68</sup> <sup>69</sup> <sup>70</sup> <sup>71</sup> <sup>72</sup> <sup>73</sup> <sup>74</sup> <sup>75</sup> <sup>76</sup> <sup>77</sup> <sup>78</sup> <sup>79</sup> <sup>80</sup> <sup>81</sup> <sup>82</sup> <sup>83</sup> <sup>84</sup> <sup>85</sup> <sup>86</sup> <sup>87</sup> <sup>88</sup> <sup>89</sup> <sup>90</sup> <sup>91</sup> <sup>92</sup> <sup>93</sup> <sup>94</sup> <sup>95</sup> <sup>96</sup> <sup>97</sup> <sup>98</sup> <sup>99</sup> <sup>100</sup> <sup>101</sup> <sup>102</sup> <sup>103</sup> <sup>104</sup> <sup>105</sup> <sup>106</sup> <sup>107</sup> <sup>108</sup> <sup>109</sup> <sup>110</sup> <sup>111</sup> <sup>112</sup> <sup>113</sup> <sup>114</sup> <sup>115</sup> <sup>116</sup> <sup>117</sup> <sup>118</sup> <sup>119</sup> <sup>120</sup> <sup>121</sup> <sup>122</sup> <sup>123</sup> <sup>124</sup> <sup>125</sup> <sup>126</sup> <sup>127</sup> <sup>128</sup> <sup>129</sup> <sup>130</sup> <sup>131</sup> <sup>132</sup> <sup>133</sup> <sup>134</sup> <sup>135</sup> <sup>136</sup> <sup>137</sup> <sup>138</sup> <sup>139</sup> <sup>140</sup> <sup>141</sup> <sup>142</sup> <sup>143</sup> <sup>144</sup> <sup>145</sup> <sup>146</sup> <sup>147</sup> <sup>148</sup> <sup>149</sup> <sup>150</sup> <sup>151</sup> <sup>152</sup> <sup>153</sup> <sup>154</sup> <sup>155</sup> <sup>156</sup> <sup>157</sup> <sup>158</sup> <sup>159</sup> <sup>160</sup> <sup>161</sup> <sup>162</sup> <sup>163</sup> <sup>164</sup> <sup>165</sup> <sup>166</sup> <sup>167</sup> <sup>168</sup> <sup>169</sup> <sup>170</sup> <sup>171</sup> <sup>172</sup> <sup>173</sup> <sup>174</sup> <sup>175</sup> <sup>176</sup> <sup>177</sup> <sup>178</sup> <sup>179</sup> <sup>180</sup> <sup>181</sup> <sup>182</sup> <sup>183</sup> <sup>184</sup> <sup>185</sup> <sup>186</sup> <sup>187</sup> <sup>188</sup> <sup>189</sup> <sup>190</sup> <sup>191</sup> <sup>192</sup> <sup>193</sup> <sup>194</sup> <sup>195</sup> <sup>196</sup> <sup>197</sup> <sup>198</sup> <sup>199</sup> <sup>200</sup> <sup>201</sup> <sup>202</sup> <sup>203</sup> <sup>204</sup> <sup>205</sup> <sup>206</sup> <sup>207</sup> <sup>208</sup> <sup>209</sup> <sup>210</sup> <sup>211</sup> <sup>212</sup> <sup>213</sup> <sup>214</sup> <sup>215</sup> <sup>216</sup> <sup>217</sup> <sup>218</sup> <sup>219</sup> <sup>220</sup> <sup>221</sup> <sup>222</sup> <sup>223</sup> <sup>224</sup> <sup>225</sup> <sup>226</sup> <sup>227</sup> <sup>228</sup> <sup>229</sup> <sup>230</sup> <sup>231</sup> <sup>232</sup> <sup>233</sup> <sup>234</sup> <sup>235</sup> <sup>236</sup> <sup>237</sup> <sup>238</sup> <sup>239</sup> <sup>240</sup> <sup>241</sup> <sup>242</sup> <sup>243</sup> <sup>244</sup> <sup>245</sup> <sup>246</sup> <sup>247</sup> <sup>248</sup> <sup>249</sup> <sup>250</sup> <sup>251</sup> <sup>252</sup> <sup>253</sup> <sup>254</sup> <sup>255</sup> <sup>256</sup> <sup>257</sup> <sup>258</sup> <sup>259</sup> <sup>260</sup> <sup>261</sup> <sup>262</sup> <sup>263</sup> <sup>264</sup> <sup>265</sup> <sup>266</sup> <sup>267</sup> <sup>268</sup> <sup>269</sup> <sup>270</sup> <sup>271</sup> <sup>272</sup> <sup>273</sup> <sup>274</sup> <sup>275</sup> <sup>276</sup> <sup>277</sup> <sup>278</sup> <sup>279</sup> <sup>280</sup> <sup>281</sup> <sup>282</sup> <sup>283</sup> <sup>284</sup> <sup>285</sup> <sup>286</sup> <sup>287</sup> <sup>288</sup> <sup>289</sup> <sup>290</sup> <sup>291</sup> <sup>292</sup> <sup>293</sup> <sup>294</sup> <sup>295</sup> <sup>296</sup> <sup>297</sup> <sup>298</sup> <sup>299</sup> <sup>300</sup> <sup>301</sup> <sup>302</sup> <sup>303</sup> <sup>304</sup> <sup>305</sup> <sup>306</sup> <sup>307</sup> <sup>308</sup> <sup>309</sup> <sup>310</sup> <sup>311</sup> <sup>312</sup> <sup>313</sup> <sup>314</sup> <sup>315</sup> <sup>316</sup> <sup>317</sup> <sup>318</sup> <sup>319</sup> <sup>320</sup> <sup>321</sup> <sup>322</sup> <sup>323</sup> <sup>324</sup> <sup>325</sup> <sup>326</sup> <sup>327</sup> <sup>328</sup> <sup>329</sup> <sup>330</sup> <sup>331</sup> <sup>332</sup> <sup>333</sup> <sup>334</sup> <sup>335</sup> <sup>336</sup> <sup>337</sup> <sup>338</sup> <sup>339</sup> <sup>340</sup> <sup>341</sup> <sup>342</sup> <sup>343</sup> <sup>344</sup> <sup>345</sup> <sup>346</sup> <sup>347</sup> <sup>348</sup> <sup>349</sup> <sup>350</sup> <sup>351</sup> <sup>352</sup> <sup>353</sup> <sup>354</sup> <sup>355</sup> <sup>356</sup> <sup>357</sup> <sup>358</sup> <sup>359</sup> <sup>360</sup> <sup>361</sup> <sup>362</sup> <sup>363</sup> <sup>364</sup> <sup>365</sup> <sup>366</sup> <sup>367</sup> <sup>368</sup> <sup>369</sup> <sup>370</sup> <sup>371</sup> <sup>372</sup> <sup>373</sup> <sup>374</sup> <sup>375</sup> <sup>376</sup> <sup>377</sup> <sup>378</sup> <sup>379</sup> <sup>380</sup> <sup>381</sup> <sup>382</sup> <sup>383</sup> <sup>384</sup> <sup>385</sup> <sup>386</sup> <sup>387</sup> <sup>388</sup> <sup>389</sup> <sup>390</sup> <sup>391</sup> <sup>392</sup> <sup>393</sup> <sup>394</sup> <sup>395</sup> <sup>396</sup> <sup>397</sup> <sup>398</sup> <sup>399</sup> <sup>400</sup> <sup>401</sup> <sup>402</sup> <sup>403</sup> <sup>404</sup> <sup>405</sup> <sup>406</sup> <sup>407</sup> <sup>408</sup> <sup>409</sup> <sup>410</sup> <sup>411</sup> <sup>412</sup> <sup>413</sup> <sup>414</sup> <sup>415</sup> <sup>416</sup> <sup>417</sup> <sup>418</sup> <sup>419</sup> <sup>420</sup> <sup>421</sup> <sup>422</sup> <sup>423</sup> <sup>424</sup> <sup>425</sup> <sup>426</sup> <sup>427</sup> <sup>428</sup> <sup>429</sup> <sup>430</sup> <sup>431</sup> <sup>432</sup> <sup>433</sup> <sup>434</sup> <sup>435</sup> <sup>436</sup> <sup>437</sup> <sup>438</sup> <sup>439</sup> <sup>440</sup> <sup>441</sup> <sup>442</sup> <sup>443</sup> <sup>444</sup> <sup>445</sup> <sup>446</sup> <sup>447</sup> <sup>448</sup> <sup>449</sup> <sup>450</sup> <sup>451</sup> <sup>452</sup> <sup>453</sup> <sup>454</sup> <sup>455</sup> <sup>456</sup> <sup>457</sup> <sup>458</sup> <sup>459</sup> <sup>460</sup> <sup>461</sup> <sup>462</sup> <sup>463</sup> <sup>464</sup> <sup>465</sup> <sup>466</sup> <sup>467</sup> <sup>468</sup> <sup>469</sup> <sup>470</sup> <sup>471</sup> <sup>472</sup> <sup>473</sup> <sup>474</sup> <sup>475</sup> <sup>476</sup> <sup>477</sup> <sup>478</sup> <sup>479</sup> <sup>480</sup> <sup>481</sup> <sup>482</sup> <sup>483</sup> <sup>484</sup> <sup>485</sup> <sup>486</sup> <sup>487</sup> <sup>488</sup> <sup>489</sup> <sup>490</sup> <sup>491</sup> <sup>492</sup> <sup>493</sup> <sup>494</sup> <sup>495</sup> <sup>496</sup> <sup>497</sup> <sup>498</sup> <sup>499</sup> <sup>500</sup> <sup>501</sup> <sup>502</sup> <sup>503</sup> <sup>504</sup> <sup>505</sup> <sup>506</sup> <sup>507</sup> <sup>508</sup> <sup>509</sup> <sup>510</sup> <sup>511</sup> <sup>512</sup> <sup>513</sup> <sup>514</sup> <sup>515</sup> <sup>516</sup> <sup>517</sup> <sup>518</sup> <sup>519</sup> <sup>520</sup> <sup>521</sup> <sup>522</sup> <sup>523</sup> <sup>524</sup> <sup>525</sup> <sup>526</sup> <sup>527</sup> <sup>528</sup> <sup>529</sup> <sup>530</sup> <sup>531</sup> <sup>532</sup> <sup>533</sup> <sup>534</sup> <sup>535</sup> <sup>536</sup> <sup>537</sup> <sup>538</sup> <sup>539</sup> <sup>540</sup> <sup>541</sup> <sup>542</sup> <sup>543</sup> <sup>544</sup> <sup>545</sup> <sup>546</sup> <sup>547</sup> <sup>548</sup> <sup>549</sup> <sup>550</sup> <sup>551</sup> <sup>552</sup> <sup>553</sup> <sup>554</sup> <sup>555</sup> <sup>556</sup> <sup>557</sup> <sup>558</sup> <sup>559</sup> <sup>560</sup> <sup>561</sup> <sup>562</sup> <sup>563</sup> <sup>564</sup> <sup>565</sup> <sup>566</sup> <sup>567</sup> <sup>568</sup> <sup>569</sup> <sup>570</sup> <sup>571</sup> <sup>572</sup> <sup>573</sup> <sup>574</sup> <sup>575</sup> <sup>576</sup> <sup>577</sup> <sup>578</sup> <sup>579</sup> <sup>580</sup> <sup>581</sup> <sup>582</sup> <sup>583</sup> <sup>584</sup> <sup>585</sup> <sup>586</sup> <sup>587</sup> <sup>588</sup> <sup>589</sup> <sup>590</sup> <sup>591</sup> <sup>592</sup> <sup>593</sup> <sup>594</sup> <sup>595</sup> <sup>596</sup> <sup>597</sup> <sup>598</sup> <sup>599</sup> <sup>600</sup> <sup>601</sup> <sup>602</sup> <sup>603</sup> <sup>604</sup> <sup>605</sup> <sup>606</sup> <sup>607</sup> <sup>608</sup> <sup>609</sup> <sup>610</sup> <sup>611</sup> <sup>612</sup> <sup>613</sup> <sup>614</sup> <sup>615</sup> <sup>616</sup> <sup>617</sup> <sup>618</sup> <sup>619</sup> <sup>620</sup> <sup>621</sup> <sup>622</sup> <sup>623</sup> <sup>624</sup> <sup>625</sup> <sup>626</sup> <sup>627</sup> <sup>628</sup> <sup>629</sup> <sup>630</sup> <sup>631</sup> <sup>632</sup> <sup>633</sup> <sup>634</sup> <sup>635</sup> <sup>636</sup> <sup>637</sup> <sup>638</sup> <sup>639</sup> <sup>640</sup> <sup>641</sup> <sup>642</sup> <sup>643</sup> <sup>644</sup> <sup>645</sup> <sup>646</sup> <sup>647</sup> <sup>648</sup> <sup>649</sup> <sup>650</sup> <sup>651</sup> <sup>652</sup> <sup>653</sup> <sup>654</sup> <sup>655</sup> <sup>656</sup> <sup>657</sup> <sup>658</sup> <sup>659</sup> <sup>660</sup> <sup>661</sup> <sup>662</sup> <sup>663</sup> <sup>664</sup> <sup>665</sup> <sup>666</sup> <sup>667</sup> <sup>668</sup> <sup>669</sup> <sup>670</sup> <sup>671</sup> <sup>672</sup> <sup>673</sup> <sup>674</sup> <sup>675</sup> <sup>676</sup> <sup>677</sup> <sup>678</sup> <sup>679</sup> <sup>680</sup> <sup>681</sup> <sup>682</sup> <sup>683</sup> <sup>684</sup> <sup>685</sup> <sup>686</sup> <sup>687</sup> <sup>688</sup> <sup>689</sup> <sup>690</sup> <sup>691</sup> <sup>692</sup> <sup>693</sup> <sup>694</sup> <sup>695</sup> <sup>696</sup> <sup>697</sup> <sup>698</sup> <sup>699</sup> <sup>700</sup> <sup>701</sup> <sup>702</sup> <sup>703</sup> <sup>704</sup> <sup>705</sup> <sup>706</sup> <sup>707</sup> <sup>708</sup> <sup>709</sup> <sup>710</sup> <sup>711</sup> <sup>712</sup> <sup>713</sup> <sup>714</sup> <sup>715</sup> <sup>716</sup> <sup>717</sup> <sup>718</sup> <sup>719</sup> <sup>720</sup> <sup>721</sup> <sup>722</sup> <sup>723</sup> <sup>724</sup> <sup>725</sup> <sup>726</sup> <sup>727</sup> <sup>728</sup> <sup>729</sup> <sup>730</sup> <sup>731</sup> <sup>732</sup> <sup>733</sup> <sup>734</sup> <sup>735</sup> <sup>736</sup> <sup>737</sup> <sup>738</sup> <sup>739</sup> <sup>740</sup> <sup>741</sup> <sup>742</sup> <sup>743</sup> <sup>744</sup> <sup>745</sup> <sup>746</sup> <sup>747</sup> <sup>748</sup> <sup>749</sup> <sup>750</sup> <sup>751</sup> <sup>752</sup> <sup>753</sup> <sup>754</sup> <sup>755</sup> <sup>756</sup> <sup>757</sup> <sup>758</sup> <sup>759</sup> <sup>760</sup> <sup>761</sup> <sup>762</sup> <sup>763</sup> <sup>764</sup> <sup>765</sup> <sup>766</sup> <sup>767</sup> <sup>768</sup> <sup>769</sup> <sup>770</sup> <sup>771</sup> <sup>772</sup> <sup>773</sup> <sup>774</sup> <sup>775</sup> <sup>776</sup> <sup>777</sup> <sup>778</sup> <sup>779</sup> <sup>780</sup> <sup>781</sup> <sup>782</sup> <sup>783</sup> <sup>784</sup> <sup>785</sup> <sup>786</sup> <sup>787</sup> <sup>788</sup> <sup>789</sup> <sup>790</sup> <sup>791</sup> <sup>792</sup> <sup>793</sup> <sup>794</sup> <sup>795</sup> <sup>796</sup> <sup>797</sup> <sup>798</sup> <sup>799</sup> <sup>800</sup> <sup>801</sup> <sup>802</sup> <sup>803</sup> <sup>804</sup> <sup>805</sup> <sup>806</sup> <sup>807</sup> <sup>808</sup> <sup>809</sup> <sup>810</sup> <sup>811</sup> <sup>812</sup> <sup>813</sup> <sup>814</sup> <sup>815</sup> <sup>816</sup> <sup>817</sup> <sup>818</sup> <sup>819</sup> <sup>820</sup> <sup>821</sup> <sup>822</sup> <sup>823</sup> <sup>824</sup> <sup>825</sup> <sup>826</sup> <sup>827</sup> <sup>828</sup> <sup>829</sup> <sup>830</sup> <sup>831</sup> <sup>832</sup> <sup>833</sup> <sup>834</sup> <sup>835</sup> <sup>836</sup> <sup>837</sup> <sup>838</sup> <sup>839</sup> <sup>840</sup> <sup>841</sup> <sup>842</sup> <sup>843</sup> <sup>844</sup> <sup>845</sup> <sup>846</sup> <sup>847</sup> <sup>848</sup> <sup>849</sup> <sup>850</sup> <sup>851</sup> <sup>852</sup> <sup>853</sup> <sup>854</sup> <sup>855</sup> <sup>856</sup> <sup>857</sup> <sup>858</sup> <sup>859</sup> <sup>860</sup> <sup>861</sup> <sup>862</sup> <sup>863</sup> <sup>864</sup> <sup>865</sup> <sup>866</sup> <sup>867</sup> <sup>868</sup> <sup>869</sup> <sup>870</sup> <sup>871</sup> <sup>872</sup> <sup>873</sup> <sup>874</sup> <sup>875</sup> <sup>876</sup> <sup>877</sup> <sup>878</sup> <sup>879</sup> <sup>880</sup> <sup>881</sup> <sup>882</sup> <sup>883</sup> <sup>884</sup> <sup>885</sup> <sup>886</sup> <sup>887</sup> <sup>888</sup> <sup>889</sup> <sup>890</sup> <sup>891</sup> <sup>892</sup> <sup>893</sup> <sup>894</sup> <sup>895</sup> <sup>896</sup> <sup>897</sup> <sup>898</sup> <sup>899</sup> <sup>900</sup> <sup>901</sup> <sup>902</sup> <sup>903</sup> <sup>904</sup> <sup>905</sup> <sup>906</sup> <sup>907</sup> <sup>908</sup> <sup>909</sup> <sup>910</sup> <sup>911</sup> <sup>912</sup> <sup>913</sup> <sup>914</sup> <sup>915</sup> <sup>916</sup> <sup>917</sup> <sup>918</sup> <sup>919</sup> <sup>920</sup> <sup>921</sup> <sup>922</sup> <sup>923</sup> <sup>924</sup> <sup>925</sup> <sup>926</sup> <sup>927</sup> <sup>928</sup> <sup>929</sup> <sup>930</sup> <sup>931</sup> <sup>932</sup> <sup>933</sup> <sup>934</sup> <sup>935</sup> <sup>936</sup> <sup>937</sup> <sup>938</sup> <sup>939</sup> <sup>940</sup> <sup>941</sup> <sup>942</sup> <sup>943</sup> <sup>944</sup> <sup>945</sup> <sup>946</sup> <sup>947</sup> <sup>948</sup> <sup>949</sup> <sup>950</sup> <sup>951</sup> <sup>952</sup> <sup>953</sup> <sup>954</sup> <sup>955</sup> <sup>956</sup> <sup>957</sup> <sup>958</sup> <sup>959</sup> <sup>960</sup> <sup>961</sup> <sup>962</sup> <sup>963</sup> <sup>964</sup> <sup>965</sup> <sup>966</sup> <sup>967</sup> <sup>968</sup> <sup>969</sup> <sup>970</sup> <sup>971</sup> <sup>972</sup> <sup>973</sup> <sup>974</sup> <sup>975</sup> <sup>976</sup> <sup>977</sup> <sup>978</sup> <sup>979</sup> <sup>980</sup> <sup>981</sup> <sup>982</sup> <sup>983</sup> <sup>984</sup> <sup>985</sup> <sup>986</sup> <sup>987</sup> <sup>988</sup> <sup>989</sup> <sup>990</sup> <sup>991</sup> <sup>992</sup> <sup>993</sup> <sup>994</sup> <sup>995</sup> <sup>996</sup> <sup>997</sup> <sup>998</sup> <sup>999</sup> <sup>1000</sup> <sup>1001</sup> <sup>1002</sup> <sup>1003</sup> <sup>1004</sup> <sup>1005</sup> <sup>1006</sup> <sup>1007</sup> <sup>1008</sup> <sup>1009</sup> <sup>1010</sup> <sup>1011</sup> <sup>1012</sup> <sup>1013</sup> <sup>1014</sup> <sup>1015</sup> <sup>1016</sup> <sup>1017</sup> <sup>1018</sup> <sup>1019</sup> <sup>1020</sup> <sup>1021</sup> <sup>1022</sup> <sup>1023</sup> <sup>1024</sup> <sup>1025</sup> <sup>1026</sup> <sup>1027</sup> <sup>1028</sup> <sup>1029</sup> <sup>1030</sup> <sup>1031</sup> <sup>1032</sup> <sup>1033</sup> <sup>1034</sup> <sup>1035</sup> <sup>1036</sup> <sup>1037</sup> <sup>1038</sup> <sup>1039</sup> <sup>1040</sup> <sup>1041</sup> <sup>1042</sup> <sup>1043</sup> <sup>1044</sup> <sup>1045</sup> <sup>1046</sup> <sup>1047</sup> <sup>1048</sup> <sup>1049</sup> <sup>1050</sup> <sup>1051</sup> <sup>1052</sup> <sup>1053</sup> <sup>1054</sup> <sup>1055</sup> <sup>1056</sup> <sup>1057</sup> <sup>1058</sup> <sup>1059</sup> <sup>1060</sup> <sup>1061</sup> <sup>1062</sup> <sup>1063</sup> <sup>1064</sup> <sup>1065</sup> <sup>1066</sup> <sup>1067</sup> <sup>1068</sup> <sup>1069</sup> <sup>1070</sup> <sup>1071</sup> <sup>1072</sup> <sup>1073</sup> <sup>1074</sup> <sup>1075</sup> <sup>1076</sup> <sup>1077</sup> <sup>1078</sup> <sup>1079</sup> <sup>1080</sup> <sup>1081</sup> <sup>1082</sup> <sup>1083</sup> <sup>1084</sup> <sup>1085</sup> <sup>1086</sup> <sup>1087</sup> <sup>1088</sup> <sup>1089</sup> <sup>1090</sup> <sup>1091</sup> <sup>1092</sup> <sup>1093</sup> <sup>1094</sup> <sup>1095</sup> <sup>1096</sup> <sup>1097</sup> <sup>1098</sup> <sup>1099</sup> <sup>1100</sup> <sup>1101</sup> <sup>1102</sup> <sup>1103</sup> <sup>1104</sup> <sup>1105</sup> <sup>1106</sup> <sup>1107</sup> <sup>1108</sup> <sup>1109</sup> <sup>1110</sup> <sup>1111</sup> <sup>1112</sup> <sup>1113</sup> <sup>1114</sup> <sup>1115</sup> <sup>1116</sup> <sup>1117</sup> <sup>1118</sup> <sup>1119</sup> <sup>1120</sup> <sup>1121</sup> <sup>1122</sup> <sup>1123</sup> <sup>1124</sup> <sup>1125</sup> <sup>1126</sup> <sup>1127</sup> <sup>1128</sup> <sup>1129</sup> <sup>1130</sup> <sup>1131</sup> <sup>1132</sup> <sup>1133</sup> <sup>1134</sup> <sup>1135</sup> <sup>1136</sup> <sup>1137</sup> <sup>1138</sup> <sup>1139</sup> <sup>1140</sup> <sup>1141</sup> <sup>1142</sup> <sup>1143</sup> <sup>1144</sup> <sup>1145</sup> <sup>1146</sup> <sup>1147</sup> <sup>1148</sup> <sup>1149</sup> <sup>1150</sup> <sup>1151</sup> <sup>1152</sup> <sup>1153</sup> <sup>1154</sup> <sup>1155</sup> <sup>1156</sup> <sup>1157</sup> <sup>1158</sup> <sup>1159</sup> <sup>1160</sup> <sup>1161</sup> <sup>1162</sup> <sup>1163</sup> <sup>1164</sup> <sup>1165</sup> <sup>1166</sup> <sup>1167</sup> <sup>1168</sup> <sup>1169</sup> <sup>1170</sup> <sup>1171</sup> <sup>1172</sup> <sup>1173</sup> <sup>1174</sup> <sup>1175</sup> <sup>1176</sup> <sup>1177</sup> <sup>1178</sup> <sup>1179</sup> <sup>1180</sup> <sup>1181</sup> <sup>1182</sup> <sup>1183</sup> <sup>1184</sup> <sup>1185</sup> <sup>1186</sup> <sup>1187</sup> <sup>1188</sup> <sup>1189</sup> <sup>1190</sup> <sup>1191</sup> <sup>1192</sup> <sup>1193</sup> <sup>1194</sup> <sup>1195</sup> <sup>1196</sup> <sup>1197</sup> <sup>1198</sup> <sup>1199</sup> <sup>1200</sup> <sup>1201</sup> <sup>1202</sup> <sup>1203</sup> <sup>1204</sup> <sup>1205</sup> <sup>1206</sup> <sup>1207</sup> <sup>1208</sup> <sup>1209</sup> <sup>1210</sup> <sup>1211</sup> <sup>1212</sup> <sup>1213</sup> <sup>1214</sup> <sup>1215</sup> <sup>1216</sup> <sup>1217</sup> <sup>1218</sup> <sup>1219</sup> <sup>1220</sup> <sup>1221</sup> <sup>1222</sup> <sup>1223</sup> <sup>1224</sup> <sup>1225</sup> <sup>1226</sup> <sup>1227</sup> <sup>1228</sup> <sup>1229</sup> <sup>1230</sup> <sup>1231</sup> <sup>1232</sup> <sup>1233</sup> <sup>1234</sup> <sup>1235</sup> <sup>1236</sup> <sup>1237</sup> <sup>1238</sup> <sup>1239</sup> <sup>1240</sup> <sup>1241</sup> <sup>1242</sup> <sup>1243</sup> <sup>1244</sup> <sup>1245</sup> <sup>1246</sup> <sup>1247</sup> <sup>1248</sup> <sup>1249</sup> <sup>1250</sup> <sup>1251</sup> <sup>1252</sup> <sup>1253</sup> <sup>1254</sup> <sup>1255</sup> <sup>1256</sup> <sup>1257</sup> <sup>1258</sup> <sup>1259</sup> <sup>1260</sup> <sup>1261</sup> <sup>1262</sup> <sup>1263</sup> <sup>1264</sup> <sup>1265</sup> <sup>1266</sup> <sup>1267</sup> <sup>1268</sup> <sup>1269</sup> <sup>1270</sup> <sup>1271</sup> <sup>1272</sup> <sup>1273</sup> <sup>1274</sup> <sup>1275</sup> <sup>1276</sup> <sup>1277</sup> <sup>1278</sup> <sup>1279</sup> <sup>1280</sup> <sup>1281</sup> <sup>1282</sup> <sup>1283</sup> <sup>1284</sup> <sup>1285</sup> <sup>1286</sup> <sup>1287</sup> <sup>1288</sup> <sup>1289</sup> <sup>1290</sup> <sup>1291</sup> <sup>1292</sup> <sup>1293</sup> <sup>1294</sup> <sup>1295</sup> <sup>1296</sup> <sup>1297</sup> <sup>1298</sup> <sup>1299</sup> <sup>1300</sup> <sup>1301</sup> <sup>1302</sup> <sup>1303</sup> <sup>1304</sup> <sup>1305</sup> <sup>1306</sup> <sup>1307</sup> <sup>1308</sup> <sup>1309</sup> <sup>1310</sup> <sup>1311</sup> <sup>1312</sup> <sup>1313</sup> <sup>1314</sup> <sup>1315</sup> <sup>1316</sup> <sup>1317</sup> <sup>1318</sup> <sup>1319</sup> <sup>1320</sup> <sup>1321</sup> <sup>1322</sup> <sup>1323</sup> <sup>1324</sup> <sup>1325</sup> <sup>1326</sup> <sup>1327</sup> <sup>1328</sup> <sup>1329</sup> <sup>1330</sup> <sup>1331</sup> <sup>1332</sup> <sup>1333</sup>

φθαρτὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσεται ἀφθαρσίαν, καὶ τὸ θνητὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσεται ἀθανασίαν, τότε γενήσεται ὁ λόγος ὁ γεγραμμένος· Κατεπόθη ὁ θάνατος εἰς νίκος. <sup>55</sup> Πού σου, θάνατε, τὸ

η Rom. 5. 12.
ε 2. 30.
ε 7. 5.

ο 1 John 5. 5.
Rom. 7. 25.
ε 2. 37.

κέντρον; πού σου, ἄδη, τὸ νίκος; <sup>56</sup> (τὸ δὲ κέντρον τοῦ θανάτου ἡ ἁμαρτία· ἡ δὲ δύναμις τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὁ νόμος.)

<sup>57</sup> Ὁ τῷ δὲ Θεῷ χάρις τῷ διδόντι ἡμῖν τὸ νίκος διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ! <sup>58</sup> Ὡστε, ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί, ἐδραῖοι

the force of the antithetic parallelism, cannot but mean in æternum. Or it may be for the purer Greek εἰς τέλος (sometimes used by the Sept.), and that equiv. to εἰς παντελὲς = πανταχῶς, 'entirely.' Thus εἰς denotes 'end,' or 'purpose,'—what any thing finally tends to.

<sup>55</sup>. In this verse the style rises, by a bold personification of Ἀϊδης, to the highest pitch, and the sense is couched in a kind of song of triumph for the victory obtained by Christ over Death and the Grave; whatever of bitterness either might heretofore have had, being then removed by Christ. The passage is from Hos. xiii. 14, πού τὸ κέντρον σου, ἄδη; and the Apostle's words differ only from the ancient Versions by the transposition of νίκος and κέντρον, except that for νίκος the Sept. has δίκη. But I suspect that to be only a gliss on νίκος, which reading is found in some of the Fathers, though evidently only an error of the scribes for νίκος. The Hebrew, indeed, differs too materially to admit of any mode of reconciliation. Yet it differs more in words than sense; so that it was not inapplicable to the Apostle's purpose. Dr. Henderson (after Calvin, whom he quotes) observes, that 'the appropriation of the words here made by the Apostle to the doctrine of the final resurrection is made, not in the way of proof, but merely to give expression to the animated feelings of his breast.' The term κέντρον is by some supposed to allude to the dart, which the Jewish writers, and many Classical and modern poets, depict Death as holding. See Milton's Par. Lost, b. ii. 672. The Greek Commentators, however, and of the modern ones, Grot., Crell., Vorst., and Krause (more rightly, I think, suppose an allusion to the sting of serpents or scorpions. So Rev. ix. 10, καὶ ἔχουσιν οὐράς ὁμοίας σκορπίου, καὶ κέντρα ἦν ἐν ταῖς οὐραῖς αὐτῶν. This, indeed, is exceedingly confirmed by the next words; for, as Theophyl. remarks, 'the sting of serpents constitutes their strength, and when that is taken away, they cannot hurt, if they would.' Thus the sense of the next words is,—'Now it is sin that gives death its chief power over us, and thus occasions its greatest bitterness.' For ἄδη, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read θάνατος, from 6 uncial, and 2 cursive MSS. (to which I can make no addition), the Vulg., and some later Versions, and several early Greek Fathers. But ἄδη is defended by all the copies in the Sept., confirmed by the Hebrew. And since this is, notwithstanding Bp. Randolph's assertion to the contrary, a quotation from the prophet Hosea, and, as is plain from the other words, from the Septuagint Version, we shall do best to retain the reading of the great bulk of the MSS. of that Version (including the Alexandrian), confirmed as it is by all the copies of the Greek Test., except eight, and the Pesch. Syr. Version.

<sup>56</sup>. ἡ δὲ δύναμις τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὁ νόμος] Reader: 'It is the Law which is the strength of sin; i. e. what causes this power of sin, imparts this power to it. By ὁ νόμος seems to be meant, not the law of Moses (as most Commentators explain), but, as the Greek Commentators, and, of the modern ones, Grot., Crell., &c., understand, law of every kind, both natural and revealed. So Rom. v. 13, ἁμαρτία δὲ οὐκ ἔλλαγεῖται μὴ ὄντος νόμου. See also Rom. iv. 15, and vii. 9, and notes. If it be asked, Why is the Law called 'the strength of sin?' we may answer, with Mr. Conyb., 'Because the Law of Duty, being acknowledged, gives to sin its power to wound the conscience; in fact, a moral law of precepts and penalties announces the fatal consequences of sin, without giving us any power of conquering sin.'

<sup>57</sup>. The Apostle concludes with a thanksgiving to God, the Author of all good, and an exhortation (as in the parallel passage of 1 Thess. iv. 13—18) to be steadfast in the faith of the Gospel, and especially in this important article of the resurrection of the dead. And first with respect to the former, it may be regarded as uttered by the Apostle in a sort of foretaste, through faith, of that period of glory, when he should join with the heavenly choir in singing, ἡ σωτηρία τῷ Θεῷ ἡμῶν, τῷ καθήμενῳ ἐπὶ τοῦ θρόνου, καὶ τῷ Ἄρην! Rev. vii. 10. Of this verse the full sense is ably drawn forth in a masterly Sermon of Cudworth (on this text), where he considers this victory as a threefold victory, obtained over a threefold enemy; 1. over Sin, as that which is the cause of death; 2. over the Law, as that which aggravates the guilt, and exasperates the power of Sin; 3. over Death, the consequence of sin; and shows that the victory over death is expressed by the resurrection of the body to life and immortality; which, as it was meritoriously procured for us by Christ's dying upon the cross, so it will be really effected at last by the same Spirit of Christ which gives the victory over sin here. See Rom. viii. 11.

<sup>58</sup>. The Apostle now concludes his appeal with a practical corollary on the foregoing ratiocination on the resurrection of the dead, enjoining three duties; 1. firmness in faith; 2. immovableness in hope; 3. proficiency in holiness and good works of every kind.

They were very properly exhorted to that firmness in the faith, which was justly called for by the august authority on which the above revelations were made; that hope, full of immortality, which must result from a firm faith; and lastly, that zealous performance of all good works, which would put to the test the firmness of their faith, and furnish the fairest fruits of its efficacy. In ἐδραῖοι καὶ ἀμειψικίνητοι there γίνεσθε, ἀμετακίνητοι, περισσεύοντες ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τοῦ Κυρίου πάντοτε, εἰδότες ὅτι ὁ κόπος ὑμῶν οὐκ ἔστι κενὸς ἐν Κυρίῳ.

XVI. 1<sup>a</sup> Περὶ δὲ τῆς λογίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους, ὥσπερ δι-έταξα ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῆς Γαλατίας, οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς ποιήσατε. a Acts 11. 30.
Rom. 12. 13.
2 Cor. 8. 4.
9. 1.

2<sup>b</sup> Κατὰ μίαν σαββάτων ἕκαστος ὑμῶν παρ' ἐαυτῷ τιθέτω, θη- b Acts 20. 7.
Rev. 1. 10.

seems to be, as will appear from supra v. 1, and Col. i. 23, and notes, not (what Gerdes. imagines) an agonistic, but an architectural metaphor. Thus Simonides, cited by Grotius, calls a good man χρῆσις τε καὶ ποσις καὶ νόμ. τετραγώνον. The view which I have taken of the nature of the metaphor is much confirmed and illustrated by what I have annotated on 2 Pet. iii. 17, ἵνα μὴ ἐκπίσθῃ τοῦ ἰδίου στηριγμοῦ.

— περισσεύοντες ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τ. κ. The exact import of these words mainly turns on that of the expression περισσεύοντες, which has been variously, but not satisfactorily, interpreted. Of the several senses assigned, that of 'excelling ourselves' is, upon the whole, to be preferred. Theophyl. well explains, ὅτι μόνον αὐτοῖς ἐπαχθόμενοι, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐκ περιουσίας αὐτοῖς ποιοῦντες, 'endeavouring continually to make greater progress'; implying both diligence and perseverance.

By the expression ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ (with which comp. τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ, John vi. 29, and see note) is not meant almshiving, nor any other special virtue. But as the exhortation is general, and the motives urging it are general, so must the sense be so too; i. e. 'doing all that the Lord would have us do as Christians;' including, of course, good works of every kind (see Estius), and espec. works of benevolence, as appears from the next words.

The last clause, εἰδότες ὅτι ὁ κόπος, &c., which means 'knowing assuredly that your labour is never in vain in the sight of the Lord,' has reference to the preceding words, περισσεύοντες ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τοῦ Κυρίου πάντοτε, with allusion to that recompense at the resurrection of the just, the hope of which would be necessary to animate them to be continually abounding in every good work; for, as Dr. South remarks, 'He who takes away the incitements to duty (in the two great main-springs of action, Hope and Fear) not only impedes the performance of duty, but hinders its very attempt.'

XVI. 1. Chrys., Theophyl., and Œcumen. remark, that the Apostle, having concluded his treatment of doctrines, proceeds to treat on moral duties, and espec. on the queen of virtues—Almsgiving. One should rather say, that the Apostle here, as he usually does at the end of his Epistles, assembles together, as Thom. Aquin. says, 'quædam specialia et familiaria,' and among sundry minute directions and suggestions, certain arrangements for ecclesiastical duties, commencing with the matter about the charitable collection he had enjoined them to make. Thus there is a Transition. I cannot, however, but suspect that there is a connexion with the preceding context, and that in tracing it, the true vinculum will be found in the words περισσεύοντες ἐν τῷ Κυρίῳ, and the labour of love connected with that exhortation.—τῆς λογίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγ., i. e. the collection of alms for the relief of poor Christians. Such collections for the relief of indigent Jews of Palestine had been not unfrequent among the foreign Jews; and had now, it seems, been introduced among the Gentile Christians. The reason for which was, that the Christians of Judæa were, by the various arts of Jewish persecution, direct and indirect, brought into great poverty; and their distress would be the greater, inasmuch as,—from the sad state of society in Judæa, so accurately described by Joseph. as existing at this period, when the national ruin was impending,—the poorer classes would be more and more brought to destitution. The Article τῆς shows that the collection was well known, and perhaps spoken of in the letter of the Corinthians to St. Paul. The word λογία is not found in Class. writers; but that it was occasionally used by them is probable, since Suid. and Hesych. attest that the plur., as in ver. 2, was used in the sense ἱερολογίας. Accordingly it is adduced by Dind. in Steph. Thea. in v. from Theod. Stud. p. 459. Indeed, the sing. form occ. in 2 Macc. xii. 43, ποιήσάμενος κατ' ἀνδρολογίαν κατασκευάσματα εἰς ἀργυρίου δραχμαὶ δισχιλίας, δέδοται εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα, where Valckenaer's masterly emendation, κατ' ἀνδρα λογίαν, is undoubtedly the true reading. The word seems to have been a term of common Greek.

2. κατὰ μίαν σαββάτων] 'on the first day of the week;' μίαν being used, by Hebraism, for πρώτην, as in Matt. xxviii. 1; and ἡμέραν understood; q. d. 'on the first of the days of the week;' from which it is plain that Sunday was then set apart by Christians for religious purposes.—τιθέτω, for κατατιθ. Παρ' ἐαυτῷ, 'by him.' French, chez lui, 'at home.'—8 τι ἂν σοὸς, 'he has been prospered in.' Εὐδοκῶσθαι signifies properly, 'to be set right on one's way,' and metaphorically, 'to be prospered in any undertaking;' and, if a pecuniary undertaking, the result thereof in profit, = the sum so gained. The turn of the expression seems meant to suggest the duty pointed out; q. d. 'as any one's industry has been prospered by God, so it is his duty to make a proper return out of the amount, by doing good unto men, according to his will.' And this, it is suggested, should be done on the principle of the offerings, under the old Law, of the δραχμαί, which were meant as an acknowledgment to the Giver. Here the Apostle had probably in mind Ecclus. xxxv. 10, 'Give unto the Most High according as he hath enriched thee.' The collections in question were directed to be made weekly, because every one is more inclined to contribute by little and little, than all at once; and on the Lord's day, because a participation in the offices of religion most effectually opens the heart to charity. The propriety of our Common Version will be evident; and the difficulties started by many Commentators at ἵνα μὴ—γίνωσκται may be removed by supposing that the Apostle only meant that there should be no private and petty gatherings, then first to be σανρίζων ὃ τι ἂν εὐδοῶται· ἵνα μὴ ὅταν ἔλθω, τότε λογίαι γίνωνται. 3<sup>c</sup> *Ὅταν δὲ παραγένομαι, οὓς ἂν δοκιμάσητε, δι' ἐπιστολῶν τούτους πέμψω ἀπενεγκεῖν τὴν χάριν ὑμῶν εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ.

o 3 Cor. 8.
16, 19.

4 ἂν δὲ ἡ ἀξίον τοῦ καμὲ πορεύεσθαι, σὺν ἐμοὶ πορεύονται.

d Acts 19. 21.
2 Cor. 1. 18.

5 δ' Ἐλεύσομαι δὲ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ὅταν Μακεδονίαν διέλθω· Μακεδονίαν γὰρ διέρχομαι. 6 *πρὸς ὑμᾶς δὲ, τυχὸν, παραμενῶ, ἡ καὶ παραχεμῶσω, ἵνα ὑμεῖς με προπέμψητε οὐδ' ἂν πορεύομαι.

o 3 Cor. 1.
15.
Rom. 15. 24.

7 ὃ οὐ θέλω γὰρ ὑμᾶς ἄρτι ἐν παρόδῳ ἰδεῖν· ἐλπίζω ἡ γὰρ χρόνον τινὰ ἐπιμεῖναι πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἂν ὁ Κύριος *ἐπιτρέψῃ. 8 Ἐπιμενῶ f Acts 18. 21.

ch. 4. 19.
James 4. 15.

δὲ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἕως τῆς Πεντηκοστῆς· 9 *θύρα γὰρ μοι ἀνέφηγε μεγάλη καὶ ἐνεργής, καὶ ἀντικείμενοι πολλοί.

g Acts 14.
27.

h ch. 4. 17.
1 Thess. 2. 2.

10 ἂν δὲ ἔλθῃ Τιμόθεος, βλέπετε ἵνα ἀφόβως γένηται πρὸς made, when he came, but only one συνεισφορά formed, comprehending all the sums which had been gradually laid up by each in private.

3. οὓς ἂν δοκ. δι' ἐπιστ. τούτους τίμψω] There has been some doubt as to the construction, and, as depending thereupon, the sense of the words. Now δι' ἐπιστολῶν may be construed either with the preceding, or the following words. But the latter construction is preferable. Thus the διὰ will be for in, or on, and may be rendered 'charged with.'—οὓς ἂν δοκιμάσητε is to be taken as a brief expression ('whom ye may think fit to choose'), of which examples are found in the Class. writers.—τὴν χάριν ὑμῶν is for τὴν ὑμῶν ἐλεημοσύνην: see examples in my Lex.

4. ἂν δὲ ἡ ἀξίον] Sub. τὸ πρᾶγμα. At ἀξίον supply τῆς ἡμῶν διακονίας. Theophyl., Œcumen., and others, point out that the force of σὺν ἐμοὶ πορεύονται is, 'they shall have my company,' I will accompany them. But the sense plainly is, 'they shall go in my company,' involving, as Bengel points out, a just sense of his Apostolic dignity. It seems that the money was always sent by two persons. That this had been the case with the sacred money contributed by the foreign Jews to the temple at Jerusalem, appears from Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6, 7, where he speaks of the persons who were to carry it to Jerusalem ἵνα κακομίδῃ (for so I would conjecture, instead of the corrupt ἀνακομίδῃ) συμπορευομένους ('going together'), which implies at least two.

6. πρὸς ὑμᾶς δὲ, τυχὸν, παραμενῶ] 'And I shall, perhaps [in my way] make some stay with you.—ἡ καὶ παραχ., 'or even remain for the winter.' This sending, and, in some degree, accompanying forward the teachers of Christianity, was an established custom in the first ages; and especially when the stay was long.

7. οὐ θέλω—ἰδεῖν] This is exegetical of the preceding. The ἄρτι is meant to be emphatical, and is not well rendered now. The full sense is, 'now that I have delayed so long.' The second γὰρ here is altered into διὰ by Lachm. and Tisch., from 7 uncial, and not a few cursive MSS. (to which I can only add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill). But internal evidence is in favour of γὰρ, which was, I suspect, altered to διὰ for the purpose of removing a tautology; and, moreover, γὰρ has the support of the Pesh. Syr. and Vulg. Versions. The case is different with ἐπιτρέψῃ, just after, which has been, on competent authority (to which I add Lamb. 1185), altered to ἐπιτρέψῃ by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., whom I have now followed; since internal evidence here comes in aid of external authority. The text rec. arose, I doubt not, from the scribes here, as often, confounding the letters π and ψ, which, in some MSS., are written very much alike. Propriety of language (which is rarely quite overlooked in the writings of St. Paul) is in favour of ἐπιτρέψῃ, though it is possible that St. Paul wrote ἐπιτρέψῃ, by a colloquial idiom, which would be not unsuitable to this part of the Epistle.

8. ἐπιμενῶ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ] This, Paley remarks, Horse Paul. ch. iii. No. II., 'is in terms almost asserting that he was at Ephesus at the time of writing the Epistle,' which (vor. 5 and ch. iv. 19) 'purports to have been written a short time before St. Paul's second journey into Greece;' and this, we know, from Acts xx. 1, was on his leaving Ephesus, where (ib. xix. 10) he had been resident for the space of two years. Hence the remark of the Apostle in ch. xv. 32; on which Paley observes: 'I allow that the Apostle might say this, wherever he was; but it was more natural, and more to the purpose, to say it, if he was in conflicts at Ephesus at the time.'

9. θύρα] figur. 'an opportunity for effecting any thing; a sense in which the word was sometimes used by the Class. writers; see Acts xiv. 27.—ἀνέφηγε is for ἀνέφετα, which some Atticists thought a solecism, but others defended. It only occurs in the later writers.—Ἐνεργής is well explained by a Glossographer ἰσχυρὰ πρὸς ἐργασίαν, and may be rendered 'effective.' So Thucyd. iii. 17, πλεῖστα δὲ ἦσαν ἀνέργοι ἰσχυροί. In καὶ ἀντικείμενοι, πολλοὶ the καὶ may be better taken for καίπερ, 'although,' than rendered 'for.' But it would rather seem that the meaning is not fully evolved, but is to be supplied from what precedes; q. d. ['And as there are many adversaries, there is need of my farther stay;] for, &c.

10. ἰδεῖν] 'should come [unto you]' or 'be come.' It appears from ch. iv. 17, that that was doubtful. Βλέπετε—ὑμᾶς, 'take heed that he may be (i. e. abide) with you without molestation,'—namely, that of factions opposition. The words τὸ γὰρ ἔργον—ἰδεῖν seem meant to anticipate their undervaluing him on the score of his youth and inferior spiritual gifts; and their general sense is, 'He discharges the office of preacher

ὡς αὐτὸν ἐξουθενήσῃ. Προπέμψατε δὲ αὐτὸν ἐν εἰρήνῃ, ἵνα ἔλθῃ πρὸς με· ἐκδέχομαι γὰρ αὐτὸν μετὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν. <sup>12</sup> Περὶ δὲ Ἀπολλῶν τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, πολλὰ παρεκάλεσα αὐτὸν, ἵνα ἔλθῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς μετὰ τῶν ἀδελφῶν· καὶ πάντως οὐκ ἦν θέλημα ἵνα νῦν ἔλθῃ, ἐλεύσεται δὲ ὅταν εὐκαιρήσῃ. <sup>13</sup> Ἐγρηγορεῖτε, στήκετε ἐν τῇ πίστει· ἀνδρίζεσθε, κραταιοῦσθε. <sup>14</sup> Πάντα ὑμῶν ἐν ἀγάπῃ γινέσθω.

<sup>15</sup> Παρακαλῶ δὲ ὑμᾶς, ἀδελφοί· οἴδατε τὴν οἰκίαν Στεφανῶ, ὅτι ἐστὶν ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀχαΐας, καὶ εἰς διακονίαν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἔταξαν ἑαυτούς· <sup>16</sup> ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς ὑποτάσσησθε τοῖς τοιούτοις, καὶ παντὶ τῷ συνεργοῦντι καὶ κοπιῶντι. <sup>17</sup> Χαίρω δὲ ἐπὶ τῇ παρουσίᾳ Στεφανῶ καὶ Φουρτουνάτου καὶ Ἀχαικοῦ, ὅτι τὸ ὑμῶν

of the Gospel even as I do,' i. e. he is as much a divinely commissioned minister of God as myself.

<sup>11.</sup> μή τις—ἐξουθενήσῃ] There was, as Theophyl. observes, reason to fear this, since he was young, alone, and had the charge of so wealthy and proud a people.

<sup>12.</sup> πάντως οὐκ ἦν θέλημα, &c.] Supply αὐτῷ, meaning, 'but it was not fully his inclination to go now.' That αὐτῷ is the true ellipsis, and not, as Commentators suppose, αὐτοῦ, I have shown in the note on Matt. xviii. 14.

<sup>13, 14.</sup> This concluding counsel is given with reference to all the preceding cautions. They were in the midst of temptations of various kinds; therefore he bids them 'watch.' They had among them false teachers, and therefore he tells them to 'stand fast in the faith.' They had divers trials to encounter, and therefore he says to them, 'quit you like men; be strong.' There were, moreover, great contentions among them, and therefore he adds, 'Let all things be done with charity.' The term γρηγορεῖτε might, did the context permit, be taken to denote 'Christian watchfulness generally;' but from what follows it is plain that 'watchfulness against the arts of seducing spirits endeavouring to corrupt their faith' must be chiefly meant; and, as the next expression, στήκ. ἐν τ. πίστει, must be understood of steadfastness in the faith, so must γρηγ. signify 'watchfulness against the arts of false teachers,' and στήκ. 'a manly firmness in maintaining what they conscientiously believed to be the truth.' On στήκ. ἐν τῇ πίστει, see note supra ch. xv. 58. Ἀνδρ. and κρατ. may be ornamental metaphors; but it would rather seem that the Apostle had in mind I Sam. iv. 9, κραταιοῦσθε καὶ γίνεσθε αἰε ἀνδρες, i. e. by Hebraism, γίνεσθε ἀνδρες, with which we may compare the Homeric ἀνδρες ἱστί· comp. Eph. vi. 10.—Κρατ. is a word not occurring in the Class. writers, although frequent in the LXX., as Ps. xxx. 24, ἀνδρίζεσθε, καὶ κραταιοῦσθε ἢ καρδία ὑμῶν. It is often used of perseverance in opinion, or determination. The lit. meaning of κραταιοῦσθαι is, 'to gird up one's loins,' or 'string up one's nerves for any arduous undertaking.' The Apostle has espec. in view perseverance in sound doctrine; the 'not being henceforth tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine;' see note supra xv. 58, and Eph. iv. 14.

The Asyndeton imparts peculiar vigour to the expression.

<sup>14.</sup> πάντα—ἀγάπῃ γινέσθω] It is worthy of remark, that exhortations to constancy in doctrines are often, as here, followed up with an admonition to love, and to 'keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.'

<sup>15.</sup> The construction here is somewhat involved; nor is it to be cleared either by throwing the words, with some, into a parenthesis; or with others, by supposing a transposition. The present order is very natural, and may be best adjusted by supposing an ellipsis of ὅτι, 'forasmuch as,' omitted because of the ὅτι after.

—αἰε διακ. τοῖς ἁγ. ἑ. ἰ.] The sense is, 'have devoted themselves to ministering unto the saints.' Xen. Mem. ii. 1, 11, οὐδὲ αἰε τὴν δουλίαν ἑαυτοῦς τέττω. The word διακ. cannot have reference to the offices and duties of Deacons; but may be supposed to denote zealously performing the duties of hospitality and general kindness to poor Christians, especially strangers.

<sup>16.</sup> The ἵνα connects with παρακαλῶ.—ὑποτάσσ. may mean, as many Commentators explain, 'show them all due respect and deference.' Though, as there seems to be some reference to the preceding ἔταξαν ἑαυτούς (which, by a military metaphor, signifies 'they have ranged or set themselves'), may rather mean 'range yourselves under and co-operate with them in their benevolent designs.'

<sup>17.</sup> ὅτι τὸ ὑμῶν ὅσοι. εἰς τοὺς ἀνέκλ.] The sense of these words is somewhat obscure, probably from the popular mode of expression adopted. The ancient Interpreters explain it, 'They have taken this long journey to act as your representatives.' This, however, seems not a little harsh; and such the Apostle could not mean. I prefer (with Beza, Rosenmuller, and Schleusner) to render, 'they have supplied your absence;' i. e. 'supplied the deficiency occasioned by your absence' (as in Phil. ii. 30).

For ὑμῶν, several of the most ancient MSS. have ὑμῶν, which has been edited by Lachm. and Tisch.; but not on good grounds; for we may suppose the ancient Critics to have stumbled at ὑμῶν, especially as standing before the noun, and so corrected ὑμῶν. See my note on Luke xxii. 53.

ὕστερῃμα οὗτοι ἀνεπλήρωσαν <sup>18</sup> ἀνέπαισαν γὰρ τὸ ἐμὸν πνεῦμα ο Rom. 16. 5. καὶ τὸ ὑμῶν. ἐπυγινώσκετε οὖν τοὺς τοιούτους. <sup>19</sup> ὁ Ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τῆς Ἀσίας ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς ἐν Κυρίῳ πολλὰ Ἀκύλας καὶ Πρίσκιλλα, σὺν τῇ κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλης 2 Cor. 13. σία· <sup>20</sup> ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ ἀδελφοὶ πάντες. ἀσπάσασθε 1 Pet. 5. 14. ἀλλήλους ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ.

<sup>21</sup> ὁ Ἀσπασμὸς τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ Παύλου <sup>22</sup> εἰ τις οὐ φιλεῖ τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, ἦτω ἀνάθεμα, μαρὰν ἀθί· <sup>23</sup> ἡ χάρις τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ μεθ' ὑμῶν <sup>24</sup> ἡ ἀγάπη μου μετὰ πάντων ὑμῶν ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. ἀμήν.

[Πρὸς Κορινθίους πρώτη ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Φιλίππων διὰ Στεφανᾶ, καὶ Φουρτουνάτου, καὶ Ἀχαικοῦ, καὶ Τιμοθέου.]

18. ἀνέπαισαν γὰρ—ὑμῶν] The sense of these words is mistaken by most of the modern Commentators, though well explained by the ancient ones, who rightly regard them as exegetical of the preceding, τὸ ὑμῶν ὕστ. ἀνέπλ. γὰρ meaning thus, for instance.—'Ανέπαισαν, 'have solaced;' a Hellenistic use of the word. The sense of the clause seems to be this: 'By thus supplying your absence, they have benefited us both: which was really the case; for St. Paul gained information of the state of those absent; and they gained, in the counsel afforded to them by the Apostle. The exact sense, however, of the words is, from being imperfectly developed, obscure and doubtful; but it cannot be that assigned by Bp. Shuttleworth and Dr. Peile, 'they have refreshed my spirit, and will refresh yours.' Such a sense cannot, without violence, be extracted from the words. Est. regards the words as expressive of a spirit of Christian courtesy, like that at Rom. xvi., as said of Rufus: ἀσπάσασθε Ῥούφον, καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ ἰμοῦ.

19. τῇ κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλ.] It is strange that some of the best modern Commentators should explain this of all the Christians in their family. The most natural and probable sense is that adopted by the Greek Commentators, and of the modern ones, by Mede, Wells, Pearce, Iaspis, and Olah, 'the congregation that was accustomed to meet, for divine worship, at their house.' And this sense has the advantage of including the other. See more in the note on Rom. xvi. 5.

20. ἀσπάζονται—φιλ. ἁγ.] On this custom see note on Rom. xvi. 16; and comp. Justin Martyr. Apol. i. 85, ἀλλήλους ἀσπαζόμεθα παυσάμενοι τῶν ἐνῶν.

21. ὁ ἀσπασμὸς—II.] Schoettgen remarks on the ellipsis, which he supplies thus: 'Restat salutatio a me, quæ est adscripta a me ipso, propria manu.' There can be no question that this was written by Paul with his own hand, though he had dictated the rest to some scribe. The Apostle was accustomed to dictate letters, and, at the end, to add a sentence with his own hand to prevent fraud; see Rom. xvi. 23. Gal. vi. 11. 2 Thess. iii. 17. Philem. 19. Χειρ is rarely used, as here, for handwriting; inasmuch that, were there not an example found in Hypocrites, we might suspect this to be a Latinism.

22. To the salutation with his own hand Paul here subjoins, as in some other Epistles (e. gr. Col. iv. 18. Eph. vi. 24), a solemn declaration, or weighty sentiment; and with the sentiment is conjoined an Aramaic saying, כְּמָה יְדָ, 'The Lord cometh;' of which the most probable account is, that, as Alf. says, it was meant as a weighty watch-word, tending to recall to them the nearness of the Lord's coming, and the duty of being found ready for it. See Matt. xxiv. 18, comp. with Luke xi. 40. Dr. Lightfoot's opinion (Works, vol. v. 417—55, and xii. 461) is, that as the expression 'maranatha' implies 'the coming of the Lord, the Messiah, to judgment,' it was here applied by the Apostle as a home-thrust against the unbelieving Jews; q. d. 'the true Messiah, the Lord, is coming to execute vengeance on all who believe not in Jesus, and embrace not his Gospel;' q. d. 'On his own head be the awful consequences of his rejecting the only name which has been given among men, as that whereby we must be saved.' The full force of ἦτω ἀνάθεμα, 'let him be held accursed,' will appear from note on Rom. ix. 3. The words which designate the person, or rather the class of persons, so anathematized,—εἰ τις οὐ φιλεῖ τὸν Κύριον Ἰ. Χρ., 'whosoever doth not love the Lord Jesus Christ,'—have been variously explained by modern Expositors, though by the ancients in only one way, as represented by Chrys., thus: εἰ ἴναι τοῦτον ῥήματος πάντα ἐφόβηται, τοὺς τὰ μέλη αὐτῶν ποιούντας πόρνης μέλη, τοὺς σκανδαλίζοντας τοὺς ἀδελφούς διὰ τῶν εἰδωλοθύτων, τοὺς δὲ ἀνθρώπων ὀνομαζομένους, τοὺς τῇ ἀναστάσει διατιστούντας—Ἀνάθ. ἦτω! ejiciatur e cetera fidelium!

24. ἡ ἀγάπη μου μετὰ π. ὑμ.] Theodor., Theophyl., and Œcumen., point out (after Chrys.), that it was with good reason Paul subjoined his love to them, since, considering that the Epistle had contained much that was severe, it was well to conclude it with the expression of his parental love to them: thus showing them ὅτι οὐ θυμῷ, οὐδὲ ὀργῇ ἦσαν τὰ γραφόμενα, ἀλλ' ἀγάπῃ καὶ κηδεμονίας, εἰ καὶ πικρίας ἐνέφουν. The words ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησ. are not added as mere words of course, but are as much as to say, 'My love has nothing merely human and fleshly, but is spiritual, and in Christ Jesus.'

ΠΑΤΡΟΥ ΤΟΥ ΑΠΟΣΤΟΛΟΥ

Η ΠΡΟΣ

ΚΟΡΙΝΘΙΟΥΣ

ΕΠΙΣΤΟΛΗ ΔΕΥΤΕΡΑ.

I. <sup>1</sup> ΠΑΥΛΟΣ, ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, διὰ θελήματος <sup>a</sup> Phil. 1. 1.
Θεοῦ, καὶ <sup>b</sup> Τιμόθεος ὁ ἀδελφός, τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ τῇ οὐσῇ <sup>b</sup> Acts 16. 1.
<sup>c</sup> Rom. 16. 21.
<sup>d</sup> 1 Cor. 16. 10.

THIS second Epistle was written about seven or eight months (namely, late in the summer, or early in the autumn, of A. D. 57) after the first, and as St. Paul was on his progress through Macedonia (see 1 Cor. xvi. 5), at Philippi, as the subscription attests. This is plain from a consideration of the journeys and the occurrences which had taken place since his writing the first. From ch. ix. 2—4, it appears to have been transmitted to the Corinthians by Titus and his colleagues, who were on the road from Macedonia to Corinth, to finish the collection of the contributions for the relief of the poor Christians in Judea. The circumstances which led to the writing of this second Epistle were, 1. the peculiar state of the Church at Corinth; 2. the alacrity of the Corinthians in contributing to the necessities of the poor Christians in Judea, and their kind treatment of Titus; both of which required acknowledgments from the Apostle. Having heard that his first Epistle had produced much good among the Corinthians, and considerably broken the strength of the faction against him, he wrote this, to confirm them in the doctrine he had preached, to vindicate himself against the calumnies of his enemies, and so to pave the way for the third visit to them, which he meditated. The scope of the Epistle cannot, however, be well understood without adverting to the partial failure of success which his former Epistle had experienced, at least from certain persons, for whom, therefore, a second address seemed necessary. Not a few, it would seem, of the Corinthians even yet adhered to their false teacher or teachers, and virtually denied the Apostleship of Paul; founding their rejection of his claims even on his manner of address in his first Epistle. Because, too, he had changed his intention of visiting them (see vv. 15, 16) in his way from Ephesus to Macedonia, they charged him with fickleness and irresolution; also with pride and tyranny, on account of his severity towards the incestuous person; and moreover with general arrogance in his ministry, and a haughtiness of demeanour little suitable to the insignificance of his personal appearance. The chief scope, therefore, of the Epistle is to rebut these charges; wherein he, 1. satisfactorily accounts for his not having come to them as soon as he had proposed; 2. he shows that his sentence against the incestuous person was not harsh or severe, but necessary; and, as it appears by the effects, salutary. Accordingly, he authorizes them to absolve him from that sentence, and restore him to communion with the Church; 3. he adverts to his great success in preaching the Gospel, and shows that he dwells not upon it for his own glory, but for that of the Gospel, in preaching which he used all diligence and faithfulness, notwithstanding the sore tribulations it brought upon him, and of which he gives a most affecting detail; 4. he excites them to lead a holy life; and, in order thereto, to avoid all communion with idolaters; 5. he desires them to complete their contributions for the poor saints in Judea; 6. he enters into a long defence of himself against the charge of timidity and personal insignificance. The former he effectually refutes by the severely obdurate air of his address to the disaffected. The most remarkable circumstance in this Epistle is the confidence of the Apostle in the goodness of his cause, and the support from above to bear him out in it, though under difficulties of the most formidable kind; see Scott, who shows at large that 'a stronger internal testimony, not only to his integrity, but divine inspiration, cannot exist; for had there been any collusion, it is next to impossible but such a conduct must have occasioned a disclosure of it.' On the chronological difficulty connected with xii. 14, and xiii. 1, 2, see the Notes there. The generousness of this Epistle is so manifest, from the strongest internal as well as external evidence, that it has never been seriously called in question.

ε Rom. 1. 7.
1 Cor. 1. 3.
Gal. 1. 10.
Eph. 1. 2.
1 Th. 1. 1.
Phil. 1. 2.
Col. 1. 3.
1 Pet. 1. 2.

ἐν Κορίνθῳ, σὺν τοῖς ἁγίοις πᾶσι τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν ὄλῃ τῇ Ἀχαΐᾳ
ἡ χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ Θεοῦ Πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

I have only to subjoin such observations as have, on careful reconsideration of the subject, occurred to me on the character and spirit, the manner and style, of the Epistle.—As to the first mentioned of these topics. Nothing is more striking, even to ordinary observers, than the marked variety of character in different parts. Besides the twofold character in the former and the latter portions of the Epistle, as addressed to two different classes of persons—the well-affected and the ill-affected to the Apostle—(in the former case overflowing with love, and in the latter redundant with oburgation and menace) the character often shifts from one phasis to another the opposite; so that consolation and rebuke, gentleness and severity, deep seriousness and bitter irony, succeed each other as rapidly as unexpectedly. Meyer remarks that ‘the excitement and interchange of the affections, and probably also the haste, under which Paul wrote this Epistle, render the expressions often obscure, and the construction difficult; but serve only to exalt our admiration of the great oratorical delicacy, art, and power, with which this outpouring of Paul’s spirit, especially interesting as a self-defensive apology, flows and streams onward.’ But there is something very indefinite in the ‘excitement, and interchange of affections;’ and I must take exception to Meyer’s ascribing the awkwardness of the construction, and the general obscurity, to ‘great haste.’ No proof has been adduced that Paul wrote the Epistle in ‘haste;’ nor can I trace any certain marks of haste impressed on the matter. I doubt not that the obscurity and anomalous phraseology arose from mental perturbation;—the excitement of intense emotions agitating the mind of the Apostle while writing the Epistle. As to the manner and tone, there is (with the exception of a few portions in the last four Chapters) the same Apostolic gravity, befitting the weightiness of the subject discussed, accompanied with a deep earnestness and anxiety for the spiritual welfare of those whom he addresses. As to ‘the great oratorical delicacy and art’ spoken of by Meyer, there is not a particle of art observable, all being nature unadorned save by Gospel truth; and as to ‘the delicacy of oratory,’ it is beyond my ken. There are a few specimens of oratorical power, and demotic almost Demosthenean; e. g. that noble portion vi. 1—10, than which there is nothing finer even in the First Epistle; and which for gravity and dignity, for long-sustained point, and just antithesis, I know of nothing comparable, except that inimitably fine passage in Thucyd. i. 70, where he contrasts the characters of the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians. There is, indeed, throughout the Epistle none of the loose and disjoint phraseology, and negligent diction, ascribed by some German Critics. It cannot, indeed, be denied that the style is very inferior to that of the First Epistle,—that there is a roughness,—not to say ruggedness,—of tournerie, seldom observable in that; there is, too, sometimes an awkwardness of moulding, as if the writer took no pleasure in his task. Besides, the scope of the writer is occasionally indistinctly marked, the construction often irregular, and the composition, with few exceptions, without that polish bestowed on the First Epistle. In short, the style varies in the same degree in manner as does that of the eighth book of Thucydides, compared with the rest of his noble History. In both cases (though from very different causes) the work never received the ‘limæ labor’ indispensable to perfect composition. Thus in both cases the same character of diction and style stamps the compositions with the same Thucydidean, or Pauline, impress unmistakably. It cannot, however, be denied, that some portion of the ruggedness, awkwardness, and obscurity, has been introduced by the perverse officiousness of shallow Critics, or occasioned by unskillful interpretation, as will appear from not a few of the critical notes interspersed; though I do not deny that the text, like that of the eighth book of Thucydides, is in a very unsatisfactory state, such as will require the labour of more than one generation of true Critics before it can be ultimately, not per saltum, brought to a tolerably perfect condition.—But, to advert to a matter of far greater importance to truly Christian Bible students, the Epistle is peculiarly interesting, as giving, beyond any other, an insight into the personal character, and bringing to light the inmost feelings, of one who had once, at least, been admitted to a glimpse of the unrevealed wonders of the other world. And when we observe in the interesting character here depicted, all that we can imagine of Christian heroism and moral elevation, combined with the deepest Christian humility, the warmest affections, and the utmost simplicity of heart,—we cannot but consider this Epistle, though the vehicle of no new Scriptural truth, nor throwing any farther light on the more mysterious topics of Revelation (thereby less gratifying to mere speculative curiosity); yet, as by the force of so bright an example to all Christian pilgrims (especially of the ministry) as replete with spiritual edification as any whatever in the Sacred Writings. See more on this subject in Bishop Shuttleworth’s Introductory remarks on the Epistle, to which I have, in two or three sentences, been indebted for several suggestions.

I. In this Chapter, after his usual salutations, Paul (vv. 1, 2) blesses God for the consolations under tribulation, and the deliverances in dangers vouchsafed to him, which were intended both for the comfort of others similarly circumstanced, and to himself an earnest of future aid from above (vv. 3—11). He rejoices in the testimony of his conscience, and expresses his confidence in their attachment to him;—which had induced him to propose again visiting them (vv. 12—14), and shows that his deferring this visit did not arise from capricious mutability (vv. 15—18); and, after adverting to the stability of God’s promise, through Christ, assures them that he had postponed his visit from motives of lenity, that the saints might have time to repent, and that he

3<sup>a</sup> Εὐλογητὸς ὁ Θεὸς καὶ Πατὴρ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὁ Πατὴρ τῶν οἰκτιρῶν καὶ Θεὸς πάσης παρακλήσεως, 4<sup>e</sup> ὁ παρακαλῶν ἡμᾶς ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν, εἰς τὸ δύνασθαι ἡμᾶς παρακαλεῖν τοὺς ἐν πάσῃ θλίψει, διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως ἧς παρακαλούμεθα αὐτοὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ 5<sup>i</sup> ὅτι καθὼς περισσεύει τὰ παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς ἡμᾶς, οὕτω διὰ τοῦ

4 Eph. 1. 2.
1 Pet. 1. 3.

5 ch. 7. 4. 7.
1sa. 12. 1.
2 ad. 10.
2 ad. 11. 12.
2 ad. 12. 5.
2 ad. 13. 12.
2 ad. 14. 1.
2 ad. 15. 12.
2 ad. 16. 12.

himself might be spared the pain of using severity (vv. 17—24).

1, 2. Address, and salutation.

1. ἀπόστολ. [I. Xp.] See note on Rom. 1. 1.—διὰ θελήμ. Θ., see note on 1 Cor. i. 1.—δ ἀδελφ., 'our brother' (in Christ), or 'our brother-minister, fellow-labourer, in the Gospel.' This Est. and others, with some reason, think more apt and suitable to the intent of the Apostle—which was to give consequence to the person whom he had sent in some degree as his legate.

2. χάρις—Χριστοῦ] See Rom. 1. 7. 1 Cor. i. 3. and Luke xxiv. 36.

3. εὐλογ. ὁ Θεός, &c.] Dodd., Mackn., and Newc. translate, 'praised be the God and Father of,' &c. But there is, perhaps, no sufficient reason to deviate from the common version, 'blessed be God, even the Father,' &c., which is supported by the authority of the ancient Versions and ancient Commentators, and by the most eminent modern Expositors. See the notes of Calvin and Whitby. However, I grant that the rendering is an open question. Mr. Alf. prefers the other version, on account of its 'verisimilitude, and simplicity.' The former may be granted; but not the latter. Whichever be the true version, we have the very same exordial form occurring in nearly all the Pauline Epistles,—of praising God for some signal blessing, and thus adapting the wording of his thanksgiving to the circumstances before him; with allusion to which in the present case there is added ὁ Πατὴρ τῶν οἰκτιρῶν—παρακλήσεως, meaning, 'He who is the Fountain of all mercy, and the source of all comfort.' It is strange that De Wette should think that Paul, in so expressing himself in vv. 3, 4, had no definite purpose, except to pour out the thankfulness of his own heart. The true view of this purpose is well stated by Chrys. and Theophyl., and, of modern Expositors, by Est. and Calv., confirmed by Olah., who well remarks, that 'this true consolation is well represented as the operation of the Spirit, which is the (only) source of perfect consolation.' Accordingly, the Apostle's main purpose was, as Calv. remarks, 'to animate the Corinthians, by his own example, courageously to endure persecution; looking stedfastly, in all difficulties, to the only source of help—the God of all comfort, who worketh it out for his faithful servants who trust in him, in every form.' Comp. the similar expression Θεοῦ τ. ἐλπίδος, Rom. x. 13.

4. ὁ παρακαλῶν] for παρηγορῶν, or παραμυθῶν, as at Acts xvi. 40. xx. 12, and elsewhere. Thus παρακαλεῖν signifies lit. to 'bid any one take courage,' by suggesting to him the reasons for hope and confidence. By ἡμεῖς is meant (as the best Expositors are agreed) the Apostle himself, who, Theodor. thinks, uses the expression δύνασθαι out of modesty. But though the word must not be pressed on, neither must it be thus explained away. For, as Calv. well remarks, 'ut non sibi vivebat Apostolus, sed Ecclesiam; qui quidquid gratiarum in ipsum conferebat Deus, non sibi soli datum reputabat, sed quo plus ad alios juvandos haberet facultatis.' The terms παρακλήσεως and παρακαλούμεθα must not be confined to any one of the sources of comfort, but be understood generally of all; especially of that spiritual support breathed into his soul by the great Comforter sent from God, and who is God. Now that comfort would be imparted to others, both for the purpose of communicating to them the grounds of it, and for inspiring them with the same spirit of devotedness to the Gospel which filled his own bosom.

5. περισσεύει—εἰς ἡμᾶς] lit., 'have occurred to us abundantly.' So Rom. v. 16, ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ—εἰς τοὺς πολλοὺς ἐκπερισσεύουσα. The τοῦ just after is added on the authority of several of the most ancient MSS., and after the ex. of the most eminent Editors. In τὰ παθ. τοῦ Χριστοῦ the Genit. may, with most ancient and earlier modern Expositors, be so taken as to denote 'the sufferings endured by Christ,' inasmuch as the sufferings of Christ's members for his sake are styled his sufferings, as being evils inflicted on his members out of enmity to him, and by reason of their mystical union with him, and the sympathy he has with them in their sufferings, as Rom. viii. 17. It is better, however, with others, to interpret 'the sufferings endured for Christ's sake and for his glory': of which force of the Genit. exx. are not rare. So Eph. iii. 1, ἐγὼ Παῦλος ὁ δίδωμις τοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. Thus the sense will be, 'because, in proportion to the sufferings to which the Gospel of Christ abundantly exposes us, so does the same Gospel supply us with abundant consolation [which we may administer to others];' which last words, implied from the preceding verse, form the true vinculum between this and the next verse, on the connexion of which Expositors have been perplexed. The words, then, of ver. 6 are meant to further develop the foregoing sense.—σωτηρίας ὡμῶν, 'for the saving of your souls.' In the next words the order varies exceedingly in different MSS. and Edd. The t. rec. has: εἰτε δὲ θλιβόμεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὡμῶν παρακλήσεως καὶ σωτηρίας, τῆς ἐνεργουμένης ἐν ὑπομονῇ τῶν αὐτῶν παθημάτων ὧν καὶ ἡμεῖς πάσχομεν εἰτε παρακαλούμεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὡμῶν παρακλήσεως καὶ σωτηρίας' καὶ ἡ ἐλπίς ἡμῶν βεβαία ὑπὲρ ὡμῶν. Some ancient MSS., as A, C, and 10 cursives, together with the Syriac, and most other Versions, have εἰτε παρακαλούμεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὡμῶν παρακλήσεως, τῆς ἐνεργουμένης ἐν ὑπομονῇ τῶν αὐτῶν παθημάτων, ὧν καὶ ἡμεῖς πάσχομεν' (καὶ ἡ ἐλπίς ἡμῶν βεβαία ὑπὲρ ὡμῶν) εἰδότες ὅτι, &c., which is adopted by Griesb. and Vater. But it is founded on slender external evidence

g. ch. 4. 18.
 2 Tim. 2. 10.

h Rom. 8. 17.
 2 Tim. 2. 11.

i Acts 19.
 25. &c.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

1 Cor. 15. 22.
 & 10. 9.

Χριστοῦ περισσεύει καὶ ἡ παράκλησις ἡμῶν. <sup>6</sup> Ἐἴτε δὲ θλίβομεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὑμῶν παρακλήσεως καὶ σωτηρίας, τῆς ἐνεργουμένης ἐν ὑπομονῇ τῶν αὐτῶν παθημάτων, ὧν καὶ ἡμεῖς πάσχομεν (καὶ ἡ ἐλπίς ἡμῶν βεβαία ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν) εἴτε παρακαλούμεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὑμῶν παρακλήσεως καὶ σωτηρίας. <sup>7</sup> Ἐἰδότες ὅτι ὥσπερ κοινωνοὶ ἐστε τῶν παθημάτων, οὕτω καὶ τῆς παρακλήσεως. <sup>8</sup> Οὐ γὰρ θέλομεν ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, ἀδελφοί, ὑπὲρ τῆς

(part of which is mis-stated; for it is not in the Cod. Cov. 2), and is by no means strong in internal; for it savours of the alteration of the early Critica. Greatly preferable is the reading of MSS. B, D, E, F, G, J, K, and 60 cursives; and I can add all the Lamb. and several ancient Mus. copies (including Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), also the Edit. Princ., Erasmi. 1, and other early Editions. This I have adopted, with Matth., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; it being called for by external and internal evidence, and also by the context. The transposition of the clause καὶ ἡ ἐλπίς—ὑμῶν to the end of the verse was, no doubt, made by those fastidious Critica, who thought it interrupted the antithesis between εἴτε θλίβ., &c. and εἴτε παρακ. This class of Critica were, however, far less bold than those who, besides making use of the same transposition, introduced other alterations,—partly to prevent a so-called tautology, and partly to render the interpretation the easier; though, in fact, it yields a very objectionable sense; for, adopting the transposition of the clause τῆς ἐνεργουμένης—πάσχομεν, it is difficult to see how their consolation could be promoted by their bearing the same sufferings as the Apostle. On carefully reconsidering the perplexing question of the reading in these verses (6, 7) I am quite of the same opinion as heretofore. Dr. Peile, indeed, adopts the t. rec.; which I should myself have been inclined to do, had it not been based on slender external authority, and ill-supported by internal evidence. This state of the case gives no encouragement to endeavour to make out, by exegetical contrivances, and the ever ready aid of paraphrase, any such sense as would not misrepresent the Apostle's evident meaning.—τῆς ἐνεργουμένης, here used as at 2 Cor. iv. 12. Gal. iii. 5, and v. 6. 1 Thessa. ii. 13. Rom. vii. 5. Gal. v. 6, should be referred to both παρακλήσεως and σωτηρίας. The Apostle means to say, that both his affliction and his consolation is calculated to profit them; and, in expressing this sentiment, he interposes the clause τῆς ἐνεργουμένης—πάσχομεν to show how his affliction may profit them: it will, he says, be made efficacious, by their patiently bearing, after his example, the same afflictions that he suffers. To this he subjoins a parenthetical clause, expressive of his hope and trust respecting them, namely, that they will follow his example.—For εἰδότες grammatical propriety would have required εἰδόντων. The same irregularity occurs in Jos. Antt. iv. 8. 38, εἰδότες ὧς, &c. Here ἡμεῖς is to be supplied from ἡμῶν above, as αὐτοὶ in the passage of Josephus. The ὧς for ὥσπερ, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from a few MSS., is only a correction of the grammarians, who thought it called for by the subsequent ὧς.

Verse 7 is explanatory of the preceding. They were partakers of his sufferings by sympathy; and of his consolation they could not fail to be likewise partakers, by being like-minded, and as firm in the faith as he was.

8. οὐ γὰρ θέλομεν ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, &c.] Dr. Peile renders by 'we have no wish you should not know.' But that version is not permitted by the use of this formula (highly characteristic of St. Paul, occurring also Rom. i. 15. 1 Cor. x. i. xii. 2, and 1 Thessa. iv. 13), the purpose of which is to solicit special attention to something about to be said. And such is its force here. The full sense, taken in conjunction with the γὰρ elliptical, and exemplificative, being this: '[sufferings, I may well say;] for, by way of example, I would have you fully to know that,' &c. The sense may be carried on as follows: 'I would have you to well know, that, as to the subject (or the matter) of our distress, which befell us in Asia, we were exceedingly hard pressed (lit. weighed down) with affliction beyond our strength to bear.' The words which follow serve to carry the description yet further, representing the peril as being all but mortal,—'inasmuch that we even despaired of life.' On this force of the Genit. (that of relation, without regimen) found also in Dionys. Hal. Ant. xii. 16, ὅποτε ἐξαπορηθεῖεν ἀργυρίου ('as to money'), and Thucyd. iv. 60, 2, τῆς ἀρχῆς προκοπτόντων αὐτοῖς, see my note there. This view of the force of the terms ἵβαν, and ἔξωαν, is supported by the authority of Chrysa. and Theophyl. The occasion of this mortal peril is, as has been shown by Dr. Paley, Hor. Paul. No. III., the popular tumult at Ephesus recorded in Acts xix. 29—32, and xx. 1. That the danger to St. Paul may very well have been such as it is here represented, will sufficiently appear by considering that the whole city was filled with confusion when the populace had seized his companions; and his friends thought him in such peril that they would not suffer him to adventure, as he wished, into the theatre, to endeavour to quell the tumult. I must not omit to animadvert on the want of judgment displayed by Lachm. and Tisch. in editing from several of the most ancient MSS., uncials and cursive, and some Fathers, for ὑπὲρ, πρὸς, certainly against a fundamental Critical canon, for ὑπὲρ is the more difficult reading; and πρὸς, as I long ago pointed out, is evidently a mere gloss, or correction. Profiting by my remark, Alf. has here deserted his fidus Achates, and retained ὑπὲρ. This use of the Preposition is somewhat unfrequent; but it occurs twice in the Sept., and several times in the Class. writers; and, indeed, it would present itself more frequently were it not on some other occasions thrown out, and the more usual Preposition brought in, by rash and mis-judging Critica. Billroth's preference θλίψεως ἡμῶν τῆς γενομένης ἡμῶν ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ, ὅτι καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἐβαρῆθημεν ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, ὥστε ἐξαπορηθῆναι ἡμᾶς καὶ τοῦ ζῆν· <sup>9</sup> ἄλλὰ αὐτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς τὸ ἀπόκριμα τοῦ θανάτου ἐσχήκαμεν, ἵνα μὴ πεποιθότες ὦμεν ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῷ Θεῷ τῷ ἐγείροντι τοὺς νεκρούς· <sup>10</sup> ὃς ἐκ τηλικούτου θανάτου ἐῤῥύσατο ἡμᾶς, καὶ ῥύεται· εἰς ὃν ἠλπικαμεν ὅτι καὶ ἔτι ῥύσεται· <sup>11</sup> συνυπουργούντων καὶ ὑμῶν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν τῇ δεήσει, ἵνα ἐκ πολλῶν προσώπων τὸ εἰς ἡμᾶς χάρισμα διὰ πολλῶν εὐχαριστηθῇ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν.

<sup>12</sup> Ἡ γὰρ καύχησις ἡμῶν αὕτη ἐστὶ, τὸ μαρτύριον τῆς συνει-

of the false reading, περὶ, solely arose from his mistaking the construction, on which a most competent judge (Dr. Peile), has schooled him effectually. With ἐβαρῆθ, I would compare Aristoph. ap. Zonara Lex., p. 1785, ἰσχυμῖνος ταῖς συμφοραῖς. Notwithstanding what Rosenmüller and others think, ὥστε ἐξαπορηθῆναι—ζῆν can only mean, 'inasmuch that we even despaired of life.'—ἐξαρ. signifies properly 'to stop short in one's progress, from being utterly at a loss to know what course to take.' So iv. 8.

<sup>9</sup> ἐν ἑαυτοῖς τὸ ἀπόκριμα τ. θανάτου ἐσχήκαμεν] This contains a strongly figurative mode of expressing utter despair of life; q. d. the having nought but death before one's eyes, and the sentence of death in one's ears; meaning to say, that he was like one who is lying under condemnation to death; over whom the sword of the Law is continually suspended. In short, it is as when a man not only looks upon himself as one already condemned to death, but when he has absolutely made up his mind to die, may regard himself as already a dead man, and so may be said to have the verdict of death recorded in the court of his own mind. It would seem, then, that the present expression is one even stronger than three already adduced by me from Thucyd. ii. 53, Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, 2, and Philostr. vii. 28, to which I now add Soph. Elect. 772, where Clytemnestra says, in reference to the threats of Orestes, ἀλλ' ὃ προστάτος Χρόνος ('the close-at-hand time') διηγέ μ' αὖν ὡς θανούμην, where the sense is, 'carried me forward (passed over my head) as if every day was to be my last,' as if (i. e. thinking that) every day, &c. Hence it is plain that the strong figure in this verse is only the top step in the climax, commenced at the verse preceding, consisting of four degrees, καθ' ὑπερβολήν, ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, ἐξαπορηθῆναι τοῦ ζῆν (ver. 8), and the present: for the expression in this verse is stronger than in those which preceded; and, accordingly, the ἀλλὰ should be rendered, not and, but into, or quasi into. The masterly discussions of Dr. Paley, in his Hor. Paul., have shown that the language of the Apostle is not overcharged, not a mere rhetorical ebullition, but the expression of the lively sensations arising from extreme peril, and the impressions occasioned by recent deliverance from this peril. The next words, ἵνα μὴ, &c., are meant to intimate the purpose for which Divine Providence permitted him to be reduced to this state, —namely, that he should thereby be brought not to confide in his own strength, but rather trust implicitly in Him who can raise the very dead,

—and consequently can preserve the living from perils, however imminent. See the admirable notes of Calv. and Hyper.—The words πεποιθότες ἑμιν are not merely for πεποιθῆσθαι, but the Partic. and Verb Subst. are used to express continuity of action, implying continua. By 'trusting in ourselves,' is meant having regard to our own strength [alone], without reference to Divine aid.—Τῷ ἐγείροντι τοὺς νεκρούς, 'who raiseth the very dead, [and therefore who can preserve the living, in whatsoever peril.]' Thus intimating that the deliverance was so great, as to be a kind of resurrection from the dead. Ver. 10 refers to the perils in question as deadly, adverting to former deliverances and present preservation, and expressing hope and trust of future deliverance. There is a sort of climax at the words ἐῤῥύσατο, —ῥύεται, —and ἔτι ῥύσεται, meaning, 'who formerly delivered, now delivereth, and, we hope and trust, will yet again deliver us.'

<sup>11</sup> συνυπουργούντων—ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν] 'you, too, co-operating in supplication on our behalf.' Of the words following, ἵνα ἐκ πολλῶν προσώπων, &c., the sense is, 'that so the gracious gift [of deliverance] being bestowed on me, by means of the petition of many persons on my behalf, may by many persons be acknowledged with thanks; for, as Doddr. observes, nothing is more reasonable than that what is obtained by prayer should be owned in praises. This use of εὐχαριστεῖσθαι (as said of a thing to be returned thanks for), is very rare. See my Lex.

<sup>12</sup> Ἡ γὰρ καύχησις—τὸ μαρτύριον τῆς συνειδήσεως ἡμῶν, &c.] In handling this passage the greatest difficulty is, to ascertain the connexion with the foregoing words. Indeed, that is so far from clear, that some have thought there is none; and, while few attempt to trace any connexion, even those few differ as to the mode. Dr. Peile lays it down as follows: 'This affectionate interest in our favour we are entitled to expect [from you]; for our conscience warrants us in asserting that,' &c. Such is also the view taken by Calvin, who thinks that the γὰρ adverts to the reason why his safety ought to be commended to them all, inasmuch as, &c. This, however, carries with it a spirit of self-praise little suitable to the character of the Apostle. And Dr. Peile's mode of turning and winding the sense, though it gets rid of much of this objection, yet supposes words to be referred to in γὰρ which have nothing to warrant them in the context; not to say, that thus the term καύχησις is well-nigh sunk. It is, at any rate, better to suppose, as I have done, that the connexion is with ver. 10. Thus the full meaning intended will be as follows: 'And we hope and trust that God will continue to deliver us, you co-operating with us in prayer for support, &c. &c.; FOR the ground of our glorying is the testimony of,' &c. This view of the connexion is, I find, supported by the authority of Hyper. and Bullinger, who, however, express the purport of the words in language liable to the same objection as that above adverted to. The mode of tracing the connexion pursued by Est. has the advantage of avoiding that objection. He, too, with Hyper. and Bullinger, refers the γάρ (as I have done) to ἡλιπίκαμεν at ver. 10. However, on attentively reconsidering the point, it occurs to me that the reference in γάρ may be with the words συμ-υποκρούμεται—ἐν δέήσει, in the verse preceding. Thus the full meaning intended will be: '[And this co-operation we may justly expect at your hands] for there is to us [as respects you] a matter of glorying and rejoicing [as founded on] the testimony of our conscience that, &c. Of these somewhat harshly phrased words ἡ γὰρ καύχησις ἡμῶν αὐτῇ ἐστὶ, the lit. rendering is, 'for our matter of glorying and rejoicing is,' &c. Had ἡμῖν and τοῦτο even been written, the sense would have been the same. And the permutation in construction of ἡμῶν and ἡμῖν, ὑμῶν and ὑμῖν, as also of αὐτῇ, when coming after a subst. feminine and τοῦτο, is not unfrequent both in the N. T. and in Thucyd. In thus taking ἡμῶν as standing for ἡμῖν, and αὐτῇ for τοῦτο, I am supported by Chrys., Theophyl., and Theodoret. There is in καύχ. a double sense, of glorying and of rejoicing; which twofold sense may have place at 1 Cor. xv. 31, and Phil. ii. 1. 1 Thess. ii. 19, and perhaps in the use of καύχημα Heb. iii. 6.—Τὸ μαρτ. Sub. ὅν, 'that which is testified by our own consciences.' On the value of this testimony, and how far we ought to rest on it, see Bp. Sanderson's Second Sermon ad Magistratum, § 9—30. On the former it is finely said by Eurip. Hippol. 431, μόνον δὲ τοῦτο φασ' ἀμιλλᾶσθαι βίᾳ ('can compete in value with life'), γνώμην δικαίαν κάγαθην.

δήσεως ἡμῶν, ὅτι ἐν ἀπλότῃ καὶ εἰλικρινεῖ Θεοῦ, (οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ σαρκικῇ, ἀλλ' ἐν χάριτι Θεοῦ) ἀνεστράφημεν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, περισσοτέρως δὲ πρὸς ὑμᾶς. 13 Οὐ γὰρ ἄλλα γράφομεν ὑμῖν,

—ἐν ἀπλότῃ καὶ εἰλικρ. ['in,' or 'with simplicity, or singleness of heart [as opposed to duplicity and guile], and with sincerity and purity of mind and disposition, such as will bear the strictest scrutiny.' See note on Rom. xii. 7, 8, and my Lex. in voc. Comp. Wisd. i. 1, ἐν ἀπλότῃ καρδίᾳ ζητεῖτε αὐτὸν (τὸν Κύριον). For ἀπλότ., however, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and 4 cursives, ἀγιότῃ, prob. from supposing the t. rec. to have been introduced from Eph. vi. 5, and Col. iii. 22. But ἀπλότ. is more called for by the term following, εἰλικρ. Not to mention that ἀγιότῃ is not used either in the New Test. (except in one passage of Hebrews) or the Sept.; nor would it be quite suitable here, where it may have arisen from a mistake on the part of the scribes, for the words are in manuscript characters very similar. The scribes, or perhaps the critics, in like manner stumbled at ἀπλότῃς in 2 Cor. xi. 3, οὕτως φανερὸν τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀπλότῃς, &c., where some of the most ancient MSS. have ἀπλ. καὶ ἀγιότῃς, or ἀγιότῃς, while in others is πρὸς ἐκτὸς καὶ τῆς ἀγιότῃς, evidently for the purpose of qualifying and explaining ἀπλότ. In using the words ἀπλότ. and εἰλικρ. here, Paul seems to allude to his opponents, who accused him of dishonesty and inconsistency in his words and deeds, as if he had written privately to some individuals in the church in a different strain from that of his public letters to them.—The word Θεοῦ may (as most recent Commentators suppose) be meant to raise the quality to the highest pitch. But it is more agreeable to the characteristic modesty of the Apostle to suppose it to have reference to God as the author thereof by his grace, or to denote something done with reference to him. See Rom. iii. 21, 22.—MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and 4 cursives (I add Lamb. 1182, one Mus. copy, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill) prefix τοῦ, read by Chrys. and Theophyl., and adopted by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But, specious as the reading is, I continue to retain, with Scholz, the text. rec., especially since internal evidence is in its favour; for it would seem that the early Critical Revisers inserted it as thinking it called for by propriety of language, which is not the case. The article is just afterwards, in the same position, absent from all the MSS. Though I imagine our German Critics will, with their usual sophistry, represent that as a proof positive against the genuineness of the word. Against the Fathers whom they adduce we may bring the far weightier authority of Origen, and even Papias; in the second of whose Fragments (ap. Routh. Rel. 8.) we have the words, τοῦ κατὰ Θεὸν ἀκασίας ἀκούοντες παῖδες ἐκάλουν, i. e. the first Christians, where κατὰ Θεὸν may, as Θεοῦ here, qualify the Substant., and be translated 'godly'; with the difference, however, that though κατὰ Θεοῦ may mean, either 'such as God inspires,' or 'such as God requires in the Christian,' as agreeable to his own goodness (see Matt. v. 48); but in the passage of Papias it can only mean the latter, which is prob. the sense here: and this is confirmed by the use of the same phrase in Eph. iv. 24, τὸν κατὰ Θεὸν κτισθέντα ἐν δικ. καὶ δόξῃ τῇ, where see note. But if so, Papias prob. had this passage in mind, and must have had Θεοῦ, not τοῦ Θεοῦ, in his copy.

—οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ σαρκικῇ] meaning, in a general way, carnal or secular wisdom, the wisdom of this world. Probably alluding to the arts of the Heathen Sophists and Rhetoricians, and also the Christian false teachers. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 17, and ii. 1.—ἐν χάριτι Θεοῦ, 'by the gracious help of God,' as shown in the communication of supernatural gifts and miraculous endowments, imparted to the Apostle. See 1 Cor. xv. 10.—ἀνεστράφημεν, 'we have behaved ourselves.' An expression (like the Latin versari) used with reference to conduct of every kind.

13, 14. There is here, as Hyper. remarks, a confirmation of the truth of the Apostle's teaching and writing, a 'testimonio Scripturarum, et ab ipsorum judicio et experientia in vita ejus.'

ἀλλὰ ἢ ἂ ἀναγινώσκετε, ἢ καὶ ἐπιγινώσκετε ἐλπίζω δὲ ὅτι καὶ εἰς τέλους ἐπιγινώσεσθε, <sup>14</sup> καθὼς καὶ ἐπέγνωτε ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ μέρους ὅτι καύχημα ὑμῶν ἐσμεν, καθάπερ καὶ ὑμεῖς ἡμῶν, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ. <sup>15</sup> Καὶ ταύτη τῇ πεποιθήσει, ἐβουλόμην πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐλθεῖν πρότερον, (ἵνα δευτέραν χάριν ἔχητε,) <sup>16</sup> καὶ δι' ὑμῶν διελθεῖν εἰς Μακεδονίαν, καὶ πάλιν ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, καὶ ὑφ' ὑμῶν προπεμφθῆναι εἰς τὴν Ἰουδαίαν. <sup>17</sup> Τοῦτο οὖν βουλευόμενος μήτι ἄρα τῇ ἐλαφρίᾳ ἐχρησάμην; ἢ ἂ βουλευόμαι, κατὰ σάρκα βουλευόμαι,

<sup>14</sup> οὐ γὰρ ἄλλα—ἐπιγινώσκετε] The sense is not very clear; but the best Commentators, ancient and modern, are generally agreed, that there is a reference to the words ἀπλότης and ἀλλοτριᾶ. just before. And the real and full sense (not a little mistaken by Expositors) seems to be this: [‘I may well say in godly sincerity:] for we write no other things [i. e. doctrines] unto you than what you read, what you even recognize [to be true], and I trust will continue to acknowledge always.’ This seems to be a popular manner of speaking, of which the sense is, ‘I have no other meaning in what I write, than what is open and legible; agreeably to the obvious purport of the words; I do not write one thing and intend another, express one doctrine and mean another.’ For (as Mackn. observes) ‘it seems the Faction had affirmed that some passages of Paul’s first Epistle were designedly written in ambiguous language, that he might afterwards interpret them as it suited his purpose.’ If this interpretation (which is supported by the opinion of almost all the recent Expositors) be thought, as it may, to rest on somewhat precarious proof, and little accordant with the words following, we may suppose, with Theophyl., Est., Beza, and Calvin, that the Apostle here means to soften what might be called arrogance in what he had said; q. d. ‘he makes no more boasting in words than what can be proved by deeds; nay, the Corinthians themselves being witnesses, whose own previous knowledge of him would bear testimony to the truth of what they read.’ Thus ἀναγινώσκετε should be rendered, as it is by Calvin, recognoscitis, ‘recognize.’ And the word is used thus in Xen. Anab. v. 8, 6, and elsewhere in the Class. writers. There is, too, a kind of cinna; for ἐπιγινώσκετε, as Calvin shows, is more significant than ἀναγιν. Thus ἀναγινώσκω has reference to the less favourably disposed; ἐπιγινώσκω, to those who were sincerely and firmly attached to the Apostle. This distinction seems adverted to in the next verse; where, after saying ἐπίγνωτε, he corrects the term by the imitatio phrase ἀπὸ μέρους, meaning, ‘a part at least of you.’

ἢ ἀλλὰ ἢ there is a pleonasm; since either of the two particles would have been sufficient. Or we may regard this (with Emmerling) as a blending of two modes of expression.

<sup>14</sup> ὅτι καύχημα—ἡμῶν meaning, [‘You will find and acknowledge [say] that we are your rejoicing, as also you are ours, in the day of the Lord.’—Καύχ. ὑμῶν, i. e. ‘such as may make you proud of having me as a teacher.’—

Καθάπερ καὶ ἔματε ἡμῶν,—namely, as being proud of such disciples.

<sup>15</sup>—<sup>24</sup>. A defence of himself against the charge of fickleness of purpose in not having come to them.

<sup>15</sup> καὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πεποιθήσει, ἰβουλ., &c.] The full sense is, ‘And it was in this firm confidence that ye, to wit, would recognize me [to be] even as I wrote [that I should be able myself to be what I promised], that I should be able to keep my word,—that I was desirous to come unto you,’ &c.—χάριν, ‘benefit,’ lit. ‘gratification.’

<sup>17</sup> τοῦτο οὖν βουλευόμενος, μήτι—ἐχρησ.] ‘Now, in thus purposing, did I at all use (i. e. act from) levity of mind?’ i. e. infirmity of purpose, from fickleness and inconstancy.—ἢ ἂ βουλευόμαι, κατὰ σάρκα βουλ., ‘or what I [at any time] purpose [to do], do I purpose after [the infirmity of] human nature [which is prone to halt between two opinions]?’ The next words serve to illustrate the idea of this levity and inconstancy of purpose by a peculiar form of expression, originating in some adagial saying.—I have been induced to now abandon the view of the Greek Commentators, and several modern Expositors, who regard this formula as an exemplification of self-willed obstinacy of purpose, ‘vult or vult,’ ad libitum; and that not so much because of the construction which this sense requires, ἵνα τὸ εἶ ναι, καὶ τὸ εἶ οὐ, which would, as Dr. Peile shows, violate propriety of language by detaching ναι as a predicate from τὸ ναι, and οὐ from οὐ, but because, as he says, ‘it accords neither with the collocation of St. Paul’s words, nor with the tenor of his argument, which, from ver. 12 to the end of the chapter, is combating the notion of his playing fast and loose with the Corinthians,’—viz. by saying and unsaying as the whim might dictate. Thus at εἶ we may supply πρῶτα, and render, ‘so that the thing should be,’ or, taking it impersonally, ‘so that there should be with me [at one time], Yea, yea! [at another] No, no!’

For βουλευόμαι, A, B, C, F, G, and 12 cursives, have βούλομαι, adopted by Lachm., and by Tisch., in ed. 1; but in ed. 2 βουλευόμαι, which is retained by Alf., who regards the other reading as a correction to suit ἰβουλόμενον supra 15; but if so, how low must he rate the judgment of the Critics whom he half worships! I suspect, however, that the reading (which I find also in Lamb. 1152, 1184, Mus. 5116, 11,836, 16,164, and Cov. 5, omitted by Mill) arose, not from correction of Critics, but was derived (like multitudes of other corruptions of reading) from the Acts 9. 20. ἵνα ἡ παρ' ἐμοὶ τὸ ναὶ ναὶ, καὶ τὸ οὐ οὐ ; 18 * Πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεός, ὅτι ὁ λόγος ἡμῶν ὁ πρὸς ὑμᾶς οὐκ ἔγένετο ναὶ καὶ οὐ 19 ὁ γὰρ τοῦ Θεοῦ υἱὸς Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς, ὁ ἐν ὑμῖν δι' ἡμῶν κηρυχθεὶς, δι' ἐμοῦ καὶ Σιλουανοῦ καὶ Τιμοθέου, οὐκ ἔγένετο ναὶ καὶ οὐ, ἀλλὰ ναὶ ἐν αὐτῷ γέγονεν 20 ὅσαι γὰρ ἐπαγγελίαι Θεοῦ, ἐν αὐτῷ τὸ ναὶ, καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ τὸ ἀμήν, τῷ Θεῷ πρὸς δόξαν δι' ἡμῶν. 21 Ὁ δὲ βεβαιῶν ἡμᾶς σὺν ὑμῖν εἰς Χριστὸν, καὶ χρίσας ἡμᾶς, † Exod. 3. 14.

Matt. 24. 35.
John 8. 58.
Heb. 1. 11.
12. & 12. 4.
Rev. 1. 8, 11,
17.
u ch. 5. 5.
1 John 2. 20,
27.

Vulgate Version, where, for 'voluissim,' the true reading from Jerome, was, I doubt not, 'voluissim.' Upon the whole, the Apostle's meaning appears to be, that 'he did not use the terms in question as mere words of course, but intended to make them good; and that, although his design was frustrated, yet the word was stable.'

18. πιστὸς δὲ ὁ Θεός—οὐ] This may (as Chrys. thinks) be meant to anticipate an objection; q. d. 'If what you say be not firm and stable (and you often say ναὶ, and it is found οὐ), may we not fear lest your word (doctrine and preaching) be found such?' viz. ναὶ καὶ οὐ, i. e. unstable and wavering. To which the Apostle answers,—My purpose to come to you was my own,—wherefore I attained it not; but my doctrine is of God, and what, as such, cannot deceive. Now God is true (πιστός, verax), so that, as He is constant, neither is his word to you, which we preach, inconstant and unstable. With πιστός ὁ Θεός comp. Heb. x. 23, πιστός ὁ ἐπαγγελάμενος, and 1 John i. 9. Emmerling remarks on the defectiveness of the phrasing, usual in oaths [though here is meant only solemn asseveration, or obtestation], by which the veraciousness of God is pledged for the truth of the assertion. The phrase occurs in the Sept. in Gen. xxi. 50, and 1 Kings xii. 5. The sense intimated by St. Paul is this,—that 'his purpose to come was his own, but his doctrine is of God, and, as such, cannot deceive. And, as God is immutable, neither is his word which is preached to them by himself unstable, but sure.'

For ἐγένετο, A, B, C, D, F, G, and 5 cursives (to which I can make no addition), with the Vulg. Version, and Cyrill., have ἐστίν, received by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but rejected by Matth. and Griesb. Internal evidence seems in its favour; but the paucity of the cursive MSS. and the confirmation afforded to the great body of the MSS. by the Pech. Syr. Version, induce me to still decline receiving it. Alford's account of it, as 'a correction to suit the supposed reference to the past, is very plausible; but is purely a gratuitous supposition. Why should we not suppose ἐστίν a correction to suit what the Critics thought a required reference to the present; not aware that the Imperf. is often used to designate habitual action, so as to be nearly equivalent to the Present. In confirmation of my opinion as to the reading being a Critical alteration, I add, that one of the most ancient of the MSS. which have it (the Cod. C), has at v. 9 ἐστίν instead of ἐγένετο,—a manifest Critical alteration, but so ungrounded as to prove the Critic to have been as stupid as presumptuous.

19. For ὁ γὰρ τοῦ Θεοῦ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ὁ τοῦ Θεοῦ, from A, B, C, and 4 car-sives, to which I can only add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill; authority too slender to warrant the reception of the reading,—especially since internal evidence is not, as it should be, entirely in its favour. The text. rec. may have been, as Alf. says, a correction of order; but that it should have been corrected in all the copies except nine is incredible. It is more likely to have been, as those nine, an error of a scribe, who, after having passed over the γὰρ (very often omitted by scribes), and perceiving it after having written τοῦ Θεοῦ, brought it in after those words, to avoid defacing his copy. The et alii of Griesb. and Scholz is purely imaginary. The case I have supposed,—of the γὰρ being omitted by the scribe,—does occur in one of Matthew's MSS., though unrecorded by Griesb. and Scholz.

20. This is meant to further evince how steadfast and unbending ought to be the preaching of Christ, since in him it is that all the promises of God are made sure and steadfast. (Olivet.)

—ὅσαι γὰρ ἐπαγγελίαι, &c.] Bp. Middl. well renders, 'for, how many soever be the promises of God, in Him (Christ) is the Yea, and in him the Amen;' i. e. 'whatever God hath promised, He will through Christ assuredly fulfil; ναὶ and ἀμήν being strong and frequent asseverations of the truth;' q. d. (in the words of Newc.) 'For whatever promises God has made, they are confirmed to mankind through him; and the truth of them is and will be conveyed through him; to the glory of God by our preaching.'

21. ὁ δὲ βεβαιῶν, &c.] God is here designated as the author both of their original conversion to the Christian faith, and of their confirmation in it. So Abp. Newcome well paraphrases: ['But I do not arrogate any thing to myself when I use the expression by us.] It is God that establishes both me and you with respect to Christ as disciples of Christ.' Dr. Peile thinks that this verse and the next contain an enlargement upon the Divine assurances through Christ, which the Apostle has just declared to be the unchanging feature in his preaching ἐμπαράλητα γὰρ τὰ χερσίνου καὶ ἡ κληρίς τοῦ Θεοῦ, Rom. xi. 29, 'Yea, He that is confirming [or rather, 'confirmeth,' as said of what is habituat], us the teachers and you the taught, in our progressive growth into complete identity with Christ, and in Christ hath anointed us (Rom. viii. 29, Eph. i. 3—6. ii. 5—7. 1 John ii. 20. 27), is none other than God, who hath both outwardly set his seal upon us in baptism, and given us inwardly the earnest of his Spirit in our hearts.' Comp. Rom. v. 5. Eph. i. 13. iv. 30. Rev. vii. 3. By the Spirit is to be understood the operation of the Spirit by his spiritual gifts, and also by his graces ('given to every man to profit withal') for sanctification. The anointing, too, is of course by the same Spirit. See Eph. i. 13. 1 John ii. 20. The best

Θεός<sup>23</sup> ὁ καὶ σφραγισάμενος ἡμᾶς, καὶ δούς τὸν ἀράβωνα<sup>24</sup> τὸν Πνεύματος ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν. v Eph. i. 13, 14, & 4. 30.

23 Ἐγὼ δὲ μάρτυρα τὸν Θεὸν ἐπικαλοῦμαι ἐπὶ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν, ὅτι φειδόμενος ὑμῶν οὐκέτι ἦλθον εἰς Κόρινθον. 24 οὐχ ὅτι κυριεύομεν ὑμῶν τῆς πίστεως, ἀλλὰ συνεργοὶ ἐσμεν τῆς χαρᾶς ὑμῶν τῇ γὰρ πίστει ἐστήκατε. II. 1 Ἐκρῖνα δὲ ἑμαυτῷ τούτο, τὸ μὴ πάλιν ἐν λύπῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐλθεῖν. 2 Εἰ x Rom. i. 9.

1 Cor. 4. 21.
ch. 13. 2, 10.
1 Cor. 2. 4.
15. 1.
1 Pet. 5. 3.
Rom. 11. 30.
a ch. 7. 5-8.
12. 20, 31.
13. 10.
1 Cor. 4. 21.

comment on the terms σφραγ. and ἀράβων. is found in the words of Eph. i. 13, 14.

23. The Apostle now returns to his principal subject, and here the second chapter ought properly to have commenced.

— ἐπὶ τὴν ἐμὴν ψυχὴν ] ‘against my soul,’ ‘to its great detriment,’ i. e. if I speak not the truth. The solemnity of the asseveration here, and in other parts of this Epistle, was justified by the unworthy imputation (of fickleness of purpose, see xiii. 3, and x. 2,) which called it forth.

Φειδόμενος is for ὡς φειδ., i. e. ὥστε φειδῶσθαι, ‘to spare you the pain of the severe censure, which I must have passed on your irregularities.’

24. οὐχ ὅτι κυριεύομεν—ὑμῶν] We have here, Beza and Grotius remark, a softening, rather an explanation. By κυριεύειν is meant ‘the assumption of an arbitrary power.’ See Luke xxii. 25. The general sense of the verse is well expressed by Bp. Middl.,—‘Though I speak of punishment, I would not have you think that we [seek to] tyrannize over your faith by wanton acts of severity, but rather that we may be fellow-workers of your joy; for by your faith alone, that faith which we seek to strengthen in you, can ye attain to salvation.’ Comp. Rom. xi. 20. For a reason which will appear from note on 1 Cor. iii. 9, I would here render συνεργ., not ‘cooperators,’ with most translators, but ‘adjutors,’ the sense assigned by the Vulg. and others, ‘promoters,’= ‘fellow-helpers, of your joy in the Lord,’ or ‘joy in the Holy Ghost by the consolations of the Gospel.’

— τῇ γὰρ πίστει ἐστήκατε ] ‘for by faith (only), [which we would strengthen in you] do ye stand.’ Stand is here said in opposition to failing in salvation. Comp. infra ch. vi. 13. Rom. xi. 20. 1 Pet. v. 12. 1 John v. 3. We are to bear in mind that (as Bp. Sanderson observes), ‘though it is by faith that we stand, if we do stand, yet it is by the grace of God that our faith itself standeth.’ Take that grace away, and our faith faileth: and then our hearts will faint. And then there is neither courage, nor patience, nor obedience, nor any thing good in us.’

II. In this Chapter the Apostle continues his justification of himself (intermixing a direction as to the course they should now take with the incestuous person), and contrasts his own conduct with that of the false teachers. Then, after mentioning his disappointment in not meeting Titus at Troas, blesses God for the success of his ministry. On the train of sentiment in this whole portion, and on the general conduct of the Apostle in the matter adverted to, see the able remarks of Paley in his Homœ Paulinæ, and Canon Tate’s notes.

1. ἔκρῖνα δὲ ἑμαυτῷ τούτο, τὸ μὴ πάλιν, &c.] Instead of the text, rec. ἐλθεῖν ἐν λύπῃ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, 9 uncials, and 40 cursives (I add all the Lamb. and several Mss. copies), have, what I have edited with Scholz, Matthæi, Grieseb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., ἐν λύπῃ πρ. ὁ. ἑ.: a reading which, in its Pauline nerve and vigour, has far more of the character of genuineness. ‘Ἐν λύπῃ must not be confined to Paul, or to the Corinthians, but be extended to both, and the sense is,—‘so as to give myself and you pain,’ viz. by causing your irregularities. Compare 1 Cor. iv. 21, ἐν ῥάβδῳ ἐλθεῖν.

— ἔκρῖνα ἑμαυτῷ τούτῳ] Billr. remarks, that almost all Commentators explain the dative ἑμαυτῷ by apud me, and say it is used as elsewhere with παρὰ or ἐν. This, however, he justly thinks quite arbitrary, and would regard ἐμ. as a dat. cosmocod., ‘I determined for myself,’ i. e. for my own sole advantage, best for myself. But this view, though adopted by Dr. Peile and Mr. Alf., appears to me hardly admissible, as yielding a strained and jejune sense. And no need is there to resort to it, since the sense presented by the Versions, in itself natural and suitable, may be obtained without any such philological subtlety, but simply by reading either, with Theophyl., ἔκρῖνα δ’ ἐν ἑμαυτῷ, a variation, however, unnoticed by all the Critical Editors. That the Peach. Syr. Translator had this reading in his MS. cannot be doubted,—since, although the Latin Versions of Trost. and Schaaf. have ‘apud me ipsum,’ the true and literal rendering would be ‘in meipso,’ for the Syriac preposition is 2, ‘in,’ and, accordingly, Mr. Etheridge (the translator of that Version) well renders ‘in myself.’

2. αἱ γὰρ ἐγὼ λύπῃ—ἐξ ἐμοῦ;] There is here some obscurity, perhaps occasioned by the refined delicacy of the remark; which was, I conceive, meant to be explanatory of ἐν λύπῃ ἐλθεῖν, just before. The καὶ, like the Heb. ו, increases the force of the interrogation, and may be rendered ‘then;’ and in the interrogative τίς is implied, in the answer, οὐδείς. The phrase τίς ἐστὶν ὁ εὐφ. is expressed populariter, the sense being, ‘Who, then, is there (i. e. would there be) to soothe my sorrows, but the grieved person?’ i. e. persons; for the singular is put for the plural, as in collectives. Here that designation might be said, in some degree, to embrace both the sound and the unsound part of the congregation; for the former would so sympathize with the latter, as to afford the Apostle but little cordial consolation; and the latter could not be expected to do it, unless in the event of entire repentance and thorough reforma-

b ver. 12.
Gal. 5. 10.
Philom. 31.

c ch. 7. 2, 9.

d 1 Cor. 5.
1—4, 12, 13.
e 1 Cor. 5. 4.
f.

g Gal. 6. 1, 2.
h Gal. 1. 3, 10.
Jude 22, 23.

γὰρ ἐγὼ λυπῶ ὑμᾶς, καὶ τίς ἐστιν ὁ εὐφραίνειν με, εἰ μὴ ὁ λυπούμενος ἐξ ἐμοῦ; <sup>3</sup> Καὶ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν τούτο αὐτό, ἵνα μὴ ἐλθὼν λύπησιν ἔχω ἀφ' ὧν ἔδει με χαίρειν πεποιθὸς ἐπὶ πάντας ὑμᾶς, ὅτι ἡ ἐμὴ χαρὰ πάντων ὑμῶν ἐστιν. <sup>4</sup> ἐκ γὰρ πολλῆς θλίψεως καὶ συνοχῆς καρδίας ἔγραψα ὑμῖν διὰ πολλῶν δακρύων οὐχ ἵνα λυπηθῆτε, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἀγάπην ἵνα γνῶτε ἦν ἔχω περισσοτέρως εἰς ὑμᾶς.

<sup>5</sup> Εἰ δέ τις λελύπηκεν, οὐκ ἐμέ λελύπηκεν, ἀλλ' ἀπὸ μέρους (ἵνα μὴ ἐπιβαρῶ πάντας) ὑμᾶς. <sup>6</sup> Ἰκανὸν τῷ τοιοῦτῳ ἡ ἐπιτιμία αὕτη ἡ ὑπὸ τῶν πλειόνων ὥστε τοῖναντίον μᾶλλον ὑμᾶς χαρίσασθαι καὶ παρακαλέσαι, μήπως τῇ περισσοτέρᾳ λύπῃ καταποθῇ ὁ τοιοῦτος. <sup>8</sup> Διὸ παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς κυρῶσαι εἰς αὐτὸν

tion, which the Apostle would not stay to see put to the proof. And thus his comfort with both of them could be but small.

3. ἔγραψα ὑμῖν τούτο αὐτό] Most Expositors, supposing an ellipse of ἐπιστόλιον, understand this of the present letter; but others, of the former one; while others take τούτο αὐτό to refer to the order given to excommunicate the incestuous person, and the general reproach on their moral conduct; which is greatly preferable, and is confirmed by the following context. Alf. supposes τούτο to mean 'the announcement of his change of purpose'; which seems the least probable of all the numerous interpretations. However, the plain truth is, so indefinite is the Apostle's language, that even a bolder man than Mr. Alf. might admit that the meaning intended by the Apostle is never likely to be fully ascertained.

4. The connexion, obscure enough, is traced by Abp. Newcome as follows: ['I wrote my former Epistle, I say, that I might not have occasion of grief;]—for I am so much interested in your welfare, that I was deeply affected when I wrote it; and its end was not so much to grieve you, as to show my great love towards you.' He rightly suspends the sense on the γὰρ, but wrongly takes it to be causal, and drowns the sense in a multitude of words. But why should not the γὰρ be expository, introducing, by way of explanation, the reason for something proceeding; on which see my Lex. ? Thus, here, it introduces an explanation of Paul's conduct; q. d. 'why it was out of much tribulation, and heartfelt anguish, that I wrote unto you (with many tears) as I did [and not from any inconsistency of purpose]; in doing which, my meaning was, not that ye should be pained, but that [sensible of the motive which induced me so to write as to give pain] ye might recognize therein my love, which I bear abundantly towards you.'

5. αἰ δέ τις λελύπηκεν] Whatever may be uncertain in the interpretation of this passage, one thing is clear (though it has been pointed out only by Beza), that the αἰ is used here as a softening of speech, whereby indirect is preferred to direct assertion,—and, indeed, is often used of things past, and therefore certain; as in Æschin., p. 337, οὐκ ἀγαπᾷ εἰ μὴ δίκην δέδοκε. Eurip. Ion 1321, φθονεῖς αἰ πατὴρ ἔξευρέ με; De-mosth. Mid. p. 29, οὐκ ἡσύχῃ αἰ τιποῦτο κακὸν ἰλάγαι τῷ. Yet αἰ τις is not simply put for εἰ τις (as in Luke xiv. 26, and often elsewhere, see my Lex. N. T.), but the τις retains its usual force, though it is meant to denote (but tacitly) 'a certain person' (meaning the incestuous person), and is not to be understood indefinitely. Render: 'But if any one (meaning the vicious person in question) have caused grief, he hath not [so much] grieved me, as (that I may not be too severe in saying) all of you,—partly, 'With regard to the sentiment,' says Mr. Comyn, 'St. Paul intends to say, that not all the Corinthian Church had been included in his former censure, but only that part of it which had supported the offender; and therefore the pain which the offender had drawn down on the Church was not inflicted on the whole Church, but only on that erring part of it.'

6. Reasons are now adduced for showing mercy to the penitent offender.—ἡ ἐπιτιμία. The term signifies properly 'the fine,' or other 'penishment adjudged to an offender;' but here, that of 'ecclesiastical censure, awarded at the hand of the body of the congregation.'—αὕτη, 'of itself.'—ἐκ τῶν πλειόνων, 'at the hands of the many,' 'the general body of the Church'—the πλῆθος, meaning all except the persons so punished. Thus the *Exco*mes sometimes received back a brother who had been expelled from the society, after he had suffered much misery, ἰσχυρῶς ἐπὶ τοῖς ἁμαρτήμασιν αὐτῶν τὴν βέβαιον ἠγοῦμενος, says Joa. Bell. ii. 8, 8.

7. χαρίσασθαι] Of course implying that he had repented of his sin.—λύπη αἰσθησῶν, 'be overwhelmed by the excess of his sorrow: a metaphor derived, I conceive, not from the being devoured by a beast, as is generally supposed, but from drowning; compare Ps. cxiv. 2—4. The destruction here alluded to is that from excess of affliction, or self-destruction from despair.

8. κυρῶσαι εἰς αὐτὸν ἀγάπην] This is rendered, 'to confirm your love to him.' But the proper import of the word permits, and the context and circumstances of the case rather require, the sense, 'to make him assured of your love'; namely, by some public testimony of it; i. e. the annulment of the act of excommunication, in order to confirm that reconciliation. That some public testimony of kind feeling to him, namely, by the reversal of his excommunication, is here ἀγάπην <sup>9</sup> εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ ἔγραψα, ἵνα γνῶ τὴν δοκιμὴν ὑμῶν, εἰ εἰς πάντα ὑπήκοοί ἐστε. <sup>10</sup> Ὡς δέ τι χαρίζεσθε, καὶ ἐγὼ (καὶ γὰρ ἐγὼ εἶ τι κεχάρισμαι, ᾧ κεχάρισμαι, δι' ὑμᾶς) ἐν προσώπῳ Χριστοῦ, <sup>11</sup> ἵνα μὴ πλεονεκτηθῶμεν ὑπὸ τοῦ Σατανᾶ· οὐ γὰρ αὐτοῦ τὰ νοήματα ἀγνοοῦμεν.

<sup>12</sup> Ἐλθὼν δέ εἰς τὴν Τρωάδα εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ θύρας μοι ἀνεφγμένης ἐν Κυρίῳ, οὐκ ἔσχηκα ἀνεσις τῷ πνεύματί μου, τῷ μὴ εὐρεῖν με Τίτον τὸν ἀδελφόν μου. <sup>13</sup> Ἄλλὰ ἀποταξάμενος αὐτοῖς, ἐξῆλθον εἰς Μακεδονίαν. <sup>14</sup> Τῷ δὲ Θεῷ χάρις, τῷ πάντοτε θριαμβεύοντι ἡμᾶς ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, καὶ τὴν ὁσμὴν τῆς γνώσεως αὐτοῦ φανερῶντι δι' ἡμῶν ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ. <sup>15</sup> Ὅτι Χριστοῦ εὐδία ἐσμὲν τῷ Θεῷ ἐν τοῖς σωζομένοις καὶ

intended, was also, I find, the opinion of Theophyl. Of the phrase here used I have never met with any example elsewhere. Probably it was a provincialism.

<sup>9</sup> εἰς τοῦτο γὰρ ἔγραψα—[εἰς] The full sense contained in this briefly worded passage seems to be this: '[Forgive him, I say:] for the chief object I had in writing [that you should punish him is answered; and that] was, that I might know the proof of you (i.e. that I might put you to the test), whether you be obedient in all things. Comp. Phil. ii. 22.]

<sup>10</sup> ὡς δέ τι χαρίζεσθε, καὶ ἐγὼ Sub. χαρίζομαι. The sense intended is well expressed by Laeppis thus: 'in omnibus judiciis, quæ equitatem et lenitatem animi producant, nemo liberius vos sequitur quam ego.'—καὶ γὰρ ἐγὼ—δι' ὑμᾶς. The sense seems to be, 'For whatever I have [hereby] forgiven any one (if I myself can be said to have forgiven), I forgive it for your sakes, and to testify my regard for you.' At ὡς, sub. κεχάρ., which was suppressed to avoid repetition. The next words, ἐν προσώπῳ Χριστοῦ, are by almost all Commentators joined with the words immediately preceding. And thus a good sense arises; but one, I conceive, not very agreeable to the words following. ἵνα μὴ πλεον. ὑπὸ τοῦ Σατ. I therefore agree with the Bala Editor, that the words καὶ γὰρ—ὑμᾶς are parenthetical; and that ἐν προσώπῳ, &c., belong to καὶ ἐγὼ (χαρίζομαι)—ἐν προσώπῳ Χρ. means, 'acting in the name and in behalf of Christ, as it were in his person;' synonymous with ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. 1 Cor. v. 4.]

<sup>11</sup> ἵνα μὴ πλεονεκτηθῶμεν, &c.] These words seem meant to give a reason why he and they should be always disposed to show lenity on sincere repentance; namely, lest, by their excessive severity, Satan might obtain an advantage over them, by tempting the offender either to despair or to apostacy; thus bringing Christianity into evil report, as a harsh religion, and deterring others from embracing it; or, by exciting divisions in the Church, and preventing the success of the Gospel.

<sup>12, 13</sup> What is here said is meant to give a further proof of his affectionate concern for them, and his desire to visit them; namely, that after he went to Troas to preach the Gospel, and had good opportunity of success; yet, because he found not Titus there (who was to bring him account of the state of the Corinthian converts), he could not rest, but must go in search of him into Macedonia.

<sup>12</sup> καὶ θύρας μοι ἀνεφγ. See note 1 Cor. xvi. 9, and Acts xiv. 2. Ὅς ἄλλα, &c., the full sense is, 'But however [effecting what I could without his assistance] I bade adieu to them (i.e. the Trojans), and went into Macedonia.'

<sup>14</sup> τῷ δὲ Θεῷ—Χριστῷ Render: 'But [so that as it may] thanks be unto God;' i.e. with reference to the happy turn affairs had taken at Corinth, and the good account he had received of the Corinthians from Titus (see vii. 6), the Apostle breaks forth into thanksgivings to God, for the success with which he is pleased to bless his Evangelical labours.—θριαμβ. ἡμᾶς ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ shows the grounds of the thanksgiving; namely, because 'he maketh us to triumph.' The word properly signifies 'to triumph over;' but here is used (as the best Commentators, ancient and modern, suppose) in a Hiphal or causative sense; as in Eur. Herc. Fur. 1596; and in other verbs, as βασιλεύειν, ἐπιστάσκειν, ἀνταρκεῖν, κληρονομεῖν, &c. The sense is, 'causeth us to triumphantly overcome all difficulties,' 'to go from city to city as triumphing conquerors in the cause of Christ.' But the metaphor is not to be too much pressed on. So also the expressions πάντοτε and ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ are not to be rigidly interpreted, but understood of what, upon the whole, was the case. Indeed, when the Apostle was least successful, there was always some kind of victory obtained over the kingdom of Satan—καὶ τὴν ὁσμὴν—φανερῶντι, &c. The sense is, 'And who diffuseth, by us, every where the odour of his Divine knowledge.' There is an allusion to the fragrant odour of flowers and aromatics scattered around conquerors when going in triumph. So Plutarch (cited by Kypke) says the streets were on such occasions θυμιαμάτων πληρεῖς. Some confusion of metaphor, indeed, exists; but, under a lively allusion to the wide spreading of aromatic odours, it represents the wide diffusion of the Gospel, and its multifarious influence.

<sup>15</sup> Χριστοῦ εὐδία—ἀπολλυμένοις] Here the metaphor at ὁσμὴ is retained, but with some change of application; the Gospel thus propagated being now compared to a sweet odour diffused throughout any place, or among any per-n Luke 2. 34. ἐν τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις οἷς μὲν, ὁσμή θανάτου εἰς θάνατον, 16 οἷς John 9. 30. δὲ, ὁσμή ζωῆς εἰς ζωὴν. καὶ πρὸς ταῦτα τίς ἱκανός; 17 οὐ

 ch. 2. 5, 6. γάρ ἐσμεν, ὡς οἱ πολλοὶ, καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ o ch. 4. 1. ἵνα ἡμεῖς σωθῶμεν. καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις, both among those who are & 11. 12-13. saved, and among those who perish.' On the Jer. 5. 31. exact import of these two expressions considerable & 23. 37-32. diversity of opinion exists. Calvin, as may Matt. 24. 24. I Tim. 1. 19, 20. & 4. 1-3.

sons (John xii. 3): and as the odours of aromatic herbs possess the property of being salutiferous as well as grateful;—such is the quality here meant to be ascribed to the Gospel, and such is the idea particularly contained in the words of the next verse. Here the Apostle is said to have had in mind similar modes of expression found in the Rabbinical writings. So the Rabbis speak of the Law as 'a savour of life to Israel, but to the Gentiles a savour of death.' Thus the sense is, 'We are those by whom God, through Christ, diffuseth this odoriferous and salutiferous knowledge of the Gospel: 'we are the means of disseminating it ἐν τοῖς σωζομένοις καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις, both among those who are saved, and among those who perish.' On the exact import of these two expressions considerable diversity of opinion exists. Calvin, as may be imagined, finds no difficulty whatever, by referring the former term to the elect, and the latter to the reprobate. But here, it is observable, he stands almost alone. No countenance to this view is to be found in the ancient Fathers, whether Greek or Latin, not even in Augustin: and next to none in the great Reformers. Thus Melancthon, Bucer, Bullinger, and Beza, take no such view; which has, however, been adopted by some Calvinistic-English Commentators. In order to effectually exclude which sense, Dr. Poole explains of σωζ. to mean 'they who, in the exercise of their own free-will, submit themselves to be saved by the power of God (Acts ii. 40, 41. 47. Rom. i. 16. 1 Cor. i. 18), are the followers of the great Captain of Salvation, Acts v. 31. Heb. ii. 10; but, οἱ ἀπολλύμενοι, they that are in the way to perish, that willfully reject the proffered means of grace, and by their own deliberate choice proclaim themselves unworthy of that eternal life which God, on certain prescribed conditions, has proposed to their acceptance' (Acts xiii. 46). It is, however, better to explain the terms in question, as the best Commentators have done, without reference to any theological system, which it could not be the Apostle's purpose here to introduce. In short, it is best to regard the words as meant to be understood populariter: thus taking the former, with Grot., Hamm., Whitby, Dodd., and Wesley, of true believers, who receive the faith, and live according to it; the latter, of willful unbelievers, who receive it not, and, accordingly, perish by its non-reception.' In short, the present passage is parallel to that at 1 Cor. i. 18; so much so, that no interpretation ought to be introduced here that will not suit what is adopted there. The sense I have laid down there will apply here; and this differs little from the explanation of the terms here offered by Dr. Poole. At ver. 16 the application of the metaphor is again somewhat changed; the Gospel being considered, not as the odour of sweet-smelling perfumes, but of aromatics, to which we apply the term savour, as admitting both of a good and of a bad sense. And so in Greek ὁσμή is applied in both ways; but espec. the latter. Considering, then, that of aromatics some are salutiferous, others dele-

rious; hence the Apostle, with reference to each of these two classes (under which he here comprehends professing Christians in general), means to say, 'To those (i. e. those who are perishing) the salutiferous savour of the Gospel we diffuse becomes a deadly savour, tending to death, while to those who are saved it is a life-bestowing savour or odour tending to life (overlasting).' The above view of the nature of the metaphor in ὁσμή is further confirmed by the use, probably as early as the time of St. Paul, by the Rabbinical writers of the expressions aroma vite and aroma mortis, wherein they characterize the law as an aroma vite to Israel, but to the heathens as an aroma mortis, thus using the term 'aroma' simply in the sense odour. Iachm. and Tisch. at the next verse subjoin ἐκ to both θανάτου and ζωῆς, from 3 uncial, and 7 cursive, MSS. and some later Versions, besides not a few Fathers; but wrongly. The external authority for the reading is too slender to be relied on; espec. when in direct opposition to all the early Versions, that recognize the simple Genit., which only requires to be understood, to be approved.

16. καὶ πρὸς ταῦτα τίς ἱκανός;] The interrogation implies a strong negation; the sense being, in other words, 'No one of himself;' meaning, that his sufficiency must be from God [to whom all things are possible], through his Holy Spirit. See Matt. xix. 16.

17. οὐ γὰρ ἴσμεν, καπηλ. τὸν λόγον τ. Θ.] The γὰρ refers to ver. 14, the full meaning being, in other words, 'We are put in trust to do, and enabled to do, all this,—however arduous the task; and we do it with zeal and singleness of heart; for we are not, as the many (the majority), corrupting the Gospel (in order to make a gain of it).' The view which I have thus taken of the force of καπηλ. I am now enabled to further confirm from what is said by Dr. Bentley, in his admirable Sermon from this text on Popery, vol. iii. p. 242, where he shows that καπηλεύειν has a complex idea, and a wider signification than δολοῦν, since κατ. always comprehends δολ., but δολ. never extends to κατ.; which, besides the sense of adulterating, has an additional notion of unjust gain or profit. Thus κατ. was, by an easy and natural metaphor, diverted to other expressions, denoting cheating, and lucre, as κατ. τὰς δίκας, τὴν σοφίαν, τὰ μαθήματα, 'to corrupt and sell justice,' to prostitute learning and philosophy for gain. 'Cheating and adulterating' is part of the notion of κατ.; but the principal essential of it is 'sordid lucre.' Wherefore, to do justice to our text, we must add to 'who corrupt the word of God,' by the words 'for filthy lucre.'—I would add that ἀετλος means a petty retail dealer, or huckster, 'one who sells at second hand; as is plain from Plato, p. 581, c, ἔργα ἀλλότρια παραδεχόμενοι, διέτερον πωλοῦσι πάλιν οἱ κάπηλοι, and p. 606. And so Heych. explains καπηλεύειν μετὰ πωλῆ. Eschyl., too, Theb. 541, by a bold figure (formed on the foregoing sense), says, ἔλθων δ' ἰοικανὸν οὐ καπηλεύειν μίχην, 'he will not fight by retail;' i. e. in a peddling ἀλλ' ὡς ἐξ εἰδικρινείας, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐκ Θεοῦ, κατενώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἔν Χριστῷ λαλοῦμεν. III. <sup>1</sup> Ἀρχόμεθα πάλιν ἐαυτοῖς συν- a ch. 5. 12.

10. 3. 12.
3. 11. 19.
1 Cor. 3. 10.
4. 15. & 10. 32.

way. In short, the κἀπηλοι were petty charmen (and that chiefly in estables or drinkables) exactly corresponding to our lucksters. And as provisions are most susceptible of that adulteration, which is so likely to be practised by petty vendors, so these κἀπηλοι were, from a very early period, accused of this trickery. So Is. i. 22. οἱ κἀπηλοι σοὶ μισγοῦσι τὸν οἶνον ὕδατι. Καπηλεύειν, therefore, came to mean 'make a gain of'; and also, as here, to 'corrupt for the purpose of gain.' So Lucian. Herm. 59. ὥσπερ οἱ κἀπηλοι κερασάμενοι καὶ δολώσαντες. The sense, then, is, 'corrupting the Gospel, in order to make a gain of it, by representing its doctrines and injunctions as otherwise than they really are.' What these admixtures were, may easily be conceived, though they, no doubt, differed in different teachers; sometimes consisting of Jewish superstitions, and sometimes of philosophical notions, and the dreams of the sophists.

The idea is further unfolded in the words following, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐξ εἰλ., where, from extreme brevity, the sense is left indeterminate. Hence the variety of interpretations, not a few of which are manifestly untenable. Whitby paraphrases as if πράσσουσι could be supplied after the former ἁλλά; but it cannot; and the sense which he deduces from the remaining words is only such as is wrested from them. Nearly the same may be said of Dr. Peile's paraphrase; in framing which he did not discern the pregnant brevity of the words. And strange it is, that so excellent a Greek scholar could come to the conclusion that ὡς ἐκ Θεοῦ can stand for ὡς Θεοῦ ἀνθρώποι, or that ἐν Χριστῷ means, 'as ministers of Christ.' The construction is, indeed, somewhat perturbed, and may at first appearance seem overcharged in phraseology. But a right view of the construction will dissipate this appearance of redundancy; and, in order to this, we have only to take the words ὡς ἐξ εἰλικρ. ὡς ἐκ Θεοῦ as pertaining to λαλοῦμεν circumstantially, i. e. so as to qualify λαλ. by a circumstance of mode,—namely, either by regarding ἐξ εἰλ. as an Adverbial phrase, to signify, 'as in (lit. out of) sincerity,' or (as the accompanying phrase ὡς ἐκ Θεοῦ seems to require) rather to view it as suspended on the Participle οἱ λαλοῦντες, to be understood from λαλοῦμεν; and this is supported by the authority of the Pesh. Syr. Version, which so renders at each of the clausulae ὡς ἐξ εἰλικρ. and ὡς ἐκ Θεοῦ. Of ἐκ Θεοῦ the sense is, not, 'of God,' but, 'from God,' i. e. Dei instructus, by his authority and instruction. With respect to the phrases which follow, κατενώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ and ἐν Χριστῷ, they are likewise to be considered as qualifying adjuncts of circumstances as to mode, pertaining to λαλοῦμεν. And the former signifies 'as in the sight (or presence) of God,' i. e. 'having him always before us,' and consequently having an eye to him, his will and pleasure, and his approbation alone. The latter admits of several senses, each not inapposite. I should still be inclined to think that its real sense is, 'according to the truth in Jesus, and without any admixture of falsehood,'—but that this now seems to me objectionable, from its being an over-strained interpretation. Hence I prefer the sense assigned by Grot. and Est. (which has the support of the Syriac and Vulg. Versions, and of the ancient Commentators), 'in the name and by the authority of Christ,' as his ministers. This is confirmed by a similar passage, infra, ch. xii. 19, κατενώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐν Χριστῷ λαλοῦμεν, where see my note. It is proper for me to remark, that the second ἁλλά is intensive, as at ch. vii. 11, and the Participle with Verb. Subst. is put for the Verb καπηλιεύομεν (= καπηλεύεσθαι ἔσμεν) to denote habitual action. Render: 'for we are not, like most, corrupting the word of God; but as in sincerity, but as from God do we speak (i. e. deliver our Gospel message), as in the presence of God, in the name [by the authority] of Christ.'

III. In this Chapter the Apostle obviates any charge of self-commendation, desiring to ascribe all his success to God, vv. 1—6. And in adverting to the superiority of the Gospel over the Law, vv. 7—11, he especially points out plain speaking (probably to excuse his own freedom of animadversion) as most accordant with its nature; and concludes with describing the liberty and progressive holiness which arose from the Gospel, vv. 11—18.

1. ἀρχόμεθα—συνιστάνειν;] This is meant to anticipate an objection, that by thus mentioning his sincerity he was recommending himself. In the interrogation is implied a strong negation, οὐδαμῶς! The next words, εἰ μὴ χρῆζομεν, are to be considered as having reference to something omitted for brevity's sake; q. d. '[Nor have we any occasion so to do], unless we need, &c.' Thus there will be no occasion, with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., Alf., and other Editors, to read ἡ μὴ for εἰ μὴ, from C, D, F, G, and a few cursives (to which I can only add Lamb. 1182), Versions, and Fathers. 'H μὴ is probably an alteration to remove a difficulty, which, after all, is, as we have seen, but imaginary. This view I find confirmed by the opinion of Meyer and Dr. Peile, who supply, as I have done, the ellipsis. 'No!' nor has there been any occasion, unless we need,' &c.; and the same Critics deem that the strong external authority for εἰ μὴ is supported by internal evidence, arising from εἰ μὴ being the more difficult reading. But that canon has its modification; and, on carefully reconsidering the question, I am of opinion, as heretofore, that ἡ μὴ may possibly be the true reading, nay that it probably is such. But I cannot agree with Mr. Alford as to the origin of εἰ μὴ, because his hypothesis is too far-fetched. Critics might stumble at μὴ, and its awkward position in the question; (at what would they not stumble?) but the fault, if any, is to be laid at the door of the scribes, who would be likely to stumble at the unfrequent ἡ μὴ, and read it as εἰ μὴ, by itacism; not to say that εἰ and ἡ are perpetually interchanged.—σοῦτα. ἱστο. These (called by Arrian, Ep. iii. 2, 1, γράμματα σοῦτα) were letters of introduction, probably deriving their origin from the tersera hospitalitatis of the earlier Greeks. They were much employed among the Greeks and Romans, and also the Jews; ιστάνειν; † εἰ μὴ χρῆζομεν, ὥς τινες, συστατικῶν ἐπιστολῶν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἢ ἐξ ὑμῶν συστατικῶν. <sup>2</sup> Ἡ ἐπιστολὴ ἡμῶν ὑμεῖς ἐστε, ἐγγεγραμμένη ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν, γινωσκομένη καὶ ἀναγινωσκομένη ὑπὸ πάντων ἀνθρώπων <sup>3</sup> φανερούμενοι ὅτι ἐστὲ ἐπιστολὴ Χριστοῦ διακονηθεῖσα ὑφ' ἡμῶν, ἐγγεγραμμένη οὐ μέλανι, ἀλλὰ Πνεύματι Θεοῦ ζώντος, οὐκ ἐν πλαξὶ λιθίναις, ἀλλὰ ἐν πλαξὶ καρδίας σαρκίνας. <sup>4</sup> Πεποιθήσιν δὲ τοιαύτην ἔχομεν διὰ τοῦ Χριστοῦ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν <sup>5</sup> οὐχ ὅτι ἱκανοὶ ἐσμεν

T

b 1 Cor. 2.
2, 3.

c Exod. 24.
12.
N 24. 1.
Jer. 31. 33.
Ezek. 11. 19.
N 30. 20.
Heb. 8. 10.

d ch. 2. 16.
Phil. 2. 12.

from whom, it is probable, was immediately derived the frequent use of them in the primitive Church. The τινες alludes to the false teachers, who, it seems, had thus introduced themselves to the Church at Corinth.

2, 3. These verses present a certain difficulty, and that arising partly from harshness of metaphor, but chiefly from the circumstance of ἐπιστολὴ bearing two different senses in these two verses:—in the first, denoting an ἐπιστολὴ συστατικὴ, or letter serving to recommend him; in the second, simply an epistle, or writing.

— ἡ ἐπιστ. ἡμῶν ὑμῖς ἐστε, &c. ] As if he had said (observes Theodor.), ἡμῖς οὐ δέσμεθα γραμμάτων· αὐτὰ γὰρ ἡμεῖς τὰ πράγματα μαρτυροῦν, according to the sense expressed by Theophylact, 'that which letters of introduction and recommendation would have done, this ye yourselves do when seen and heard.' Thus the meaning is, 'Ye are [in fact] our recommendatory Epistle, one written by Christ, through our instrumentality; not with ink, but with the Holy Spirit; not on tablets of stone, but on the heart;' q. d. 'your conversion to the Christian faith, by my preaching and miracles, is a sufficient recommendation of me as a true Apostle, and of the Gospel through me. Now this conversion, and the moral reformation therein implied, must (from the extensive communication of Corinth with almost every part of the world) have been known to all, and were in that sense read by all.' By the words a little further on, γινωσκομένη—ἀνθρώπων, it is simply meant that 'this recommendatory Epistle is easy to be read and known by all men.' The words ἐγγεγραμμένη ἐν ταῖς καρδ. ἡμ. are merely meant to point at the peculiar circumstance of the Apostle's being himself deeply impressed with the fact, that they are an Epistle recommendatory of him, and of the Gospel which he was bearing to all parts of the world.

3. φανερούμενοι ὅτι ἐστὲ, &c. ] 'Here,' observes Prof. Dobree, 'we have a transition from the heart of Paul to the heart of the Corinthians, as at infra vv. 13—16 from Moses veiled to the Jews veiled.' Hence arises a comparison of the ministry of Paul, as compared with that of Moses; see Exod. xxxiv. 33. Φανερ. ὅτι ἐστὲ, &c. is for ὅτι φανερῶς ἐστὲ, 'it being manifest that ye are,' &c. The same metaphor is here continued, but with alteration, and a different application. When it is said that they are even Christ's Epistle, the latter must be understood in a different sense from the former; and the sense may be thus traced: 'Ye bear the commands of Christ on your heart, and transcribe them into your practice.' The words διακονηθεῖσα ὑφ' ἡμῶν refer to the Apostle's own instrumentality in the matter, as much as to say: 'Ye are, indeed, an epistle of Christ,—but one which He has ordained to be written by us—a writing not with ink [as letters of recommendation are], but with the Spirit of the living God; but which he has taken care to have written by us.' By ἐπιστολὴ Χρ. is meant the Gospel; and to this the term ἐπιστολὴ is very applicable. The term being, from its original sense, applicable to 'any revelation of God's will to man.'

The remainder of the verse is meant further to unfold the sense of ἐπιστολὴ, and to show the superiority of the Gospel over the Law. 'The Law was written with ink; the Gospel was written upon your hearts by the Spirit: accordingly, as far as the Spirit is superior to ink, and the heart to stone, so far is the new Dispensation superior to the old.' Again, in the Law there was a bare command; in the Gospel the injunction was rendered effectual by the operation of the Holy Spirit. The words ἐν πλαξὶ καρδίας σαρκ. are, by transposition, put for ἐν πλαξὶ σαρκ. κ., i. e. on fleshy tablets, namely, those of the heart; in which words the Apostle prob. had in mind the expression ἐν τῇ in Prov. lii. 3 and Jer. xvii. 1, though the Greek Versions there inadequately render by ἐν τῇ τοῦ στόματος: except that in the Alex. MS. for ἐν τῇ τοῦ πλάτους τῆς καρδίας, the true reading, I doubt not, is ἐν τῇ πλακῶς τ. κ., as found in the Compl. and Ald. edd. and some MSS. Comp. Sirach xvii. 13 in the Complut. and 2 other copies; and ἐσθ. I am persuaded, had place in St. Paul's copy.

4. The connexion which I have traced after Chrys., Theoph., and Calv., supposes the Apostle here means to deprecate the accusation of boasting of himself. And this view I find supported by Est. Thus it is to be considered rather as a softening of language that might have seemed boastful; and, accordingly, the connexion will be with vv. 2 and, partly, 3; and Paul means to say, that, 'whatever his superiority might be, it rested solely on his confidence in (lit. 'affiance on'; as supra i. 15, infra viii. 2. x. 2. Eph. iii. 12) God, through Christ, from whom alone he derived his sufficiency to spread the Gospel.' The full sense, then, may be expressed thus: 'We, however, have such a cause for entire affiance [as this superiority implies] in God alone, through Christ.'

5. οὐχ ὅτι, &c. ] A brief form of expression for οὐ λέγω ὅτι, &c. '[I mean not to say] that we are of ourselves able to excogitate, or derive, any thing [of this kind, as it is said Acts iii. 12, ἐξ ἑδρας δυνάμεως] as coming out of, from ourselves,' namely, any thing in relation to the truths, much less the mysteries, of the Gospel: 'but our competency, or ability to utter them

ἀφ' ἐαυτῶν λογίσασθαι τι, ὡς ἐξ ἐαυτῶν, ἀλλ' ἡ ἰκανότης ἡμῶν ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ <sup>6</sup> ὅς καὶ ἰκάνωσεν ἡμᾶς διακόνους καινῆς διαθήκης, οὐ γράμματος, ἀλλὰ πνεύματος· τὸ γὰρ γράμμα ἀπο-κτείνει, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ζωοποιεῖ. <sup>7</sup> Εἰ δὲ ἡ διακονία τοῦ θανάτου ἐν * γράμματι ἐντετυπωμένη ἐν λίθοις, ἐγενήθη ἐν δόξῃ, — ὥστε μὴ δύνασθαι ἀτενίσαι τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὸ πρόσωπον Μωϋ-σέως, διὰ τὴν δόξαν τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ τὴν καταργουμένην <sup>8</sup> πῶς οὐχὶ μᾶλλον ἡ διακονία τοῦ Πνεύματος ἔσται ἐν δόξῃ;
<sup>9</sup> Εἰ γὰρ ἡ διακονία τῆς κατακρίσεως δόξα, πολλῶ μᾶλλον

e Jer. 31. 31.
Heb. 3. 6. 8.
Rom. 7. 6.
ch. 5. 18.
1 Deut. 4. 12.
Exod. 34. 20
—30.
Heb. 9. 4.
e Luke 9.
29—31.
Act. 8. 18.
e Exod. 19.
13—19.
e 30. 18, 19.
Rom. 1. 18.
e 8. 5, 4.
Gal. 3. 10.
Heb. 12. 18—31.

with effect is from God.' The above view of the sense is confirmed by Chrys., Theophyl., Theodor., and (Ecumen., cited in Recens. Syn., where I have adduced exx. of the phrase λογίζεσθαι ἐξ ἑαυτοῦ, and ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, from Demetr. Phaler. and Elian. Of the two expressions, ὡς ἐξ ἑαυτῶν and ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν, Wolf refers the former to the will, the latter to the power. It would rather seem that ὡς ἐξ ἑαυτῶν is meant to further explain the sense; the meaning being, what Emmerling expresses, 'ita ut ex me profectum putem.' The words are perhaps to be construed, not with ἰκανοί, but with λογίσασθαι τι: which is confirmed by Liban. Or. 44, p. 914, D, ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν αὐτὰ λογίζομενοι καὶ σκοποῦντες οἱ δικάσται, &c. Of the words following (which ought not to have been discovered from those preceding) ὅς ἡμᾶς—διαθήκης, the sense is, 'and He alone it is that hath fitted us to be ministers,' &c., viz. 'by giving us, through the grace of the Spirit, ability to minister in the Gospel.' The terms ἰκανοί, ἰκανότης, and ἰκάνωσεν, could only be meant (as the best Commentators are agreed) to be applied to the work of evangelizing, and therefore ought not to be urged in support of a doctrine as they are by those whose purpose is to establish a system. Such, however, has, I lament to say, been done by Augustin, Thom. Aquin., Est., Calv., Beza, Hyper., and Bulling., of whom Thom. Aquin., Calv., and Beza, in particular, extend it to every thing,—using the most unmeasured language, so as almost to deny the power not only to think a good thought, but almost to think at all, and pronouncing, after the manner of the Council of Trent, that whosoever shall oppose their dogma is deceived by an heretical spirit. In the words οὐ γράμματος, &c., the Apostle takes occasion to again advert to the difference between the Law and the Gospel; where by τὸ γράμμα is meant 'what is literal,'—namely, the Law; and by τὸ πνεῦμα, 'what is spiritual,' (namely, internal and spiritual religion,) the Gospel. See Calv. on Rom. ii. 29. Such (in opposition to the Mystics, who take these words of the literal, and the spiritual interpretation) Bp. Marsh. in his Lect. p. 369, has proved to be the only sense which the context admits. 'The Apostle (says he) is drawing a parallel, which has no concern with interpretation, but is between the Law of Moses and the Gospel of Christ. The former "kills," inasmuch as it denounces death without hope on all who disobey it; nay, sometimes occasioned death, by the multiplicity and difficulty of its ceremonial rites. See Rom. iii. 20, and Gal. ii. 19. On the contrary, the πνεῦμα, the Spiritual System of the Gospel, ζωοποιεῖ, 1st, brings life and immortality to light, and affords the means of salvation; 2dly, it imparts life, a new life, by the Holy Spirit. There is also an allusion to that expiatory sacrifice by which this vivification is effected. The two Dispensations, moreover, are contrasted as to their tendency: that of the Law was punishment; that of the Gospel, reformation rather than punishment,—salvation rather than condemnation.'

7, 8. The Apostle now further evinces this superiority of the Gospel over the Law, by showing, 1. that its glory is greater; inasmuch as the Law had only a corporeal and visible glory,—namely, that in the face of Moses; but the New Dispensation an intellectual and spiritual one. (Theophyl.) We have here an argumentum à minori ad majus; and the full sense of the two verses may be thus expressed: 'If the ministry or office of promulgating a covenant which, in the letter (when written on tables of stone), brought nothing but death with it, was glorious (namely, by the appearance of angels with the cloud of glory), and so glorious that the children of Israel were not able to look at the face of Moses, because of the shining of his countenance, which glory was soon to vanish; how much more shall not the ministration of the Spiritual, or the Spirit-giving Dispensation (i. e. the Gospel) be glorious?' I now point to δόξα,—and καταργουμένην,—thus keeping apart the words ὥστε—καταργουμένην, for a reason which will appear from note on 1 Cor. i. 6. For γράμματος, I now, with Lachm. and Tisch., edit, on competent authority, γράμματι, which is called for by the course of argument which I have already explained. As to τὴν καταργουμένην, it must not be understood, with some, of 'fading away with youth, and ceasing with death.' The best mode of taking the words is that of the ancient, and some eminent modern, Expositors; namely, to suppose that τὴν καταργουμένην (introduced to impart force to the argumentation), though it pertains in appearance to τὴν δόξαν, yet, in fact, belongs to γράμματα, meaning 'the Mosaic economy;' and that the Apostle meant to hint that, as that glory was temporary, and would cease at death, so was the Dispensation, of whose Divine origin this was the symbol, meant also to be temporary.

9. εἰ γὰρ ἡ διακονία—ἐν δόξῃ] The Apostle here (observes Theophyl.) 'gives another turn to the same thought.' Indeed, ἡ διακ. τῆς κατακρ. is meant to further illustrate what was said at ver. 7, ἡ διακονία τοῦ θανάτου ἐν γράμματι. The condemnatory Law, and the justifi-περισσεύει ἡ διακονία τῆς δικαιοσύνης ἐν δόξῃ. <sup>10</sup> Καὶ γὰρ οὐ[δὲ] δεδόξασται τὸ δεδοξασμένον ἐν τούτῳ τῷ μέρει, ἕνεκεν τῆς ὑπερβαλλούσης δόξης. <sup>11</sup> Εἰ γὰρ τὸ καταργούμενον, διὰ δόξης· πολλῶ μᾶλλον τὸ μένον ἐν δόξῃ. <sup>12</sup> Ἐχοντες οὖν τοιαύτην ἐλπίδα, πολλῇ παρρησίᾳ χρώμεθα. <sup>13</sup> καὶ οὐ, καθάπερ

1 Rom. i. 17.
1 Eph. i. 13.
2 Exod. 34.
33, 35.
Rom. 10. 4.
Gal. 3. 26.

catory Gospel, are contrasted; the former as a ministry of condemnation, the latter as one of justification; conferring justification on all who heartily embrace it.

10. What is here said is not a correction, but a confirmation of the preceding; meaning that the glory of the Law is eclipsed when the Gospel goes forth; as the moon and stars, though diffusing their light over all the earth, yet fade before the beams of the sun, so the Law, glorious as it is in itself, yet in glory is as nothing compared with the greatness of the Gospel (Calv.): in other words, that the ministry of the New Covenant so far excels that of the Old,—outshines it so much in dignity,—that the latter was hardly glorious at all in comparison with the surpassing glory of the New. This use of δοξάζουσα, 'to be glorious,' which recurs at 1 Pet. i. 8, is not found in the Class. writers, and was doubtless Hellenistic, espec. considering that in the Sept. it often occurs, e. gr. Exod. xv. 1, 21. Pa. xxvi. 21. lxxxvi. 2. Mal. i. 11. It was, in fact, formed on the Hebr. תָּרַח in Is. lxiii. 1, glorified, glorious, and תָּרַח in Exod. xv. 11. The same use of the Part. Pass. for Noun-adj. is found in 1 Pet. i. 8, χαρὰ δεδοξασμένη.—τούτῳ τῷ μέρει signifies (like the French en cet égard), in this reference, that of comparison; and ἕνεκα bears the sense in respect to, in regard of, as in 2 Cor. iii. 10. To the examples from the Class. writers adduced by Raphael, I add Thucyd. viii. 92, δύον ἀπὸ βοῆς ἕνεκα, and Xen. Hist. ii. 4, 31, δύον ἀπὸ βοῆς ἕνεκα, in both which passages there is no such pleonasm as the Commentators suppose; but ἕνεκα (scil. τούτου) is subjoined, by way of explanation, = as far as regards this.

11. We have in this verse a more extended proof of the assertion,—that the ministry of the New Covenant very far excels that of the Old. This it does, inasmuch as its glory is more permanent; whereas the ministry of the Old was one that, on every occasion, soon passed away.—τὸ καταργ., not 'which was done away,' but 'which was to be done away,' as being intended to be only temporary.—τὸ μένον, 'what was to be permanent,' μόνιμον (viz. until the end of the world), and so called, as being the last Dispensation of God, and to be succeeded by no other.—ἐν δόξῃ, sub. ἡ, 'was attended with glory,' both at its delivery, and in its use.

12, 13. Here the Apostle further develops the sentiment conveyed at vv. 4 and 8, and resumed at ch. iv. 1, as to the superiority of the Gospel ministrations, and consequently his own, over that of the Law, intimating that he is warranted in using great παρρησία, and not, as Moses, employing a veil.—παρρησία χρ. is, as in many other nouns, used with the verb χρῆσθαι, supposed to be put for the verb cognate with the subject, and thus to be equiv. to παρρησιαζόμεθα. But the phrase carries with it an intensity of sense. As to the term παρρησία, it admits of two senses, either of them applicable in the present case. I. It may mean plainness or openness of speech, sine verborum involucria. So Chrys., Theophyl., and (Ecumen., of the ancients, and, of modern Commentators, Baling., Pisc., and Beza. Thus they explain, 'Quod Moses umbris obiectum indicavit, evangelium perspicue declarat'; comparing Mark viii. 32, καὶ παρρησίᾳ τὸν λόγον ἔλάλει, i. e. 'spoke of his approaching sufferings, &c., plainly,' and without using, as on former occasions, figures or types to denote it. And so the word is used in John x. 29. xi. 14. xvi. 25, 29, where it stands opposed to ἐν παροιμίαις. II. The term may signify openness, or bluntness of speaking, boldness of speech (such as befits the minister of the Gospel, Rom. i. 16); as Theodor., Calv., Hyper., Grot., Est., Rosenm., and others explain. This latter interpretation is recommended by its being more agreeable to the usus loquendi of the Class., and still more of the Scriptural writers; and it is, perhaps, here to be preferred on the ground of, I think, greater suitability to the following context. However, the exact sense intended by the Apostle seems to have been open straight-forwardness of speech, sincerity, as opposed to what is kept close (tectum), cloaked up; probably with allusion to the false teachers, whose teaching and dealings, we have reason to think, answered to that character. This interpretation is confirmed by what is said at ch. iv. 1, where the Apostle resumes the subject (here interrupted by the portion at vv. 13—18, containing the allegory of the veil, and the subjoined completion of the contrast between the Law and the Gospel), and that with words serving to introduce another allusion to the underhand, crafty practices of the false teachers, as conveyed in ἀπειπάμεθα τὰ κρυπτά—μὴ περιπατοῦντες ἐν πανουργίᾳ—ἀλλὰ τῇ φανερῶσι [namely, as opposed to τὰ κρυπτά just before] ἀληθείας; in which expressions, τὰ κρυπτά, πανουργία, and φανερῶσι, there is an allusion to the term παρρησία here; and by those expressions the false teachers are, as all Expositors admit, meant to be characterized. Thus we are enabled to see how the term κάλυμμα, at the next verse, came into the Apostle's mind,—namely, through the idea, by contrast, of concealment involved in παρρησία. Consequently the idea in παρρησία suggested the use of the term κάλυμμα, and that again suggested (as Paley has shown) the use of the allegory in question.

13—15. The Apostle here means to say, that his doctrine is not hid in obscurity, or ambiguity, or under types and shadows, as the Legal Dispensation had been; of which the veil on the face of Moses was a figure, or emblem. As this covering concealed the lustre of his countenance, so the obscurity of that Dispensation concealed its real glory; and the Israelites were unable to look steadfastly to Christ,—the great End and Scope of those ceremonies which were shortly to be abolished.

Μωϋσῆς ἐτίθει κάλυμμα ἐπὶ τὸ πρόσωπον ἑαυτοῦ, πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἀτενίσαι τοὺς υἱοὺς Ἰσραὴλ εἰς τὸ τέλος τοῦ καταργουμένου 14<sup>1</sup> ἄλλ' ἐπωρώθη τὰ νοήματα αὐτῶν ἄχρι γὰρ τῆς σήμερον τὸ αὐτὸ κάλυμμα ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναγνώσει τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης μένει, μὴ ἀνακαλυπτόμενον, ὅτι ἐν Χριστῷ καταργεῖται. 15 Ἀλλ' ἔως

1 Isa. 6. 10.
 & 20. 10-12.
 & 42. 18-20.
 Ezek. 13. 2.
 Matt. 13. 14.
 Acts 28. 28.
 Rom. 11. 7-10, 26.

13. καὶ οὐ] Subaud. ποιῶμεν τοῦτο, i.e. παρακαλύπτωμεν, or κάλυμμα ἐπιτίθεμεν (from the context), 'we do not use a veiled and mysterious form of speaking.' The narrative (Est. observes) contained in Exodus is here converted into an allegory, and the mystery concealed under it is pointed out; or rather the whole is, as Cameron observes, mystical and typical. A carnal people could not endure the splendour of Moses' countenance, a type of the Gospel of Christ; and thus, agreeably to the figure, the Law was veiled until the Spirit should come, who was to take it away. It has been well noticed by Calvin, Beza, and Emmerling, that πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἀτενίσαι τ. vi. 1. is not to be understood of any intention on the part of Moses, as if he spoke obscurely in the Law, in order that its ultimate import might not be discovered. Moses (as Calvin shows) would doubtless have wished that the true intent should have been known, but that he had a simple duty to perform,—to publish the Law; and as he could not regenerate the minds of the people, so also no blame is imputable (or is here imputed) to him, 'quia non debuit plus prestare quam ferebat dispensatio sibi commissæ.' In short, the πρὸς is to be taken simply to express occurrit rei (i.e. by the blindness of the Israelites): and this Cameron proves by a reference, 1. to facts; 2. to the antithesis at ver. 14; 3. to the nature of the thing; and 4. to the propriety of the thing.

The words πρὸς τὸ μὴ ἀτενίσαι—καταργουμένου may be paraphrased thus: 'So that they did not see what was adumbrated under the Law which was to be done away, even the substance—the Gospel of Christ, the end and object, the complementum of the Law.' Here the construction is carried on by the words left to be supplied, thus: 'We do not use a κάλυμμα, as Moses used one over his face [to hide the splendence of Divine glory] inasmuch that the children of Israel did not fix their eyes unto (i.e. their mental sight did not reach unto, so as to discern) the end and object of that which was being done away;' said, perhaps, in allusion to the transient manifestation of Divine glory on the august occasion recorded in Exod. xxxiv., when God was pleased to impart to Moses a portion of his own glory, in order to confirm his authority by a visible image of the Fountain of all authority impressed on his countenance, as much as to say, 'Hear ye him!' As to the term κάλυμμα, used here and at ver. 15 (derived from the Sept. Version at Exod. xxxiv.), I must remark, that veil seems not the right version to express what is really meant; which is rather hood, such as was worn by the Greeks (chiefly, however, women) as a head-covering, which concealed all the face, except the eyes, and fell upon the shoulders. Comp. Eurip. Iph. T. 372, with Soph. Aj. 245, κάρα καλύμματα κρυψάμενον. Now this both concealed the face, and shaded, though it did not quite hide, the eyes, as in the case of the hood of the middle ages, to which there is an allusion in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, ii. 2: 'While grace is saying I'll hood mine eyes, thus, with my hat.' This was all the covering that, in the case of Moses, the occasion required,—since it was the skin of Moses' face which so shone that the Israelites durst not look upon it (as beaming with the reflection of the Divine glory), and as such required to be hooded.

14—17. These verses form a parenthetical portion, of which the matter (which is allegorical) was suggested by the mention of the veil before spoken of, alluding to the custom of putting a veil on the face of the reader of the Law in the Jewish synagogue, and showing that the disposition of the Jews, as to blindness and dullness of understanding, is now just as it was in the days of Moses, and is no other than that which has occasioned their rejection of Jesus Christ. At vv. 14, 15 it is shown that the disposition of the Jews, as to blindness and stubborn aversion to knowledge, is no other than what was in the days of Moses; and is that which has now occasioned their rejection of Christ the Lord.

14. ἄλλ' ἐπωρώθη τὰ νοήμ. α.] Ἀλλὰ refers to a clause omitted, and the full sense seems to be this: '[Nor has this only been in old time,] but [it has ever since been the case,] that their understanding and perceptions have been, and are, dull and stupid.' On this sense of πωρ. see Mark vi. 52. viii. 17. John xii. 40, notes. It is proper to bear in mind, that what is said here, and in the whole context, was chiefly intended to show that the disposition of the Jews was then very much as that of the Israelites had been in the time of Moses. During these verses, 14—16, the construction is suspended, and then at ver. 17 et seq. it is resumed and completed.

—τὸ αὐτὸ κάλυμμα—μένει, μὴ ἀνακ.] The sense is: 'For, to this day, the same veil as that which Moses used (i.e. the obscurity of the Mosaic Law, typified by the veil on Moses' face) still remains, when they read the Old Testament.' The next words, μὴ ἀνακαλυπτόμενον—καταργεῖται, are best interpreted to mean 'it not being discovered by (as made known) to them, that in Christ it (i.e. ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη) is being disannulled (done away).'

15. ἄλλ' ἔως σήμερον—κεῖται] Here the Apostle repeats what he had said in the two preceding verses, and that by way of subjoining something whereby he may more clearly set forth what he meant by the term κάλυμμα. The words may be rendered thus: 'Yea, even unto this day, whenever (i.e. as often as) Moses is being read, there is a hood on their heart (i.e. lying against it); namely, so as (according to the ingenious tracing of the nature of the metaphor by Dr. Peile) to shut out and obstruct what the offer of "so great salvation" might have been expected to call forth, as the instinctive motion σήμερον, ἥνικα ἀναγινώσκειται Μωϋσῆς, κάλυμμα ἐπὶ τὴν καρm Rom. 11. διὰν αὐτῶν κείται· 16<sup>m</sup> ἥνικα δ' ἂν ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, 23, 26. περιαιρείται τὸ κάλυμμα. 17<sup>n</sup> Ὁ δὲ Κύριος τὸ Πνεῦμά ἐστιν n John 4. 24. οὐδὲ τὸ πνεῦμα Κυρίου, ἐκεῖ ἐλευθερία.) 18<sup>o</sup> Ἡμεῖς δὲ πάντες, o 1 Cor. 13.

 19.
 ch. 5. 7.

of the heart.' Thus the Apostle here declares that there yet remains the same κάλυμμα set, or fixed, at their heart. Thus it is intimated that this κάλυμμα is something adhering to the minds of the Jews. Accordingly, it is not, as some suppose, the obscurity of the books of the Old Test. that is signified mystically by the κάλυμμα, but the darkness of mind (produced by carnal and earthly affections) whereby the mind is prevented from comprehending the Scriptures, and acquiescing in the great truths they proclaim, because there is a disinclination to believe.

16. ἥνικα δ' ἂν ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, &c.] The words of this verse suggest the only remedy for this blindness and stupidity, and the only means of restoration. The use of the singular here, where the plural might have been expected, has occasioned perplexity, and a difference of opinion as to the reference. Some Expositors refer it to 'Israel' (the people of Israel) at ver. 13; others, to Μωϋσῆς in the preceding verse, meaning the Law of Moses, i. e. the Old Test.; others, again, to καρδία in the preceding. The view first mentioned seems to deserve the preference, yet only as involving the least harshness. It would seem that (as Cameron and Capell. point out, and the Pesch. Syr. Version confirms) the singular is here put for the plural, by a sort of impersonal use, or rather by an ellipsis of τις in a collective sense (for the plural, like the French on). So far in my former Editions.—On careful reconsideration of the subject for this ninth, I now think that the last of the three references in ἐπιστρ. merits the preference, viz. referring it to the nearest antecedent, τὴν καρδίαν αὐτῶν; which is much confirmed by what Dr. Burton points out, that there is an allusion to [the Sept. Version of] Exod. xxxiv. 34, ἥνικα δ' ἂν ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον. Accordingly, the words of this verse should be rendered: 'But as often as it (i. e. the heart of the Jews) shall be turned to the Lord, the veil is withdrawn from it;' meaning, as Dr. Peile explains, that no sooner shall it have turned from exclusive trust in Moses to the Lord Jesus Christ (Acts ii. 36), than that obstructing veil [rather hood] is withdrawn from off it.

17. ὁ δὲ Κύριος τὸ Πνεῦμά ἐστιν.] If the view here taken by Abp. Newe. and Bp. Middl. be correct, the full meaning will be this: 'Now the Lord [of whom I am speaking, ver. 16] is the Spirit, as opposed to the letter;' in other words, the Lord and his doctrine is (i. e. imparts) the spiritual and life-giving religion (mentioned supra, ver. 6, ὁ γράμματος, ἀλλὰ πνεύματος), so that he who lives under the Gospel lives under the Spirit, is free from the slavery of the letter, as is alluded to in the words following, οὐ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα Κυρίου, ἐκτὶ ἐλευθερία: by liberty being meant admission to the privileges of the Gospel. And so in James i. 27, and ii. 12, Christianity is termed "the perfect law of liberty," from the bondage of the Law. This view, confirmed by the ancient Expositors, and ably maintained by Hyper., has been adopted also by Prof. Dobree and Scholefield, and by Mr. Simeon, who remarks that 'the Apostle is comparing the Law and the Gospel, which, if disjoined, may be considered the one as a mere letter, a ministration of death; the other a Spirit, a ministration of righteousness and life.'

By ἐλευθερία understand 'a dispensation of freedom, and not of bondage to ceremonies.' But we are also to advert to that freedom from condemnation imparted by the Gospel (Rom. viii. 34), freedom from the bondage of corrupt passions or slavish principles; imparted by Christ, whereby the believer is enabled to find liberty in willing obedience. See Rom. viii. 1, 2, 14, 17.

18. ἡμεῖς δὲ πάντες—Πνεύματος] This verse contains the completion of the contrast between the dispensation of the Law and of the Gospel, in respect to their spiritual efficacy, commenced at ver. 13, but interrupted by the intervention of a passage expressing an idea suggested by the term κάλυμμα. It is admitted to be a passage of more than ordinary difficulty and obscurity; and the terms and expressions on which this difficulty mainly rests are, ἀνακαλυφμένον προσώπον, κατοπτρίζομενοι, μεταμορφούμεθα, and ἐκτὶ ἀπὸ Κυρίου Πνεύματος. Of these the phrase ἀνακε. προσώπου simply signifies (as standing for the adverb πρὸς) 'without the view being intercepted by any interposing medium,' as was the face of Moses by the hood above mentioned. 'Ἡμεῖς, as being opposed to the Israelites spoken of ver. 13, must mean we Christians, as the subjoined πάντες signifies all without distinction of persons, or exception of any. Of the words κατοπτρίζομενοι τὴν εἰκόνα Κυρίου the most probable sense is that assigned by Chrys., Theophyl., Theodor., Ecumen., Luther, Est., Mackn., and Emmerl., 'instar speculī suscipientes aique reddentes,' i. e. 'receiving and reflecting, after the manner of a mirror, the glory of the Lord;' where there is an allusion to the effect of looking at the 'natural face in a glass,' i. e. a metallic and highly burnished mirror (see Aesch. ap. Stob. 18, 13, compared with Xen. Cyr. viii. 1, 1, ὥσπερ κάτοπτρον εἰδόμενοι), by which the face of the beholder will be illumined by the reflected rays. The sense may be thus expressed: 'We Christians, on the contrary (ἀντ.) all of us, with unveiled face (clearly and plainly) beholding in the Gospel, as in a mirror, the glory of the Lord, (and not, like the Jews, seeing the truth veiled in types and shadows,) we, I say, are transformed into the same image and resemblance as that of the Lord, which we behold in the Gospel, [and go on] from glory to glory, even as we are supported by the Spirit of the Lord.' Ὁ μεταμορφούμεθα the sense is, 'are being [gradually] transformed,' i. e. undergoing a gradual transformation [of heart] (comp. Rom. xii. 2, μεταμορφούσθε τῇ ἀνακάλυψι τοῦ προσώπου ὑμῶν), which would be by the change of heart and renovation of soul effected in moral regeneration. This μεταμόρφωσις, or ἀνακάλυψις, is moreover said to be [κατὰ τὴν αὐτὴν εἰκόνα], 'after the very likeness,' viz. of the exemplar set forth ἀνακαλυμμένῳ προσώπῳ τὴν δόξαν Κυρίου κατοπτριζόμενοι, τὴν αὐτὴν εἰκόνα μεταμορφούμεθα ἀπὸ δόξης εἰς δόξαν, καθάπερ ἀπὸ Κυρίου Πνεύματος. IV. <sup>1</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο ἔχοντες τὴν διακονίαν ταύτην, καθὼς ἡλεήθημεν, οὐκ ἔκκακούμεν <sup>2</sup> ἀλλ' ἀπει-

a 1 Cor. 7.
 b ch. 3. 17.
 1 Thess. 2.
 3. 6.
 ch. 6. 4.

in the Son of God. So Rom. viii. 29, προώρισε συμμόρφους (εἶναι) τῆς εἰκόνης τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ. Comp. Col. iii. 10, καὶ ἐνδυσάμενοι τὸν νῆον ('the new man') τὸν ἀνακαινούμενον—κατ' εἰκόνα τοῦ κτίσαντος αὐτόν. The words ἀπὸ δόξης εἰς δόξαν (denoting 'the constant accession of fresh glory') may imply that, the more we behold this resplendent light, the more we reflect back its rays; intimating that, the more we contemplate the great truths of the Gospel of Christ as impressed on us by the teaching of the Spirit, the more do our minds become imbued with its true spirit, and we are enabled to "go on," in the words of the Psalmist, "from strength to strength" (from one stage of spiritual progress advancing to another).—until, at length, the view of faith, as in a mirror, shall be changed into immediate and perfect sight, even the glorified vision of God in heaven itself.' It only remains to determine the sense of the words which conclude the passage, καθάπερ ἀπὸ Κυρίου Πνεύματος. These, from the indeterminate nature of the wording, are susceptible of several senses, which have been assigned to them by one class or other of Expositors, and accordingly to decide which is the true interpretation must depend upon circumstances apart from words. Many modern Commentators (including Hamm., Whitby, Dodd., Mackn., and Billr.) render, 'the Lord of the Spirit,' namely, Christ, in whom the Spirit dwells, and by whom it is communicated in its gifts and graces. But this view of the sense proceeds on a most harsh construction, and is in itself little in accordance with any thing elsewhere to be found in Scripture. Again, by others, and those forming the greater part of the modern Commentators, the words are interpreted, 'as from the Spirit of the Lord,' i.e. the Holy Spirit sent from and imparted by the Lord. But that would suppose a transposition for ἀπὸ Πνεύματος Κυρίου, which occurs at ver. 17. Others render, 'by the Lord, the Spirit,' i.e. who is the Spirit; the second Genit. being in apposition with the first. So the Greek Commentators and Fathers, and the Pesch. Syr. Version, Beza, Est., Wolf, Abp. Newc., and Rosenm. But this lies open to the serious objection urged by Bp. Middl., that it would require the Article τοῦ Πνεύματος. I agree with the learned prelate in preferring the common interpretation, which to him appeared free from all objection, and to me seems to involve no serious one; for I cannot consider the so-called transposition such. And as to the one advanced by Dr. Peile, that this interpretation translates ἀπὸ just as if it had been ὑπὸ, that has little or no force, since the use of ἀπὸ for ὑπὸ is found in almost every Greek writer, very frequently in Thucyd., and occasionally in N. T. I am aware indeed that in most of these passages the ἀπὸ may be accounted for, and shown to be capable of a sense not quite equiv. to that of ὑπὸ. And such seems to be the case here, since it may mean 'from,' i.e. 'from the operation of, under the influence of,' as in Thucyd. vi. 61. viii. 48 and 68, and other passages which come under the canon of Abresch on Thucyd. vi. 61, namely, that ἀπὸ τινος προηχθῆναι is said (by Thucyd.) of things which are done ductu cūspirationis. Indeed, such, I apprehend, is the sense intended in the present passage, where the obscurity has arisen from extreme brevity. I doubt not that the preceding term μεταμορφούμεθα was here intended to be mentally repeated, the full sense being, 'even as we are gradually transformed by the influence of the Spirit of the Lord, the Holy Ghost imparted by the Lord.'

IV. This Chapter and the two next form the second section of the Epistle. The Apostle here skillfully resumes the subject of his discourse, dropt at ch. iii. 12.—the dignity of the office he was invested with; from which topic he had been drawn by the comparison with the ministration of Moses, suggested by the allegory of the veil. In order to this, and as tending to that general purpose of apology which runs through a great part of the Epistle, he compares his own conduct with that of his adversaries, and intimates his superiority over them in the most important characteristics of the ministerial office,—fidelity, sincerity, zeal, and diligence. Then, to set in a still higher point of view his merit in the last-mentioned quality, he adverts to the various trials and tribulations, which had broken his strength, and consequently lessened his ability to serve them. To this physical weakness he then opposes, by contrast, the power of the Lord, by which alone he was enabled to persevere, and to faint not under trials.

1. ἡλεσθημεν] This word is oft. used in the New Test., as here, of the free grace of God, shown in bringing men to salvation, as Rom. ix. 15 seqq. xi. 30, 32. 1 Cor. vii. 25. 1 Pet. ii. 10. On the sense of ἡκακεῖν, see note on Luke xviii. 1, and my Lex. The word is properly a military term, signifying 'to give way from cowardice.' However, for ἡκκ. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἡγκ., from A, B, D, F, G, and 4 cursives; while Matth., Gricab., and Scholz retain ἡκκ., rightly; for external evidence is insufficient to warrant the reception of ἡγκ.; and internal evidence is adverse. I doubt not that ἡγκ. was a Critical correction, to introduce a more Classical, but less forcible term. See note on Luke xviii. 1.

2. ἀπαί. τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνῃς] Render: 'we disclaim, renounce, have nothing to do with the secret practices of shame; all such base practices as men, from shame, conceal (so Hdot. ii. 35, τὰ μὲν αἰσχυρὰ, ἀναγκάζει δὲ, ἐν ἀποκρύφῳ ποιεῖν χρεῖον); not meaning, I apprehend, as Est. and others explain, 'acts of secret flagitiousness (though such might be indirectly alluded to); nor simply, as Dr. Peile explains, 'dishonest reservation;' but generally all those underhand artifices by which the false teachers made a gain of godliness by corrupting the word of God, as it is said supra, ii. 17, κατηλείποντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, answering to what is here said, δολοῦντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ

πάμεθα τὰ κρυπτὰ τῆς αἰσχύνης, μὴ περιπατοῦντες ἐν πανουργίᾳ, μηδὲ δολοῦντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀλλὰ τῇ φανερώσει τῆς ἀληθείας συνιστῶντες ἑαυτοὺς πρὸς πᾶσαν συνείδησιν ἀνθρώπων, ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>3c</sup> Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἔστι κεκαλυμμένον τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, ἐν τοῖς ἀπολλυμένοις ἐστὶ κεκαλυμμένον <sup>4d</sup> ἐν οἷς ὁ θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἐτύφλωσε τὰ νοήματα τῶν

c 1 Cor. 1. 18.
ch. 2. 15.
d Isa. 6. 10.
John 12. 31,
40, 45.
e 14. 9, 30.
ch. 2. 8, 9, 12.
Col. 1. 15.
Heb. 1. 2.

Θεοῦ, which would be either by corrupting the doctrines of the Gospel for filthy lucre's sake, or by teaching this or that set of doctrines,—'doctrines,' as Goldsmith says, 'fashion'd to the varying hour;' to suit times, and please persons; as Chrys. and Theophyl. explain.

The expression ἐν πανουργίᾳ stands in opposition to ἀπλοικῶς, denoting 'trickery' as opposed to 'straightforwardness' (the παρόρησις before mentioned), teaching one thing and thinking another (as it is explained by Theophyl. and Œcumen.), or holding back one truth, and putting forward another. In the next words, ἀλλὰ τῇ φανερώσει—ἀνθρώπων, the Apostle indirectly glances at the same class of persons by a tacit contrast of their course of action with his own; q. d. 'They recommend themselves to the acceptance of men by falsifying the truths of the Gospel; we commend ourselves to the candid judgment of every man's conscience by a simple declaration of the truth.' I have thus represented, as nearly as our language will permit, the force of the term συνείδησις, on which the gist of the argument turns, and which seems used populariter, by metonymy, to denote 'the judgment founded on internal conviction of the truth.' And the word conscience in our own language is often so used. See Johnson's Dictionary, where it is defined, 'the estimate, or determination, of conscience;' and he might have added, 'both as respects one's self, and (as here) others.' The interpretation I have propounded is confirmed by the authority of Theodor. and Photius ap. Œcumen. The added words, ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, absolutely require the sense which I have assigned to συνείδησις and, as to the general view I have taken of the passage, it is, I find, in accordance with the mode of explaining it adopted by Est. and Hyper., and the learned and judicious editor of Billroth.

For συνιστῶντες, MSS. C, D, F, G, and 3 cursives, have συνιστάντες, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but without sufficient external authority, and against internal evidence, by a breach of the most certain of Critical Canons,—since it is expelling an unusual form, and bringing in an ordinary one. The same error is repeated infra, ch. vi. 4. In both passages Griesb. and Matth. rightly retain συνιστῶντες, also at ch. x. 18, where Alf. strangely calls συνιστῶν the more usual form; whereas it is the very reverse; though he might have learnt better from Buttm. Gr. § 106 and 107. The form occurs in two of the most ancient uncials, and in two or three cursives, supra ch. iii. 1, and was edited by Lachm. The simple form in the Present ιστῶμεν occurs in Rom. iii. 31, in all the MSS. except six uncials (one from alteration), where Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. bring in the more usual form ιστάμεν, pronouncing the other a correction; though its rarity forbids that. See Buttm. Gr. § 107, who adduces Hdot. iv. 103, ιστῆ—ὅτι τῆς οἰκίας.

3. The figurative language before adopted is here continued. An objection is supposed, founded on the preceding πᾶσαν; q. d. 'all do not receive the Gospel, even when preached so plainly and strongly as Paul does.' To which the answer is, that the fault is not in the Gospel, nor in any obscurity which attaches to it, but in the blindness and perversity of those who are perishing, are in a lost state, meaning that of unbelief.—εἰ δὲ καὶ ἔστι κεκαλ. τὸ εὐαγγ., &c. It has been disputed whether the reference here is to the κέλυμμα spoken of supra, ch. iii. 13—16, combined with the ἀπιστία. πρὸς. at ver. 18, or to the particular contained in ver. 2, πᾶσαν συνείδησιν; or, again, to what is contained in the same verse, τῇ φανερώσει τῆς ἀληθείας. Each of these modes of interpretation has been adopted by one or other of the Expositors, ancient as well as modern. Now, of these, the first-mentioned is evidently untenable. The third is recommended by its probability, and is ably supported by Calvin. I have heretofore, as above, decided on the reference to πᾶσαν, and with good reason; this opinion being borne out by the words following, and supported by what is admitted by the best Expositors, that there is here an anticipation of an objection on the part of the opposers of Paul's preaching. Now, however, I am of opinion that there is a reference to both the last-mentioned terms; though the reference to φανερώσει seems made subversively to πᾶσαν. The objection in question was, it seems, twofold; q. d. 'your Gospel is any thing but clear (any thing but a φανερώσις or manifestation); it is too recondite (κεκαλυμμένον) to be understood, except by a few: by the great majority (πᾶσι) it is not understood, and consequently not received, and carried out.' To which the answer is: 'But if our Gospel is, as you say, shrouded in mystery, it is so only in the case of those who are in a lost state, those who have no part nor lot in the matter of Gospel truth: the fault is not in the Gospel which we preach, or in our want of clearness in propounding its truths, but in the blindness of those who will not see. To them it brings no light, and to them it is no other than "the savour of death unto death."'

4. This verse serves to illustrate the foregoing one, showing how this incapacity to see the light of Gospel truth had arisen, and pointing out the results thereof. The incapacity in question is declared to have had its origin in the blindness of unbelief, produced by the influence of Satan, who thus wrought in them, that the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ (who is the image of God) should not shine unto them; and that thus they should neither understand nor appreciate its blessings; meaning, in other words, 'so that, in ἀπίστων, εἰς τὸ μὴ αὐγάζειν [αὐτοῖς] τὸν φωτισμὸν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τῆς δόξης τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὅς ἐστιν εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>5</sup> Ὁὐ γὰρ ἑαυτοὺς κηρύσσομεν, ἀλλὰ Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν Κύριον ἑαυτοὺς δὲ, δούλους ὑμῶν διὰ Ἰησοῦν. <sup>6</sup> Ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς ὁ εἰπὼν ἐκ σκότους φῶς λάμψαι, ὃς ἔλαμψεν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν, πρὸς φωτισμὸν τῆς γνώσεως τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν προσώπῳ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

7 Ἐχόμεν δὲ τὸν θησαυρὸν τοῦτον ἐν ὀστροκίνοις σκεύεσιν, point of fact, they receive no enlightening, even from the glorious light of the Gospel.—Ἐν οἷς should be rendered, 'in whose case,' the ἐν being used here as supra, ch. ii. 15, and elsewhere. There is a brevity of expression for ἐν οἷς ἐστὶν ἡ κάλυψις ὅτι, &c. Satan is called, not lord, but god, of this world (so too the Rabbinical writers sometimes style him, Schottg. H. H. p. 688), because he is worshipped and served in the place of God by the world at large. So Bp. Sanderson (in his 7th Sermon 'ad Populum') shows that it 'is by doing service to Satan that the men of the world make a god of him; service being a principal part of that honour which belongeth to God.' So Matt. iv. 10, αὐτῷ μόνῳ λατρεύσεις.—Ἀπίστων is here used by anticipation; and Christ is here, as in Col. i. 15, styled εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ, in respect of his supernatural Divine nature, proceeding from the Father, as 'very God of very God,' and, as such, exactly representing God the Father: so that 'he who hath seen him hath seen the Father,' as it is declared John xiv. 9. The Apostle had probably in mind Wisd. vii. 26, where it is said of Σοφία, that it is ἀπαύγασμα φωτὸς αἰδίου καὶ εἰκὼν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ (i. e. Θεοῦ).—Εἰς τὸ μὴ αὐγάζειν, &c. The construction and sense is, 'So that the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ (who is the image of God) might not shine unto them,' i. e. that it might not show its true purport, and its real excellence to them; so that they should neither understand the one, nor appreciate the other.—The term φωτισμὸς is (as Est. shows) here used to match with the former figures of light, and, what is an obstruction of light, κάλυμμα. Now φωτισμὸς is (as Hyper. remarks) a term peculiarly suitable to the Gospel, which is properly light, as setting forth Him who is the Light of the world, and who is declared to be pre-eminently such John i. 9.

8. οὐ γὰρ ἑαυτοὺς κηρύσσομεν, &c.] The compassion of these words with those at ver. 2, and the force of the γὰρ, as laid down by me in my note, have the support of Chrys., Theophyl., and (Ecumen.), and nearly so that of Hyper. I am, however, now inclined to think, with Est., that the Apostle thus meant to introduce why to the words τὸν φωτισμὸν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου he chose to subjoin this additional particular, τῆς δόξης τοῦ Χριστοῦ: namely, in order to set forth the true office of a minister of the Gospel, which is not to preach himself, but Him who sent him. Comp. John vii. 18. While, however, supposing this as a sort of subordinate link of connexion, I must regard the other as the principal one intended, and would express the general sense as follows: 'we do not deal craftily, we do not deal unfaithfully with the word of God, we dare not; for the glory of the light of the Gospel is not ours, but pertains to Christ the Lord, the Lord of the universe.' Parallel to this is a passage of Col. i. 15, compared with Heb. i. 2, and 1 Cor. xv. 28. So speaking, then, the Apostle intimates that he considers himself by no means as a principal, but as one acting, on the part of Christ the Lord, in the character only of an Agent, instrumental to their good; q. d. 'we are not able to enlighten, much less to pardon or sanctify you: but the Lord Jesus is your only pardon, justification, and sanctification,—and we simply his instruments.'

6. ὅτι ὁ Θεὸς—ὃς ἔλαμψεν, &c.] The Apostle here returns to the allegorical mode of speaking, alluding again to the shining of Moses' face. The construction, however, is somewhat irregular; and the best mode of tracing it is to suppose an ellipsis of οὗτός ἐστι before ὃς ἔλαμψεν. In determining the interpretation, it is necessary to fix the connexion; which seems as follows:—'[And fully are we qualified to act in that capacity]; FOR he (i. e. God) who [at the creation] bade light to shine out of darkness (so Job xxxvii. 15, φῶς ποιήσας ἐκ σκότους), he, I say, it is, who hath made the light [of the Gospel] to shine upon our hearts (i. e. minds), as formerly did the light of the glory on the face of Moses.' The next words, πρὸς φωτισμὸν—Χριστοῦ, serve to denote the purpose of this Divine illumination; namely, 'ad illuminandam, in facie Christi, cognitionem gloriæ Dei,' in order that [to those, to whom I should preach] the knowledge of the majesty and glory of God, might become clear, in the person (i. e. personal appearance) of Jesus Christ,' as being, what he is just before called, εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ. In ὁ εἰπὼν ('who bade') there is an allusion to Gen. i. 3, 'Let there be light: and there was light.' The Apostle, meaning to intimate, 'Physicè quasi in creando mundo, et moralitèr per Christum Deus dixit, Fiat lux! et facta est lux.'—ὃς ἔλαμψεν, [he it is] who hath caused the light to shine.' See note at Luke i. 78, ἀνεπαύθη ἐξ ὕψους, and my Lex. in λάμπω. How this light, which shineth on men by the revelation of God's truth and the illumination of his Spirit, through the ear or the understanding, conveying the light of truth into the heart, may (as in the case of those mentioned supra v. 4) be in many ways excluded and become ineffectual, has been well shown by Dr. Isaac Barrow, Sermons, vol. ii. p. 25. The Apostle has reference to the state of ignorance and prejudice to which he had formerly been so wedded; when (in a twofold sense) the light of heaven broke in upon him.

7. The Apostle now proceeds (from this verse to ch. v. 10) to advert to a very different sub-f Gen. 1. 3.

Ps. 14. 15.
Ps. 74. 10.
& 130. 7-9.
Acts 7. 55.
Eph. 5. 8.
1 Pet. 2. 9.
1 Cor. 5. 1.
1 Cor. 2. 5.
2 Cor. 3. 5.
& 13. 9.

h Heb. 13.
5, 6.
i ch. 37, 34.
j Rom. 8, 17.
Gal. 6, 17.
Phil. 2, 10.
2 Tim. 2, 11.
12.
1 Pet. 4, 13.
ch. 1, 5.
k Pa. 44, 22.
Rom. 8, 36.
1 Cor. 4, 9.
l 15, 31, 40.
m ch. 13, 9.

ἵνα ἡ ὑπερβολὴ τῆς δυνάμεως ἢ τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ μὴ ἐξ ἡμῶν 8 ἐν παντὶ θλιβόμενοι, ἀλλ' οὐ στενοχωρούμενοι ἀπορούμενοι, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐξαπορούμενοι 9 ἡ διακόμενοι, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐγκαταλειπόμενοι καταβαλλόμενοι, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἀπολλύμενοι 10 ἡ πάντοτε τὴν νέκρωσιν τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματι περιφέροντες, ἵνα καὶ ἡ ζωὴ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματι ἡμῶν φανερωθῇ.
11 ἡ Δεῖ γὰρ ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες εἰς θάνατον παραδιδόμεθα διὰ Ἰησοῦν, ἵνα καὶ ἡ ζωὴ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ φανερωθῇ ἐν τῇ θνητῇ σαρκί ἡμῶν. 12 ἡ Ὡστε ὁ [μὲν] θάνατος ἐν ἡμῖν ἐνεργεῖται, ἡ δὲ ζωὴ

ject,—namely, his own infirmities of body, and the trials under which he suffered; probably to preclude the idea that these were inconsistent with the possession of those illustrious gifts and that Apostolical dignity which he claimed. In refutation of this, he shows that his heavy trials and tribulations are appointed by God for his own wise and merciful purposes; that he is amply supported under them by Divine aid (a manifest attestation to the truth of his claim), that the trials are not without profit to them, and benefit to himself both here and hereafter.—ἔχομεν, for κατέχομεν.—τὸν θησαυρὸν τ., i.e. 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ' just spoken of, and the important ministry which related to it. The term θησαυρὸς is here applied to the Gospel of Christ, considered as a most precious deposit, laid up to be improved (like money at interest in a bank); and δοτῆται is said by way of denoting what is mean and fragile, as opposed to the rich and solid materials of which the caskets, to hold treasure, were formed. Comp. Lam. iv. 2, οἱ υἱοὶ Σιών οἱ τιμιοὶ—πάντες ἐλογίσθησαν εἰς ἀγγαίαν δοτῆκαι! Moreover, as σκεῦος is here put for bodies, so, in a passage of Plato, p. 213, et al., the human body is called τὸ σκεῦος, as being, so to speak, the vessel of the soul. There may, however, be an allusion (agreeably to the Platonic doctrine) to the body, as standing in the same relation to the soul, as the shell does to the fish—ἡ ὑπερβολὴ τῆς δυνάμεως, i.e. 'the exceeding great power [committed to me as an Apostle].' Or it may refer to the mightiness of the things effected—whether miracles, or the scarcely less preternatural work of conversion effected with such strikingly insufficient means.—ἦ, for φημιναί, 'might clearly appear to be' of God (comp. Pa. lxiv. 9), and not of us: the same sentiment as at i. 9.

8. ἐν παντὶ θλιβόμενοι, &c.] The full sense is: 'So great is God's powerful aid, that although we as it were earthen, and beaten about by so many trials and tribulations, we are not broken down or destroyed.' In θλιβ., and the other similar terms employed in this figurative passage (where antithesis and paronomasia are united), the Commentators generally recognise agonistical metaphors. But we may rather, with Theophyl., suppose military ones; the allusion being to an army, so pressed upon and hemmed in, as scarcely to know whither to turn itself; yet not utterly reduced to despair. To which view of the sense θλιβ. and στενοχ. are far more suitable; θλιβ. denoting 'to be pressed upon, or thronged,' στενοχ., 'to be hemmed in;' of which see a graphic description in Thucyd. v. 72, 73. The two terms are similarly combined in Arrian, Disc. Epict. i. 25. On the military allusion see Valckn. on Hdol. viii. 59, and Wakef. on Soph. Phil. 432. Render: 'hard pressed, yet not hemmed in [by the enemy];' in other words, while having much to withstand, yet having still standing-room, namely, as long as we can say from the heart, 'the Lord is our help, we will not fear what man can do unto us.'—Ἐξαπορούμενοι (where the ix signifies utterly, as in ἰξασθαι) is used in the same sense as at i. 8, ὥστε ἐξαπορηθῆναι ἡμᾶς τοῦ ζῆν, where see note. The paronomasia in ἀπορ. and ἰξασθ. cannot be more closely represented than as follows: 'reduced to straits, but not to utter straits,'—deprived of life.

9. ἐγκαταλ. 'deserted [by God],' as an army by its auxiliaries.—ἀπολλ. This term is alone applicable to soldiers, since the worsted athletes were not destroyed. And that must determine καταβαλλόμενοι to contain a military allusion; of which it is quite as susceptible as of an agonistical one.

10. πάντοτε—περιφέροντες] Here and at v. 11, we have a forcible mode of expressing the peril of life to which he was continually exposed (as 1 Cor. xv. 31, καθ' ἡμέραν ἀποθνήσκω); together with an indirect comparison of the sufferings endured by himself and the other Apostles, with those endured by the Lord Jesus even unto death. The sense is, 'bearing about, continually sustaining perils and sufferings, like those of the Lord Jesus.'

11. This verse serves to explain the foregoing, and espec. the second clause, which is meant to show the reasons why they were exposed to, and at the same time sustained under, these mortal perils and sufferings, namely, 'in order that the life of Jesus [and also his power], might be clearly manifested by their mortal bodies thus preserved alive.' Of ἡμῶν οἱ ζῶντες the sense is, 'we who are living,' 'who are [yet] alive.'—παραδιδόμεθα, 'are being delivered,' i.e. 'are continually delivered.' The words are well paraphrased by Est., 'We are daily (i.e. continually) delivered' unto peril of death for the sake of the Gospel of Jesus [who died for us]. Yet we do not die, but, by the power of God protecting us, we continue alive. And this is so, in order that by our mortal bodies, so often delivered to death, and nevertheless yet alive, it might manifestly appear that Jesus whom we preach is also living, 'ever liveth.' See 2 Cor. xiii. 4, and Heb. vii. 25.

12. ὥστε ὁ μὲν θάνατος—ἡμῖν] Here we have an inference introducing a contrast between their condition and that of their converts. In determining the exact nature of it, much depends upon the import assigned to ἰεργυῖται, which most interpreters, ancient and modern, take in an active sense, 'worketh,' 'is efficacious.' Others, however, see Beza, Grot., Est., and Bp. Bull, assign to it a passive sense, 'is brought about,' 'produced,' 'takes effect;' which occurs at Rom. vii. 5, and is here preferable, as being, in the present instance and supra i. 6, and Eph. iii. 20, more suitable to the context. To adhere to the sense of the expressions θάνατος and ζωή, these may be taken (as they are by some ancient and modern Expositors) in their proper sense,—to mean that, 'while he is dying for Christ's sake, they are enjoying life.' If so, this must be meant as an ironical reproof. Yet the sense thus arising is harsh and jejune. Hence it is better to suppose, with Chrys., that the sense is: 'In us the Gospel takes effect by producing trials and tribulations, but in you by life;' i. e. by comparative freedom therefrom; also as being made partakers of the vital efficacy of Christ by his spiritual gifts, and of an assimilation to his resurrection by a life of holiness.

ἐν ὑμῖν. <sup>13 m</sup> Ἐχοντες δὲ τὸ αὐτὸ πνεῦμα τῆς πίστεως, (κατὰ <sup>m Pa. 116.</sup> τὸ γεγραμμένον Ἐπίστευσα, διὸ ἐλάλησα) καὶ ἡμεῖς <sup>10, ch. 2. 12.</sup> πιστεύομεν, διὸ καὶ λαλοῦμεν <sup>14 n</sup> εἰδότες ὅτι ὁ ἐγειρας τὸν <sup>n Rom. 8. 11.</sup> Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, καὶ ἡμᾶς διὰ Ἰησοῦ ἐγερεῖ, καὶ παραστήσει <sup>1 Cor. 6. 14.</sup> σὺν ὑμῖν. <sup>15 o</sup> Τὰ γὰρ πάντα δι' ὑμᾶς ἵνα ἡ χάρις πλεονάσῃ, <sup>o ch. 1. 6. 11.</sup> διὰ τῶν πλειόνων τὴν εὐχαριστίαν, περισσέσῃ εἰς τὴν δόξαν <sup>2 Tim. 2. 10.</sup> τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>16 p</sup> διὸ οὐκ ἐκκακοῦμεν ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ ὁ ἔξω ἡμῶν <sup>p Rom. 7. 22.</sup> <sup>Eph. 2. 16.</sup> <sup>Col. 3. 10.</sup> <sup>1 Pet. 2. 4.</sup>

13. The vinculum of the connexion here is ably traced by Theophyl. and Theodor. to the use of the term ζωή for salvation, which, resting in hope (and what is hoped for is not seen), must be centered in faith.—κατὰ τὸ γεγραμμένον, i. e. 'to adopt the words of Scripture.' The general sense may be thus expressed: 'Now we, having the same Spirit of faith [namely, in the resurrection.] as David had, do adopt his words (Pa. cxvi. 10), and [accordingly] we, too, having the same faith, speak and act as we do.'—πνεῦμα τῆς πίστεως is not, as many suppose, for πίστις; but the phrase may be compared with πνεῦμα σοφίας at Eph. i. 17, πνεῦμα νουθεσίας and πνεῦμα δουλείας at Rom. viii. 15, πνεῦμα προφῆτος Gal. vi. 1. Thus the sense is, 'a disposition, or spirit, animated by the same faith as David had.' This St. Paul describes in the words of the Psalmist, as urging him to a similar confession arising from a similar certainty: and no wonder; since firm persuasion naturally tends to produce it in others. So Plato, Symp., says, καίτοις δ' ἰγὺς, καίτοις δὲ πειρώμαι καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους πείθειν.

14. This verse is confirmatory of what has been said of deliverance by the power of God after the example of Christ; q. d. 'God could raise up Christ;' hence he can deliver us from perils, and even death.' Comp. similar passages at Rom. viii. 11, and 1 Cor. vi. 14. 'In short the Apostle here (as observes Abp. Newcome) explains how the life of Jesus was to be manifested in his body or mortal flesh, vv. 10, 11.'—εἰδότες denotes full assurance of faith, as 1 Cor.

xv. 58.—καὶ Ἰησοῦ, 'by Jesus,' as the resurrection and the life, John xi. 25. The term παραστήσει is strong, and even graphic; alluding to the solemn introduction necessary to admission into the presence of kings. Here, however, the introduction is supposed to be made by the Prince himself. Comp. Eph. v. 27, ἵνα παραστήσῃ αὐτὴν ἑαυτῷ ἑκδοχὴν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, with Jude v. 24, τῷ δυναμῶν φυλάξαι ὑμᾶς—καὶ στήσῃ κατωκίον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ ἀμώμου. Accordingly the full sense is, 'will admit us into his presence [with acceptance and approbation].'
—σὺν ὑμῖν is most happily thrown in, by way of confirming them in the faith; as intimating that the blessings in question would extend likewise to all those who should have the like spirit of faith as they had. See 1 Cor. xv. 51. The Apostle may have also meant to hint, that the prospect of rejoining them in the society of 'just men made perfect' had been to him an encouragement to suffer for their spiritual benefit.

15. τὰ γὰρ πάντα δι' ὑμᾶς] The sense (obscure and disputed) depends on the connexion, and the reference in πάντα. Now the connexion, as Calv. shows, is with the verse just preceding. Thus by 'all things' are meant 'all events,' whether prosperous or adverse; and by δι' ὑμᾶς is meant, 'on your account,' 'for your spiritual good.' The next words, ἵνα ἡ χάρις πλεονάσῃ—τοῦ Θεοῦ, advert to the purpose, or result, of those sufferings,—namely, 'in order that the abundant favour of God, displayed in his preservation, might, through the thanksgiving of many persons, redound to the glory of God.' Meaning to intimate, that, under all his afflictions, he shall at least have the comfort of their sympathy, and the benefit of their prayers; agreeably to what he says at the kindred passage, supra i. 11.—περισσέσῃ. From the antithesis here between the two terms πλεονάζειν and περισσεύειν, it is plain that the sense is not simply redound, i. e. conduce; but (by a stronger sense) 'be superabundantly conducive.' The words are capable of other senses, and have been explained in other ways; but this seems to me the simplest and most natural sense.

16. διὸ οὐκ ἐκκακοῦμεν, &c.] The course of reasoning is this: 'Wherefore, although we suffer evils, and encounter perils of various kinds, yet, stayed by the power of faith and hope, knowing the power of God,—and feeling assured that as he has delivered us now, he will continue to deliver us, and finally raise us up at the last day,—we faint not, nor despair under our sufferings.'—Ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρ. denotes the body, as ὁ ἰσθμῖν ἄνθρ. the mind, or rather soul. See Rom. vii. 22. Διαφθείρεται, 'is impaired [in its strength];' 'well-nigh consumed.'—ἀνακαινύεται, 'is gradually renovated,' 'acquires fresh strength,'—namely, the strength of faith and hope. For, as ἄνθρωπος διαφθείρεται, ἀλλ' ὁ ἔσωθεν ἀνακαινύεται ἡμέρα καὶ ἡμέρα. <sup>17</sup> Ὁ γὰρ παραντίκα ἐλαφρὸν τῆς θλίψεως ἡμῶν καθ' ὑπερβολὴν εἰς ὑπερβολὴν αἰώνιον βάρος δόξης κατεργάζεται ἡμῖν. <sup>18</sup> μὴ σκοποῦντων ἡμῶν τὰ βλεπόμενα, ἀλλὰ τὰ μὴ βλεπόμενα· τὰ γὰρ βλεπόμενα πρόσκαιρα· τὰ δὲ μὴ βλεπόμενα αἰώνια. V. 1· Οἶδαμεν γὰρ, ὅτι, ἐὰν ἡ ἐπίγειος ἡμῶν

g Ps. 30. 5.
Rom. 8. 18.
1 Pet. 1. 6.
r Rom. 8. 24.
Heb. 11. 1.
a Job 4. 19.
e 19. 25, 26.
Ps. 30. 9.
2 Tim. 1. 12.
2 Pet. 1. 12.
14.

Bp. Sanderson finely remarks, 'the testimony of a good conscience from within, and the light of God's countenance from above, put more true joy into the heart, than any outward thing can sorrow.'

17. τὸ γὰρ παραντίκα ἔλ., &c.] This is meant, as Theophyl. observes, to be explanatory of the preceding, as showing how the inner man acquires fresh strength, even under such trials. There has, however, been some doubt as to the sense of τὸ παραντίκα—θλίψεως ἡμῶν. As bearing a strong resemblance to the present, I would compare a passage of Thucyd. iii. 56, καὶ ὅταν τὸ παραντίκα πον ἡμῖν ἐφίλιμον καθίστηται, 'and when, too, our own advantage for the present is consulted.' In both these places παραντίκα means 'for the present'; which, indeed, is the literal sense of the word. Thus the sense here will be that which the Syriac Translator, and most of the recent Commentators assign, 'our present [comparatively] light affliction.' But the ancients generally, and almost all the earlier moderns, took παραντίκα (which signifies literally, 'for the present') to mean momentary; regarding the words as put for ἡ θλίψις ἡμῶν ἢ παρ. καὶ ἑλαφρὰ οὖσα, 'our affliction, which is but momentary, and therefore light.' Indeed, the sense 'for the present' readily suggests an idea of what is temporary; and is required by the antithetical αἰώνιον. The phrase καθ' ὑπερβολὴν εἰς ὑπ. is highly significant, the repetition having an intensive force (like the Heb. מְּוֹתָם), and may be rendered 'infinitely exceeding.' See a fine passage illustrative of the present in Dr. Ia. Barrow's Sermons, vol. i. p. 55, and also Hooker's Eccl. Pol., p. 18. 1st edit.—Βάρος signifies here, as often in the Sept., greatness, or abundance; and αἰώνιον βάρος is for βάρος αἰώνιον δόξης, with which compare a similar construction in 2 Mac. ix. 10, διὰ τὸ τῆς δόξης ἀφόρητον βάρος, for τὸ τῆς δόξης ἀφόρητον βάρος, and Soph. Oed. Col. 297, πατρῶον αὐτῷ γῆς, for πατρῶας γῆς αὐτῷ.—κατεργάζεται, 'produces,' 'obtains.' So Dionys. Hal. Antiq. lib. v. τούτῳ τὸ ἔργον ἀθάνατον αὐτῷ δόξαν ἐργάσατο.

18. μὴ σκοποῦντων, &c.] These words are explanatory of the foregoing, and meant to show how it comes to pass, that the afflictions seem light. Now that is not only because they are temporary, but because we consider them as things of temporary interest only, compared with those of an eternal existence. Σκοποῦντων (sc. ἡμῶν) is by the best Interpreters taken as a Participle for a Verb and Participle, 'while we consider not, or keep not our minds intent upon;' as in Phil. ii. 4. iii. 17, and sometimes in the O. T. and the Class. writers. By βλέπ. seem meant 'all the visible and sensible things of the world, whether pleasurable or painful,' elsewhere called τὰ ἐπίγεια and τὰ ἐν κόσμῳ; by the τὰ μὴ βλέπ., 'the things not corporeally seen, but which are realized by faith.' The intent of the Apostle seems to be, to show how heavy afflictions may come to seem light,—namely, by a due consideration of the glory which will attend the enduring of them as we ought, and also by a due estimate of the value of the things which can be put in balance against the glory that shall be revealed. The difference is, that the glory, though unseen, is real and eternal; whereas the objects of the world are, though seen, unreal,—only a vain show (see Ps. xxxix. 6); considering that even their longest duration is temporary, since our life is (James iv. 14) 'but a vapour,' as unreal as it is fleeting. Chrysost. finely remarks, that the future life, which seems to be ἀδελος, is yet more manifest than the present, more stable, yea, more permanent: a truth forcibly expressed by Euripides, Hippol. 188—195 (Matthias); which Chry. may have had in mind. Simil. Seneca, Ep. 59, 'ista imaginaria sunt, et ad tempus aliquam faciem ferunt. Nihil horum stabile nec solidum est. Mittamus (igitur) animum ad ea quæ æterna sunt.' Simil. the philosopher Proclus counsels men to withdraw their minds ἀπὸ τῶν φαινομένων ἐπὶ τὰ ἀφανή.

V. 1. The sentiment of this verse is closely connected with the preceding chapter; not, however (as has been thought), with the last verse, but with the words διὸ οὐκ ἐκκακοῦμεν, ver. 16; vv. 17, 18, being, in some measure, parenthetical.—οἶδαμεν γὰρ—οὐρανοῖς. There is an allusion to what has been said of the perishableness and the fragility of the body (ch. iv. 7, 16) and the temporary nature of the things that are seen, and the eternity of those which are unseen: whence the Apostle takes occasion, from the mention of the future felicity of the saints, to enlarge thereon by setting forth the strong supports it afforded him under all trials. Render: 'for we assuredly know (comp. εἰδότες, supra, iv. 14) that if our earthly house of the tent (tent-house) should be destroyed (i. e. in the event of its being destroyed), we have [destined for us] a building from God (i. e. on the part of God, furnished and by him), a house not made with hands [immaterial], eternal in heaven.' With ἵκεμεν—οἰκίαν ἀχειρ. ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, comp. Æschin. Socr. Dial. iii. 4, ἥδη περιφρονῶ τοῦ ζῆν, εἰς εἰς αἰεὶ οἶκον μετασπένδοντες.—The expression καταλῦθῃ has peculiar propriety; the term being one employed of the destruction of substances of every kind, espec. buildings, and sometimes that of the human body. So Philostr. Vit. Soph. i. 9, μὴ καταλῦθῆναι τὸ σῶμα ὑπὸ γήραος.—In the expression ἡ ἐπίγειος ἡμῶν οἰκία τοῦ σκήνου, some, as Rosenm. and Wakef., regard the οἰκία as redundant; σκήνωσ, they say, of itself signifying 'the human body.' This is, however, merely evading the difficulty. It is, indeed, true that in the Class. writers σκήνος has sometimes that sense. So Plato calls the body γῆινον σκήνος, and at Wisd. ix. 15 we have τὸ γῆινον σκήνος. Comp. also Heb. xi. 10. Hence some Commentators (as Michaelis, Schleusn., and Bp. Middleton) take the sense to be, 'our earthly abode of the body.' The learned prelate, however, is more successful in showing the incorrectness of our Common Version, than in establishing the propriety of the one he adopts. It is plain that, as οἰκία must not be considered pleonastic, τοῦ σκήνους must be meant to be exegetical of the ἡ ἐν τῷ. ἡμῶν οἰκία. And yet, according to the sense assigned by the Bishop, the explanation would be scarcely necessary. Besides, as that signif. is no where else found in St. Paul's writings, nor, indeed, in the Scriptures either of the New Test. or the Old, it ought not to be here introduced. Why should we not translate 'of the tent?' (by a Genit. of explanation, as Grot. says,) which is not liable to Bp. Middleton's censure, and yields an excellent sense, as meant to suggest that the earthly house of the soul, the body, was a mere tent, set up for a temporary purpose, and formed for speedy decay and ruin.

οἰκία τοῦ σκήνους καταλυθῇ, οἰκοδομῆν ἐκ Θεοῦ ἔχουσαν, οἰκίαν ἀχειροποιήτου, αἰώνιον, ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. <sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Καὶ γὰρ ἐν τούτῳ <sup>b</sup> Rom. 8. 32 <sup>1</sup> Eodr. 2. 45. στενάζομεν, τὸ οἰκητήριον ἡμῶν τὸ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ ἐπενδύσασθαι ἐπιποθοῦντες <sup>3</sup> εἰ γε καὶ ἐνδυσάμενοι, οὐ γυμνοὶ εὐρεθισόμεθα. <sup>4</sup> <sup>c</sup> Καὶ γὰρ οἱ ὄντες ἐν τῷ σκήνει στενάζομεν, βαρούμενοι, ἐφ' <sup>c</sup> 1 Cor. 15. 13—15. <sup>1</sup> Rev. 2. 19. <sup>2</sup> 10. 15. <sup>3</sup> Wisd. 9. 15. <sup>4</sup> 1. 50. <sup>5</sup> 23. <sup>6</sup> 1. 32. <sup>7</sup> Eph. 1. 18. <sup>8</sup> 4. 30. ὃ οὐ θέλομεν ἐκδύσασθαι, ἀλλ' ἐπενδύσασθαι, ἵνα καταποθῇ τὸ θνητὸν ὑπὸ τῆς ζωῆς. <sup>5</sup> <sup>d</sup> Ὁ δὲ κατεργασάμενος ἡμᾶς εἰς αὐτὸ

2. ἐν τούτῳ] Supply, not (as some do) μίαν or πράγματι, but τῷ σκήνει and ὄντες. See v. 4.—στενάζομεν, namely, under the various distresses to which the frailty of that tent-house subjects us.—τὸ οἰκητήριον—ἐπιποθοῦντες. Here we have a change of the metaphor by which the body was compared to a habitation, into another, by which it is compared to a garment; both similes in use among the Greek Philosophers,—the former employed by the Pythagoreans,—the latter by the Platonists. We have here the two blended together, which has caused a misapprehension of the sense by some Expositors. Οἰκητήριον is here used, not σκήνος, because a permanent, and not a temporary building is intended.—τὸ ἐξ οὐρ., sup. διδόμενον, which is expressed in John iii. 27, though ἐξ οὐρ. is generally taken for ἰσχυράντων. On the true import of ἐκδύσ., which is simply to put on, see note on 1 Cor. xv. 53.—The expression τὸ οἰκητήριον—ἐπενδύσασθαι is said by comparison of the body (the fleshly frame) to a garment; a comparison found not only in the Platonists, but in perhaps the most ancient of the Books of Scripture, Job x. 11, 'Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh.'

3. εἰ γε καὶ ἐνδυσ., οὐ γυμνοὶ εὐρ.] The sense here is disputed and dubious, and the expositions of Commentators in general liable to objection. The interpretation most usually adopted is that of Bos and Weta. (which has been followed recently by Emmerling and Rinck), who explain, 'If, indeed, it may be so, that we shall be found

[when the change takes place] clothed with a body, not having put it off by death.' For the Platonists, Bos shows, used the term γυμνοὶ to denote the dead, and ἰδυσάμενοι the living. So Max. Tyr. Diss. xiii. p. 240 (Reiske), ἡ μὲν οὖν ἀγαθὴ ψυχὴ, καὶ διατεταμένη ἀμειλίῃ, καὶ ὡς ταχίστα ἰφίσταται γυμνωθῆναι, where several parallel sentiments are adduced by Markland from Porphyry, Philo-Judæus, and other writers. The above interpretation, however, yields a sense not a little frigid, and is on various grounds (which I have stated in Recens. Synop.) wholly untenable. It would rather seem that the meaning intended is: 'Since being so clothed (i. e. having put on this dress) we shall not be found naked, i. e. destitute of a body (whatever may become of our earthly one). See 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54.

4. Here we have the same sentiment as that at v. 2, but more plainly expressed. The only doubt as to the sense regards the words ἐφ' ὃ οὐ θέλομεν ἐκδύσασθαι, ἀλλ' ἐπενδύσασθαι, which the best Expositors interpret, 'For we desire not to put it off, but to be clothed upon, in it; so that our mortal state may be at once exchanged for the immortal, by an immediate entrance into an eternal state.' This interpretation, however, especially the latter part, is open to many objections stated by me in Recens. Synop. Render: 'For even we, who are [yet] in the tabernacle or body, groan, feeling oppressed, inasmuch as we desire, not indeed to be unclothed [by death], but to be clothed upon [by a celestial body]. At ἐπενδ. we must repeat, from the preceding context, τὸ οἰκ. τὸ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. As to the real meaning intended to be conveyed, many eminent Commentators have thought it to be, that the raised bodies of the just will be covered and encircled with another body, which shall be bright, aerial, and resplendent, and shall somehow communicate a principle of immortality to the raised mortal body. And this is supposed to be countenanced by 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54. But see the note there. I agree with Mr. Scott, that 'the Apostle did not mean to determine any thing concerning the manner, as to external circumstances, in which the body subsists after the resurrection.' The next words, ἵνα καταποθῇ τὸ θνητὸν ὑπὸ τῆς ζωῆς are best explained, with Chrys. and Theodor., 'that thus the mortal principle may be absorbed in and swallowed up by the vivifying and immortal one;' or, as Theophyl. explains, ἵνα ἀναλωθῇ καὶ δεκασθηῇ ἡ φθορὰ ὑπὸ τῆς ζωῆς. Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 51.

5. ὁ δὲ κατεργασάμενος—Θεός] Here not a little difference of opinion exists as to the import of κατεργ.; though, indeed, the senses assigned by various Expositors, wrought, destined, created, or fitted, do not materially differ. Which of them is to be adopted will depend upon what is ε Heb. 11. 13. τοῦτο, Θεὸς, ὁ καὶ δὸς ἡμῖν τὸν ἀρραβῶνα τοῦ Πνεύματος.

 f Rom. 8. 24, 25. 6<sup>a</sup> ὁ θαρρύνωντες οὖν πάντοτε, καὶ εἰδότες, ὅτι ἐνδημοῦντες ἐν τῷ 1 Cor. 13. 12. σώματι ἐκδημοῦμεν ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου 7 (ἰ διὰ πίστεως γὰρ περι-ch. 2. 18. πατούμεν, οὐ διὰ εἵδους) 8<sup>a</sup> θαρρῶμεν δὲ, καὶ εὐδοκοῦμεν μάλg Phil. 1. 13. ῖον ἐκδημῆσαι ἐκ τοῦ σώματος, καὶ ἐνδημῆσαι πρὸς τὸν Κύριον.
 f Ps. 62. 13. 9 Διὸ καὶ φιλοτιμούμεθα, εἴτε ἐνδημοῦντες εἴτε ἐκδημοῦντες, Jer. 17. 10. & 22. 19. εὐάρεστοι αὐτῷ εἶναι. 10<sup>b</sup> Τοὺς γὰρ πάντας ἡμᾶς φανερωθῆναι
 Matt. 26. 22. Rom. 2. 6, 7. & 14. 12. 1 Cor. 22. 12. & 4. 5. Gal. 6. 5. Col. 3. 24, 25. Rev. 2. 23.

understood by τοῦτο. Now from ver. 4 it would seem to mean this change from corruption to incorruption, and from mortality to immortality, the ἀπολύτρωσις τοῦ σώματος of Rom. viii. 23, the deliverance from the bondage of corruption, and restoration to the glorious liberty of the children of God by adoption and grace; where it is plain that the true sense of these words is: 'Now he who hath wrought (fitted) us unto (lit. moulded us unto) this very thing [meekness, by faith and hope, for a state of immortality in bliss] is God'; whose creation we are said to be, infra, v. 17, and his workmanship in Eph. ii. 10. This view of the sense I find supported by the authority of Calv., Hyper., Bulling., Est., and Cameron, who rightly understand κατὰ, to denote the preparation, by means of the word of God in the Gospel, through the teaching and renewing power of the Holy Spirit, alluded to in the next words; whereby we are brought, by regeneration, from a life the very reverse of heavenly, and are rendered fit for immortality. This sense of κατὰ, arises from the primary one 'to work up,' as said of a statuary, who works up his clay into a statue of the required form. So Plut. Pericl. καταργασάμηναι τὴν ὕλην τεχνίται. The expression may therefore be rendered, 'wrought us unto this [state of immortality],' or, as the idiom of our language rather requires, 'moulded us.' So Milton, P. L. x. 744, 'Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay to mould me man,' i. e. 'to mould me into man.' The words following, which strongly support this interpretation, are meant to show the certainly of the change in question; since God had given them the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit as a pledge of future acceptance, by which they were sealed to the day of redemption (Eph. iv. 30). On the term ἀρραβῶνα see note supra i. 22.

6. θαρρύνοντες οὖν—Κυρίου] The οὖν has much force, implying an inference from the preceding; q. d. 'Such being the case, in reliance, therefore, on these gracious aids, which are the pledge of resurrection and glorification, we,' &c.

—καὶ εἰδότες, ὅτι, &c.] 'especially since we know this,' &c. These words are meant to show the ground of that confidence, and the nature of that courage, which is such as to enable them to meet death itself.—ἐνδημοῦντες is not well rendered, 'while we are at home'; for although the word is susceptible of that sense, it is unsuitable to the context, and at variance with the rest of the New Test., which represents this world as not our home, but our sojourn. Render: 'Accordingly, we are ever courageous, especially as knowing, that while we are sojourning in the body, we are residing away from our proper home with the Lord.'

7. διὰ πίστεως—εἰδόντες] This is meant to show how the Apostles could be said to be ἐκδημοῦντες ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου, namely, by faith, considering heaven as their only home, and what seemed to be such, a mere sojourn. The full sense here intended is: '[We, I say, regard ourselves as absent from our home with the Lord]; for (in our present state) we walk (i. e. lead our spiritual life) only through faith (in Christ), not in the sight (of him, as we shall when present with the Lord).'

8. θαρρῶμεν διὰ—Κυρίου] This is reassuring, and further illustrative of what was said at ver. 6; q. d. 'We are, I say, of good courage, desirous rather to be,' &c. The general sentiment is, that they wish circumstances to be quite reversed. The terms ἐκδ. and ἐνδ. are not well rendered absent and present; still less so by Macknight, from home, and at home. The true sense of ἐκδ. is migrate, to depart. On the other hand, the word ἐνδημῆσαι should be rendered, not to be present with, but (agreeably to the metaphor) to be at home with, implying communion with him in whose presence is fulness of joy. In the verse following, ἐνδῆμ. and ἐκδῆμ. must have the very same sense as in this, and may best be rendered, 'whether we are at home or from home;' i. e. remain in the body or depart from it.

9. Paul now returns to the main cause of his fidelity and diligence in his Apostolical office, and also the constancy and fortitude with which he encounters perils the most appalling; confirming withal what he said a little before; namely, that whatever he does in this life, his earnest desire is to please God and be with God. (Hyperius.)

—διὰ καὶ φιλοσ.] 'Wherefore [since we have such exalted hopes] we strive to the uttermost,' &c. The metaphor in φιλοσ. is one derived from striving for the mastery in the pursuits of ambition, as calling forth the most strenuous exertions; since the combatants must have learnt (to use the words of the Grecian historian) μὴ φύγειν τοὺς πόνους, ἢ μηδὲ τὰς τιμὰς δάσκειν. See Milton's Lycidas, l. 72.

10. τοὺς γὰρ πάντας ἡμᾶς φαν., &c.] The γὰρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. '[And there is need to strive to act, so as to approve ourselves in his sight], for both we and all persons must appear,' &c.—φανερωθῆναι some Commentators, ancient and modern, explain, be made manifest, meaning that 'our inmost soul will be displayed:' see 1 Cor. iv. 5. But though that sense be a good one, and agreeable to what we read elsewhere in Scripture, it may be doubted whether such is here intended to be directly asserted. The expression is better rendered by others, as Piscator and H. Stephens, compare, appear; which sense may, indeed, include, by implication, that of manifestos fieri. Φανερωθῆναι was, I suspect, δεῖ ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ βήματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἵνα κομίσθαι ἕκαστος τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος, πρὸς ἃ ἔπραξεν, εἴτε ἀγαθόν, εἴτε † κακόν.

11<sup>1</sup> Εἰδότες οὖν τὸν φόβον τοῦ Κυρίου, ἀνθρώπους πείθομεν <sup>1 ch. 4. 2 Jude 26.</sup>

Θεῷ δὲ πεφανερῶμεθα. ἐλπίζω δὲ καὶ ἐν ταῖς συνειδήσεσιν ὑμῶν πεφανερῶσθαι. <sup>13</sup> Οὐ γὰρ πάλιν ἑαυτοὺς συνιστάνομεν <sup>k ch. 1. 14 & 10. 2 & 1. 1.</sup> ὑμῖν, ἀλλὰ ἀφορμὴν δίδόντες ὑμῖν καυχήματος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἵνα ἔχητε πρὸς τοὺς ἐν προσώπῳ καυχωμένους, καὶ οὐ καρδίᾳ.

a forensic term, meaning 'to present oneself for trial.' So the Pesch. Syr. Version has, 'we must all stand up for trial.'

— τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώμ.] Supply πραγμῆμα, which word is expressed in Ælian, H. A. v. 26, τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος πραττόμενα. And thus the expression is (as Theodor. points out) equiv. to βιβιωμένα. In this manner, too, I find Calv. interprets the words, understanding by τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώματος not only external actions, but 'omnia opera que in vita corporali perpetrantur,' i. e. τὰ διὰ τοῦ σώμ. 'the things done by the person during his natural life in the body.' All the ancient Commentators are agreed, that 'hence it is plain the soul will be punished in conjunction with the body which it occupied in this life (see Acts xvii. 31. 1 Cor. iv. 5. 2 Thesa. i. 7. 2 Tim. iv. 1),' and consequently that the soul will be punished for its own evil thoughts. For κακόν I am inclined, with Lachm. and Tisch., to read, on strong authority, φαῦλον, for reasons which will appear from my note on Rom. x. 11.

11. The Apostle now again speaks of himself; and takes occasion, from what he has just been saying, to express what powerful motives he has to fidelity and diligence in his office. There, however, exists a certain obscurity, which the Commentators have not entirely removed. The sense assigned by Billroth would be suitable to the occasion; but it cannot be fairly elicited from the words. And the same objection attaches to the interpretation of the expression πειθῆναι ἀνθρώπους offered by the Greek Commentators, namely, to 'persuade men of our integrity,' 'to persuade them to think favourably of us.' The sense which I have, in common with the generality of Expositors, assigned to πειθῆναι, namely, 'we use our utmost endeavours to persuade men, by pressing on them these awful considerations, to embrace the Gospel, and obey what it enjoins,' is, I doubt not, that intended by the Apostle; and this use of the term is placed beyond doubt by a passage of Acts xviii. 4, compared with ch. xiii. 45. The main difficulty, however, existing rests on the words Θεῷ δὲ πεφαν., which Dr. Poile seeks to remove by rendering, 'whilst God sees what we are.' But δὲ is not susceptible of the signification whilst, and the sense thus arising is forced and jejune. The difficulty is best encountered by supposing that, from extreme brevity, some words have been suppressed, which ought properly to have been expressed. In short, I am of opinion that, after all, no antithesis was intended. In the former clause, it seems, the Apostle meant to say, that, in his endeavours to convert his fellow-men, he was solely influenced by a sense of their awful danger, and his own heavy responsibility,—consequently, not, as the false teachers represented, by any human motives of personal interest. In the words subjoined the Apostle means, delicately and by implication, to solemnly attest, as before God, his sincerity, and the rectitude of his motives, q. d. 'Moreover, we are made manifest to God, as so acting, from the sole motive of rescuing men from the wrath to come, and thus fulfilling a bounden duty on our part.' On this sentiment the Apostle then engrafts (though with an increase of the obscurity already existing, occasioned by a no inconsiderable harshness of comparison) the sentiment, 'But (or, yea) we trust also that we are in like manner made manifest [as so acting] to the satisfaction of the judgment of your conscience,' your innate convictions, the estimates of your consciences respectively.—τὸν φόβον. The term may, as Commentators say, be used, per metalepsin, for τὸ φοβερόν, by way of intimating the awful judgment of the Lord. But I am rather inclined to think, with Calvin, that the phrase εἰδέναι τὸν φόβον τοῦ Κυρίου is meant to denote 'the having a deep and reverential sense of our accountability to the Lord Jesus Christ.'

12. οὐ γὰρ πάλιν, &c.] This is, as Calv. observes, meant to anticipate an objection: 'Why, if your views be so manifest to us, commend yourselves to us?' The answer to which is: 'Not so; for we are not commending ourselves; that is not our purpose.' Ἀλλὰ ἀφορμὴ—ἡμῶν, 'but our intent in so speaking is to afford you matter for glorying in us'; namely, that you have been converted to Christianity by a true Apostle.—ἵνα ἔχητε. Supply τι λῆγαι, or καυχᾶσθαι. The words τοὺς ἐν προσώπῳ καυχ., καὶ οὐ καρδίᾳ are meant to stigmatize the false teachers, who prided themselves on those external advantages, by which they excited the admiration of the multitude, neglecting the virtues of the heart, and the testimony of a good conscience. The γὰρ, absent from B. C. D. F. G., and 3 cursives, together with some Versions and Fathers, has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch.; but on insufficient grounds, since it has internal evidences in its favour,—being far more likely to have been put out of, than brought into, the text; and being, moreover, as ancient as the Alex. MS., and even as the time of Theodoret,—since, though not found in the text of his Commentary, it has place in the Commentary itself. The reason for its being thrown out of the text was, I apprehend, that the Alexandrian Critics did not perceive its force; which, however, will sufficiently appear from the connexion traced by me, after Calv. and Hyper. The Particle in question not unfrequently comes in after the οὐ, serving to introduce the negation to some question put in the form of an objection.

1 ch. 11. 1,
16, 17.
& 12. 6, 11.
m Rom. 8.
15.
& 6. 11, 12.
& 14. 7.
Gal. 2. 20.
1 Thess. 5.
10.
1 Pet. 4. 2.
n Gal. 2. 5, 6.
& 5. 6. & 6. 15.

13 <sup>1</sup> Εἴτε γὰρ ἐξέστημεν, Θεῷ εἴτε σωφρονούμεν, ὑμῖν. <sup>14</sup> ἡ γὰρ ἀγάπη τοῦ Χριστοῦ συνέχει ἡμᾶς· <sup>15</sup> κρίναντας τοῦτο, ὅτι εἰ εἰς ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν, ἄρα οἱ πάντες ἀπέθανον. Καὶ ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν, ἵνα οἱ ζῶντες μηκέτι ἑαυτοὺς ζώσιν, ἀλλὰ τῷ ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν ἀποθανόντι καὶ ἐγερθέντι. <sup>16</sup> Ὥστε ἡμεῖς ἀπὸ

13. εἴτε ἐξέστημεν, &c.] We have here (as Calvin remarks), a concessio, or a speaking after the manner of his adversaries, making use, per mimesin, of the term they employed. So that what is here said forms a sort of tacit reply thereto. It remains, however, to decide what is the exact force of the term ἐξέστημεν. Some early Expositors, as Hyperius, and also Dodd., understand it to mean that he is transported beyond himself through zeal for God's glory. So Mark iii. 21, ἡλεγον ὅτι ἐξίστην, and Acts xxvi. 24, Μαίρω, Παῦλε. This sense, however, is forbidden by the antithetical term σωφρονούμεν, which, from the context, can only mean, 'speaking modestly of himself,' as opp. to ἀφρων εἶναι, xi. 16, and thus ἐξίστ. must mean the reverse. And so it is taken by some ancient, and all the most eminent modern, Interpreters,—namely, to denote 'the exceeding due measure in self-commendation'; a sense of the word the more easy to be accounted for, since the phrase ἐξέστηκέναι τοῦ νοῦ, or φρονέω, or ἑμυνοῦ (which last word is expressed in Eschin. de Falsa Legat. sub init., ἐξίστην δ' ἑμυνοῦ), was often used to denote being a fool, which frequently carries the adjunct sense of boasting of oneself. Thus far in my former Editions. On attentive reconsideration of the question, I am still, as before, of opinion that the former part of the sentence may very well be understood to denote 'exceeding due measure in self-commendation'; and the latter what is the reverse, namely, 'preserving due moderation in that respect.' This view is, indeed, not without its difficulties; though they are not so great as Billroth represents. It fails in the second clause of the sentence, by yielding a somewhat feeble sense; yet the same objection attaches to the other mode of taking the words. Thus Dr. Peile, who embraces that view of the sense, expresses the meaning of the clause in question as follows: 'If you believe that we are in our right mind, you must see it is for your advantage that we are labouring.' But thus the antithetic turn is spoiled. And, moreover, according to the above view of the sense of σωφρ., the words can only with propriety be rendered: 'If we are in our right mind, it is for your advantage that we are so, namely, that we may the better be enabled to instruct you.' Yet even thus the jejune result is not removed. Perhaps the truth may best be attained by adopting the modified view of Hyper., according to which εἰ σωφρ. will signify, 'if we are sober-minded, keeping within due bounds of zeal in our preaching for the salvation of our fellow-men, it is for you (i. e. for your advantage),—inasmuch as, in some cases, such a mode of carrying ourselves better promotes the end in view.' Accordingly, we may suppose that the Apostle in so doing acted on the same principle as that which induced him to 'be one *al*l things to all men, that he might by all means [i. e. by the use of all means of attaining the end in view, as to things indifferent]

save some.' And surely manner, and even style, adopted in preaching, may be reckoned among the ἀδιάφορα.

14. Here we have the third reason for his so doing, and that from a sense of gratitude for what he owes to Christ, as dying for him and all men.—ἡ γὰρ ἀγάπη—ἡμᾶς. The connexion may be traced as follows: 'For your advantage [I say]; for the love (or loving gratitude) we bear to Christ constraineth us (συμβέβηκεν, Ecumen.) [so to act in the promotion of his glory and your salvation].'

—κρίναντας τοῦτο, &c.] 'because we judge this,' equiv. to, 'form this judgment of our reason for the bounden duty in question that:—Εἴτε ὑπὲρ πάντων, 'one in the place of, as a substitute for, all, as making atonement for all.' It is scarcely necessary to observe how strongly this text inculcates the doctrine of Universal Redemption; see 1 Tim. ii. 6. Heb. ii. 9. Indeed, as observes Bp. Bull, in his Exam. Cens., 'unless Christ be understood to have died for all, that foundation on which ministers of the Gospel build exhortations of this kind will be always uncertain, and very often false. Always uncertain, because it cannot be made manifest to men who are the elect: very frequently false; as often,—namely, as it is used to the non-elect, who, on this ground of redemption, would not be held bound to live unto Christ, unless it were presupposed that Christ had really redeemed them. Finally, Christ himself could not, in right of his own death (Rom. xiv. 9), claim supreme dominion over all and every man.'—As respects the words ἀπὸ οἱ πάντων ἀπέθανον, on carefully reconsidering what has been urged by Prof. Scholes against the Common Version, 'then were all dead,' I admit the force of his objections; but I would render, not with the Professor, 'then all died,' but, with Dr. Peile, 'then did all those die, viz., whose substitute he was'; in other words, 'were in no better condition than dead men.' See Rom. v. 12, 19. Eph. ii. 1, 3, 5.

15. καὶ ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν, ἵνα. This seems meant to show the duty of the redeemed to be co-extensive with the purpose of Christ's death; which was not only to deliver man from spiritual death, or perdition, but to restore him to the spiritual life which he had lost in Adam; meaning to intimate that it is but just that the life so preserved should be devoted to the Preserver. I would further observe, that the words are more closely connected with what precedes than is generally supposed. Render: 'also he died for all,' ἵνα οἱ ζῶντες—ζώσιν, 'in order that those who are alive from the dead, redeemed to life from spiritual death [in trespasses and sins unexpiated] should live,' &c.—τῷ ὑπὲρ—ἐγερθέντι, 'who died for their sins, and hath been raised again [for their justification].' Comp. Rom. iv. 24.

τοῦ νῦν οὐδένα οἶδαμεν κατὰ σάρκα. εἰ δὲ καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν κατὰ σάρκα Χριστὸν, ἀλλὰ νῦν οὐκ ἔτι γινώσκομεν. 17 Ὅστε εἰ τις ἐν Χριστῷ, καινὴ κτίσις· τὰ ἀρχαῖα παρῆλθεν, ἰδοὺ γέγονε καινὰ τὰ πάντα. 18 Ἐὰν δὲ πάντα ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, τοῦ καταλάξαντος ἡμᾶς ἐαυτῷ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, καὶ δόντος ἡμῖν

16. The words of this verse are, from the extreme flexibility of the terms, capable of several senses, among which the connection must determine our choice. Now that is not, I think, as some have maintained, with ver. 12, but with the verse immediately preceding; the ἔστι implying a conclusion from what went before; q. d. 'Such being the case,—since we owe every thing to Christ, and ought to be all dead to the present life,—we regard no man in respect of any worldly advantage;' alluding probably to the false teachers, who prided themselves, and were esteemed by others, on account of some personal, external, and adventitious advantages, as having known Christ personally, or his relatives, or at least the Apostles in Judea. See Calv. and Hyper. This sense of εἶδος recurs at 1 Thess. v. 12, and espec. at 1 Cor. ii. 2, οὐ γὰρ ἰκεῖνα τοῦ εἰδέναι τι ἐν ἡμῖν, εἰ μὴ Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν. The next words, εἰ δὲ καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν κατὰ σάρκα Χριστόν, ἀλλὰ νῦν οὐκ ἔτι γινώσκομεν, contain, as Hyper. remarks, a sentiment thrown in per occasionem et obiter, for the purpose of overturning the arrogant claims of the false teachers to superiority on the score of having known Christ personally. St. Paul says that he too had known Christ, although he claims no glory on that account; it being of little consequence whether any one has seen Christ in the flesh or not, so long as he does the duty enjoined on him by Christ; see more in Hyper.

17. ἔστι εἰ τις, &c. This is resumptive of what was said in the preceding ἔστι ἡμεῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν οὐδένα οἶδαμεν κατὰ σάρκα, and forms the second inference from vv. 14, 15, presenting a general maxim which constitutes, as Scott says, 'the standard of genuine Christianity.' From the brevity, however, with which it is expressed, the passage admits of being variously interpreted. From the nature of the passage, and the scope of the context, it is evident that ἔστι is here to be supplied; i. e. 'If any one is in Christ, he is a new creature;' meaning, he is wholly changed, conformably to the new and spiritual religion of Christ, which requires a renewal of the heart. Comp. Rev. xxi. 5, and note. By the expression being in Christ, I would understand not merely (as many have done) being grafted into the body of Christ by baptism, but being really united to him in faith, love, and obedience.—The next words, τὰ ἀρχαῖα παρῆλθεν, ἰδοὺ γέγονε καινὰ τὰ πάντα, are probatory, and illustrative of καινὴ κτίσις before, forming, as Calvin says, an 'eulogium ad extollendam regenerationem.' The words were probably formed on Isaiah xliii. 18, 19. The newness here spoken of is not to be understood in the limited sense assigned by many modern Commentators. As regarded the Jew, it would include an abandonment of all his former prejudices and narrow views; an undergoing that great change of principles and feelings, which may best be conceived by contrasting together the Dispensations of the Law and the Gospel. As it regarded the Gentile, it would denote a still greater change; implying a total abandonment of the errors of Atheism or Polytheism, and an abjuring of those demoralizing principles which were generated by each of them. Finally, as regarded δοῦλ, it implied a complete abandonment of sin, a renouncing the works of the flesh and the devil, a ceasing to live after the flesh, and a living henceforth after the Spirit; a change so great, that it might well be called καινὴ κτίσις.—I am still of the same opinion as heretofore on the sense of these words, and must consider as inadmissible the rendering of Calv., Grot., and others, sit, or debet, and the marginal one of our Authorized Version; for the ellipse ἔστι is irregular. The right rendering is, I doubt not, that of the Pesch. Syr. Version, which supplies in each of the clauses the word est, 'is'; and the same was done by Pelagius and Ambrose, cited by Est. The sense then is,—'Whosoever (whatever person) is in Christ, he is a new creature;' though for this some express the sense thus: 'he is a new creation,' i. e. 'part of a new creation.' See Billroth and Dr. Peile, who urge in support of that mode of rendering, Gal. vi. 15. Eph. ii. 1—10. iv. 20—24. Col. iii. 9—11. But this, besides involving a change, to say the least, unnecessary, has far less of simplicity than the usual rendering 'creature' (confirmed by the Greek Commentators), which is, moreover, preferable on the ground of its being capable of a wider acceptance than the other expression; for to be 'a new creature' is the same as being 'a new man;' what is expressed at John iii. 3, by γεννηθῆναι ἀνωθεν. However, to 'be in Christ' must mean, not only to be 'grafted into the body of Christ by baptism, through faith,' but 'to really be, through spiritual grace, 'permanently dead unto sin and alive unto righteousness;' in other words, 'to be renovated by the Holy Spirit to a new and holy life,' such as is spent by faith in Christ (see St. Ambrose, cited by Est.); in short, 'to be a justified believer;' one who hath obtained the adoption of sons according to what we read in John i. 12, οἱ οὖν δὲ ἤλαβον αὐτὸν [ἐν πίστει] ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἐξουσίαν τέκνα Θεοῦ γίνεσθαι. See also 1 John iii. 2, comp. with Rom. viii. 17. Gal. iv. 7; one who hath become united to Christ, he being one with Christ, and Christ one with him.

18. τὰ δὲ πάντα ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, &c., meaning, it would seem, to intimate the cause of the spiritual renovation effected by the Gospel; and that not by our own natural strength, but by the grace and strength derived from God alone. By τὰ πάντα we must understand all the component parts of the thing in question, namely, spiritual regeneration by the Gospel. The next words advert to the means whereby it was effected.

—ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ meaning, that 'it is by God, through the Spirit, that the regeneration in question is alone effected by God,' who, having reconciled men to himself by Jesus Christ, thus made man a fit subject for this regeneration.

q Rom. 3. 24. τὴν διακονίαν τῆς καταλλαγῆς. 19 <sup>q</sup> ὥς ὅτι Θεὸς ἦν ἐν Χριστῷ
 25. κόσμον καταλλάσσων ἑαυτῷ, μὴ λογιζόμενος αὐτοῖς τὰ παραr ch. 6. 1. πτώματα αὐτῶν, καὶ θέμενος ἐν ἡμῖν τὸν λόγον τῆς καταλλαγῆς.
 Eph. 6. 20. 20 <sup>r</sup> Ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ οὖν πρεσβεύομεν, ὡς τοῦ Θεοῦ παρακαλουν-
 Mat. 2. 7. τος δι' ἡμῶν δεόμεθα ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ.
 1 Lu. 23. 4. 21 <sup>s</sup> τὸν γὰρ μὴ γνόντα ἁμαρτίαν, ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἁμαρτίαν ἐποίησεν,
 9. 12. ἵνα ἡμεῖς γινώμεθα δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ, VI. 1 <sup>s</sup> συνερ-
 Rom. 5. 10. 20.
 1 Cor. 2. 9. 21.
 Heb. 12. 18.

19. ὥς ὅτι Θεός, &c.] This is further illustrative, with amplification, of the preceding subject of reconciliation through Christ. Some obscurity, however, here exists, occasioned partly by the peculiar idiom in ὥς ὅτι (best rendered quippe or nempe quod, literally, that is, namely, that), but chiefly by the harshness of the construction. As to the sense, there is no difficulty, except as regards the words ἐν Χριστῷ, which may be taken either with the preceding (and thus the meaning will be, that God reconciled the world to himself by Christ), or with the following, by which the sense will be, that God was in, i. e. united to, Christ, reconciling, &c. The latter mode is the more simple and natural; according to either view, the doctrine of Christ's divinity is strongly attested. Thus far in my former Editions. On more mature consideration, I am now less inclined than before to give the preference to the latter mode of interpretation, at least on the score of its greater simplicity and facility of construction, for that reason has less force in St. Paul's writings than in most others. However, it seems best to render, 'God was reconciling the world to himself through Christ;' which view is adopted by the Greek Fathers and Commentators, the Pesch. Syr., Arabic, and Æthiopic Versions, and by modern Commentators generally; and this has been preferred by Est., on the ground of its so aptly corresponding both to the preceding and the following words. It is also ably maintained by Billroth. The reason why the periphrastic form was here used in preference to the simple verb imperfect is well stated by Billroth thus: 'The reconciliation spoken of in both these verses must include both forgiveness of sins, justification by faith, and the adoption of sons. See Gal. iv. 5, compared with Eph. i. 5.' I would now interpret τὸν κόσμον, not 'of the human race generally,' because that would require much qualification of the sense, and would be unsuitable to this passage: for, as observes Estius, 'Scripture no where so speaks, as to say that God reconciles to himself those who shall not believe in him; and that he does not impute to them their trespasses.' I can by no means, with certain Commentators, understand by 'the world' to be denoted 'the persons out of the whole world, who are elected and predestinated to salvation.' I do not hesitate to adopt the view of Augustin, De Lyræ, and Cajetan, that by κόσμος is meant the 'Church of Christ throughout the world,' that part of the world which is incorporated in the body of Christ.—μὴ λογιζόμενος, 'not imputing;' as Rom. iv. 8, οὐ μὴ λογιζήται Κύριος ἁμαρτίαν. So also οὐκ ἔλλογαι in Rom. v. 13.—θέμενος ἐν ἡμῖν τὸν λ., literally, 'putting into our hands;' i. e. committing to our trust.—τὸν λόγον τῆς κατ., 'the message of reconciliation.'—καταλλάγητε is a Genit. of εὐρίσκειν.

20. The οὖν is very significant, an inference being now drawn from what has been said; q. d. 'In the exercise, then, of this office of reconciliation, we the Apostles are ambassadors on the part of Christ.' The words following, ὥς—ἡμῶν, are exegetical of ὑπὲρ Χρ. πρ., and mean, that, in delivering the message, they act on the part of God, and represent his person; and therefore God may be said by them to persuade, and CHRIST to entreat, when they address the exhortation, καταλλάγητε τῷ Θεῷ, 'embrace the means of reconciliation afforded to you, through Christ, by God.'

21. τὸν γὰρ μὴ γνόντα, &c.] The γὰρ has reference to what follows, as suggesting an especial reason why they should hearken to the message of reconciliation; namely, that 'he who sent it has been so benignant and merciful as to make,' &c.—τὸν μὴ γνόντα ἁμαρτίαν: a most significant designation of Christ, denoting 'the perfectly Holy and Righteous;' or, as Theophyl. explains, αὐτοδικαιοσύνην. Righteousness itself. In ἁμαρτίαν ἐποίησεν, the ἁμαρτίαν is taken by many eminent Commentators to mean 'a sin-offering,' or a sacrifice by which he expiated our transgressions; and, as that sense is frequent in the Sept., it is likely to be the one meant here. Other Interpreters, however, of not less note, take ἁμαρτίαν for ὁμολογούμενον, abstract for concrete. And thus the meaning will be, that 'though Christ was free from sin, he underwent the punishment of death, which is the consequence of sin: he was accounted as a sinner.' And this is somewhat confirmed by the next clause, of which the sense is, 'that we might be accounted righteous, and justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus;' δικαιοσύνη being for δικαιοσύνην (comp. 1 Cor. i. 30), and Θεὸν for παρὰ Θεοῦ. On either interpretation the doctrine of the Atonement is abundantly evident from this passage: see Abp. Magee, Illustr. No. xx. viii., Bp. Bull's Exam. Cena. p. 39—43, and Dr. L. Barrow's Sermons, vol. i. serm. 32.

VI. This Chapter consists of two parts, vv. 1—10 (or 1—13), and v. 11—ult., with the first verse of the following Chapter. 1. The Apostle, continuing his vindication of his ministry, shows with what faithfulness, zeal, charity, and patience he has discharged it, amidst all the afflictions and disgraces to which he has been subjected. Then, 2, at vv. 11, 12, he desires, as a return for his ardent affection for them, a similar affection from them,—such as should be evinced in abstinence from a certain practice which was contrary to Christian principles, and must be destructive of their happiness here, as well as endanger their

γούντες δὲ καὶ παρακαλοῦμεν, μὴ εἰς κενὸν τὴν χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ
δέξασθαι ὑμᾶς.<sup>2</sup> (Ὁ λέγει γάρ· Καιρῷ δεκτῷ ἐπήκουσά σου, καὶ ἐν ἡμέρᾳ σωτηρίας ἐβοήθησά σου· ἰδοὺ, νῦν καιρὸς εὐπρόσδεκτος, ἰδοὺ, νῦν ἡμέρα σωτηρίας.)<sup>3</sup> ° μηδεμίαν ἐν μηδενὶ δίδόντες προσκοπήν, ἵνα μὴ μωμηθῇ ἡ διακονία.
<sup>4</sup> ἀλλ' ἐν παντὶ συνιστῶντες ἑαυτοὺς ὡς Θεοῦ διάκονοι, ἐν ὑπο-

salvation hereafter; namely, intermarrying with idolaters or unbelievers. In short, ver. 14—ult. seem to properly connect with the exhortation at ver. 1, 'not to receive the grace of God in vain.' For vv. 3—10 seem to be parenthetical, and meant to strengthen the force of the exhortation, by adverting to the character of those who gave it. After desiring a proper return for such devotedness, the Apostle proceeds to notice the practice in question.

1. συνεργούντες δὲ καὶ παρακ.] See note on 1 Cor. iii. 9, and 1 Thes. iii. 2, from which it will appear that συνεργούντες is put for συνεργεῖτε, scil. τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is to be taken from the immediately preceding Θεοῦ, confirmed by the immediately subsequent τοῦ Θεοῦ. This view of the sense has the support of Œcumen., among the ancient, and, of the modern Commentators, of De Lyra, Cajetan, and Est, which last-mentioned Expositor ably traces the connexion, and sets forth the general sense of the passage thus: 'Cum Deus in Christo mundum sibi reconciliaverit, causam exhibendo sufficientem reconciliationis ejus ac justificationis in merito passionis Christi, nos apostoli, quibus a Deo datum est ministerium reconciliationis annuntiande et exsequendæ, Deo co-operantes tamquam ejus ministri, cum obsecratione vos exhortamur.'—μὴ εἰς κενόν—δέξασθαι ὑμᾶς, meaning, 'not so to act, as that the grace of God, i. e. the gracious offer of reconciliation to God in the Gospel, shall have been received in vain,' by your living unworthy of your holy calling. In so rendering I have, I trust, represented the true force of the idiomatical phraseology in παρακ. μὴ δέξ., which has escaped almost all the translators; in order to understand which, we must carefully notice the brevity of expression in παρακαλοῦμεν—μὴ δέξασθαι, which seems to imply the omission of some intermediate verb, such as προσφίμεσθαι, 'to conduct yourself'; ὥστε μὴ δέξ. (δέξασθαι for δέξασθαι), 'so to act as that you shall not have received it in vain.' The result denoted by εἰς κενόν is such as might arise as well from non-perseverance in faith once embraced, as from failure to evince it by suitable fruits in the life and conversation. The sense which I have assigned to χάριν is confirmed by two passages supra, v. 18—21, and Tit. ii. 11.

2. This is meant to adduce a reason why the gracious offer should not be rejected, or abused. And there is, as Theodor. remarks, great propriety in the testimony of prophecy being called in to strengthen admonition.—λέγει γάρ, &c., 'for He (i. e. God) saith'; namely, in Isa. xlix. 8. Here Θεός must be supplied (as in Rom. xv. 10) from Θεοῦ in the preceding verse; not ἡ γραφή, or προφήτης, as many recent Commentators suppose; for such an ellipsis would be intolerably harsh; whereas the other is regular, and confirmed by the context of the passage of Isaiah; for there God is (as even the best Jewish interpreters admit) represented as saying to the Messiah, that 'he had heard his intercession, in behalf of the Gentiles, in an acceptable or favourable time, and at the day of salvation (that destined for salvation) had resolved to succour him.' This Scripture the Apostle in the next words applies; q. d. 'And mind—now is the acceptable time, now is the day of salvation; the time is now come when God will fulfil his promise respecting the salvation of the Gentiles through Christ; and that salvation is now offered by those, whose Divine mission is confirmed by signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds; and is regarded as the accepted time, or day of salvation, to all who seek an interest in the Redeemer's kingdom.' With the expression καιρῷ δεκτῷ, which is explained by the one occurring in the next clause, καιρὸς εὐπρόσδεκτος ('well accepted'), is meant 'the time for acceptance,' πρὸς ἑμὲ. So Seneca, Med. 1017, 'Meus dies est; tempore accepto utimur.' This is further explained by the antithetical phrase ἡμέρα σωτηρίας, 'time of (i. e. suitable for) deliverance.'—ἐπήκουσά σου, 'I have hearkened, or listened, to thee'; as Gen. xvi. 2, and 2 Chron. xiii. 20: the idea of listening being contained in the ἐπὶ, which denotes that the person not only hears, but turns his ear towards the speaker, and thus, as we say, 'lends an ear'; implying a granting of the request. So Lucian, Timon 34, ἐπήκουσας τῶν εὐχῶν.

3. μηδεμίαν ἐν μηδ. δίδόντες προσκ.] This closely connects with παρακαλοῦμεν at ver. 1, 'We beseech you—we, I say, who give no offence, &c. For the participle may be resolved into a verb and relative; a view confirmed by Theophyl., Theodor., and the Arab. Version, and some of the most eminent modern Expositors; who are agreed that the Apostle is not speaking (as several Commentators, espec. Mackn., suppose) of the Corinthians themselves (as if these were exhortations or precepts of a holy life), but of himself and Timothy; though, indeed, it comes to the same thing; since, as Theophyl. points out, ἐν τάξει διηγέσεται συμβουλίας ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀφωσώσιν.—The Apostle then proceeds most earnestly to remind them of his most meritorious conduct in the ministry, and his unsparring sacrifices for their spiritual benefit, as an additional reason why they should not receive the grace of God in vain. The sense is, 'laying no stumbling-block' (πρόσκομμα, Rom. xiv. 13) in the way of Christians, by which any one might be shaken in his religious faith, or turned from it, or by which the ministry might incur censure, and become less efficient. Προσκοπή is put, by metonymy, for 'causes of offence' or 'falling'; i. e. 'giving no occasion for condemning and rejecting the Gospel.' By ἡ διακονία understand the above 'ministry of reconciliation,' 'the office of preaching the Gospel,' mentioned supra ver. 18, and so equiv. to 'our ministry.'

4. συνιστῶντες ἑαυτοὺς] 'manifesting, apμονῇ πολλῇ, ἐν θλίψεσιν, ἐν ἀνάγκαις, ἐν στενοχωρίαις, <sup>5</sup> ἐν πληγαῖς, ἐν φυλακαῖς, ἐν ἀκαταστασίαις, ἐν κόποις, ἐν ἀγρυπνίαις, ἐν νηστείαις <sup>6</sup> ἐν ἀγνότητι, ἐν γνώσει, ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ, ἐν χρηστότητι, ἐν Πνεύματι ἀγίῳ, ἐν ἀγάπῃ ἀνυποκρίτῳ, <sup>7</sup> ἐν λόγῳ ἀληθείας, ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ, διὰ τῶν ὅπλων τῆς δικαιοσύνης proving ourselves as; which figurative sense arises out of the proper one of placing together; here implying the justa-position of two things for the purpose of showing their comparative size or value.—Ὡς θ. διάκονοι. Supply δυντες; q. d. 'evinced ourselves to really be persons entrusted with a Divine legation.' The Apostle then proceeds to state the component parts of this his general Apostolic conduct; and that in a manner the most pathetic and impressive; with which comp. the parallel passage infra xi. 21—28, 'forming conjointly (to use the words of Canon Tate, Cont. Hist. 159) a splendid enumeration of particulars which,—unparalleled, as, from their nature, they must ever be,—may be ranked among the very highest examples of the sublime and pathetic.' I have now pointed as I have, since τῇ ὑπομονῇ is to be connected, not (as it is done by most editors) solely with the following context, nor, strictly speaking, at all; but rather with the preceding συνιστάντες ἑαυτούς; for, as Thom. Aquin. points out, 'the Apostle here purposes to set forth how we ought to approve ourselves as God's ministers; first, generally, in ὑπομονῇ, then specially by the other terms.' And this is confirmed by Calv., Bucer, Hyper., and Est., who are agreed that ὑπομ. is a general term, placed first, as being intended to be referred to all the particulars which follow in the subsequent enumeration, and denoting, in a general way, 'a patient endurance' of the various afflicting trials and tribulations specified in the words following; q. d. 'by the exercise of faith with patience.' This view, by which in ὑπομονῇ is taken for δι' ὑπομονῆς (comp. infra xii. 12), affords, I apprehend, the only clue to unravel the difficulty which otherwise exists, and to make what were otherwise confused, clear and intelligible. And thus the particulars following need not be regarded (as they have been by most Commentators) merely as synonymous expressions, forming together a complication of evils in general; but they are to be considered specially, as meant to be distributed into groups, forming a beautiful gradation. The several evils here enumerated, form, I apprehend, three classes, each composed of three particulars. In the first we have ἐν θλίψεσιν, ἐν ἀνάγκαις, ἐν στενοχωρίαις, 'in afflictions; in necessities; in pinching distresses'; where there seems to be a climax; comp. infra xii. 10, and Rom. viii. 35. So Bengel pithily remarks: 'In pressuris complures utent vix, sed difficiles; in necessitatibus, una difficilis; in στενοχωρίαις, nulla.'

5. As the foregoing trials were, more or less, the results of indirect persecution, so the next group, ἐν πληγαῖς, ἐν φυλακαῖς, ἐν ἀκαταστασίαις, represents the effects of direct persecution. Of these the first needs no comment; the second particular is illustrated by a passage of Clemens Romanus, who mentions St. Paul as ἐπὶ τῷ δίσμῳ φορέσας: as to the third, ἀκαταστασίαις, it may best, I now think, with Dr. Peile, be rendered 'tumults,' meaning 'riots,' or 'uproars;' such as Paul was assailed with at Iconium, Lystra, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth itself, Ephesus, and Jerusalem. 'Unsettled circumstances of life,' by being, from tumults and persecutions, driven from place to place into a sort of exile,—the misery of which appears from Paul's connecting it, at 1 Cor. iv. 11, with endurance of hunger, thirst, and nakedness: πεινῶμεν καὶ διψῶμεν, καὶ γυμνητούμεν,—καὶ ἀστατούμεν, καὶ κοπιῶμεν ἐργαζόμενοι ταῖς ἰδίαις χερσὶ: which passage, indeed, is a good comment on the present; and hence it appears that κόποις here must be chiefly understood of his labours at his trade (though partly of those in travelling, mostly on foot); and νηστείαις, of that insufficient support which labours so interrupted by his Apostolic duties could alone be expected to supply. Ἀγρυπνίας seems to refer to the abridgment of his rest by night, to make up for the time expended by day on his evangelical labours.

6, 7. To the above statement of the afflictions endured is here subjoined another of the virtues and graces cultivated, under the influence of the Spirit, in the severe school of adversity.—ἀγνότητι, 'by purity and sanctity of life.'—Of ἐν γνώσει the sense is uncertain. As the Apostle is generally admitted to be here speaking of the practical virtues, there is much to countenance the opinion of Calvin and many recent Commentators, that γνώσις denotes a practical knowledge of religion, such as shows itself in actions: a sense, indeed, very suitable to the context, but which involves considerable harshness. As, however, the Apostle here intermixes with practical virtues some particulars which cannot be referred to that head (as ἐν Πνεύματι ἀγίῳ and ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ), it may be better to understand γνώσις of the cultivation of Divine knowledge; that wisdom from above, which James iii. 17, associates with purity and the other Christian virtues here specified; and St. Peter (2 Epist. i. 5) bids his converts to 'add to their faith; what St. Paul, infra, viii. 7, associates with πίστις, and at 1 Cor. xii. and xiii. enumerates among 'the gifts of the Holy Spirit.' See more in Estius.—ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ and ἐν χρηστότητι seem to have reference to the mode of exercising the ministry in question,—namely, by patience and forbearance towards those who oppose themselves, and by a general benignity of disposition, as contrasted with starchy austerity.—ἐν Πνεύματι ἀγίῳ must be understood of the influence of the Holy Spirit. Thus the sense will be, 'by evincing those dispositions produced under the influence and aids of the Holy Spirit.' Here it would seem the Apostle intended, in the words ἐν Πνεύμ. ἀγίῳ—ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ, to further illustrate what he had before said at ἐν γνώσει, ἐν μακροθ., ἐν χρηστ.; meaning to intimate, that the knowledge to be cultivated is Divine and inspired knowledge, and therefore emphatically τῶν δεξιῶν καὶ ἀριστερῶν <sup>8</sup> διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀτιμίας, διὰ δυσφημίας καὶ εὐφημίας ὡς πλάνοι, καὶ ἀληθεῖς <sup>9</sup> ὡς ἀγνοοῦμενοι, καὶ ἐπιγνωσκόμενοι ὡς ἀποθνήσκοντες, καὶ ἰδοὺ ζῶμεν ὡς πα-

ch. 11. 4.
1 Cor. 15. 31.
Pa. 118. 18.

the Word of truth: also that the forbearance and benignity practised is to be genuine undissembled love to man for the sake of God; not like the hypocritical and self-interested love of false teachers. Comp. Rom. xii. 9. 2 Tim. i. 5. 1 Pet. i. 22.—The next particular, ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ, is variously interpreted. It may (with the ancients, and the earlier moderns) be understood of the mighty supernatural gifts enjoyed by the Apostles and others, and thus seem intended to complete the idea before represented by ἐν αἰνῷ Πνεύματος. But it would rather seem to denote that operation of inspiring influence enjoyed by the Apostles, to which Dr. Henderson (on Inspiration, p. 369) applies the term inspiration, 'whose energy (he observes) strengthened their mental powers, giving expansion to the understanding, quickness to the perception, vividness to the imagination, vigour to the memory, and solidity to the judgment.' Upon the whole, however, I prefer the view of Calv., Hyper., and Est., who take δυνάμει Θεοῦ to denote 'the power of doing all things with a certain authority and majesty,' by the exercise of a power imparted by God (1 Cor. ii. 5) of so doing all things, that it may be seen that God 'is of a truth with the doer by his grace and heavenly benediction.' This view I find supported by the authority of Theophyl. The words following, διὰ τῶν ὤπλων, &c., v. 7, are intended to suggest the means by which the δυνάμει Θεοῦ above spoken of was made effectual. Comp. Eph. vi. 10—12. Now these are, in that passage, called the panoply of God, and there the military figure is expanded into an allegory. Here the spiritual arms are not particularized, yet the terms τῶν δεξιῶν καὶ ἀριστερῶν are very comprehensive, referring to the complete armour and arms, on both sides—right and left—by spear and shield, with which the ὡπλιτὴς, or completely-armed soldier, was furnished, who was thus said to be ἀμφιδίξιος, as having weapons both of offence on the right, and of defence on the left: φυλακτήρια and ἀμυντήρια. So Bengel well observes, 'per arma offensiva quum floremus, per defensiva quum laboramus.' And such the Christian soldier has need of, since the attacks of his great spiritual Foe are right and left; in fact, on every side. The sense implied in δικαιοσύνης is this:—'We employ no other arms than those of righteousness;' meaning, as Calv. explains, 'a good conscience, and a holy life.' These were the arms employed by the great Apostle, who recommends their use to us: and how nobly did he use them! In the words of Theodoret, οὕτῃ δόξα αὐτὸν ἐπῆρει, οὕτῃ ἀτιμία καθήγειρεν οὐκ εὐφημία ἐφύσησεν, οὐ δυσφημία ἠλάσεν ἄλλὰ διὰ τῶν ἐναντιῶν οὐδέων, ἀματίσθητος ἔμεινεν.

8—10. Here the reference to the circumstances, under which they employed the armour of righteousness, passes into a sort of description of the situations in which they did all this; and that by way of contrasting their real character with that which their calumniators ascribed to them; and showing, as Theodor. says, in some other respects, their real, as compared with their reputed situation; by which, indeed, it might appear that their life was made up of seeming, though not real, contradictions.

8. διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀτιμίας, διὰ δυσφημίας καὶ εὐφημίας Here διὰ, as I long ago pointed out in my Recens. Syn., denotes, not the means, but the medium, through which; and it may be rendered 'amidst.' Availing himself of this suggestion (which I was the first to make), Mr. Alf. observes, 'that, thus understood, these two pairs [the latter an exegetical parallelism to the former] will form an easy transition from instrumental, through medial, to the passive characteristics which follow.' It is well observed by Theophyl. (after Chrys.), that δυσφημία is ill to be borne by the generous and virtuous mind, being worse than bodily tortures; these affecting the body only, but those pressing, with their whole weight, on the mind. Calv. makes the same remark.

—ὡς πλάνοι, καὶ ἀληθεῖς, &c.] After πλάνοι supply ὄντες, to match the Participles in the clauses following, where the καὶ is for καίτοι, corresponding to the δὲ at χαίροντες and πλουτίζοντες, q. d. 'Our adversaries represent us as impostors, but falsely; we are real ambassadors from God.' Thus, as Alf. observes, 'from speaking of repute Paul passes to the character of the repute,—namely, by way of explanation and illustration; this Chrys. and Theophyl. well saw, when they remarked, τοῦτο ἴστιν ὃ εἶπε διὰ δυσφημ. καὶ εὐφημ. Πλάνοι was no doubt, the term applied to Paul and the other Apostles by their adversaries, the Pagan priests and the Jewish Rabbis, as it had formerly been done by the Scribes and Pharisees to Jesus, Matt. xvii. 63. And no wonder; since it was the ordinary term to denote an impostor, used by Joseph. and the later Class. writers. By ἀγνοοῦμενοι is meant obscure persons; lit. 'ὡς οὐκ οὐδὲν ἔγνωσεν,' 'no bodies;' and by ἐπιγνωσκόμενοι, 'well known as the dispensers of spiritual good.' In ὡς ἀποθνήσκοντες, &c. ver. 9, there is an ὀξύμωρον, the sense being 'near to death, devoted to death by our enemies.' See 1 Cor. xv. 31.—καὶ ἰδοὺ ζῶμεν, 'and yet, strange to say, we live.' Here Grot. compares the Latin verse, 'Semper casuris similes, nunquamque cadentes.'—παίδευόμενοι is by many eminent Commentators explained punished, or corrected by the magistrates, as in Luke xlii. 16, 22. But that sense is somewhat frigid, and the word is better interpreted (with all the ancient and most modern Commentators) 'chastened,' viz. by the Lord, in his fatherly correction; with allusion, perhaps, to Ps. cxvii. 18, Sept., παίδεύεις ἐπαίδυνσί με ὁ Κύριος τῷ ὃ θανάτῳ οὐ παρίδωκί με. And so 1 Cor. xi. 32, κρινόμενοι δι' ὑπὸ Κυρίου, παίδυνόμεθα, where see note. Thus the sense is: 'We are permitted to fall into these tribulations, as chastenings for our good in the end.' See Heb. xii. 6. The reflection in the words following, ὡς λυπούμενοι, &c. (v. 10) naturally arises out of the preceding; q. d. '[Under these afflictions and corrections] we seem to be suffering grief, and are thought the most unhappy of

h ch. 2. 4.
 & 7. 8-10.
 Matt. 5. 4-12.
 Luke 6. 21.
 John 16. 22.

δευόμενοι, καὶ μὴ θανατούμενοι<sup>10</sup> ὡς λυπούμενοι, αἱ δὲ χαί-ροντες ὡς πτωχοὶ, πολλοὺς δὲ πλουτίζοντες ὡς μηδὲν ἔχοντες, καὶ πάντα κατέχοντες.

11 Τὸ στόμα ἡμῶν ἀνέφηγε πρὸς ὑμᾶς, Κορίνθιοι, ἡ καρδία ἡμῶν πεπλάτυνται! 12 οὐ στενοχωρεῖσθε ἐν ἡμῖν, στενοχω-ρεῖσθε δὲ ἐν τοῖς σπλάγχχνους ὑμῶν. 13 ἴτην δὲ αὐτὴν ἀντιμι-men; yet, in fact, we are rejoicing in the testimony of a good conscience, and in the consolations of Divine grace.

10. πλουτίζοντες] 'making [spiritually] rich.'—Μηδὲν ἔχοντες; i.e. 'having nothing that we can call our own, so property.'—Καὶ πάντα κατέχοντες, i.e. '[yet] possessing all things [essential to our real happiness]; and, in the promises of the Gospel, what must infinitely outweigh all that the world can give; even the boundless riches of glory in the heavenly inheritance.

11—13. The difficulty complained of in these verses has partly arisen from not attending to their scope, and partly from inattention to the nature of the metaphor in πεπλάτυνται and its antitheton στενοχ. As respects the former, the Apostle's intent is,—1st, to apologize for language which might seem to savour of egotism, and involve somewhat of reproach to the persons addressed; 2. under the expression of tender affection, to convey a delicate reproof to them for the want of a due return. See Chrysa., Theophyl., and Theodor. He tells them, that he has spoken thus frankly, from his strong affection for them, and his desire to promote their spiritual good. It is the warmth of his affection that has caused him to speak out, as he has,—and to pour forth all the feelings of his heart so unreservedly. And truly the expressions are very applicable to the preceding impassioned stream of fervid eloquence poured forth in the preceding verses, 'without overflowing full!'

11. ἡ καρδία ἡμῶν πεπλάτυνται] In the metaphor here employed we may observe an almost philosophic exactness; the effect of joy, affection, and unreserved confidence being to unloose the tongue (see Pa. xl. 3. cxvii. 2. Acts ii. 26), and expand the heart, which therefore feels as it were enlarged; while, under the contrary feeling, the tongue seems chained, and the heart tightened and contracted. See Hyper. Thus the full sense is,—'I pour forth my whole soul.' So Theophyl., ἡ θερμὴ τῆς ἀγάπης τὸ στόμα μου ἀνοίγει, καὶ τὴν καρδίαν μου ἐπλάτυνα. The Apostle, however, as Chrysa. observes, makes use of this profession of affection for them, in order to intimate their want of a due mutual ἀγάπη for him. This is couched in the words following:—οὐ στενοχωρεῖσθε ἐν ἡμῖν, &c., meaning, 'our affection for you is not contracted, but your affection for us is straitened and contracted,'—where the term στενοχωρεῖσθε is highly suitable; since any one who is hated is said to have no place in our affections. Comp. Arrian, Epict. i. 25, σὺ σαυτῷ στενοχωρίαν παρέχεις, σὺ σαυτὸν θλιβεῖς—κάθολον γὰρ ἐκείνου μὲνισσο ὅτι ἐαυτοῦς θλιβόμεν, ἐαυτοὺς στενοχωροῦμεν. I need scarcely say that σπλάγχχ. here (as at vii. 15) denotes the tender affections, as being supposed to be seated in the heart; a use which has been thought Hebraistic, though it is of frequent occurrence in the Greek tragedians.—Ὡς τίκοντες λέγω suggests the ground of the claim,—namely, on the score of spiritual paternity. By this pathetic appeal to their hearts, the Apostle endeavours to draw their attention to some serious admonitions which he had to address to them.

13. τὴν δὲ αὐτὴν ἀντιμισθ.] The sense is, 'Be ye also thus enlarged as to your affections for us, according to (i.e. by making) that equal return of affection which is due to us:' in which words he shows how this ardent desire to serve them might by them be made most effectual to their benefit,—namely, by making a due return, and following his example: and as his heart was expanded in affection towards them, so should theirs be to him, by opening their minds to his salutary counsels; which he proceeds to give them in the remaining verses of this chap., and in the first of the next, containing earnest exhortations to separation from unbelief, and impurity in general; accordingly, at vv. 14—16, he especially adverts to the reason why they should abstain from intimacy with heathens, and that in a popular way; q.d. 'There is not the idem velle aliquo idem nolle, no affinity of sentiment or feeling: as being opposites, they can by no means unite: q.d. between believers and unbelievers there can be no congeniality of sentiment or feeling; as being opposites, they can no more unite than things the most heterogeneous. In short, the connection of these words with the foregoing context, and the course of thought in the Apostle's mind, is well stated by Billr. thus: 'The whole of the high-wrought discourse in vv. 4—10 was occasioned by the Apostle's desire to appear before the Corinthians as pure as possible, and thereby to enforce upon them his example. Inspired by the majesty of his office, which crowned him with honours even amid the most humiliating sufferings, and with the [abiding] consciousness that to this office all his powers were dedicated, he had allowed his words free course, and had opened his whole heart to his Corinthian readers. This gave him occasion once more to remind them of his close relations to them, and to pray them to receive him into their heart, even as he had received them into his; vv. 11—13. And now he returns to the admonitions given in vv. 1, 2. As there it is said, in general terms, that they ought to strive to show that they had not received the grace of God in vain; so here also it appears better to take the directions of the Apostle in as general a sense as possible, and to understand the words not merely of participation in what had been offered to idols, but of any partial relapse into heathenism (either in doctrine, or in walk, or in both) occasioned by [too] free intercourse with the heathen. The unsuitable-

σθίαν, (ὡς τέκνους λέγω,) πλατύνθητε καὶ ὑμεῖς. <sup>14</sup> κ Μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις· τίς γὰρ μετοχὴ δικαιοσύνης καὶ ἀνομία; τίς δὲ κοινωνία φωτὶ πρὸς σκότος; <sup>15</sup> τίς δὲ συμφώνησις Χριστῷ πρὸς Βελίαρ; ἢ τίς μερίς πιστῷ μετὰ ἀπίστου; <sup>16</sup> τίς δὲ συγκατάθεσις ναφ̄ Θεοῦ μετὰ εἰδώλων; Ὑμεῖς γὰρ ness and injuriousness of such intercourse the Apostle first sets forth under the figure of two animals unequally yoked.

Ezek. 27. 24, 27. Hos. 2. 22. Zech. 2. 5. & 12. 2. Rom. 9. 20. Heb. 8. 10. Rev. 21. 7.

<sup>14</sup> μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις] The difference of opinion, which exists as to the sense of this injunction, has chiefly arisen from inattention to the nature of the metaphor under which it is couched. Now ζυγός denotes the beam of a balance, or steelyard; and σταθμός ἑτεροζυγῶν was applied to a steelyard that pulls one way, when it should draw equal. The sense, however, thence deduced is harsh and unsuitable, and it is better, with most ancient and modern Commentators, to derive the word from ἵταρος and ζυγός, a yoke. Thus ἑτεροζυγίω will denote 'to draw on the other side of a yoke with another,' 'to be a yoke-fellow.' And the sense will be, 'Do not maintain any close connexion or intimate society with unbelievers.' So in Lev. xix. 9 the term is used of heterogeneous animals; and at 1 Macc. i. 15 we have ἐξεύχθησαν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. The Apostle did not intend hereby to forbid all communication with them; which would have been impracticable. See 1 Cor. v. 10, 11. Some, indeed, suppose the chief purpose of this injunction to be to forbid marriage with heathens. But that view does not well suit with what follows, which rather alludes to close society and intimacy. See Theophylact. At the same time, marriage may be thus said to be, à fortiori, virtually forbidden; and considering that the marriage bond was, in the idioms of all languages, represented under the metaphor of a yoke, or pole, to which draught cattle are harnessed together, there can be little doubt that, while he dissuaded from intimate society, he meant also to condemn marriage with heathens.—τίς κοινωνία φωτὶ πρὸς σκότος; Wetst. here compares Philo. t. iii. p. 56, 29, τίς οὖν κοινωνία πρὸς Ἀπόλλωνα τῷ μηδὲν οὐκ ἔων ἢ συγγενὲς ἐπιτατηδικοῦτι; I would add, Aristoph. Theam. 137, τίς δαὶ κατόπτρον καὶ ξίφος κοινωνία; and Epicharmus ap. Stob. p. 501, 4, τίς γὰρ κατόπτρου καὶ τοφλῷ κοινωνία;

<sup>15</sup> By Χριστῷ and Βελίαρ the systems of virtue and of vice are, as it were, personified. Βελίαρ is from the Syriac ܒܠܝܐ, and that from the Hebr. בלע, wickedness (derived from בל not, and בלע, to eat, lit. signifying that which profits not, but injures), which word occurs in 1 Sam. xxv. 25, and is applied (abstract for concrete) to denote κατ' ἐξοχὴν the Evil Spirit, Satan, as the Pesch. Syr. renders it.

<sup>16</sup> τίς δὲ συγκατάθεσις, &c.] Συγκατάθεσις signifies properly a putting together. It should be here rendered, not concord, or agreement, but community, or 'connexion'; q. d. 'What has a temple to do with idols and their worship?'—The words following, ὑμεῖς γὰρ—ζῶντες, are illustrative of the preceding: the image of a temple being transferred to Christians; q. d. 'For ye [Christians] are [each of you] a temple;' as 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. vi. 19. Comp. Hierocles, in

Aur. Carm. p. 24, καὶ ναὸν εἰς ὑποδοχὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ φωτὸς τὸν αὐτοῦ παρασκευάσατε νοῦν. The ὑμεῖς may, however, be understood of the whole Christian Church, considered as a temple; as in Eph. ii. 20, 21. The epithet ζῶντες is applied to JEHOVAH, as denoting a real and existing Being, in opposition to the pretended gods of the heathens, which were but stocks and stones. The words καθὼς εἶπεν ὁ Θεός are a formula of application. The Apostle means to argue, that the ancient promises of God, to dwell among his people Israel, and to be their God, were now, by the Gospel covenant, renewed to believers, and belonged peculiarly to them. In this quotation there is some alteration in the words, but no change of sense. Verse 16 is taken from Levit. xxvi. 11, 12; and the alteration is, in fact, no more than a change of the person.—νοικήσω ἐν αὐτοῖς. In the New Test. the Verb νοικῶ is frequently used of God's fixing his seat, 'taking up his habitation' in some chosen spot,—such as Mount Zion. Accordingly, with that sense it carries the adjunct notion of his 'defending and blessing' that favoured spot. Moreover, the gracious presence of the Lord with his people on earth is denoted by his dwelling with them. See Ps. ix. 11, and Isa. lviii. 13. The term is here employed figuratively, to denote the Divine presence, aid, and blessing. Ver. 17 is taken from Isa. lii. 11, 12, and the general meaning of the prophet is correctly represented; at least according to the mystical sense, which some of the best Jewish Commentators admit. See Bp. Lowth in loc.—Λύγαι Κύριος is an insertion of the Apostle. Here ἔξελθετε ἐκ μέσου ἀφορίσθητε, and ἀκαθάρτου μὴ ἄπτεσθαι, form one and the same sentiment, expressed by three enunciations, first, directly, then by implication. The two first, however, are so closely connected, as to form, in fact, but one; q. d. ἐξελθόντες ἀφορ.; and it may be doubted whether μὴ ἄπτει ἀκυθ. should be taken figuratively, of intercourse with Pagans, or literally, of abstaining from the use of any thing impure, as idol-meats. The latter view is preferable: but the former may be admitted as a secondary sense, for (as Grot. observes) 'the wise Jews supposed the prohibition, not to touch unclean animals, meant also of abstinence from society with idolaters.' Yet it is not to be confined to that, but understood to denote also in any way countenancing their idolatries, since that would imply a sort of participation in them, which could not fail to communicate a moral defilement (μολυσμὸν πνεύματος), like that of contagious disease by the touch, and prove a grievous hindrance to their 'perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord,' vii. 1. By the phrase ἐσθίσαι ὑμῶν is denoted 'reception into the close union with God,' contained in the spiritual adoption of sons: see Gal. iv. 5. Eph. i. 5. Rev. xxi. 7. Verse 18 is supposed, by Dr. Burton, not to be taken exactly from any passage of the Old Test., but to have reference to the ναὸς Θεοῦ ἐστε ζῶντος, καθὼς εἶπεν ὁ Θεός· "Ὅτι ἐνοικήσω ἐν αὐτοῖς, καὶ ἐμπεριπατήσω καὶ ἔσομαι αὐτῶν Θεός, καὶ αὐτοὶ ἔσονται μοι λαός. 17 <sup>m</sup> Διὸ ἐξέλθετε ἐκ μέσου αὐτῶν καὶ ἀφορίσθητε, (λέγει Κύριος,) καὶ ἀκαθάρτου μὴ ἅπτεσθε· κἀγὼ εἰσδέξομαι ὑμᾶς, 18 <sup>n</sup> καὶ ἔσομαι ὑμῖν εἰς πατέρα, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔσεσθέ μοι εἰς υἱοὺς καὶ θυγατέρας, λέγει Κύριος παντοκράτωρ. VII. 1 <sup>a</sup> Ταύτας οὖν ἔχοντες τὰς ἐπαγγελίας, ἀγαπητοὶ, καθαρίσωμεν ἑαυτοὺς ἀπὸ παντὸς μολυσμοῦ σαρκὸς καὶ πνεύματος, ἐπιτελοῦντες ἀγασύνην ἐν φόβῳ Θεοῦ.

<sup>m</sup> Isa. 56. 11.
Rev. 18. 4.
ch. 7. 1.

<sup>n</sup> Jer. 31. 1.
Rev. 21. 7.

<sup>a</sup> ch. 6. 18.
1 Tim. 4. 1.
John 3. 3.

<sup>b</sup> Acts 20. 28.
ch. 12. 17.

<sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Χωρήσατε ἡμᾶς οὐδένα ἡδικήσαμεν, οὐδένα ἐφθείραμεν,

general declarations made by Jehovah concerning Israel in various parts of Scripture, namely, Exod. iv. 22, 23. Jer. xxxi. 1—9. Hos. i. 9, 10. But the words bear as strong a resemblance to 2 Sam. vii. 14, as those of the preceding verse do to Isa. lii. 11, 12. There is no more than the same change of person, for application sake; and the words λέγει Κύριος and παντοκράτωρ are taken from ver. 8 of the same chapter, which surely fixes the reference of the foregoing words. The words εἰσδέξομαι ὑμᾶς in the last clause of ver. 17 are not found totidem verbis in the passage of Isa. lii. 11; but the sense ('I will receive you into my favour') has been thought implied in the words at ver. 12 of the same chap., ὁ ἐπισυνάγει ὑμᾶς ὁ Θεός '1. Yet the metaphor there—derived from 'bringing up and closing the rear guard of a retreating army'—is here quite unsuitable. Accordingly, I prefer to suppose, with some eminent interpreters, that the expression εἰσδέξομαι ὑμᾶς is formed on Jer. xxxii. 37, 38, where the term used by the Sept., συνάγω, and intended to express the force of the Hebr. צָרַף, denoting 'the drawing together' of the Jews, by bringing them back to their own country and the Temple of their God,—may well imply their 'being received,' and becoming again God's people; as it is expressly said in the next verse, 'they shall be my people, and I will be their God;' where the words of the Sept., ἔσονται μοι εἰς λαόν καὶ ἔσομαι αὐτοῖς εἰς Θεόν, may well have suggested the words following of the Apostle here, ἔσομαι ὑμῖν εἰς πατέρα, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔσεσθέ μοι εἰς υἱούς. However, I doubt not that he had likewise in mind the kindred passage of Zeph. iii. 19, 20, τὴν ἀπεσιμῆν (i. e. Jerusalem personified as the Jewish people) εἰσδέξομαι—καὶ ἐν τῷ καιρῷ θαν εἰσδέξομαι ὑμᾶς, 'adducam vos,' as the Vulg. renders: the literal sense being, 'bring you unto myself,' i. e. 'restore you to your filial relation to me, your Father and your God.' This is confirmed by the last words λέγει Κύριος π., thus corresponding to the last words in the parallel passage of Zeph., λέγει Κύριος. Paul adds παντοκρ., a designation of the Almighty, as being a not unusual adjunct to the phrase λέγει Κύριος. See 2 Kings vii. 8. 1 Chron. xvii. 7. Jer. v. 14. xxxii. 14. Amos v. 27. Nahum ii. 13. Hag. i. 2, 5, 7. Zech. i. 3, 4, 14, 16, 17, and often in that book and Malachi, and formed on the Hebr. נִצָּחַן יְהוָה. The term very often occurs in the Apocalypse.

VII. After having adduced the words of Scripture to inculcate this important truth, and comforted them with the promise therein attached to its observance, the Apostle proceeds to subjoin an earnest exhortation—and that in the way of inference from what has been before said—as to the privileges of those 'who are accepted in the Beloved.' With respect to the scope of the argument, the Apostle here means to intimate (as Calvin remarks) that 'promises are not only to them encouragements to serve God, but contain an implied contract on his part to save them.'

1. ταύτας οὖν ἔχοντες τὰς ἐπαγγ., καθαρίε. ] In this verse, which (like that of 1 Cor. xi. 1) ought not to have been separated from the foregoing chapter, the Apostle (as Billr. remarks) returns to the injunction with which he had commenced, ch. vi. 'Since, then, we have such promises (and now is the accepted time of their fulfilment), let us not render ourselves unworthy of God's grace by the defilement of our bodily or spiritual life.'—ἀπὸ παντὸς μολ., i. e. not only from the defilements of idol-meats, and idolatrous society, but from every sort of defilement. By μολ. σαρκός are denoted the pollutions of the sensual appetites, as exhibiting the outward expression of sin by the body, in word as well as deed; by μολ. πνεύμ. the pollutions of the passions, as shown in the inward workings of sin in the imagination and affections, involving all such thoughts as lead to evil actions. This view I find supported by the authority of Theophyl., who takes μολ. πνεύματος as standing for μολ. ψυχῆς, i. e. τὰς βυττανὰς λογισμῶν, those evil thoughts which lead to evil actions, or at any rate defile the man (the soul of man), as our Lord says, Matt. xv. 18, which passage was prob. in Paul's mind.—ἐπιτελοῦντες ἀγίωσ., 'striving to bring our holiness εἰς τέλος,' by seeking entire conformity to the law of God.'—Ἐν φόβῳ Θεοῦ, i. e. 'from reverence to his authority and fear of his displeasure;' as in Acts ix. 34. Rom. xiii. 7. Eph. v. 21: thus intimating the great influential principle by which men are led to cultivate such a purity,—namely, 'the fear of the Lord,' by which 'men depart from evil,' Prov. xvi. 6.

2. The Apostle now makes a transition from what is doctrinal, and has reference to Christians in general, to what is personal, and particular to himself; and resumes what he was saying supra οὐδένα ἐπλεονεκτήσαμεν. <sup>3</sup> Οὐ πρὸς κατάκρισιν λέγω προ-εἶρηκα γὰρ, ὅτι ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν ἔστε, εἰς τὸ συναποθανεῖν καὶ συζῆν. <sup>4</sup> Πολλή μοι παρρησία πρὸς ὑμᾶς, πολλή μοι καὶ χησις ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν πεπλήρωμαι τῇ παρακλήσει, ὑπερπερισσεύ-ομαι τῇ χαρᾷ ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν. <sup>5</sup> Καὶ γὰρ, ἐλθόντων ἡμῶν εἰς Μακεδονίαν, οὐδεμίαν ἔσχηκεν ἄνεσιν ἢ σὰρξ ἡμῶν,

c. ch. 6. 11—12.

d. ch. 1. 14.
Phil. 2. 17.
Col. 1. 24.
Deut. 22.
25.Acts 16. 18.
23.
1 Cor. 15. 31.
ch. 2. 12.

vi. 13, in nearly the same words; χωρήσατε ἡμᾶς being (as Calv. says) equiv. to πλευνόμενοι. So Theophyl. explains it: δίξασθε ἡμᾶς πλεονεκτήσει, καὶ μὴ στενοχωρήσῃτε ἐν ἡμῖν. Thus the sense is, 'Give us, I say, an enlarged place in your affections.' The next words suggest that there is no reason why they should not do so; since he deserves to hold that place in their affections, not having been guilty of any such conduct as alienates the affections of a people from their minister. Ἡδὲ is a general term, and ἰφθίμω and ἰπλῶν are particular ones; the former is usually explained of corrupting any one's religious principles; and the latter, of coveting his property. But I am rather inclined to agree with many of the best Commentators of the last century, that οὐδ. ἰφθ. means, 'we have not wasted your substance,' and οὐδ. ἰπλῶν, 'we have not made a gain of, or overreached any of you.' So ch. xii. 17, δὲ αὐτοῦ ἰπλῶν ἐπλεονεκτήσα ὑμᾶς; and 18, μὴ τι ἐπλεονεκτήσῃτε ὑμᾶς τίττοι; This language may be compared with that of the Prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xii. 3, seq.; and, no doubt, there is reference to what was done by the false teachers; who not only received a stipend for their office, but in other ways fleeced their devotees. So ch. xi. 20, ἀνίχεσθε—εἰ τις κατασθῆναι,—namely, by, as we say, eating them up, by living upon them, and taking from them, if not money, yet money's worth, or otherwise making a gain of them by the many cunning arts of overreaching, in which sense the word occurs in Thucyd. iv. 86.

3. οὐ πρὸς κατάκρισιν λέγω] Of this briefly worded passage the full sense seems to be,—'I say not this to hint any reproach of unkindness to me; [but I speak merely to show my claim to a large place in your affections, as ye have in mine:] for, as I have before said (i.e. in tantamount expressions, ch. vi. 11), ye are in our hearts,' &c., 'to die at once, and live there;' i.e., as Dr. Peile explains, 'to be with me alike in death and in life, to go with me to my dying day;'—a singular expression, continues he (but noticed by Chrysa, whom he cites), 'every way worthy of the warm heart of St. Paul, which may remind us of Thucyd. ii. 44, οἱ ἐνευδαίμωνοι τε ὁ βίος ὁμοίαι καὶ ἐντελευτήσαι ἐνταυμαρτήθη, "unto whom life has been equally measured out for them to be (herein consists the equality which the connecting τε—καὶ would indicate) happy, and so die in it;" i.e. not live a moment longer than they were happy in living.'

Ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις, &c., is for ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν (οἱ ἐστέ, ὅ ἐστε [ὑμῖν] συναποθανεῖν καὶ συζῆν [ἡμῖν]). And ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις εἶναι for ἔχειν ἐν καρδίᾳ. The sentiment is similar to that in Athen. p. 249, τοῦτον δ' οἱ βασιλεῖς ἔχουσιν οὐκ ἔσθαι καὶ συναποθανέσκοντες; and that of Horace, Carm. iii. 9, 24, 'Tecum vivere amem, tecum obeam libens.'

4. πολλή—ὑμᾶς] This is supposed to be meant to soften the harshness of the preceding expostulations; and is interpreted by the generality of older Commentators, 'I venture to use this freedom of plain speaking with you, which I know you will take in good part.' That sense, however, involves so much harshness, that it is better, with most recent Expositors, to render παρρησία, reliance, or confidence, 'I have great reliance on, or confidence in you,'—a signif. of the word frequent in the New Test. And this is supported by the authority of the Pesch. Syr. Version. However, I am inclined to think that both are intended, the sense of confident reliance being the principal, and that of freepokenness being the subordinate, sense. This view of the matter I find supported by the authority of Est. The next clause seems in antithesis to this; and the full sense is ably pointed out by Est., thus: 'multum ac saepe apud alios de vobis, ac vestri nomine, gloriar [prædicans obedientiam vestram erga me], 'great is my exultation [to others], ver. 14, ch. ix. 2—4, respecting you [on account of your faith, obedience, and attachment to me].' This view of the sense I find supported by the authority of Chrysa, Theophyl., and Theodor. The connexion with the words following seems founded on a sort of climax, thus: 'Not only do I boast of you to others, but your spiritual progress and well-affectedness to me gives me superabundant consolation after all my tribulation.'—πεπλήρωμαι—ἡμῶν, '[inasmuch that] I am full of comfort; nay, I superabound with joy,' 'amidst all my tribulation.' The verb ὑπερπερισσεύω occurs also at Rom. v. 20; but no where else. Compare ὑπερπερισσεύω at Mark vii. 37. Of these tribulations the nature and origin are then pointed out.

5. οὐδεμίαν ἔσχηκεν ἄνεσιν] The scope of the passage is well pointed out by Calv. thus:—'Magnitudo tristitiae argumento est, quantum efficaciam habuerit consolatio. Ego, inquit, undique premebar, tam intestinis quam externis afflictionibus: non tamen obstetit hoc totum, quo minus gaudium, quod mihi contulisti, prævaluerit, adeoque exundaverit.' The best recent Commentators are of opinion that ἡ σὰρξ is here (as often in the New Test.) used for 'the person;' meaning simply, 'We had no rest,' namely, from the persecutions of our unrelenting foes, the Jewish and Heathen zealots. But I would rather (with Beza, Sciator, and Calv.), take ἡ σὰρξ of 'the outer man,'—i.e. as regarded outward circumstances: though the Apostle, doubtless, suffered both in body and mind from the effects of his extreme anxiety; and was without any support, save that derived from spiritual consolations. The next words are ερωγεται; of which ἐν παντί θλιβ. is a general expression (see supra i. 6. iv. 8), and ἐξωθεν—φόβος a particular one. The sense is: 'externally (i.e. in our body) we were exposed to opposition and f ch. 1. 3, 4. ἄλλ' ἐν παντὶ θλιβόμενοι· ἔξωθεν μάχαι, ἔσωθεν φόβοι. <sup>6</sup> Ἄλλ'

 & 3. 13. ὁ παρακαλῶν τοὺς ταπεινοὺς παρεκάλεσεν ἡμᾶς, ὁ Θεὸς, ἐν
 1 Cor. 10. 17. τῇ παρουσίᾳ Τίτου· οὐ μόνον δὲ ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ, ἀλλὰ
 1 Thess. 3. 2. καὶ ἐν τῇ παρακλήσει ἣ παρεκλήθη ἐφ' ὑμῖν, ἀναγγέλλων ἡμῖν
 3 John 2—4. τὴν ὑμῶν ἐπιπόθησιν, τὸν ὑμῶν ὀδυρμόν, τὸν ὑμῶν ζῆλον ὑπὲρ ε ch. 2. 4. ἐμοῦ· ὥστε με μᾶλλον χαρῆναι. <sup>8</sup> Ὅτι εἰ καὶ ἐλύπησα ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ, οὐ μεταμέλομαι, εἰ καὶ μετεμελόμην. Βλέπω
 h ch. 5. 11. γὰρ ὅτι ἐπιστολὴ ἐκείνη, εἰ καὶ πρὸς ὥραν, ἐλύπησεν ὑμᾶς.
 1 Matt. 20. <sup>9</sup> Ἡ νῦν χαίρω, οὐχ ὅτι ἐλυπήθητε, ἀλλ' ὅτι ἐλυπήθητε εἰς μετά-
 70. Prov. 17. 22. νοίαν· ἐλυπήθητε γὰρ κατὰ Θεόν, ἵνα ἐν μηδενὶ ζημιωθῆτε ἐξ ἡμῶν. <sup>10</sup> Ἡ γὰρ κατὰ Θεὸν λύπη μετάνοιαν εἰς σωτηρίαν violence, internally (in our mind) to anxieties and fears; namely, for the safety of the Church at Corinth, lest it should be destroyed by heresies and dissensions.' See Gal. v. 15. And as the mind presses on the body, the latter could have no ἀνεσις, or respite.

6. τοὺς ταπεινοὺς] 'those that are cast down and afflicted.' God is frequently in the Old Test. described as the comforter of those that are in trouble. See Ps. cxlv. 8.

7. ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τῇ παρακλήσει—ἀναγγ., &c.] 'but also by the comfort with which he was comforted on your account, by having to announce,' &c. The Apostle means to speak of the comfort, which it was to him, to find that Titus had been enabled to make report of their strong affection to him, and their longing for the sight of him. Comp. v. 13.—τὴν ὑμῶν ἐπιστ. is best interpreted, not 'your affection for me,' but 'your longing [to see me]'; as Rom. xv. 23, ἐπιστ. δὲ ἔχων τοῦ ἰλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς.—Ὁδυρμ. may be explained 'heartfelt sorrow for what had been displeasing to the Apostle.'—τὸν ὑμῶν ζῆλον ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ, 'your attachment towards me,' implying a readiness to perform his injunctions.—ὥστε με μᾶλλον χαρ., 'so that I rejoiced the more'; i. e. 'in addition to that I felt at his coming, by what I heard of you.'

8. εἰ καὶ ἐλύπησα—μετεμ.] The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, 'Wherefore, if I even did pain your feelings in the Epistle [which I wrote to you], I do not [now] repent; though I did repent,' 'was sorry' (see ii. 4); i. e. 'after I had sent it off, and before I saw Titus'; a mode of taking the words which removes all ambiguity. It cannot be hence inferred, that the Apostle had written with undue severity; still less need we stumble at the idea of repenting of what was done under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; for by such a repentance we are only to understand that misgiving, or regret,—which a good and kind-hearted man feels,—not from the consciousness of having done wrong; but from tenderness for the feelings of others, and an apprehension lest his well-meant reproofs may have been too severe.—βλέπω γάρ, &c. The sense of these words is thus laid down by most recent Commentators: 'For I perceive that the letter grieved you only for a short space.' Such, however, cannot be proved to be, nor is it likely to be, the sense,—which rather seems to be as follows: 'For I perceive that that letter did pain you, though it was but for a season.'

Now as οὐ μεταμέλομαι proceeding almost implied 'I am glad'; the Apostle, to soften what might seem harsh, and to explain his meaning, added νῦν χαίρω, &c.—Εἰ πρὸς ὥραν is meant to suggest, that the pain was temporary, the benefit permanent.

9. νῦν χαίρω, &c.] meaning, that the satisfaction which he has been speaking of is, not that they were pained, but that they were so pained as to be brought to a better frame of mind; and hence,—as is meant to be suggested by the words a little after, ἵνα ἐν μηδενὶ ζημιωθῆτε ἐξ ὑμῶν, 'that in no respect had they been aggrieved by him.' The pain felt, he means to say, was the end of the reproof, and not the giving pain, that being only a means to the other, the end. See Plut. de Discr. adul. et amic. 16, where it is shown, that the true friend must sometimes, like the physician, pain his friend in order to benefit him; yet he must not thereby give up his friendship: δαί γὰρ ὠφελούντα λυπαῖν τὸν φίλον, οὐ δὲ λυπούντα τὴν φίλῃ ἀναίρειν· ἀλλ', ὥς φαρμάκῳ τὸ δάκνυσθαι χρῆσθαι, σάζοντι καὶ φυλάττοντι τὸν θεραπευομένον.

10. The Apostle here means to show that, so far from having been injured by him, they have been benefited: and this he does by pointing out the salutary nature of the λύπη κατὰ Θεόν, to which he then opposes that κατ' ἀνθρώπου, the worldly with the religious sorrow. We must bear in mind, that ἡ κατὰ Θεὸν λύπη is not, as many Expositors suppose, 'sorrow produced by God'; but, as Bengel says, 'sensus animi Deum spectantis, sequentis.' See the able note of Est., who well defines (after Thom. Aquin.) ἡ κατὰ Θεὸν λύπη to be 'a sorrow proceeding from a love of God, and justice which God requires and approves; not such as flows from the love of the world, and which is, a little after, called ἡ τοῦ κόσμου λύπη.' In what follows (observes Winer), Paul might have written ἡ κατὰ τὸν κόσμον λύπη, but we have, instead, ἡ τοῦ κόσμου λύπη, meaning, 'such a sorrow as men of the world experience [and such only as they are capable of], who naturally regard the things of the world'; which tends both to death temporal, and, without the preventing grace of God, spiritual and eternal. The advantage of this godly grieving is pointed out by its effects, —μετάν. εἰς σωτηρ.—Μετάνοια here denotes 'such a change of mind as produces reformation in the life'; on which see Gataker's Misc. Poth. C. 29 (in which he ably discusses at large all the terms denoting ἀμεταμέλητον κατεργάζεται· ἡ δὲ τοῦ κόσμου λύπη θάνατον κατεργάζεται. <sup>11</sup> Ἰδοὺ γὰρ, αὐτὸ τοῦτο τὸ κατὰ Θεὸν λυπηθῆναι ὑμᾶς, πόσῃν κατειργάσατο ὑμῖν σπουδὴν! ἀλλὰ ἀπολογίαν, ἀλλὰ ἀγανάκτησιν ἀλλὰ φόβον, ἀλλὰ ἐπιτόθησιν ἀλλὰ ἔλπον, ἀλλ' ἐκδικῆσιν! Ἐν παντὶ συνεστήσατε ἑαυτοὺς ἄγρους εἶναι ἐν τῷ πράγματι. <sup>12</sup> Ἄρα εἰ καὶ ἔγραψα ὑμῖν, <sup>1 ch. 2. 4. 1 Cor. 5. 1.</sup> οὐχ εἵνεκεν τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος, οὐδὲ εἵνεκεν τοῦ ἀδικηθέντος· ἀλλ' εἵνεκεν τοῦ φανερωθῆναι τὴν σπουδὴν * ἡμῶν τὴν ὑπὲρ * ὑμῶν πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ. <sup>13</sup> Διὰ τοῦτο παρακεκλήμεθα <sup>1 Rom. 16. 2.</sup> ἐπὶ τῇ παρακλήσει ὑμῶν περισσοτέρως δὲ μᾶλλον ἐχάρημεν ἐπὶ τῇ χαρᾷ Τίτου· ὅτι ἀναπέπανται τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ πάντων ὑμῶν. <sup>14</sup> ὅτι εἴ τι αὐτῷ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν κεκαύχημαι, οὐ κατησχύνθη· ἀλλ' ὡς πάντα ἐν ἀληθείᾳ ἐλαλήσαμεν ὑμῖν, οὕτω καὶ ἡ καύχησις ἡμῶν ἢ ἐπὶ Τίτου ἀλήθεια ἐγενήθη.

repentance); and the second chapter of Bp. Jer. Taylor's Tract on the Doctrine of Repentance, in which he considers the nature of true repentance.—κατεργάζεται, 'produces'; as Rom. iv. 15. And so Plut., vol. ii. p. 476, π, τὰς μὲν γὰρ ἄλλας ἀναιρᾷ λύπας ὁ λόγος, τὴν δὲ μετάνοιαν αὐτὸς ἐργάζεται.—With respect to ἀμεταμέλητον, it is not agreed whether we ought to refer it to σωτηρίαν, or to μετάνοιαν. In the former case it will mean certain and unchangeable. Yet this interpretation involves no little harshness, and the sense arising is somewhat jejune. It is therefore better to suppose a slight transposition, and a sort of paronomasia; which, if ἀμετάνοησεν had been written, would have been complete. There is also a meiosis; the sense being, 'never to be regretted, but rather to be rejoiced in': since no one will ever have cause to repent of godly sorrow for sin, that being necessary to produce reformation, and therefore indispensable to salvation. So Ἀντίθρονος, τὴν ἡδονὴν ἀγαθὴν εἶναι φάσκων, προσέθηκε τὴν ἀμεταμέλητον.

11. Ἰδοὺ γάρ] 'Now, mind!' q. d. 'for only see, in your own case; a strong term of expression, introducing an earnest representation of the blessed effects of the godly sorrow in themselves, as shown by facts.—αὐτὸ τοῦτο τὸ, &c. The words may mean, with Prof. Scholefield, 'this very circumstance, of your having sorrowed,' &c. 'The ἀλλὰ,' observes Billr., 'which forms a highly significant anaphora, may be rendered item, the Apostle, as it were, correcting himself, as if he had not said enough. The several expressions are well brought out (as to their force and application) by Chrys. 'Your sorrow,' he says, 'has not only caused you to condemn yourselves, as though ye had sorrowed to little purpose, but it has rendered you more anxious.' He then enumerates the marks of their anxious care, ἀλλὰ ἀπολογίαν πρὸς ἐμὶ—ἀλλὰ ἀγανάκτησιν, &c.—σπουδὴν (properly denoting hustle) here marks 'the anxiety and earnestness' with which they strove to clear themselves of the charges made, and remove the abuses censured by the Apostle. This general term is then followed up particular ones, of which Emmert. observes that some, as ἀπολογία, φῶς, ἐπιπόθ., and ζῆλος, pertain to the Apostle,—to whom the Corinthians were anxious to clear themselves (they therefore earnestly desired to appease him, and to testify to him their prompt obedience)—the others, ἀγανάκτησιν and ἐκδικῆσιν (on which terms see my Lex.), belong to the incontinent person. The words may, however, refer to others, who had been in a less degree guilty, as, for instance, those who attended at, or encouraged attendance at, the idol-feasts.—ἐπιπόθ. and ζῆλος are to be taken as at ver. 7.—ἐκδ. means 'infliction of punishment' (on which see my Lex.), as in Rom. xii. 19, and elsewhere.—συνεστ. ἑαυτοὺς, 'ye have approved yourselves,' 'have shown yourselves by proof;' i. e. 'have shown yourselves, as a society, dynasts, pure of guilt, in τῷ πράγματι, in the matter in question,—that of the incontinent person.

12. Here the Apostle explains his purpose in writing as he had done, which was not for any particular person's sake, neither of the injurer, nor of the injured, or aggrieved person; not from any desire to punish the former, and procure justice for the latter; but chiefly, that his anxious care for them might be manifest to them in the sight of God. Render, 'if I even did write to you [as I did]; for we have here an ellipsis of οὕτως, or such like (as suggested by the καί). As respects the words ἐνεκεν τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος, the terms ἀδικεῖν and ἀδικεῖσθαι are used by the best Class. writers; not, indeed of incest, but of adultery; espec. ἀδικεῖν, as said of the adulterer.

13. διὰ τοῦτο—ὑμῖν] The sense seems to be this: 'Wherefore [from the love we bore you] we were comforted in the exhilarating news of you, which Titus brought;' comp. ver. 7. By the next words the Apostle means, that his own joy was exceedingly increased at the joy which Titus manifested at his reception among them. The words ὅτι ἀναπέπανται—ὑμῶν are illustrative of the term χαρὰ; comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 18.—ἀναπαύεσθαι means 'to be at rest.'

14. 'Causam expositi cur super gaudio isto Titi tantopere et ipse letatus sit' (Hyper.).—namely, on the ground that in whatever he had boasted of Titus, he was not put to shame, as having boasted in vain.—ἀλλ' ὅτι, &c., 'but as

m. ch. 2. 9.
Phil. 2. 12.

n 3 Thess. 2.

Phillem. ver.

21.

a Rom. 15.

26.

ch. 9. 1—4.

Rom. 5. 3.

2 Cor. 7. 4.

James 1. 2.

Mark 12. 44.

15 <sup>m</sup> Καὶ τὰ σπλάγχνα αὐτοῦ περισσotέρως εἰς ὑμᾶς ἐστίν, ἀναμνησκομένου τὴν πάντων ὑμῶν ὑπακοήν, ὡς μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου ἐδέξασθε αὐτόν. 16 <sup>n</sup> Χαίρω ὅτι ἐν παντὶ θαρρῶ ἐν ὑμῖν.

VIII. 1 <sup>a</sup> Γνωρίζομεν δὲ ὑμῖν, ἀδελφοί, τὴν χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὴν δεδομένην ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῆς Μακεδονίας <sup>2</sup> ὅτι ἐν

we spake all things to you in faith, so also our boasting as respects Titus was (as shown by facts) the truth.'

15. What is said here is, as Theophyl. observes, meant to recommend Titus to their warm affections. On σπλάγγ. see my Lex. The Particip. ἀναμνησκ. is in apposition with αὐτοῦ.—Μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρ., 'with deep reverence and awe,' implying an anxiety not to offend him, and a marked diffidence in themselves. See note on Eph. vi. 5, and Phil. ii. 15.

16. χαίρω—ὑμῖν] The sense, however disputed, seems to be, 'I rejoice that, from the experience I have had of you, I may in every thing feel reassured, trusting in your ready obedience to all my admonitions or suggestions.' This forms an easy and natural transition to the subject now entered upon, and which forms the Second Part of the Epistle,—the collection for the relief of the poor Christians at Jerusalem ch. viii.—ix. 15.

VIII. The mention the Apostle had made (ch. vii. 16) of his full confidence in the Corinthians gave him an opportunity of again introducing the subject of the collection then making for the relief of the poor Christians at Jerusalem; which occupies this and the following chapter; and also, after informing them of what had been done elsewhere, of exhorting them to follow so good an example. They would thus, he says, testify their firm faith, by imitating their Saviour; they would justify his own boasting of them; and whatever they bestowed, the Divine blessing would amply compensate; besides that, they would have the prayers and intercessions to God on their behalf, of those whom they had relieved.

1. τὴν χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὴν δέδ. There has here been some doubt as to the sense of these words. It is, however, generally agreed, that τὴν χάριν here means (as often in this chapter and elsewhere) gift, or liberality. But on τοῦ Θεοῦ a difference of opinion yet exists. Some (as Hamm., Newc., and Wakef.) take it as used, by Hebraism, to denote great. That idiom, however, is of very limited application, and cannot have place here. The word must have its usual sense. And we may suppose χάρις so termed, either,—as it is generally understood,—to suggest that it was God, who had by his grace put into their hearts to bestow this charity; or rather we may suppose the alms to be called God's, as being given for his sake, and in a certain sense given to Him, when given to his distressed servants; according to the gracious assurance, Matt. xxv. 40. Prov. xix. 17. Thus we may render, 'the God-alms,' and suppose that the collection was so termed, both to suggest the duty and reward of the giver, and to spare the feelings of the receiver.

2. The Apostle now, in order to enhance the merit of the gift, shows that it was done under the most unfavourable circumstances.—Ἐν πολλῇ

δοκ. θλίψ. is for ἐν θλίψει πολλῇ. ἡ ἰσχυρὴ δοκιμὴ, 'in affliction most trying.'—Ἡ περισσotεία τῆς χαρᾶς a. is usually rendered 'their abundant joy'; i. e. joy from the doctrines, promises, and consolations of the Gospel. Since, however, this is a sense not very apposite, the recent Commentators take χαρὰ for χάρις, which, however, is quite unauthorized. Why should we not take the word in the sense alacrity, viz. in giving. As giving is the subject of the context, there can be no objection to assigning such a sense here, by which all difficulty is removed. Of ἡ κατὰ βάθος πτωχεῖα (Adverbial phrase for Adjective βαθεῖα) the full sense is, 'their deep-sunk poverty'; lit. 'poverty to the depth (thereof).' So Rom. xi. 33, βάθος πλοῦτου, for πλοῦτος βαθύ. The same expression occurs in Soph. Ant. 150, and in Ælian, V. H. iii. 18. Thus κατὰ βάθος is a stronger expression than κ. βάθος, introduced here by the ancient Critics into some MSS., as D. And, indeed, the same has happened several times in the Class. writers; the true reading βάθος being lost in all the copies. Suffice it to advert to Diod. Sic. i. 41, ἐν τοῖς κατὰ βάθος τόποις (read βάθους τ.), 'in the deep dells' (comp. the κοῖλον αὐλόνων βάθος of Eur. Rhes. 112), also xii. 15, T. i. 38, Bip., ἔξεταζόμενοι κατὰ βάθος (read βάθους), 'examined down to the bottom'; which passage points at the true nature of the metaphor here, which is not, as Est. supposed, taken from draining a well by pumping, but from sounding a depth of water down to the bottom, an expression often used, or alluded to by Shakspear. In the Gloss. κατὰ βάθος, 'penitus,' read βάθους, since κατὰ βάθος can only mean 'at the depth,' as in Athen. p. 13, D, ἐν τῷ βαθύ κατὰ βάθος κειμένω, where Schaef. needlessly conjectured βάθους. I am surprised that so good a Greek scholar as Dr. Peile should, in rejecting my interpretation, which has been adopted by Mr. Alf., propound in its place so strange an exegesis as that κατὰ is really an Adverb in this phrase, and βάθους a Genit. of measurement! He fell into this error from not seeing the force of the κατὰ, to illustrate which Mr. Alf. should not have adduced the phrase καθ' ὅλον, but rather the Homeric κατὰ γαίης, and κ. χροὸν ὥχρετο, Il. xxiii. 10, comp. with Soph. Antig. 24. And surely the use of a phrase formed of a Preposit. and Noun Subst. for an Adject. is an idiom of perpetual occurrence both in the Class. and the Script. writers. In the following term, ἐπερίσσευσεν, examined in, there is, as Fritz has shown, a dialogia, or different reference, in the use of ἐπερίσσευσεν in respect to its two subjects. The general sense (as Billr. shows) is, that, 'notwithstanding their severe trials through oppression (and probably the plunder of their earthly goods), their joy in giving—though they were also themselves in deep poverty, and, so giving, they gave from their necessity—produced a richness of liberality.'

πολλῇ δοκιμῇ θλίψεως ἡ περισσεΐα τῆς χαρᾶς αὐτῶν, καὶ ἡ κατὰ βάθους πτωχεΐα αὐτῶν ἐπερίσσευσεν εἰς τὸν πλοῦτον τῆς ἀπλότητος αὐτῶν <sup>3</sup> ὅτι κατὰ δύναμιν, (μαρτυρῶ,) καὶ ὑπὲρ δύναμιν αὐθαίρετοι· <sup>4b</sup> μετὰ πολλῆς παρακλήσεως δεόμενοι ἡμῶν, <sup>b Acts 11. 29. Rom. 12. 20. 1 Cor. 16. 1. ch. 9. 1.</sup> τὴν χάριν, καὶ τὴν κοινωνίαν τῆς διακονίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους, [δέξασθαι ἡμᾶς] <sup>5</sup> καὶ οὐ, καθὼς ἡλπίσαμεν· ἀλλ' ἐαυτοὺς ἔδωκαν πρῶτον τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ ἡμῖν διὰ θελήματος Θεοῦ· <sup>c ver. 17. 2 Cor. 12—18.</sup> εἰς τὸ παρακαλέσαι ἡμᾶς τίτον, ἵνα καθὼς προεηγήξατο, <sup>d 1 Cor. 1. 8. ch. 9. 8.</sup> οὕτω καὶ ἐπιτελέσῃ εἰς ὑμᾶς καὶ τὴν χάριν ταύτην. <sup>7</sup> Ἄλλ',

3. For ὑπὲρ δύν. B, C, D, E, F, G, and 3 cursives (to which I can make no addition), have παρὰ δ., which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., while Matth., Griesb., and Scholz, retain ὑπὲρ, rightly, since external authority for παρὰ is insufficient, and internal evidence quite against it; because ὑπὲρ cannot be, as Alf. pronounces, an explanatory gloss on παρὰ, for it would need none; but παρὰ is a Critical correction to a more Classical term; for while παρὰ δύν. often occurs in the purest Attic Greek writers, ὑπὲρ δύν. occurs only in Demosth. p. 292, 25, and Thucyd. vi. 16, 2, μείζων ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, and even there it means 'above its power.' In the later writers it occurs, I believe, only in Epict. 51, 5. So that it is really a rare idiom; and accordingly it ought not to be displaced for one of frequent use, to the breach of a fundamental Critical canon. But the strongest of all reasons why our Critical Triumvirate should have retained ὑπὲρ is, that St. Paul uses it once elsewhere, supra i. 8, ὅτι καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἰσαριθμήμεν ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, where even they have retained ὑπὲρ, though three of the six uncials here adduced for παρὰ have it there; and I find from Jackson that the Leic. MS. has παρὰ in the margin, but in the same hand as the textual ὑπὲρ. Of course had our Critics remembered this, they would have retained παρὰ; but Critical Editors, who set their standard so high as to pronounce, ex cathedra, judgment en dernier ressort, ought to remember what is in their own author, and what had occurred only a few Chapters before.

4. τὴν χάριν, καὶ τὴν κοιν. τῆς διακ.] In the interpretation of this passage much depends upon whether the words δέξασθαι ἡμᾶς after τοὺς ἁγίους be genuine, or not. They are absent from almost all the uncials and very many cursives; to which I can add all the Lamb., and almost all the Mus. copies; and on reconsidering the question of their genuineness, I am induced to abandon my former opinion, which cannot be maintained without no little special pleading; for, though internal evidence draws two ways, yet, when properly weighed, it is after all against the words, which, accordingly, I have now double bracketed. Thus the construction and sense will be, 'For even above their means, voluntarily, and most earnestly entreating us [to permit it], they gave this charitable collection of theirs.'

5. καὶ οὐ, καθὼς ἤλπ., &c.] We may supply ἰδρασσαν, as Dr. Peile, and μόνον; but I much prefer ἔδωκαν, from the preceding context. But it is not necessary to suppose an ellipse, at all. The sense may be thus expressed: 'And not only this—which was what we had hoped, or expected they would do—but themselves gave they first to the Lord [to do his will], and [then] to us;' i.e. to observe our directions. Giving themselves to the Lord is a strong expression, to denote the devoting themselves, and whatever they possessed, to his service.—πρῶτον καὶ [first—and (then)] is put for πρῶτον μὲν—ἔπειτα δέ. The construction in the second clause is meant to illustrate the difference in the kind of devotion to the Lord, and to Paul. And that is more plainly indicated in the phrase διὰ θελήματος Θεοῦ, the force of which is best pointed out by Calvin, who, after comparing Exod. xiv. 81 ('The people believed the Lord and Moses his servant'), observes, that 'the words are meant to intimate, that when they were obedient to Paul, they conceived that they were obeying God, since they regarded him as speaking by the mouth of God.'

6. εἰς τῷ for ὥστε, 'inasmuch that.' The complete sense is this: 'The consequence of this unexpected liberality of the Macedonians was this,—that [fearing lest you should be outstripped by them,] I exhorted Titus, &c.—προεηγήξατο, 'had already begun;' i.e. when he delivered the first letter of Paul to the Corinthians, and exhorted them to make a contribution.—τὴν χάριν ταύτην, 'this work of liberality,' namely, the collection. See supra v. 1, and note. The καὶ may be emphatic, and refer to the other good works to which they were excited by Titus. See vii. 13.

7. ἀλλ'] This particle has here the hortative sense, Now, then; as in Mark ix. 22: a sense the more necessary to be adverted to, since from that alone can we account for the omission of a verbum hortandi before ἵνα περ. At is παντὶ supply χάριτι from what follows, 'all spiritual gifts and graces.' The next words, πίστει καὶ λόγῳ καὶ γνώσει, are meant to exemplify these gifts and graces, of which πίστει must have the same sense as at 1 Cor. xii. 9.—γνώσει seems to be equiv. to the λόγους γνώσεως at 1 Cor. xii. 8. Λόγῳ may have reference to the προφητεία, or power of instructing others, either by preaching, or explaining Divine truths. So Eph. vi. 19, ἵνα μοι δοθῇ λόγος—γνωρίσαι τὸ μυστήριον τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. Comp. John xvii. 20. Acts vi. 2. To the gifts of the Spirit are now subjoined the graces of the Spirit.—πάσθ σπουδῇ; i.e. 'earnestness' in the discharge of every religious duty, as Rom. xii. 11. Heb. vi. 11. 2 Pet. i. 5.—τῇ ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐν ἡμῖν ἀγ., 'and in the affection borne by you to us.'—ἐν ἡμῖν is for eis ἡμᾶς. At ἵνα περισσ. we may supply ὁράτε;

ὥσπερ ἐν παντὶ περισσεύετε, (πίστει καὶ λόγῳ καὶ γνώσει, καὶ πάσῃ σπουδῇ, καὶ τῇ ἐξ ὑμῶν ἐν ἡμῖν ἀγάπῃ,) ἵνα καὶ ἐν ταύτῃ e 1 Cor. 7. 6. τῇ χάριτι περισσεύητε. <sup>8</sup> Οὐ κατ' ἐπιταγὴν λέγω, ἀλλὰ διὰ τῆς ἐτέρων σπουδῆς, καὶ τὸ τῆς ὑμετέρας ἀγάπης γνήσιον δοκιf Luke 9. 55. μαζῶν <sup>9</sup> γινώσκετε γὰρ τὴν χάριν τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Phil. 2. 6, 7. Χριστοῦ, ὅτι δι' ὑμᾶς ἐπτώχευσεν, πλούσιος ὢν, ἵνα ὑμεῖς τῇ g 1 Cor. 7. 6. ἐκείνου πτωχεύα πλουτήσητε) <sup>10</sup> καὶ γνώμῃ ἐν τούτῳ δίδωμι.
 h Cor. 9. 2. Τοῦτο γὰρ ὑμῖν συμφέρει, οὔτινες οὐ μόνον τὸ ποιῆσαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ θέλειν προενηρξασθε ἀπὸ πέρσει. <sup>11</sup> Νυνὶ δὲ καὶ τὸ ποιῆor take the ἵνα with a Subjunct. as put for an Imperat.—ταύτη τῇ χάριτι, 'this grace,' namely, that of liberality in relieving your Christian brethren.

8. οὐ κατ' ἐπιτ. λέγω] q. d. 'I do not say this by way of command, or injunction (see 1 Cor. vii. 6), as if I would dispose of your property authoritatively; [for works of charity should be voluntary:]' 'but because of the alacrity of others;' viz. the Macedonians; q. d. 'lest ye should be outstripped by them.' At ἅλλ' repeat λέγω. The words καὶ τὸ τῆς—δοκιμαζῶν contain the other reason for enjoining the duty on them; namely, that he might put to the test the genuineness of their love to God and man,—namely, by setting it in comparison with the zeal and liberality of the Macedonians. The construction is: καὶ [οὕτως λέγω, ὥς] δοκιμαζῶν, i. e. ἵνα δοκιμασῶν.

9. This verse is parenthetical, and the argument is the same as at 1 John iv. 19. The Corinthian converts are exhorted to give liberally, as bestowing some portion of the riches conferred on them by the Lord of the universe; who, for their sakes, left his own exalted state in the bosom of his Father (see John xvii. 5), and, divesting himself of those glories (compare Phil. ii. 7), assumed the condition of lowliness and poverty, that they might become spiritually rich,—rich in the blessings of his religion, in the means of grace afforded them here, and in the hopes of glory hereafter. It is obvious how irrefragable a proof is here supplied of the pre-existence and divinity of Christ. See Abp. Magee on the Atonement, vol. ii. p. 621, and Dr. Fye Smith, Scrip. Test., vol. ii. p. 354, sq.—πλούσιος ὢν is well rendered by the Syriac and Vulgate, 'cum esset dives,' and by almost all our Versions, 'though he was rich;' ὢν being here, as not unfrequently, the Participle Imperfect.—δι' ὑμᾶς ἐπτώχευσεν—πλουτήσῃ. The full sense is, that 'although he was rich [in the glories of the Godhead] yet for our sakes he divested himself of riches, that we, through his [voluntary] poverty, might become [spiritually] rich.'

10. καὶ γνώμῃ ἐν τούτῳ δίδωμι.] Put for the more Classical γνώμῃ ποιοῦμαι. The Apostle means, that he does not issue orders, but merely gives his advice, showing them what is expedient for them. I agree with Dr. Peile, that the collocation of τοῦτο (first in the sentiment) conveys an emphasis = 'this alone,' 'only this;' q. d. (according to his paraphrase) 'I do but offer an opinion [not issue an injunction] on this point; for this is all that is needful for you;' rather, 'expedient for you,—as suitable to your profession and character;' συνδίδωμι, as the

Schol. explains.—οὔτινες, 'quippe qui,' 'seeing that you,' as Dr. Peile explains. Thus I would express the sense at ver. 8 and in the present passage as follows: (ver. 8), 'I say this not as a command;' (ver. 10), 'I give in this matter only an opinion: for this course [that I am taking] is expedient for you,' 'suitable to you, as being persons who have not only begun to do, but have begun first with the will to do.' This is, indeed, a very peculiar, and elsewhere, perhaps, unprecedented mode of expression, to intimate that the collection had been set on foot, and carried out, not of constraint, but of a willing mind. But though Dr. Peile seems persuaded that this is the true sense of the much disputed words, I do not concur with him, since it involves too forced and far-fetched a meaning; and I am inclined to fall in with the interpretation of Estius, adopted by De Wette and Meyer, and much improved by Wieseler, and adopted by Alf., according to which the rendering of the words will be, 'seeing that you began before them not only the act, but also the mind and purpose (to act) from a year ago;' meaning, 'not only were you before hand with them in the deed itself, but also in the mind and purpose, which issued in the deed.' Wieseler remarks, 'that there are three steps in the collection,—the wishing it; the setting about it; and the ἐκτελέσειν, completion of it: and the Corinthians had begun not only the second, but even the first, of these before the Macedonians.' I have nothing to object, except that for 'willing,' or 'wishing,' I would substitute 'willing and purpose;' and this is quite confirmed by the propriety of language; since, as Buttm. long ago pointed out, in his Lexilogus, i. p. 26, 'while βούλομαι merely expresses passive inclination, or willingness, θέλω expresses an active choice (rather, wish) and purpose.' It is strange that Mr. Alf. should retain the Common Version, 'it is expedient,' though the view which he adopts, with Estius, Meyer, and Wieseler, requires, by the argument therein involved, the exposition of the Schol., ἀρμόζει, συνδίδωμι, lit. 'it is befitting,' 'suitable to the case,' i. e. of persons who had long been engaged in the matter in question, and, consequently, to whom injunction would have been out of place, but opinion and counsel suitable, as given at v. 11.

11. νυνὶ δὲ καὶ τὸ ποιῆσαι ἐκ.] The sense is: 'But now bring to an end the doing,' or what has been doing: finish what was begun.—Ἡ προθ. τοῦ θέλ. may be rendered, 'the promptitude of wishing [to do good],' = 'alacrity of wish to do good.' Comp. 3 Macc. v. 26, ὑποδικνύντων τὸ πρόθυμον τοῦ βασιλέως ἐν σαι ἐπιτελέσατε ὅπως, καθάπερ ἡ προθυμία τοῦ θέλειν, οὕτω

καὶ τὸ ἐπιτελέσαι ἐκ τοῦ ἔχειν. <sup>12</sup> Ἐἰ γὰρ ἡ προθυμία πρό- <sup>h Prov. 2. 22.</sup> κειται, καθὼ ἐὰν ἔχη τις, εὐπρόσδεκτος, οὐ καθὼ οὐκ ἔχει. <sup>13</sup> Οὐ <sup>2. 19, 22.</sup>
γὰρ, ἵνα ἄλλοις ἀνεσις, ὑμῖν δὲ θλίψις· ἀλλ', ἐξ ἰσότητος, <sup>Mark 12. 43</sup> ἐν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ τὸ ὑμῶν περίσσευμα εἰς τὸ ἐκείνων ὑστέρημα· <sup>24.</sup>
<sup>8. 14, 7. 8.</sup>
<sup>Luke 21. 2.</sup>
<sup>1 Pet. 4. 10.</sup>
<sup>14</sup> ἵνα καὶ τὸ ἐκείνων περίσσευμα γένηται εἰς τὸ ὑμῶν ὑστέρημα, ὅπως γένηται ἰσότης· <sup>15</sup> καθὼς γέγραπται· Ὁ τὸ πολὺν, οὐκ <sup>1 Exod. 16.</sup>
ἐπλεόνασε· καὶ ὁ τὸ ὀλίγον, οὐκ ἡλαττόνησε. <sup>18.</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Ἥ χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ τῷ [διδόντι τὴν αὐτὴν σπουδὴν ὑπὲρ <sup>h ver. 8.</sup>
ὑμῶν ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ Τίτου· <sup>17</sup> ὅτι τὴν μὲν παράκλησιν ἐδέξατο· <sup>Col. 3. 17.</sup>
σπουδαιότερος δὲ ὑπάρχων, αὐθαίρετος ἐξῆλθε πρὸς ὑμᾶς. <sup>18</sup> Συν- <sup>Rev. 17. 17.</sup> <sup>1 ch. 12. 18.</sup>

ἰτοίμην ἱκανῶς.—Τὸ ἐπιτελέσαι, 'the accomplishing [of what ye have begun].—ἐκ τοῦ ἔχειν
(sub. ὑμᾶς and τὸν βίον), lit. 'out of the means which ye have.'

<sup>12</sup> This verse is exegetical of the preceding.
—Ἐἰ γὰρ ἡ προθυμία πρόκ. may be rendered,
'for if this readiness of mind is but forthcoming,' πρόκ. for παράκειται, 'is at hand.'— Εὐπρόσδεκτος, scil. τῷ Θεῷ. With the sentiment comp. Aristot. Eth. x. 8, p. 493, καὶ γὰρ ἀπὸ μετρίων δύναται ἂν τις εὖ πράττειν κατὰ τὴν ἀρετὴν, which passage may serve to defend the τῆς against Griesb. and other recent Critics, who are strongly inclined to cancel it, from 14
MSS. and a few Versions and Fathers; though the latter evidence is here inadmissible; and the former is very weak, since, in so comparatively small a number of MSS., we might account for the omission from transposition; the word being in some MSS. found before ἔχη. But I suspect it was cancelled by certain over-nice Critics, who knew that it was often omitted in the Classical writers. Thus in a kindred passage of Soph.
(Ed. T. 314, ἀνδρὰ δ' ὠφελεῖν ἀφ' ὧν ἔχοι τε καὶ δύναται, κάλλιστος πόνος, where the ὧν ἔχοι, scil. τῆς, is explained by the subsequent words καὶ δύναται. On the suppression of the subject of a proposition, see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 294.
—Ἐὰν (for ἂν) ἔχη should be rendered, 'according to what a man may have, not according to what he hath not.' The reading of the MS. B, &c., ἔχει, edited by Lachm., has every appearance of being a mere correction, introduced from Acts ii. 45; though the construction in the two passages is quite different: or it may be an error of the scribe for ἔχοι. Ἐχη, however, might be suspected to be a correction of style, considering that ἔαν or ἂν properly requires the subj. or optat. Though ἂν with the present indic. is found at Mark xi. 24 (where, however, there is a variation in the reading), as also Luke viii.
18. x. 8, in the earliest editions.

<sup>13</sup> οὐ γὰρ, ἵνα, &c.] There is an ellipsis of τοῦτο βούλομαι, and the γὰρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. '[according to his ability, I say, that all without distinction may bear a part:] for
I would not,' &c. The words ἵνα ἄλλοις ἀνεσις are wrongly rendered in most of our English Versions, and the Commentators have quite mistaken their sense.—Ἀνεσις, by a metaphor taken from loosening a cord, signifies 'abatement of pain, or of pressure, by remission.' That the letter is the sense here, is plain from the anti-thetical term θλίψις, 'a pressing hard on.' So Jos. Ant. iii. 10, 6, τοῖς ἔργοις ἀνεσις οὐ διδόασιν. Comp. 2 Thess. i. 2. The full sense is, 'My meaning is not that they should be relieved by you from distress, so as to occasion distress to yourselves [but only that you should give what you can spare].' Comp. ἀλλ' ἵνα in John i. 8. The words following are illustrative of the foregoing.—At ἀλλὰ repeat τοῦτο βούλομαι. The verse may be rendered, 'But [my meaning is] that by an equalization, your superfluity, at the present time, may be a supply of their want; so that, in like manner, their superfluity [at another time] may serve to relieve your want; so that there may be [as I said] an equalization,' i. e. 'an equal reciprocity of giving and of receiving good offices between you.'

<sup>15</sup> καθὼς γέγραπ.] 'agreeably to what is written [of the manna];' q. d. (as Abp. Newcome explains) 'So that there may be a general resemblance to the case of the Israelites in Exod. xvi.
18. And that the rich may, considering his station and circumstances, have no superfluity.' It is well observed by Theodoret, that the Lord intimated this equality by the manner in which the manna was collected: Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἀνῆκαν ὁ τὸ πλεον συλλέξαν· τὸ γὰρ μέτρον ὁ μεγαλόδωρος τῷ ὀλίῳ συνέμελε. At τὸ πολὺν τὸ ὀλίγον supply, not (as is usually done) ἔχων, but συλλεξάμενος, from the preceding συν-ἔλεξαν. The citation varies from the Sept., but faithfully represents the Hebrew.

<sup>16</sup> The Apostle now returns to the subject of Τίτου, which had been dropt at ver. 6; and, in order to leave them no excuse, he reminds them of two zealous advocates in the business, who had it much at heart. Adverting first to Τίτου, he commences with giving thanks to God for having put it into his heart to hearken to his request.—Διδόντι ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ is for ἐντιθέμεν τῇ καρδίᾳ.—Σπουδὴ is to be taken as at vv. 7, 8,
'the same earnest care for you [which I feel].'
—Υπὲρ ὑμῶν, 'for your welfare and benefit.'

<sup>17</sup> τὴν μὲν παράκλη. ἰδέξ.] He received, indeed, the exhortation, but (ὁδὴ), which is said by way of correction, to intimate that Titus was 'very ready' to go; lit. 'readier to go than I to prompt him'; or, to use our English idiom, 'too ready to go, to need solicitation.' The result of this promptitude is intimated in the next words; and accordingly, 'he went forth of his own accord.'

ἐπέμψαμεν δὲ μετ' αὐτοῦ τὸν ἀδελφὸν, οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ διὰ πασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν 19 (οὐ μόνον δὲ, ἀλλὰ καὶ χειροτονηθεὶς ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν συνέκδημος ἡμῶν, σὺν τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ τῇ διακονουμένῃ ὑφ' ἡμῶν, πρὸς τὴν αὐτοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου δόξαν καὶ προθυμίαν ὑμῶν) 20 στελλόμενοι τοῦτο, μή τις ἡμᾶς μωμήσῃται ἐν τῇ ἀδρότῃ ταύτῃ τῇ διακονουμένῃ ὑφ' ἡμῶν 21 ἡμῶν, ὃν ἐδοκιμάσαμεν ἐν πολλοῖς πολλαῖς σπουδαῖον ὄντα, νυνὶ δὲ πολὺ σπουδαιότερον πεποιθήσει πολλῇ τῇ εἰς ὑμᾶς. οὗτοι δὲ 22 Συνεπέμψαμεν δὲ αὐτοῖς τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν, ὃν ἐδοκιμάσαμεν ἐν πολλοῖς πολλαῖς σπουδαῖον ὄντα, νυνὶ δὲ πολὺ σπουδαιότερον πεποιθήσει πολλῇ τῇ εἰς ὑμᾶς. οὗτοι δὲ 23 Ἐἴτε ὑπὲρ Τίτου, κοινωνὸς ἐμὸς καὶ εἰς ὑμᾶς συνεργός· εἴτε ἀδελφοὶ ἡμῶν, ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, δόξα Χριστοῦ. 24 Ἦν οὖν ἐνδείξιν τῆς ἀγάπης ὑμῶν, καὶ ἡμῶν καυχήσεως ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, εἰς αὐτοὺς ἐνδείξασθε [καὶ] εἰς πρόσωπον τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν.

18. τὸν ἀδελφόν, οὗ, &c.] It is not agreed, nor is it possible to determine, who it is that is here meant, nor the exact sense intended in the words οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ.

19. οὐ μόνον δέ] meaning, 'and he not only deserves that praise, but also,' &c.—Χειροτ., 'being constituted or appointed,' as Acts xiv. 23. —Τῇ χάριτι τ., i. e. the God's-gift mentioned at v. 1. At προθυμίαν ὑμῶν, repeat the πρὸς, 'for the manifestation of,' &c.

20. στελλόμενοι τοῦτο] This depends upon συνεπέμψαμεν at v. 18 (v. 19 being parenthetical); for the sense is, 'We have sent the brother, &c., we guarding against (i. e. in order to guard against) any blame to us, as to the distribution of your abundant liberality: a very peculiar use of στέλλειν, but found also in Hippocr., περί ἀρχ. ἰητρ., p. 1013, καὶ οὗτ' ἀν' ἀποσχεῖντο αὐτοὺς ὡς ἰπθυμοσύναι, οὐδὲ στείλαιντο, 'nor declined, avoided.' A metaphor, says Foes, taken from sailors who avoid rocks by furling their sails, or, as we should say, by clearing clear of them. How στελλ. comes to have this sense I have shown in my Lex. The ὑποστέλλ. of F, G, is a Critical correction. —Μή τις ἡμᾶς μωμή. The sense is, 'Least any one should have a handle for slander or calumny, as if I appropriated any part of the large sum collected by me to my private use.'

21. προνοούμενοι καλὰ, &c.] For προνοούμενοι, B, D, E, F, G, and 5 cursives, with the Vulg., Ital., and other Versions, and some Fathers, have προνοούμεν γάρ, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Alf., but on insufficient external authority, and without any support from internal evidence; inasmuch as, had προνοούμεν γάρ been the original reading, it is difficult to imagine why it should have been altered at all, and espec. to a reading which makes but a lame construction, and seems wanting in a Particle of connexion. This, however, was readily furnished by the Critics, and as readily caught up by other Critics of the same intellectual calibre. The very words of the t. rec. occur also at Rom. xii. 17, where see note. In each instance Paul applies to the case in hand the words of Prov. iii. 4; and in each passage the words are suspended on the preceding, by making the latter Participle stand in a sort of rude apposition with the former. It would be vain to urge, as, perhaps, the German Critics have done, that the t. rec. here was brought in from the passage of Romans; for casi bono! And how could it come into all the copies but 10? For I find not the reading in any of the Lamb. or Mus. copies.

22. τὸν ἀδελφόν ἡμῶν] Who the person is that is here meant, is uncertain.—Ὁν ἰδοὺμεν, &c., meaning, 'whom we have, by much experience, found to be diligent.' It is strange that πεποιθ. should by so many be interpreted 'the great confidence which we have in you;' for surely, according to every principle of correct exegesis, the sense must rather be, 'the great confidence which he hath in you;' the reference in πεποιθῆσαι and τῇ being evidently to ὅν—σπουδ., the brother. And indeed the sense thus arising is far more suitable and direct to the purpose; the meaning being, as many of the best Expositors are agreed, 'by the reliance which he places on you,' i. e. on your good dispositions in general, and your liberality on the present occasion.

23. εἴτε ὑπὲρ Τ.] Supply either λέγοι τις, or rather δίδεικται.—Ἀπόστολοι ἱεραλ., 'messengers, or legates of the Churches,' persons sent to despatch their business, according to the primitive sense of the word, as Phil. ii. 25. These are called the δόξα Χρ., by metonymy, as instruments for diffusing the glory of Christ and his Gospel.

24. τὴν οὖν ἐνδείξιν—ἐκκλ.] The best Editors have been long agreed that the καὶ before εἰς πρόσ. is of slender authority (it is not in any of the Lamb. and few of the Mus. copies), and accordingly it has been cancelled by Griesb., Matthæi, Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Agreeably to the true construction, we may render, 'Give, therefore, to them, in the presence of the churches, this evident testimony of your love to them, and of [the truth of] our boasting concerning you.' Now whatever they did in this matter might truly be said to be done 'in the presence of the churches;' not only because Titus would proclaim it wherever he went, but because Corinth was in every sense placed in excelso; and, from its perpetual communication with all parts of the civilized world, the tidings would soon spread to all the Gentile churches planted by St. Paul.

IX. 1 <sup>a</sup> Περὶ μὲν γὰρ τῆς διακονίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους περισσόν <sup>a Acts 11. 30. Rom. 15. 26. 1 Cor. 16. 1. ch. 8. 4. b ch. 8. 10. 19. 24.</sup> μοι ἐστὶ τὸ γράφειν ὑμῖν. 2 <sup>b</sup> οἶδα γὰρ τὴν προθυμίαν ὑμῶν, ἣν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν καυχῶμαι Μακεδόσιν ὅτι Ἀχάτα παρσκευάσται ἀπὸ πένης· καὶ ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν ζῆλος ἡρέθισε τοὺς πλείονας. 3 <sup>c</sup> Ἐπεμψα δὲ τοὺς ἀδελφούς, ἵνα μὴ τὸ καύχημα ἡμῶν τὸ ὑπὲρ <sup>c ch. 8. 4. 17—22. 1 Cor. 16. 2. Tit. 2. 1.</sup> ὑμῶν κενωθῇ ἐν τῷ μέρει τούτῳ· ἵνα, καθὼς ἔλεγον, παρσκευασμένοι ᾗτε 4 μὴ πως, ἐὰν ἔλθωσι σὺν ἐμοὶ Μακεδόνες, καὶ

IX. In this Chapter the Apostle, reverting to the collection, further urges their liberal contribution; and to the reasons before deduced, ab hominibus, are now subjoined those ab utilitate. He first assigns his reasons for sending 'the brethren before-hand,' to make up the collections, notwithstanding his confidence in them. Then, after encouraging their cheerful liberality, he, in the full expectation of its fruits, affectionately recommends them to the Divine blessing.

1. περὶ μὲν γὰρ τῆς διακ. The γὰρ serves to connect this with the last verse of the preceding Chapter; though, indeed, that connexion is not, at first sight, obvious; nay, the Apostle seems to be passing to a new subject. Yet there is no transition, properly speaking; or only, at most, that kind of quasi-transition, when a writer stops short in treating on any subject, in order to again advert to something that has been before said, so as to make that the means of introducing some new topic. In this case, ἀλλὰ γὰρ is not unusual in the Classical writers, and there is always an ellipsis of some words to be supplied from the context, or the subject-matter. So here we may paraphrase, with Abp. Newcome: '[However, I need say no more, nor insist on the foregoing topics, viii. 24;] for as to the propriety and reasonableness that you should contribute to the wants of the Jewish converts, I have no need to insist on them.' If this be thought too precarious a principle, as depending on the supply of a whole sentence to which it is to be referred, we may trace the connexion, with Dr. Peise (after Schott, Introduction to N. T., p. 240), thus: 'For, as to the Christian duty of relieving our brethren, it is superfluous for me to write to you on that point, for I know, &c. &c., but [still] I have sent, &c.,' ver. 3.

2. Ἀτὸ ὑμῶν ἡμ. there may be implied λαλῶν, from the subject-matter.—καυχ., 'which I am accustomed to boast of, when speaking of you;' or, 'boast concerning you.' By Ἀχάτα is here denoted that province of the two into which Augustus distributed Greece, consisting of Greece proper; namely, the tract or region to the south of Thessaly, Epirus, and Illyricum; which countries, together with Macedonia, constituted the other province.—Παρσκευάσται need not, with some, be interpreted of intention only and will, as opposed to deeds; nor, with others, of 'complete preparation': for it may well denote, 'has prepared itself' (Pass. with reflex. notion; see Jelf, Gr. § 367, 2), meaning, 'has been ready (to pay in the contribution).—ἀπὸ πέν., lit. 'from the year past.' Πέν. with ἀπὸ is Hellenistic, and peculiar to New Test. See my Lex.

VOL. II.

—ὁ ἐξ ὑμ. ζῆλος]. For ὁ Lachm. edits τὸ, from the MS. B; which, however, derives confirmation from Phil. iii. 6, where MSS. A, B, D, F, G, have the neuter form; though of that I cannot find a single instance elsewhere; and, considering that St. Paul has several times elsewhere used the masculine form, it seems improbable that he should here (once) have used the neuter—unless, indeed, we could suppose that in those other passages the neuter form at first existed, and was afterwards expunged by the Revisers; which is highly improbable, and gives rise to the question, 'Why should St. Paul have ever used, alone it should seem, the neuter form?' I say 'alone,' because I cannot find a single ex. of ζῆλος as a neuter in any writer of any age, except that some faint vestige of it may be found in the Sept. Vers. of Wisd. Sol., λήφεται πανοικίαν τὸν ζῆλον αὐτοῦ, where Jerome renders as if ζῆλ. were in the Nominative; and he may have had in his MS. τὸ ζῆλος, which might readily pass into τὸν ζῆλον from the uncertainty of the construction, and, indeed, of the sentiment. But the other Versions are opposed to the Vulg., and agree in taking ζῆλ. as an Accusative, which also is required by the context; for, as Bedwell observes, 'in ceteris membris sequentibus Deum virtutes suas, loco armorum, sumpturum dicit (scriptor).' If Jerome did read τὸ ζῆλος, it will serve to account for his rendering by 'zelus.' But Jerome may have written 'zelum' (i. e. zelū); and the scribes taken it for 'zelus.'—The ἐξ before ὑμῶν is omitted in B, C, and 5 ancient cursives, and is cancelled by Lachm.; wrongly; since it was removed by the Critics as useless, because they were too ignorant to perceive its force; and the Syriac and Latin Versions (which ought not to be appealed to as any authority in a matter of this kind) might suggest the alteration.

3. μὴ—κενωθῇ] i. e., as Theophyl. explains, κενὸν ἐλεγχθῇ (so Heaych., μάταιος ἀποφανθῇ), 'should be proved vain.'—Ἐν τῷ μέρει τ., 'in this particular;' i. e. your readiness to contribute, as ch. iii. 10.—ἵνα παρσκευ. ᾗτε, i. e. 'that there may be no collections requiring to be made when I come,' as the Apostle says, 1 Cor. xvi. 2.

4. μὴ πως, ἐὰν ἔλθ.—M.] 'lest, perchance, if any Macedonians should accompany me.' He does not say they would accompany him, but it was not unlikely that they should, considering the constant intercourse of Macedonia with this emporium of Greece, and the custom of setting forward the Apostles on their way, and sometimes accompanying them, so as to bring them safe to the next Christian congregation. In ἵνα μὴ λέγ. ὑμεῖς there is a very neat turn, but not a particle of the facetiousness which Olsh. traces.—ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει τ. τῆς καυχ., meaning, 'on account of, on the ground of, this confiεὐρωσιν ὑμᾶς ἀπαρασκευάστους, κατασχυνθῶμεν ἡμεῖς, (ἵνα μὴ λέγωμεν ὑμεῖς,) ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει ταύτῃ [τῆς καυχήσεως].

X

 ὁ Ἀναγκαῖον οὖν ἡγήσάμην παρακαλέσαι τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς, ἵνα προέλθωσιν εἰς ὑμᾶς, καὶ προκαταρτίσωσι τὴν προκατηγγε-μένην εὐλογίαν ὑμῶν, ταύτην ἐτοίμην εἶναι οὕτως ὡς εὐλογίαν, καὶ μὴ ὥσπερ πλεονεξίαν. ὁ Τοῦτο δέ ὁ σπείρων φειδομένως, φειδομένως καὶ θερίσει· καὶ ὁ σπείρων ἐπ' εὐλογίας, ἐπ' εὐλογίας καὶ θερίσει. ὁ Ἐκαστος καθὼς προαίρειται τῇ καρδίᾳ·

d Prov. 11.
 18. & 16. 17.
 & 32. 9.
 Gal. 6. 8.
 e Exod. 28.
 9. & 35. 5.
 Deut. 15. 7.
 Eccl. 10. 11.
 Rom. 12. 8.

dence of boasting; i.e. confident boasting; a sense which ὑπόστασις will very well bear, since it prop. denotes a foundation, or support for any thing. See my Lex.—The words τῆς καυχ. have been cancelled by all the late Editors, as interpolated from ch. xi. 17. But I agree with Dr. Peile, that, though the authority may seem weighty, the word cannot be spared here, nor in ch. xi. 17, and that by κατασχυνθῶμεν ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει ταύτης τῆς καυχ. is conveyed the same idea as by ἵνα μὴ τὸ καύχημα ἡμῶν κενωθῇ ἐν τῷ μέρει τούτῳ, at ver. 3, i.e. 'lest we be shamed [put to shame] on this ground of our boasting.' This view is confirmed by Theophyl. and Est., who explain ὑποστάσις by ὑποβάσις, argumentum ('ground'),—a sense arising from the primary one, 'a foundation, support.' The words were removed by Critics, who did not perceive their true force, as coupled with τῇ ὑποστάσει, and who therefore cancelled them, espec. as thinking that τῇ ὑποστ. would express all that was necessary. Thus the Pesch. Syr. Translator rendered as if it were by a strong expression denoting 'extreme boasting;' but the Arab. Translator, who usually follows him, κατὰ πρόβατον, here renders lit., so as to show that he had τῆς καυχ. in his copy; which confirms the opinion that the Syr. Translator also had it, though he renders with so prudent a freedom as to steer clear of the difficulty.

5. τὴν προκατηγγεγλημένην meaning, it would seem, not, as our Common Version renders, 'whereof ye had notice before;' but rather, 'which had been [so much] spoken of before [by you] and announced [by me to the public].' By most recent Commentators τὴν εὐλογίαν is simply taken to denote 'a gift.' Yet they do not satisfactorily show how such a sense can arise from the primitive signification of the word; i.e. 'an expression of good-will to any one.' Abp. Newcome's solution is the best, namely, that it is so called from a metonymy of the effect for the cause; i.e. because it produces blessing. The true mode, however, of viewing the idiom seems to be, to suppose it used from delicacy. The Apostle often employs such terms to denote alms, as are calculated at once to spare the feelings of the receiver, and remind the giver that he is exercising a duty towards God. Thus we may compare this use of εὐλογία with that of χάρις at viii. 1, and εὐχαριστία elsewhere. Hence it may be rendered 'a thanks-gift;' meaning, 'a gift bestowed on man in gratitude to God for his goodness.' The same principle may be applied to the use of the word at Gen. xxiii. 11. Judg. i. 15. 2 Kings v. 15, Sept.—At ταύτην ἐτοίμην εἶναι supply ὥστε, 'that this sum may be ready.' The words οὕτως ὡς εὐλογ. καὶ μὴ ὥσπερ πλεονεξίαν, &c., are illustrative of the foregoing sense of εὐλογία. The sense is, 'that it may be [as it is] a thanks-gift,' lit. 'gift of blessing,' and not, as it were, a grudging alms, wrung from unwilling givers by importunity.' The force of πλεονεξίαν is well illustrated by Theophyl., who observes, that 'he who gives alms unwillingly, gives it as if he were overreached, or cheated out of it;' πλεονεκτεῖσθαι as Thucyd. says, i. 77, where it is opposed to καταναγκάζεσθαι.

6. τοῦτο δέ sub. φημί, 'but this (only) I say;' prob. meant to encounter an argument for giving at least sparingly; the answer to which is, '[The gift must, indeed be voluntary, and only in proportion to what can be spared.] yet, mind this,—he who soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly.' The Apostle does not prescribe the amount which any one is to give; but merely reminds them, that they must expect to reap only in proportion to what they have sown. This metaph. use of σπείρω, in the sense 'to bestow,' is founded on the language of the Old Test.; see Isa. xxxii. 20. Hos. x. 12. Prov. xi. 18, 25.—The antithetic expression ἐπ' εὐλ. may mean, as all the ancient Versions confirm, 'in the manner of blessings;' i.e. 'thanks-gifts or offerings' (as before),—namely, 'with ample abundance,' 'most bountifully.' Comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 26 (Sept.), ὑπερὲς εὐλογίας, 'abundant rain;' and Prov. xi. 25, ψυχὴ εὐλογουμένη, 'the liberal person.'

7. καθὼς προαίρειται τῇ καρδίᾳ] not 'as he purposeth in his heart;' but, 'as he is disposed, or chooseth, in his heart;' for the Apostle is speaking not so much of determination, or purpose, as of 'will.' The word is quite unsuited of the sense purposeth, which was adopted by the Vulg. and other Translators, by many eminent modern Commentators, and recently by Billroth,—a sense supported by Acts xi. 23, προέβουι τῇ καρδίᾳ. Dan. i. 8, ἵδμεν Δαυνὶδ εἰς τὴν καρδίαν, where some copies have ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ. And certainly the term προαίρεισθαι is used by the Class. writers to denote purposing. But the words following, μὴ—ἀνάγκη, seem (as Chrys., Ecumen., and Theophyl. well saw) to fix the sense, not to purpose, or determination, but to the choice of free will. And accordingly, with reason has that sense been here assigned by most recent Commentators. Upon the whole, it seems to denote the disposition of heart to do a thing, arising from the inclination of the mind to it, and the deliberate choice of it pro alius, as in Ælian, V. H. xiv. 14. This is confirmed by Est., who explains it 'prout apud se et in animo suo libero constituerit.' See also Calv. This use of προαίρ. is almost peculiar to the Sept. προαίρεισις, prevails in the Sept., and is found in μή ἐκ λύπης ἢ ἐξ ἀνάγκης ἰλαρὸν γὰρ δότην ἀγαπᾷ ὁ Θεός. 8<sup>1</sup> Δυνατὸς δὲ ὁ Θεὸς πᾶσαν χάριν περισσεύσαι εἰς f Phil. 4. 19.

 ὑμᾶς ἵνα ἐν παντὶ πάντοτε πᾶσαν αὐτάρκειαν ἔχοντες, περισ-σέυητε εἰς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθόν. 9<sup>2</sup> καθὼς γέγραπται. Ἐσκόρ- e Ps. 112. 9.
 πισεν, ἔδωκε τοῖς πένησιν, ἡ δικαιοσύνη αὐτοῦ μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. 10<sup>3</sup> Ὁ δὲ ἐπιχορηγῶν σπέρμα τῷ σπείροντι h Isa. 55. 10.
 καὶ ἄρτον εἰς βρώσιν, χορηγήσαι καὶ πληθύναι τὸν σπόρον ὑμῶν, Hos. 10. 12.
 καὶ αὐξῆσαι τὰ γεννήματα τῆς δικαιοσύνης ὑμῶν 11<sup>4</sup> ἐν παντὶ i ch. 1. 11.
 πλουτιζόμενοι εἰς πᾶσαν ἀπλότητα, ἥτις κατεργάζεται δι' ἡμῶν & 4. 15.
 εὐχαριστίαν τῷ Θεῷ. 12<sup>5</sup> Ὅτι ἡ διακονία τῆς λειτουργίας ταύ- k ch. 8. 14.
 τῆς οὐ μόνον ἐστὶ προσαναπληροῦσα τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶν ἁγίων, & 4. 15.
 ἀλλὰ καὶ περισσεύουσα διὰ πολλῶν εὐχαριστιῶν τῷ Θεῷ, 13 (ἰδιὰ j Matt. 5. 16.
 τῆς δοκιμῆς τῆς διακονίας ταύτης δοξάζοντες τὸν Θεόν, ἐπὶ τῇ John 15. 8.
 Gal. 1. 30.

the later Greek writers. So (besides other exx. which might be adduced) Jos. Ant. xvi. 6, 7, where he is speaking of the collections made among the foreign Jews, and sent to Jerusalem for the use of the Temple, ἀπαρχὰς δὲ ἑκαστοῦ αὐτῶν ἐκ τῆς ἰδίας προαιρέσεως, scil. τὰλῃ.—ἐκ λύπης, grudgingly.—ἰλαρὸν γὰρ δότην ἀγαπᾷ ὁ Θεός. Comp. Ecclus. xxxv. 9, 11. Prov. xxii. 9. Rom. xii. 8. Similarly it is said, Pind. Pyth., κέρως δὲ φίλτατος γ', ἐκόντος αἰ Τιε ἐκ δόμων φέροι. See also Thucyd. ii. 40, ult., where see my note.

8. δυνατὸς δὲ—περισσ. εἰς ὑμᾶς] This (as Chrys. observes) seems meant to anticipate an objection: 'But if I give, I shall impoverish myself.' To which the answer is, 'God is able to [and, as he sees fit, will] make every sort of beneficence,—i. e. the ability and means to exercise it—abound unto you.' So some of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, interpret, taking χάριν for λεημοσύνην. Others, however, understand it of 'the gifts of God.' The accumulation of cognate terms, παντὶ, πάντοτε, and πᾶσαν much strengthens the sense. —περισσεύητε, 'you may have to spare [to bestow] on every kind of beneficence.'

9. καθὼς γέγραπ.] 'Thus the saying of Scripture will be made good.' The citation is from Ps. cxii. 9.—Σκορπίζω signifies 'to scatter, as in sowing,' agreeably to the metaphor at ver. 7. —ἡ δικαιοσύνη is for λεημοσύνη.—Μένει, 'endures,' i. e. in its consequences. There is a sort of Oxymoron, similar to that at Prov. xi. 24, ἰσθί, οἱ τὰ ἴδια σπείροντες πλεονα ποιοῦσιν scil. διὰ καὶ, οἱ συνάγοντες ἱλαττοῦνται.

10. ὁ δὲ ἐπιχορηγῶν—ὑμῶν] The connexion here is ably traced by Chrys. and the Greek Commentators. The words ὁ ἐπιχορηγῶν—βρώσιν are a periphrasis of God (i. e. the Good Being), 'who giveth us all things richly to enjoy.' It is formed on Ia. lv. 10.—χορηγήσαι καὶ πληθύναι, 'may he supply and multiply!' An Hendiadys for 'may he abundantly supply.'—τὸν σπόρον ὑμῶν, 'the seed you sow;' meaning the money or goods bestowed on alms, and thus sown unto the Lord; so expressing a wish that they may have more seed to thus sow unto the Lord.—τὰ γεννήματα τῆς δικαιοσύνης ὑ. An expression borrowed from Hos. x. 12, 'the effect or produce of your liberality.' Some take the meaning to be, 'may he richly reward your liberality;' while others interpret otherwise. The most correct view of the sense seems to be that of the ancient Commentators and Emmerling, who take γὰρ. τῆς δικ. to denote 'the benefit arising from their charity;' q. d. 'May their charitable spirit find more scope for doing good; may their means of doing good be increased!'

11. ἐν παντὶ πλουτιζόμενοι—ἀπλότ.] This is exegetical of the preceding καὶ αὐξῆσαι—ὑμῶν. The construction is irregular, in tracing which it is best to regard πλουτ. as a Nomin. pendens, 'ye abounding,' for Gen. absolutes, and that for ἵνα πλουτίζεσθε, scil. ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ.—Ἡτις κατεργάζεται—Θεῷ. The sense is, 'which, being ministered by us, produces, through our instrumentality, thanksgiving to God;' namely, both from the indigent Christians, who receive the bounty, and from the Apostle who procures and administers it.

12. This verse is explanatory of the foregoing, and may be freely rendered, 'For the ministering of this supply [to the wants of the poor] not only relieves their necessities, but is abundant to the glory of God, by [producing] many thanksgivings' to God; viz. both from the poor thus relieved, and from all true Christians. Comp. supra v. 5.

13, 14. These verses are further illustrative of the preceding.—δοξ. is a Nomin. pendens, like πλουτ. at ver. 11. Emmerling shows that the words of ver. 13 are put for δοξάζοντες τ. Θε. διὰ τῆς δικαιοσύνης ταύτης, ὅτι ἀπλότης τῆς κοινωνίας ἐς αὐτοὺς κ. εἰ πάντας δοκιμάζεται τὴν ὑποταγὴν ὑμῶν εἰς τ. εὐαγγ. τ. Χρ. τὸ δι' ἡμῶν ὁμολογούμενον. The force, however, of τῆς ὁμολογ. is disputed. It seems best to regard it as put for τῇ ὁμολογουμένῃ, 'their professed,' or 'avowed obedience.'—Καὶ ἀπλότῃ τῇ κοιν. ε. α. κ. ε. π. may be rendered, 'by the liberality of this your ministering to the necessities both of them, and of all [who are in need].' The whole of this verse is parenthetical; and the words καὶ αὐτῶν δέησι, &c., in the next verse, connect with v. 12. To clear the construction, we must take δέησι as put for εἰς δέησι. For as the Apostle has before said, that this supplying of the necessities of the saints ὑποταγῇ τῆς ὁμολογίας ὑμῶν εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ

 m ch. 8. 1. ἀπλότῃ τῆς κοινωνίας εἰς αὐτοὺς καὶ εἰς πάντας,) <sup>14 m</sup> καὶ αὐτῶν δέσσει ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, ἐπιποθοῦντων ὑμᾶς, διὰ τὴν ὑπερβάλ-λουσαν χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐφ' ὑμῖν. <sup>15</sup> Χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνεκδιηγῇ αὐτοῦ δωρεᾷ!

a ver. 10.
 1 Cor. 2. 2.

X. 1. Ἀὐτὸς δὲ ἐγὼ Παῦλος παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς διὰ τῆς πρῶwould redound to the praise and glory of God; so here he adverts to another effect which would thence result: 'it will also (he says) tend to [excite] their prayers for you.' The expression ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ, which is to be referred to αὐτῶν, may be best rendered, agreeably to the Syr. Version, 'having a great affection for you,' as in Phil. i. 8. Thus the words following will yield a very suitable sense; where χάριν τοῦ Θεοῦ signifies 'the grace of God in them,' as evinced by their obedience to the requisitions of the Gospel in the exercise of this charity.

15. χάρις δὲ τῷ Θεῷ ἰ. τῇ ἀνεκδ. α. δωρεᾷ.] The Apostle here concludes with a sort of doxology, or ascription of praise; in discussing which, it is important to fix the reference in the strong expression,—so suitable to the preceding context,—τῇ ἀνεκδ. δωρεᾷ. Now here Mr. Alf. thinks it 'impossible to apply such a term as this, so placed as here, to any gift short of that One, by which it may be referred to the gift of God of his only Son Jesus Christ,—a gift which (he adds) brings with it all things else (Rom. viii. 32), and is, in all its wonders of grace, and riches of mercy, truly ineffable. And so (he adds) it is explained by all the deeper Commentators,' specifying Theophyl. But of the modern Commentators, who have espoused this view, the only ones of any note are, Pisc., Scatler, Doddr.,—doubtfully, and Mackn.; none of them deep Expositors, as compared with Calv., Beza, Hyper., Est., and Bullin., followed by almost all other Expositors. The exposition in question is very specious; and I am ready to admit with Doddr., that 'the Apostle's mind, to which the invaluable gift of Christ was so familiar, may have by a strong and natural transition, glanced on that.' But I much doubt whether that was the principal idea in Paul's mind. Mr. Alford's expression, that 'it is impossible to explain it otherwise than of Jesus Christ,' is because he thought that, as Mackn. says, 'so grand an epithet could be applied no otherwise.' But even Mackn. only says, 'it may with more propriety be applied to Christ.' But how does he follow up that grand epithet in his Paraphrase? by 'who hath joined together Jews and Gentiles in one Church.' And he follows up the idea in his note. But, after all, the expression would not be too strong for the occasion. Schlichting exerts all his talent in carrying out the same line of argument pursued by Mackn. Thomas Scott softens it down a little, but only by bringing in what is not inherent in the expression. I merely refer the reader to the excellent expositions of Chrys. and Œcumen., Calv., Beza, Est., Whitby, and Burkett, because they are within reach of every one; but since the exposition of Hyperius (from the extreme rarity of the work) is out of the reach of my readers, I shall lay before them the substance of it, prefixing the introductory words of Calv.:—'Tandem, quasi voti compos, ad laudem Dei evahitur, quo suam fiduciam, quasi re jam confectâ, testari voluit.' Hyper. remarks, "that while Paul calls beneficence to the poor 'the gift of God,' and for which thanks to God are every where due, we must bear in mind that, although, diligent as the ministers of the word may be in exciting their hearers to the exercise of faith and Christian charity, 'nihil tamen agitur ni Deus suo Spiritu pectora promoveat auditorum. Quamobrem, cum non adsunt fructus, Deus est precibus pulsandus; cum vero adsunt, eidem agi debent gratiæ.'" This view is confirmed by Chrys., Δωρεῶν δὲ τὰ τοσαῦτα ἀγαθὰ τὰ διὰ τῆς ἐλεημοσύνης γινόμενα, καὶ τοῖς λαμβάνουσιν καὶ τοῖς παρ- ἔχουσιν, a mode of speaking intended to check any self-complacency, which might be engendered by the lofty praise just before assigned to almsgiving; this being represented indirectly as coming from God, whom the Apostle blesses for putting it into their hearts to give so liberally, whereby would redound so much glory to God, and honour to the Gospel of Christ. And so Theophyl. and Œcumen. As to the words cited by Alf. from Theophyl., they do not contain the sense he ascribes; though others, which he has omitted to adduce, do,—τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἀναμιμνήσκει ὃν δέξασθαι διὰ τῆς σαρκώσεως τοῦ Χριστοῦ. However, I cannot find that any ancient Greek Father adopted this view, which I suspect came from the Arians; as we may imagine from Schlichting so readily catching it up, and making the most of it. However, it is quite plain where the truth of Scripture lies; and we are, I trust, now ready to say, with Dr. Peile, 'Thanks be to God for that his unspeakable gift (of grace) through the Spirit to us, which (by its secret influences) moves us to have compassion on our fellow creatures, even as He had pity on us, and of which who shall adequately set forth all the praise, or detail (ἐκδιηγήσεται, Sirach xlii. 17) all its modes of contributing unto the glory of God, and the temporal and eternal welfare of his creatures?'

X. Now commences the third part and concluding portion of the Epistle, in which the Apostle, resuming his former argument, speaks more directly against the false teachers, vindicates himself from their calumnies, and, defending his Apostolical dignity, sets forth the full efficiency of his labours; intimating his intention to evince the power vested in him to punish the refractory, and thereby refute his traducers at the next ensuing visit, which he intended soon to make—should their continued contumacy make so disagreeable a duty unavoidable.

In this portion some difference of style may be observed,—there being here more of connection and finish than in the preceding chapters. A yet greater difference exists in the spirit, manner, and τητος καὶ ἐπεικείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὃς κατὰ πρόσωπον μὲν ταπεινὸς ἐν ὑμῖν, ἀπὼν δὲ θαρρῶ εἰς ὑμᾶς. <sup>2</sup> <sup>b</sup> Δέομαι δὲ, τὸ μὴ <sup>c</sup> παρὼν θαρρῆσαι τῇ πεποιθήσει, ἢ λογιζομαι τολμῆσαι ἐπὶ τινὰς τοὺς λογιζομένους ἡμᾶς ὡς κατὰ σάρκα περιπατοῦντας. <sup>3</sup> <sup>d</sup> ἐν <sup>e</sup> σαρκὶ γὰρ περιπατοῦντες οὐ κατὰ σάρκα στρατενόμεθα. <sup>4</sup> <sup>f</sup> τὰ <sup>g</sup> γὰρ ὄπλα τῆς στρατείας ἡμῶν οὐ σαρκικά, ἀλλὰ δυνατὰ τῷ Θεῷ, πρὸς καθαίρεσιν ὀχυρωμάτων. <sup>5</sup> <sup>h</sup> λογισμοὺς καθαίρουντες, <sup>i</sup>

some. In the former part of the Epistle all is mild and conciliatory; here severe, even oburgatory, and sarcastic; and, accordingly, the Particle of connexion is very appropriate, as marking transition not only to a new subject, but also to one in contrast with the foregoing. There is, however, no such inconsistency as some have recognised; and therefore we may dispense with the hypothesis by which Emmerling, and others, have endeavoured to account for it. In truth, the persons here glanced at are not the same. In the preceding chapters the Apostle merely encounters those who were not well affected to him, or insubordinate; and hence he there only acts on the defensive. Here he seems to have in view the ill-affected false teachers, and their partizans, his enemies, and accordingly he acts on the offensive.

He commences with entreating them, 'by the meekness of Christ,' as pointing to an example, which might serve to justify his previous forbearance, and his continued delay in punishing those who had offended. The Apostle, Est. observes, uses this exordium, as being desirous not to be compelled to severity of avengement; q. d. 'I pray you by the meekness of Christ not to compel me to be angry.' The words διὰ Χριστοῦ are meant to intimate, that he wishes to imitate that meekness on a principle of Christian duty, and not from want of power to punish. Hence he does not say I beseech you, but αὐτὸς ἐγὼ Παῦλος; which we may, with Billroth, ascribe to Paul's choosing to make prominent the circumstance of himself personally sustaining the Apostolic office, so that they might place him face to face with his opponents. But I still think that the true rendering is, 'Now I, the same Paul who,' &c. In fact, there seems to be here a blending of two modes of expression, αὐτὸς ὅς, that same person who παρακαλῶ, and ἐγὼ Π. παρακ. The Greek Commentators notice the dignity in the manner of expression by which, as Alf. observes, αὐτὸς points to the personal characteristic mentioned below, and ἐγὼ Παῦλος sets the Apostolic dignity in contrast with the depreciation which follows,—namely, in the words ὃς κατὰ πρόσωπον—ὑμᾶς (where supply παρὼν), are spoken in the person of his traducers.

2. The δι is resumptive of the δι supra at παρακαλῶ (so at Matt. iv. 1, and comp. iii. 33); and δέομαι δι may be rendered, 'I entreat you, I say.' The sense is: 'I entreat, I say, that I may not have to be bold when I am present, with that confidence, wherewith I intend to be bold against certain, who regard me as walking after the flesh; i. e. guided by worldly principles, and actuated by merely human affections. See Calv. and Hyper., and espec. Est.

3. ἐν σαρκί—στρ.] We may notice the difference between ἐν σαρκὶ and κατὰ σάρκα, and the use of περιπατεῖν in the sense to be, or to live, as 1 John i. 7. The former imports 'to live in a human body, have a frail human nature;' the latter, 'to live on merely human views.' The sense and the force of the allusion in στρατ. are disputed. The ancient and some modern Commentators suppose an allusion to the exercise of Paul's office and commission, as Apostle; see 1 Tim. i. 18; while the recent Commentators think the expression has reference to the strong contest which the Apostle had to maintain against sin and wickedness, and its upholders, and this view is admirably illustrated by Bp. Sanderson, in his 3rd Sermon ad Populum, p. 145. The former is preferable; but the latter may come in by implication. The expression here, κατὰ σάρκα, refers to the maxims of human policy; see note on John viii. 15.

4. τὰ γὰρ ὄπλα, &c.] Here the thought is further developed, and the figure is continued, in order to suggest the mighty supports from above, which the Apostle had in the exercise of this spiritual warfare; and that in order to establish his Divine commission; q. d. 'No! for the weapons of (this) our warfare against sin, the world, and the devil are not carnal or fleshly (mundane, and therefore weak), but mighty unto (or for) God, in whose cause we fight, or through God, our weapons being God's instruments to set forth his power.' So Billroth. However, it may mean, as Dr. Peile explains, 'mighty before God,'—such as God wills to be mighty.' Comp. 1 Cor. i. 24—31: certainly not, as Winer and Alf., 'in God's estimation,' 'after His rule of warfare.' The weapons of the spiritual warfare are well explained by Est. to be, humility, patience, meekness, charity, and the other Christian virtues; also wisdom, knowledge, prophecy, and the other gifts of the Holy Spirit, natural and supernatural. The next words, ver. 5, serve to show how they avail to the purpose thereof,—namely, to the storming and destroying the strong-holds of the adversaries, overturning all the means whereby they (whether the heathen philosophers, the Jewish doctors, or the false teachers) sought to impugn the truth of the Gospel as preached by Paul, or to establish their own errors, namely, through the means of false wisdom, ψευδῶν μυσος γνῶσις (see 1 Tim. vi. 20), as opposed to ἡ γνῶσις τοῦ Θεοῦ, spoken of in the next verse. The same scope may be recognised in the use of the term σόφια, by which is denoted (as at ch. ii. 11) argumentative ratiocination, such as the Platonists and Aristotelians dealt in.

5. λογισμοὺς καθ., &c.] This is further explanatory of καθαίρεσιν which precedes. Λογισμοὺς has reference to the dialectic subtleties, καὶ πᾶν ὕψωμα ἐπαίρόμενον κατὰ τῆς γνώσεως τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ αἰχμαλωτίζοντες πᾶν νόημα εἰς τὴν ὑπακοὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ, <sup>6</sup> καὶ ἐν ἐτοιμῇ ἔχοντες ἐκδικῆσαι πᾶσαν παρακοήν, ὅταν πληρωθῇ ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπακοή.

o ch. 12, 2.
10.

f1 Cor. 14.
27. & 2. 22.
g 9. 1.
Gal. 1. 11—
15. & 2. 5—9.
1 John 4. 6.
g ch. 7. 14.
ch. 12. 9.
h 12. 10.

7 Ἐὰν τὰ κατὰ πρόσωπον βλέπετε; Εἰ τις πέποιθεν ἐαυτῷ Χριστοῦ εἶναι, τοῦτο λογιζέσθω πάλιν ἀφ' ἐαυτοῦ, ὅτι καθὼς αὐτὸς Χριστοῦ, οὕτω καὶ ἡμεῖς [Χριστοῦ]. <sup>8</sup> Ἐάν τε γὰρ καὶ περισ-and vain sophisms, by which the heathen philosophers endeavoured to buttress up the strongholds of falsehood and imposture. In ὕψωμα (said with reference to a proud adversary, under the figure of a lofty tower, or fortress built up by the enemy) there is the same metaphor as in ὀχύρωμα before, though with a more especial reference to the battlements of walls and fortresses; and as λογισμ. is a particular term referring to the heathen philosophers, and partly the false teachers, so ὕψωμα (as appears from the πᾶν) is a general term applicable alike to the heathen philosophers, the false teachers, and the Jewish doctors. Νόημα should be rendered, not thought, but cogitation, i. e. intellectual ratiocination, as supra ii. 11. The false teachers, it seems, found it more difficult to subject their reasons to the obedience of Christ than their actions. Against this the pride of man has ever rebelled. Thus of those who now reject the Gospel, few are indisposed to admit the excellence of its moral precepts; but against any subjection of the reason of men they loudly protest.—εἰς τὴν ὑπακοὴν τοῦ Χρ. may best be rendered 'into obedience to Christ,' i. e. his Gospel, the γνώσις τοῦ Θεοῦ.

6. ἐν ἐτοιμῇ ἔχοντες] for ἐτοιμῆς ἔχ., 'being ready.'—Ὅταν πληρ. ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπ., i. e. 'when you are generally and completely brought to the obedience of Christ.' By ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπ. is meant the obedience of the souder part of them. We are not, however, with many recent Commentators, to suppose that the Apostle waited till the greater and sounder part were reduced to obedience, in order, by their aid, to punish the disobedient; since for the ἐκδικήσεις mentioned he needed not their aid. It would seem that he deferred exercising the supernatural power of inflicting judgments, intrusted to him by God, until, by giving time for repentance, he should have brought back as many as possible to obedience, who would help to keep the rest so, and thereby render it the less necessary to resort to severer measures. The view which I have taken of the sense is, in the main, the same with that adopted by Est., who understands the threatening in question as directed against those in the Corinthian Church who were yet guilty of gross sins; against whom, because they were numerous, ecclesiastical discipline could not be exercised by excommunication. Est. remarks, that it is as 'impracticable as unwise to extend ecclesiastical discipline, by excommunication or otherwise, to great multitudes.' But, we might ask him, have not infallible popes often done this, by laying whole kingdoms and empires under an interdict? It was, however, I imagine, not so much ecclesiastical discipline by excommunication that was here chiefly had in view by St. Paul, as rather punishment by the infliction, through the miraculous power committed to him, of diseases, dangerous, and sometimes mortal; or perhaps the infliction of Divine punishment, as exercised by the Divine hand, in plagues or pestilence; which latter, in the case of multitudes, would be that most likely to be the mode of punishment selected. So it is well observed by Augustin (cited in Est.): 'Si contagio peccati multitudinem invaserit, divina disciplina severa misericordia necessaria est.'

7. The Apostle now turns from the deceivers to the deceived.—τὰ κ. πρ. βλέπετε. Lachm. and Tisch. take the words declaratively. Yet the interrogative mode (as adopted in the Pesch. Syr. Vers.) is more suitable to the context, which is keenly reproachful. The sense of τὰ κατὰ πρ. βλ.; is, 'Do you form your estimation of things [concerning a Teacher] according to external circumstances?' such as person, manner, learning, or eloquence, wealth, birth, rank, or, lastly, the adventitious advantage of conversion under Christ himself; comp. 1 Cor. ix. 1. In τινε there seems to be an allusion to the false teachers, and espec. one who took the lead.—Πίποιθεσ ἑαυτοῦ should be rendered 'is confident in himself,' viz. by placing reliance on some personal merit of his own.—Χριστοῦ εἶναι, scil. δούλοῦ; implying, by the context, one espec. approved by him.—Τοῦτο λογιζέσθω π. ἑ. ἑ. may be rendered, 'let him again consider this with himself,' or reason thus of himself; 'out of his own mind,' as Alf. explains. Nevertheless, the reading ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦ, edited by Lachm. from B and 21, with the Vulg. and Ital. Versions, 'apud, intra,' is worthy of attention, and is confirmed by Thucyd. vi. 40, 2, αὐτὰ δὲ ἐφ' ἑαυτῆς σκοτούσα, where the old reading ἐφ' ἑαυτῆς was well rejected by Popp., Goll., and Arn. See my note. But Thucyd. is not St. Paul; and I suspect the ἐφ' to be a Critical emendation. The next words mean, 'he will reason out, discover, find, by all those arguments whereby he concludes himself to be Christ's, that he may conclude the same of me also.'

8. ἰάν τε γὰρ καὶ περισσώτερον, &c.] A confirmation, or proof, that the thing is so. Render: 'Nay, if I should boast somewhat more [than I have done] of my power;' i. e. 'even should I haply make greater claims than I have already done to a Divine commission.' I so render, because I agree with Dr. Poole and Mr. Alf. that the ἰάν is not concessive, but hypothetical. As to the τε γὰρ, they have, by the aid of Hartung, Partic. i. 15, 5, well pointed out the force; though whether such niceties can be supposed known to Paul may be doubted.—Εἰς οὐλοδοκίαν, καὶ οὐκ εἰς κ. ὅ.] The words glance at the false teachers, whose measures tended not εἰς εὐκ., but εἰς καθ., viz. by throwing impediments in the way of salvation, and by the dissemination of heresy and false doctrine.—Οὐκ αἰσχυνθήσομαι, i. e. 'I should have no reason to be ashamed,' as if I spoke falsehood; nay, the truth of facts would justify me.

στέρον τι καυχῆσμαι περὶ τῆς ἐξουσίας ἡμῶν, (ἥς ἔδωκεν ὁ Κύριος ἡμῖν εἰς οἰκοδομὴν, καὶ οὐκ εἰς καθαίρεσιν ὑμῶν,) οὐκ αἰσχυνθήσομαι. <sup>9</sup> ἵνα μὴ δόξω ὡς ἂν ἐκφοβεῖν ὑμᾶς διὰ τῶν ἐπιστολῶν, —<sup>10</sup> (ἥτις αἱ μὲν ἐπιστολαί, φησι, βαρεῖαι καὶ ἰσχυ- <sup>h 1 Cor. 2.</sup> <sup>ch. ver. 1.</sup> ραί· ἡ δὲ παρουσία τοῦ σώματος ἀσθενής, καὶ ὁ λόγος ἐξουθενη- μένος) —<sup>11</sup> τοῦτο λογιέσθω ὁ τοιοῦτος, ὅτι οἱοί ἐσμεν τῷ λόγῳ δι' ἐπιστολῶν ἀπόντες, τοιοῦτοι καὶ παρόντες τῷ ἔργῳ.

<sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> Οὐ γὰρ τολμῶμεν ἐγκρίναι ἢ συγκρίναι ἑαυτοὺς τισὶ τῶν <sup>1 ch. 2. 1.</sup> <sup>2 & 12.</sup>

<sup>9</sup> ἵνα μὴ δόξω—[ἐπιστολῶν] There is here an air of abruptness, and an obscurity, which most Interpreters, ancient and modern, endeavour to remove by supplying some clause introductory of the words. The most probable supplementum is ἀλλ' οὐ καυχῶμαι; q. d. '[if I were, I say, to boast. But this I will not do,] in order that,' &c. Now this Dr. Peile pronounces the most satisfactory explanation of the difficulty, and he seeks to confirm and illustrate it by the following remarks: 'The above interpretation rests upon that peculiar significance of ἵνα, and its equivalents ὡς or ὅπως ἂν [Anglicè (eventual) to the end that, so that, or so as to; or again (virtual) that so, for to, such as to], which would lead us here, (1) to render ἵνα μὴ by the Latin medum, Angl., 'not to come to the conclusion hastily formed by my adversaries, that,' &c. (2) to resolve the unwonted phrase ὡς ἂν ἐκφοβεῖν into (τοιούτοις) εἶναι ὅς ἂν ἐκφοβῆσιν, &c. Angl., 'to be one whose sole aim and occupation (or capability) is to play upon your fears.' The above view of the force of ἵνα may be adopted; but as to the getting rid of the difficulty in ὡς ἂν ἐκφοβεῖν, by introducing a resolution of the terms into others equivalent, it is a principle always precarious, and never satisfactory. I have the same objection against taking ὡς ἂν ἐκφοβεῖν, with Winer and Olsh., for ὡς ἂν ἐκφοβῶμαι. In short, I still pause at so long and arbitrary a supplementum; and, accordingly, I prefer that of Meyer and Alf., who, taking ἵνα μὴ δόξω subjectively, render, ('I say this because I wish not to seem,' &c. I quite agree with Meyer, that ὡς ἂν is meant to remove the harshness of ἐκφοβεῖν, and means 'tanquam,' as the Vulg. renders, ἂν losing its proper force in a commonly current expression. Thus we may render, 'as it were.' However, the sense is not, as Meyer says, the same as ὡς: nor must the ἂν be merged in the ὡς, since it points at the origin of this remarkable idiom, which was, I believe, formed on ὡς ἂν εἶποιμι, like our 'as I may say,'—both limitative expressions.

<sup>10</sup> αἱ μὲν ἐπιστολαί] This will not prove that they had previously received more than one; for, as Ep. Middl. remarks, ἐπιστολαί might be used generically, as denoting the character of them, though only one letter had been received. We may, however, account for the use of the Plural on the principle suggested by Abp. Newcome, derived from the fact, that 'St. Paul's Epistles were, as we may infer from Col. iv. 6, sent from one Church to another to be publicly read.' What confirms this solution of the difficulty is, that the only Epistles which besides 1 Cor. had been hitherto written by St. Paul were the one to the Galatians and the two to the Thessalonians—both epistles written at Corinth during his first visit to that city, where he formed the Corinthian Church, and probably communicated to influential converts there his epistles to the Galatians and the Thessalonians. And passages there are in those epistles, especially the former, which altogether answer to this character. See ch. iii. 1—5. At φησὶ supply τις, meant of the person supposed to make the observation, and probably the leading person among the false teachers.—βαρεῖαι καὶ ἰσχυ- 'authoritative and severe,' or 'not to be made light of.'—ἡ δὲ παρ. τοῦ σώμ. is for παρὼν δὲ τῷ σώματι, as in Thucyd. vi. 86, πόλις μεῖζον τῆς ἡμετέρας παρουσίας.

—ἀσθενής] 'mean, insignificant,' supposed to have reference to the very diminutive and crooked form, and various other disadvantages, as to person and manner,—which the traditional evidence of antiquity ascribes to the Apostle. Bp. Shuttleworth (cited by Dr. Peile) adduces in proof and illustration the following passage from the Apocryphal book of the Acts of Paul and Thecla, which may not improbably have been derived from more authentic sources, 'Ἰδὼν δὲ τὸν ἄνδρα ἰσχυρόν, τὸν Παῦλον, μικρὸν τῷ μεγέθει (size), ψιλὸν τὴν κεφαλὴν, ἀγκύλον ταῖς κνήμας εὐκνημον (read ἀκνημον, 'calveless') σύν-οφρυν, ἐπὶ ῥίβρον. This picture is confirmed by the Pseudo-Lucian (a writer earlier than the time of Julian) and by pictures of the Greek Church of the very earliest antiquity, as has been pointed out by Mr. Curzon in his Visit to the Monasteries.—The expression ὁ λόγος ἐξουθενήσας refers, it is supposed, to his weak voice and indistinct enunciation; including, too, an imperfect elocution, which was, we may suppose, not sufficiently refined for the fastidious critics of Grecism at Corinth.

<sup>12</sup>—<sup>18</sup> Theodor. remarks on this confessedly obscure and difficult passage, that the Apostle designedly wrote the whole passage obscurely, as not wishing ἵνα γινώσκῃς τοὺς αἰτίους,—a somewhat unsatisfactory principle. It should rather seem, that the state of the passage may be ascribed to the effect of mental perturbation.

<sup>12</sup> οὐ γὰρ τολμ., &c.] The γὰρ may be transitive, but rather elliptic. '[But we will say no more;] for,' &c.—Οὐ τολμ., 'non sustinemus, we do not venture; as Rom. v. 7, and sometimes in the Classical writers.—'Ἐγκ. and συγκρίναι are well explained by Theophylact, συναριθμῆσαι and ἀντιπαράθεσιναι. By τισὶ the Apostle means the false teachers, against whom he directs the

ἐαυτοὺς συνιστανόντων· ἀλλὰ αὐτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἑαυτοὺς μετρούν-
 11. <sup>k</sup> 1 Cor. 12. 11. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 11 Cor. 4. 18. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 m Rom. 18. 30.
 n 1m. 65. 16. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 9. 24, 25. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 1. 31.

ἐαυτοὺς συνιστανόντων· ἀλλὰ αὐτοὶ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἑαυτοὺς μετρούν-
 11. <sup>k</sup> 1 Cor. 12. 11. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 11 Cor. 4. 18. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 m Rom. 18. 30.
 n 1m. 65. 16. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 9. 24, 25. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 1. 31.

pointed sarcasm following.—ἀλλὰ αὐτοὶ συν-
 11. <sup>k</sup> 1 Cor. 12. 11. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 11 Cor. 4. 18. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 m Rom. 18. 30.
 n 1m. 65. 16. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 9. 24, 25. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 1. 31.

13. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 11. <sup>k</sup> 1 Cor. 12. 11. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 11 Cor. 4. 18. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 m Rom. 18. 30.
 n 1m. 65. 16. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 9. 24, 25. <sup>h</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>g</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>f</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>e</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>d</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>c</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>b</sup> 12. 5, 6. <sup>a</sup> 12. 5, 6.
 1 Cor. 1. 31.

14. This verse is explanatory of ver. 13, and the expressions ὑπερκεῖναι ἑαυτοὺς (with which the Commentators compare ὑπερκεῖναι τὸν δρόμον) is equivalent to εἰς τὰ ἄμετρα καυχᾶσθαι.

A similar use of ὑπερκεῖναι occurs in Lucian, Eunuch. 2, κεκραγότες καὶ ὑπερκετινόμενοι. The sense, then, is, 'we stretch not ourselves as if our boundaries did not extend so far as to reach to you.'—ἄχρι γὰρ καὶ ὑμῶν—Χριστοῦ, 'for I have advanced as far as you also in preaching the Gospel of Christ.'—Φθάν. signifies properly to arrive first; and the right of pre-occupancy is here alluded to.

15. οὐκ εἰς τὰ ἄμετρα καυχ. ] The Apostle here resumes the sentiment at ver. 13, in order to engraft another upon it, illustrative thereof: 'We (alluding to the false teachers) do not boast beyond our limits over other men's labours.' Comp. Rom. xv. 20, and also Jos. Antt. xiv. 11, 2, κατασκευάζειν ἑαυτοὺς ἐκ τῶν ἄλλοτρίων πόρων. The Apostle then hints at a result of his labours far more precious than acceptance and honour. We have, he says, a hope αὐξανόμενη τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν ἐν ὑμῖν μεγαλυνθῆναι: that, as your faith increases (i. e. as the profession of the Gospel extends further among you), ἐν ὑμῖν μεγαλυνθῆναι, 'to gain fame and glory by you,'—namely, as a teacher justly may, by the reputation of his pupils.

16. εἰς τὰ ὑπερέκεινα—εὐαγγ. ] sub. ὥστε, = εἰς τό. The sense seems to be: 'The result which I hope for, from this abundant success of my labours among you, is εὐαγγελίσασθαι (scil. με) εἰς τὰ ὑπερέκεινα ὑμῶν, that I may spread the Gospel to the parts beyond you.'—Οὐκ ἐν ἄλλοτρίῳ—καυχ. Render, 'So, however, as not to aim at boasting over that which is already obtained, and in another's bounds.'—Εἰς τὰ ἔτοιμα, for ἐν τοῖς ἔτοιμοις.

17. Since the Apostle had made frequent mention of boasting, and might have appeared to some, from what he had been saying, vain-glorious, hence he subjoins a weighty sentiment, occurring also in 1 Cor. i. 31 (prob. derived from Jer. ix. 23), but in a different relation from that here (couched in the form of a gnome), both in self-vindication, and by way of glancing at the false apostles,—namely, that 'he who boasts even with reason (and not of other men's achievements) must boast not in himself, but in the Lord, by whom he has been enabled to work good.' The words of v. 18 are confirmatory of what is said in the present, serving to set forth the uselessness of boasting, by the consideration that 'it is not by this that a man is approved, but only by the alone true glory of being approved in the sight of God, and shown to be thus καυχάσθω 18 οὐ γὰρ ὁ ἑαυτὸν συνιστῶν, ἐκεῖνός ἐστι δόκιμος, ὁ Prov. 27. 2.

ἀλλ' ὃν ὁ Κύριος συνίστησιν. Rom. 2. 20.
1 Cor. 4. 8.

XI. 1<sup>a</sup> *Ὁφελον *ἀνέχεσθέ μου μικρὸν † τῇ ἀφροσύνῃ. ἀλλὰ a ch. 6. 12.
καὶ ἀνέχεσθέ μου. 2<sup>b</sup> Ζηλῶ γὰρ ὑμᾶς Θεοῦ ζήλῳ ἡρμοσάμην & ver. 10.
γὰρ ὑμᾶς ἐνὶ ἀνδρὶ παρθένον ἀγνὴν παραστήσαι τῷ Χριστῷ 3<sup>c</sup> φοβούμαι δὲ μήπως, ὡς ὁ ὄφρις Εὐὰν ἐξηπάτησεν ἐν τῇ παν- c Gen. 3. 4.
ουργίᾳ αὐτοῦ, οὕτω φθαρῇ τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀπλότητος John 8. 44.
τῆς εἰς τὸν Χριστόν. 4<sup>d</sup> Εἰ μὲν γὰρ ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἄλλον Ἰησοῦν d Gal. 1. 7, 8.

approved; namely, either by the impartment of spiritual gifts and endowments; or, in a general way, by such a blessing on any minister's evangelical labours, as attests that he is accepted of God.

XI. 1. As v. 17 of the preceding Chapter was intended to deprecate the disgust and displeasure which arises at hearing any one praise himself, so seems the present verse thus meant. The Apostle feels constrained still further to boast of what he might justly boast,—deprecating censure, however, by the well-chosen words: 'Would that ye would bear with me a little in my folly [as you call it] of boasting! Yea, do bear with me!' Much force and elegance is there in this use of τῇ ἀφροσ., which is to be understood of what Paul's opponents called such; though it was not so, but arose from necessity. Similar uses occur in the best Class. writers, e.g. Thucyd. vi. 17, καὶ ταῦτα ἡ ἐμὴ—ἀνοία—ἐπισει. Soph. Antig. 95, ἀλλ' ἴα με καὶ τὴν ἐξ ἐμοῦ δυσβολίαν Παθεῖν τὸ δεινὸν τοῦτο. Soph. Œd. Tyr. 396, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ—Ὁ μῆδιν εἰδῶς Οἰδίπουν.

2. Ζηλῶ γὰρ—[ζήλῳ] Render: 'I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy; meaning, a jealousy which has God's service at heart, as opposed to mere human and selfish jealousy. Thus the expression implies a suspicious fear lest they should go wrong. This is confirmed by Chrys., Theophyl., Œcumen., and espec. by what follows at v. 3; and so Theophyl., ζηλοτύπτει διακίμαι, δίδωκε καὶ τρίμων, μὴ τῆς ἀπλότητος ὑμῶν ἡ πανουργία περιγίνηται. We have the same idiom in our own language,—'jealous of the honour' of a person. The next words, ἡρμοσάμην γὰρ ὑμᾶς ἐνὶ ἀνδρὶ—Χριστῷ, are illustrative of the thing, and the metaphor in ἡρμοσάμην would seem to be adopted suitably to that just after, which represents the Church as the bride of Christ. Thus ἡρμοσάμην is equiv. to ἐμνηστευσάμην; the figure being supposed to be derived from the Jewish saying, that Moses espoused Israel to God on Mount Sinai, and also with allusion to the ἀρμοσται, who negotiated marriages for their friends. See also Prov. xix. 14. Krebs, however, has shown that this is contrary to the propriety of language; the middle form ἀρμολογεῖσθαι being never used of a man's betrothing a woman to another, but only to himself. See Œth. ii. 12, Sept., and Joseph. Antt. xi. 6, 2. Hence it would seem better to reject the metaphorical allusion, and suppose, with Krebs and Mall ap. Parkhurst, a parental image, similar to that by which ἀρμολογεῖν is applied to a father's betrothing his daughter to some one. See Eurip. Elect. 24. Thus the sense will be,

'I have prepared you [by Christian doctrines and virtues] that I may introduce you as a pure virgin to one man, even Christ.' However, on further consideration of these words I am of opinion, that the parental image, of a father betrothing his daughter to some suitor cannot be sustained, as being little suitable to the context, where the Church is represented as the Bride of Christ. As to the irregularity of the expression, it is not greater than certain other idioms in the Scriptural writers, and not a few in Alexandrian Greek. The same use of the Middle form, as used in a Deponent sense (like the Simple Active), occurs in several passages of Philo, p. 364, and Jos. Bell. i. 28, 2, συναρμολογεῖσθαι τοὺς γάμους, and some later Greek writers, cited by me in my Lex. in v. ἀρμολογ. It is truly observed by Billr., that 'the figure of the marriage-union (also employed Eph. v. 25) is of frequent occurrence in the Old Test., to denote the intimate connexion between God and his chosen people Israel.' Comp. Isa. liv. 5. lxii. 5. Jer. iii. 1. Ezek. xvi. 8. It should seem, as he suggests, that the Apostle employs the form of expression, ἡρμοσάμην ὑμᾶς ('I have espoused you') from his regarding himself as the φίλος τοῦ νομφίου (comp. John iii. 29), whose office it was to seek out and introduce the bride to the bridegroom, and also to overlook her conduct. On which office see Schoettg. Hor. Heb. i. 335.

3. τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν. 'habits of thinking.'—φθαρῇ ἀπὸ τῆς ἀπλότη. τῆς εἰς τ. Χρ.: a præcis prægnans; the full sense being, 'be corrupted and perverted from the simplicity,' &c. The sense, however, of ἀπλ. has been not a little disputed, and is not quite certain. It would seem to stand for the fuller expression, ἀπλότη. τῆς καρδίας, found in Eph. vi. 6, and Col. iii. 22, and from a comparison of Phil. iv. 7, φρονέτω τὰς καρδίας καὶ τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν ἐν Χρ. 'I., taken in conjunction with the conjugal figure in the context, we may suppose that the sense is, what Dr. Paley's paraphrase expresses, 'let haply your minds may have been seduced away from single-hearted affection towards Christ.' But Est. and others of the earlier Commentators, supposing the reference to be (as, indeed, it really is) to the arts of the false apostles, suppose the sense to be, 'seducing the minds of the Corinthians from the simple, pure, and uncorrupted faith in Christ, which they had been taught.' Yet, if we render, by simple-hearted fidelity to Christ, that will include the simple faith in question; as opposed to the sophistical views of the philosophizing party. So Theophyl. explains, μὴ μετανεχθῆτε ἀπὸ τῆς ἀπλῆς πίστεως εἰς τὴν τῶν ἱερώων δαιμόνητα.

4, 5. The Apostle here disallows an æscuse, by

1 Cor. 15.
10.
Gal. 2, 6.

1 Cor. 1, 17.
5.
Eph. 2, 4.
ch. 4, 2.
& 5, 11.

& 12, 12.
6, ch. 12, 12.
16, 1 Cor. 9, 4, 12.

κηρύσσει ὃν οὐκ ἐκηρύξαμεν, ἡ Πνεῦμα ἕτερον λαμβάνετε ὃ οὐκ ἐλάβετε, ἡ εὐαγγέλιον ἕτερον ὃ οὐκ ἐδέξασθε, καλῶς ἡνείχεσθε. 5. Δογίζομαι γὰρ μηδὲν ὑστερηκεῖν τῶν ὑπερλίαν ἀποστόλων. 6. Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, ἀλλ' οὐ τῇ γνώσει· ἀλλ' ἐν παντὶ φανερωθέντες ἐν πᾶσι ἐς ὑμᾶς. 7. Ἡ ἀμαρτίαν ἐποίησα which the Corinthians might plead that they are not to be prohibited from having new masters,—inasmuch as those masters communicated more excellent things than Paul had (Est.). The connexion or full sense intended is: 'for if, indeed, the new-comer to you proclaims another Saviour whom we have not proclaimed; or if ye receive from him another and better Spirit, which ye had not before embraced,—ye might well tolerate him (admit his pretensions to Apostleship). But this is not the case; neither such an one, nor any other, can do these things, for I account myself to have come nothing short of (to be nothing inferior to) the very greatest apostles.' The formula ἐι μὴν γὰρ here used is very rare in the Class. writers, and in the New Test. is found only elsewhere in Acts xxv. 11, ἐι μὴν γὰρ δόκιμος, and Heb. viii. 4, ἐι μὴν γὰρ ἦν. By ὁ ἰσχύων is meant any such person coming; one being supposed for example's sake, and perhaps also by way of allusion to some particular individual, the leader of the anti-Pauline party. The singular Πνεῦμα is here employed, as better consorting with Ἰησοῦν: and also by way of denoting the Holy Ghost personally, as Him from whom all spiritual gifts and graces (see 1 Cor. xii. 4—11) do come. With respect to the reading, I cannot agree with Lachm. in altering the t. rec. ἡνέχθη into ὑνέχθη from only one MS., the Vat. B, for that has every appearance of being an alteration, introduced for the purpose of adapting this Verb in Tense to the foregoing Verbs. As to the reading ὑνέχθη, adopted by Scholz, Tisch., and Alf. (which I find in Lamb. 1183, 1185, 1186, and Cov. 2, omitted by Mill), I should be willing to adopt it, did I not regard it as an alteration introduced for the sake of getting rid of the double augment, which, however, as being Hellenistic or Alexandrian Greek in form, has the greater probability of being genuine. On this idiomatic use of the Imperfect, by which it means, 'ye might,' or 'could bear with him;' see Jelf's Gr. § 398, 3, and Peile on Æschyl. Agam. 534. Choeph. 412, where they point out the irony involved in the idiom.—ὑστερηκεῖν. I have chosen to render 'that I have come short,' notwithstanding that some Commentators and Translators take it as Perf. for Present tense, 'that I come short,' because, in all the exx. that have been adduced of that idiom, there is constantly to be recognised an intermixture of Past with Present, thus: 'I have done, and still do this or that,' though the Present is generally (as here) most prominent. See John v. 45, ἐς ὃν ἠλπίκατε, 'in whom ye have and do place your trust.' On the sentiment see more in Est., whose remarks coincide with what I formerly pointed out in Rec. Syn. and since in Gr. Test., namely, that 'what the Apostle here says was meant, not against Peter, James, and John (who are, in Gal., styled 'pillars' of the Church, and accordingly, by their partial admirers, would be called ὁ ὑπερλίαν ἀπὸστο- λος, in which expression there is no irony), but against those followers of the above Apostles, espec. Peter,—who, we know, had formed a party at Corinth, the heads of which, we may suppose, puffed themselves forth as a kind of under apostles, sent by the principal Apostles, averring that they delivered only the doctrine received from them, and that a better one than Paul's. This the Apostle here refutes, by showing, both that his doctrine was the very same as that of those apostles, and that he was in no respect on a footing of inferiority to them.

6. The Apostle here adverts to one of the principal objections made to his Apostolical pre-eminence by his opponents.—Εἰ δὲ καὶ ἰδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ, 'But what if I even am rude as to speech, plain in language.' Here ἰδιώτης, by the force of opposition, as respects γνώσει, signifies 'one rude in speech (devoid of eloquence),' and whose language is plain and unpolished. Comp. Joa. Ant. ii. 12, where Moses is described as ἰδιώτης λόγῳ, and whose style of writing is devoid of the ornaments of rhetoric; exactly as Xen. de Ven. xiii. 4, says, of himself, ἰδιώτης μὴν ἐμὲ ἴσται οὐν τοῖς ὁμίμασι (for ῥήμασι, 'fine words') οὐ σοσοφισμένῳ ('more sophistaturn') λέγω. Comp. 1 Cor. ii. 1, ἦλθον οὐ κατ' ὑπακοὴν λόγου ἢ σοφίας.—Of course, by γνώσει we must understand 'Divine knowledge,' viz. of the things he professes to teach,—things pertaining to the salvation of souls. And this sense is adopted by the best Expositors, and confirmed by the weighty authority of Valckn. Mr. Alf., indeed, explains it, 'a man not professionally acquainted with what he undertakes;' referring to Acts iv. 13. 1 Cor. xvi. 24, where his explanation offered here might not be unsuitable; and on that force I have amply treated in my note on Thucyd. vi. 72, 2. But the addition here of λέγω, opposed, by implication, to γνώσει, quite alters the case.—Αλλ' ἐν παντὶ φανερωθέντες—ὑμᾶς, 'yea, rather have we in every way become manifest to you in all things;' meaning, both as to our knowledge and every other particular. At φανερωθέντες we must supply, with Phot. apud Eecumen., from the subject-matter, ἱσμεν, scil. ὅτι ἔχουσιν ταύτην τὴν γνώσιν: a somewhat harsh ellipsis; to avoid which some ancient Critics wrote φανερώσαντες (found in B, E, G, and 17, and received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.), scil. τὴν γνώσιν. But that involves equal harshness. In fact, this reading, φανερώσαντες, is only part of a gloss on φανερωθέντες, the whole of which (namely, φανερώσαντες ἑαυτοὺς) is found in other MSS. That Paul would write such bald Greek as φανερώσαντες no Critic will ever admit, nor any scholar of common sense.

7. ἡ ἀμαρτίαν—ὑμῖν;) There is here an abruptness of transition (united with Pauline energy of expression), which may be removed by supplying a link in the chain of reasoning, thus: 'If, then, the matters of objection above adverted

ἐμαυτὸν ταπεινῶν ἵνα ὑμεῖς ὑψωθῆτε, ὅτι δωρεὰν τὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ εὐαγγέλιον εὐαγγελισάμην ὑμῖν ; <sup>8</sup> ἢ Ἀλλας ἐκκλησίας ἐσύλησα, <sup>h Acts 20.</sup> λαβὼν ὀψώνιον πρὸς τὴν ὑμῶν διακονίαν καὶ παρὼν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, <sup>ch. 12. 12.</sup> καὶ ὑστερηθεὶς, οὐ κατενάρκησα οὐδενός· <sup>1</sup> (τὸ γὰρ ὑστέρημά <sup>1 Thess. 2. 9.</sup> μου προσανεπλήρωσαν οἱ ἀδελφοὶ ἐλθόντες ἀπὸ Μακεδονίας·) καὶ <sup>Phil. 4. 10.</sup> ἐν παντὶ ἀβαρῇ ὑμῖν ἐμαυτὸν ἐτήρησα, καὶ τηρήσω. <sup>10</sup> <sup>1</sup> Ἔστιν <sup>1 Rom. 9. 1.</sup>
<sup>1 Cor. 9. 15.</sup>

to are of no force in showing my unfitness for the Apostolical office, what other ground of complaint have you to allege against me? Have I done wrong, acted unapostolically, in humbling myself? q. d. 'in letting myself down, that ye might be raised up;' i. e. in abasing himself by labouring with his hands, and exposing himself to all the humiliating circumstances attendant on poverty (see Juvenal, Sat. iii. 153), when he might have claimed the maintenance due to him as an Apostle. Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 7—14. In supplying the above words, left to be supplied by the mind of the reader, I am supported by the weighty authority of Photius, apud Œcumen. The omitted words, indeed, are to be fetched out of φανερῶντες ἑμὴν; as Phot. shows,—namely, inasmuch as there is no ground of accusation against us, either on the score of ignorance, or any other ground of complaint; unless, indeed, you lay hold of this pretence of accusation, that I have taken nothing from you: in other words, as Phot. paraphrases, εἰ μὴ ἄρα τὰ κατορθώματα ἡμῶν εἰς ἀμαρτίαν λογιζομαι διγνώκατα, whence it is probable that Phot. took ἡ in the sense aut (as did the Vulgate Translator), not sum, as most Expositors have done. And, certainly, to so explain the word materially helps the connexion; not to say that this is a use of ἡ quite as frequent in the writings of St. Paul as the other. Of this reference to an omitted argument, an ex. occurs elsewhere, 1 Cor. x. 22, ἡ παραζηλοῦμεν; 'or is it that we provoke?' That he had not claimed his right was, some think, alleged by the false teachers as a proof that he did not regard himself as an Apostle. This he answers by giving the true reason for his conduct. There were two other misconstructions of his conduct in this respect: 1. That he would receive nothing from them, because he had no affection for them. This is answered, by saying that he is doing what he does for their spiritual advancement. 2. That this was only a crafty device to catch them. This he notices and replies to at xii. 16.—ἵνα ὁ ὑψωθῆτε, 'that ye might be exalted in spiritual knowledge and the favour of God.' The words following are explanatory of the preceding; q. d. 'because, or inasmuch as, I have preached to you the Gospel cost free.' The reasons why he did so are stated in vv. 9—12.

8. ἄλλας ἐκκλ. ἐσύλησα] This is meant to carry the allegation still further; q. d. 'I not only preached the Gospel among you cost free,—but, that I might be enabled to do this, I, in the case of other Churches (as that of Philippi), even abandoned my rule of taking nothing; thus, as it were, despoiling them; for ἐσύλησα must be taken with due limitation, and with the requisite qualification. This the Apostle was compelled to do, since his ministerial labours at Corinth had been so great, and had occupied so much of his time, as not to allow him sufficient time to support himself by his trade.—ὑστέρηθε is, 'when I was in straits.' Thus in Phil. iv. 12, ὑστερεῖσθαι is opposed to  περισσεύειν.—Οὐ κατενάρκω. οὐδ., 'I was no heavy encumbrance to you;' lit., 'I did not lie a dead weight upon you (explained by the words following here, and at ch. xii. 14—16, ἀβαρῇ ὑμῖν ἐ. ἐτήρησα); from κατὰ, δοῦναι, and νάρκη, torpor; so called from a fish (the torpedo, or electric eel), possessing the power of affecting any one with torpor by the touch; see Humboldt's Travels in South America.—Κατα, Jerome says, is a Cilicianism for κατεβάρησα. And since he testifies that κατα was in use in Cilicia, it might be such. But as ἀνομακίας occurs in Plutarch, so it is prob. that both that and κατα were words of the common Greek, as well as Hellenistic dialect. That it was not in use in Classic Greek is plain from Paul twice subjoining words of explanation. The construction here is best accounted for, not by referring it to the rule in Matth. Gr. § 370, of the government of the Genit. by words compounded with κατὰ, but by supposing a pregnancy of sense,—namely, 'to lie a dead weight on any one, and against (κατὰ) his good,' i. e. 'to his harm.'

9. ἀβαρῇ] 'unburthenedness.' A word of rare occurrence, of which two exx. are adduced by Wetst. from later Greek writers: the most apposite of them is an inscription at Berenice, Οὐ μόνον δὲ ἐν ταῦτοις ἀβαρῇ αὐτὸν παρέσχηται, where read παρέσχηται.—Καὶ τηρήσω, q. d. 'I say not this in order that I may benefit receive of you' (comp. ver. 12, and 1 Cor. ix. 15), 'for I will keep myself.' Thus meaning to intimate, that he could not so far rely on their good dispositions as to take aught from them. In which view, it is finely remarked by Diotogenes ap. Stobæum, ἀβαρία δαὶ ἡμῖν ποτὶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους· μάλιστα δὲ ποτὶ τοὺς μήνορας καὶ καταδεισέτεροις ταῖς ψυχαῖς.

10. This resolution the Apostle confirms with a strong asseveration (like that at Rom. ix. 1), bearing affinity to an oath; since it appeals to Christ for the truth of what is said. The sense may be thus expressed: 'As the truth of Christ is (i. e. Let the truth in Christ be thought to be) in me, as I shall do what I protest, when I say this,' &c. The Commentators have failed to discover the true nature of the idiom, because they did not see that ὅτι has here the same force as when in the Sept. it follows a formula jurandi,—such as ὅτι Κύριος, thus corresponding to the Hebr. כִּי—Ἡ καὶ αὐτῇ signifies, 'this cause of boasting,' as καυχῆμα in a kindred passage at 1 Cor. ix. 16.—Οὐ φραγ., 'shall not be silenced,' or made void; i. e. by being shewn to be groundless. There is an allusion to the use of φράσσω

ἀλήθεια Χριστοῦ ἐν ἐμοί, ὅτι ἡ καύχησις αὐτῇ οὐ φραγίσεται
 εἰς ἐμὲ ἐν τοῖς κλίμασι τῆς Ἀχατίας! <sup>11</sup> <sup>k</sup> Διατί; ὅτι οὐκ
 ἀγαπῶ ὑμᾶς; ὁ Θεὸς οἶδεν! <sup>12</sup> <sup>1</sup> Ὁ δὲ ποιῶ καὶ ποιήσω, ἵνα ἐκκόψω τὴν ἀφορμὴν τῶν θελούντων ἀφορμὴν, ἵνα ἐν ᾧ καυ-χῶνται, εὐρεθῶσι καθὼς καὶ ἡμεῖς. <sup>13</sup> <sup>m</sup> Οἱ γὰρ τοιοῦτοι ψευδ-ἀπόστολοι, ἐργάται δόλιοι, μετασχηματιζόμενοι εἰς ἀποστόλους Χριστοῦ. <sup>14</sup> Καὶ οὐ θαυμαστόν αὐτὸς γὰρ ὁ Σατανᾶς μετασχηματίζεται εἰς ἄγγελον φωτός <sup>15</sup> <sup>n</sup> οὐ μέγα οὖν, εἰ καὶ οἱ
 διάκονοι αὐτοῦ μετασχηματίζονται ὡς διάκονοι δικαιοσύνης. ὦν
 τὸ τέλος ἔσται κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτῶν. <sup>16</sup> <sup>o</sup> Πάλιν λέγω μὴ τις

<sup>o</sup> ch. 12, 6.
 11.

when said of the mouth; as in Rom. iii. 19, ἵνα πᾶν στόμα φραγῇ.—Οὐ φραγίσεται] I am still of the same opinion as to the nature of the metaphor; and this I can further confirm from Ps. cxvii. 42, πᾶσα ἀνομία ἐμφράξει τὸ στόμα αὐτῆς, 'shall stop her mouth,' 'shall silence her.' Here the metaphor in question is espec. suitable, considering that he who is convicted of falsifying a solemn asseveration made in the sight of God, may be said to have his mouth effectually stopped for ever. This view I find confirmed by Theodoret. Vain is it to justify, by any ingenuity of interpretation, φραγίσεται, which has place in the 3rd edition of Stephens, where it, however, was a mere correction of the reading σφραγίσεται, which was received by Stephens in his first edition, and which is found in some late MSS., but is evidently a mere error of the scribes for φραγίσεται. Thus φραγίσεται, as it has never been found in any MS. (except, as I find, Lamb. 1185), is not really a reading at all, and therefore it is not necessary to consider whether it is difficult or easy. The expression αἰς ἐμὲ is not (as some commentators imagine) simply put for μου, but is more significant; the expression being, I conceive, emphatic, 'as respects me,' and meant with allusion to the false teachers, who were, as appears from ver. 20, very burdensome to the Corinthians.

11. διατί;] 'Why is it that I do so?' 'make this my practice?' The answer in the interrogative implies (as in Aristoph. Nub. 58, and Joe. Antt. vii. 14, 4) a strong negation, 'No! I take God to witness it is not so!' Which answer, coupled with the solemn protestation, quite excludes what the Corinthians might possibly have suspected,—his want of affection for them. The real reason is intimated in the next verse.

12. ὁ δὲ ποιῶ καὶ ποιήσω] The full sense is, 'but what I am [now] doing I will do in future.'—ἵνα ἐκκόψω τὴν ἀφορμὴν, &c., 'that so I may cut off the occasion it might supply from those who desire it:' meaning 'a handle to take something in the way of maintenance from you.' The mode of explanation is confirmed by the profound researches of Est., who, following Augustin and Thom. Aquin., shows the meaning to be, that 'Paulus, illis occasionem gloriandi subtrahere volens, noluit accipere sumptus, ut vel in hoc cogerentur agnoscere se ab illo superari.' Of the rare phrase ἀφορμὴν ἐκκόπτειν an ex. occurs in Hierocles.

13. οἱ γὰρ τοιοῦτοι ψευδ.] The γὰρ has reference to what is implied in the preceding clause, that they are in reality different from what they pretend to be; q. d. '[really, I say, and not pretendingly;] for such are not what they seem, but they are false Apostles.'—ἐργάται should be rendered, not workers, but workmen; i. e. ministers. The word is used in this sense at Matt. ix. 37. Phil. iii. 2. 2 Tim. ii. 15. They are called δόλιοι, as pretending to that disinterestedness which they did not possess. Dr. Peile, indeed, explains the sense of ἐργ. δόλ. to be, 'supposititious,' 'counterfeit workmen, uncommissioned labourers in the Lord's vineyard, pseudo-ministers of Christ' (as equiv. to 'false Apostles'); but it rather means 'workmen' (i. e. Christian teachers and ministers), who perform their Gospel work in a false and deceitful manner, so that, instead of building up their hearers in the faith (Acts xxii. 32, and Jude 20), they in reality subvert their faith;—a metaphor taken from builders, who craftily furnish their masters with work which tends to the subversion of the building they are erecting. The latter idea is that above alluded to in the parallel expression κακοὶ ἐργάται, applied to the same class of persons at Phil. iii. 2.

14. καὶ οὐ θαυμαστόν αὐτοὶ γὰρ, &c.] Here we have, as Calv. observes, an argumentum à majori ad minus; q. d. 'If Satan, the worst of all, transform himself, &c., what shall his ministers not do? Satan, we know, did this,' &c., namely, when he tempted Eve.—Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit. θαῦμα, from B, D, F, G, and 4 cursives (to which I can only add Lamb. 1182): a very specious reading, since θαυμαστ. might seem to be a gloss on θαῦμα. But θαῦμα may have been a correction of style by the Critics. At any rate θαῦμα is scarcely ever used by the Alexandrian Greek writers, while θαυμαστ. is often, both by them and by the writers of the N. T. The Class. writers do not use οὐ θαῦμά ἐστι, or οὐ θαυ. ἐστι, but only οὐδὲν θαῦμα, or οὐδὲν θαυμαστόν; and the οὐδὲν is brought in in some ancient MSS. So that very unlikely is it that the Apostle would here employ θαῦμα; and, considering that external authority is so greatly in favour of θαυμαστόν, one can scarcely doubt that it is the true reading.

15. μετασχηματίζονται] We have here a signif. praegnans, 'are changed and become;' as in Rom. ix. 29, ὅτι Γόμ. ἐν ὁμοιωθῆμεν.—&c., 'truth and virtue,' as opposed to deceit, falsehood, and iniquity in general.—τίλος, 'final punishment,' as in Rom. vi. 21.

16. Having stated broadly the true character of his opponents, the Apostle returns to his subμε δόξῃ ἄφρονα εἶναι· εἰ δὲ μή γε, κἂν ὡς ἄφρονα δέξασθέ με, ἵνα μικρόν τι καὶ γὰρ καυχῇσωμαι. <sup>17</sup> Ὁ λαλῶ, οὐ λαλῶ <sup>2d. 2. 4</sup> κατὰ Κύριον, ἀλλ' ὡς ἐν ἀφροσύνῃ, ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ὑποστάσει τῆς καυχήσεως. <sup>18</sup> Ἐπεὶ πολλοὶ καυχῶνται κατὰ τὴν σάρκα, καὶ γὰρ <sup>q. ch. 10. 12. 12. 2. Phil. 2. 3. 4. 1 Cor. 4. 10. 2d. 2. 4. 2d. 2.</sup> καυχῇσωμαι. <sup>19</sup> Ἡδέως γὰρ ἀνέχεσθε τῶν ἀφρόνων, φρόνιμοι ὄντες. <sup>20</sup> ἀνέχεσθε γὰρ, εἴ τις ὑμᾶς καταδουλοῖ, εἴ τις κατ-εσθίει, εἴ τις λαμβάνει, εἴ τις ἐπαίρεται, εἴ τις ὑμᾶς εἰς πρόσ-ωπον δέρει. <sup>21</sup> Κατὰ ἀτιμίαν λέγω, ὡς ὅτι ἡμεῖς ἡσθησάμεν <sup>1 Phil. 2. 4</sup> ject by the introductory formula πάλιν λέγω; which does not import that he is going to say no more than he had said before; but only that he returns to the same subject, which had been interrupted by what was said of the false teachers. Render: 'again,' or 'once more, I say.' The expression, however, which he employs is also, like the former one, of a softening kind, deprecating censure for venturing on self-praise. Thus the sense is, 'Let no one account me a fool, or vain-glorious person, for this self-praise.' Why, the Apostle does not here say; but he adverts to it at ver. 11 of the next Chapter. He is induced to thus boast, since the importance of the occasion demands it of him, and because, as he alleges at xii. 6, he says no more than the truth.—Εἰ δὲ μή γε, 'But if ye will not [acquit me of this charge].'

—κἂν ὡς ἀφ. δέξ. με, 'why, then, even regard me as a vain-glorious person.' It seems, however, better to advert to that rare sense of δέχεσθαι, by which it means sufferere, 'to bear with,' as said of the doing of anything. So we say 'to take,' 'put up with.' But the sense may be yet more simply expressed thus: 'Why then o'en take, receive, me as a fool.' So Theophyl. The next words, ἵνα μικ. τι καὶ γὰρ καυχ. should be rendered, 'in order that I, too [as well as the false teachers], may boast myself a little:' thus adroitly opening the way to the mention of his own labours and sufferings.

<sup>17</sup> ὁ λαλῶ — καυχῇσωμαι Notwithstanding the various attempts which have been made to elicit a satisfactory sense from this passage, the only effectual mode of removing the difficulty is to suppose the Apostle is here speaking not seriously, but (as Scalter, Beza, Bp. Hall, and Abp. Newcome are agreed) per concessione[m]. This is confirmed by the ὡς at ὡς ἐν ἀφρ. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Be it so, if you please, that what I am going to speak, I speak not [as I profess to do] according to the Lord (i. e. by inspiration, or suitably to the purposes of his religion), but speak it, as it were, in folly, in the confidence of boasting.'—The phrase ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ὑποστάσει τ. κ. is put for ἐν τῇ ὑποστάσει, 'confidence, τοντάσι ἐν τῇ καυχῇσει ταύτῃ. On the sense of the expression ὑποστ. καυχ. see note supra ix. 4.

<sup>18</sup> κατὰ τὴν σάρκα By this I would understand not only the external advantages, both natural and acquired, possessed by Paul,—in some of which latter he was superior to the false apostles,—but the former (which seems espec. meant), namely, as Thom. Aquin. and Est. express it, 'de generis nobilitate, de lege, ac circumspiciōne.' Comp. Phil. iii. 4 and 5, εἰ τις δοκεῖ πεποιθέναι ἐν σαρκί, ἐγὼ μᾶλλον περιτομή ὅτι. ἐκ γένους Ἰσραὴλ, κατὰ νόμον, &c.

—καὶ γὰρ καυχῇσωμαι, 'I, too, will glory,' namely, not only in the external advantages alluded to in κατὰ σάρκα, but also others which made Paul truly honourable. Thus glorying, the Apostle has for his purpose not to follow the example of those who boast wrongly, but to repress their proud boasting, and vindicate his own apostolical authority with the Corinthians.

<sup>19</sup> ἡδέως γὰρ ἀνέχεσθε—ὄντες Spoken in bitter irony: the full sense implied, as well as expressed is, 'I shall, I trust, not offend you by glorying, because, being forsooth wise, ye complacently bear with others' folly; ye will readily excuse my folly, since it is the characteristic of wisdom to bear with, and extend indulgence to, the foolish; and ye are accustomed to bear much from others; for example (γάρ), ye bear with it, if, &c. Such seems to be the connexion between ver. 19 and 20. Of ἀνέχεσθαι, in this absolute use (which is very rare) I have noted examples elsewhere, in Thucyd. i. 122, 5, ἐν ᾧ δοκοῦμεν ἂν διὰ δουλίας ἀνέχεσθαι, and Jos. Bell. iv. 3, 10, ἀπραχόμενοι ἀνέχεσθαι.

<sup>20</sup> γάρ] ἀετιπρὶς gratiā. The words following are intended to place the faults of the false teachers in the strongest point of view. They must not, however, be too much pressed on; nor explained with reference to any hypothesis respecting the kind of persons who were then false teachers. The words may be freely rendered,—'Thus, for example, ye put up with it, if a man (such as the false Apostles) domineer over you, eat up your substance, receive private gifts; if he bear himself haughtily, if he smite you on the face;' i. e. 'treat you with the most contemptuous harshness.'—By καταδουλοῖ, 'treats you domineeringly,' is to be understood, not so much by the imposition of the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, as by a general imperiousness of manner: a sense further developed in the term following, ἑαυτοῖς, 'carries himself haughtily.' By the phrase εἰς πρόσωπον δέρει, is denoted 'the utmost contumeliousness, or coarse severity.' Κατ-εσθίει and λαμβάνει have been variously interpreted. Many eminent Commentators understand the former term of receiving a large stipend; and the latter, of taking private gifts. It would rather seem that λαμβ. is to be taken of receiving a stipend, and κατ-εσθ. of exacting presents of money or goods, and also living at their tables; see note supra vii. 2. Perhaps, however, the two expressions are meant to be taken together, as descriptive of the vivacious spirit by which those teachers heavily burdened their devotees, and devoured their substance.

<sup>21</sup> κατὰ ἀτιμίαν λέγω—ῥαθύν. Render, 'By way of disparagement I speak [saying] that.' The sense of these words (which is obscure, and has ἐν ᾧ ὃ ἂν τις τολμᾷ, (ἐν ἀφροσύνῃ λέγω,) τολμῶ καὶ γὰρ.

 ἡ Acts 22. 2. 22 * Ἑβραῖοί εἰσι; καὶ γὰρ Ἰσραηλῖται εἰσι; καὶ γὰρ σπέρμα Rom. 11. 1. Ἑβραῖοί εἰσι; καὶ γὰρ 23 * διάκονοι Χριστοῦ εἰσι; (παραφρονῶν v ch. 6. 4, 5. λαλῶ) ὑπὲρ ἐγώ ἐν κόποις περισσοτέρως, ἐν πληγαῖς ὑπερ-
 Acts 9. 16. βαλλόντως, ἐν φυλακαῖς περισσοτέρως, ἐν θανάτοις πολλάκις
 8. 31. 11. 1 Cor. 15. 10, 81.
 2 Deut. 26. 24 * ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων πεντάκις τεσσαράκοντα παρὰ μίαν ἔλαβον, 7 Acts 16. 25 * τρίς ἐρραβδίσθην, ἅπαξ ἐλιθάσθην, τρίς ἐνανάγησα, νυχθ-been variously traced) seems to be this, 'I speak this with reference to the reproach cast on me by certain (namely, the false teachers), and in order to excite you to make a comparison of their conduct with mine in such respects, that you may see how little similitudō they bear to me as an apostle, and that you may determine which party has the better claim to the title of real apostle.' He then follows up this indirect comparison of the mode in which he exercised his ministry with that of the false apostles, by a direct examination of the qualifications on which they prided themselves, in order to show that they also exist in himself; and he then points out in what respects his qualifications and merits in the cause of the Gospel were vastly superior to theirs. This he introduces with the words ἐν ᾧ ὃ ἂν τις τολμᾷ—καὶ γὰρ, 'ventures to boast;' where supply καυχᾶσθαι, to be taken from the preceding καυχῶμαι. This is softened by the qualifying insertion ἐν ἀφρ. λέγω, equiv. to παραφρονῶν λαλῶ at ver. 23. The foregoing view of the sense is confirmed by the suffrage of Est. in an able exposition, where of δοθῆναι, so used, he adduces exx. from 1 Kings ii. and Ps. lvii., and observes that it is frequent in Scripture. The same view is adopted also by Billroth. The preceding exposition of τολμᾷ is confirmed by Theophyl., Beza, Picc., Est., and Wakef.; though most recent Expositors take τολμᾷ in the sense, 'is bold,' 'carries himself high,' equiv. to 'being proud of ought;' and Est. admits that it may be the meaning intended here. Of this sense I have noticed, besides the ex. adduced from Job xv. 12, τί ἐτολμήσιν ἡ καρδία σου; the following (more apposite) from Thucyd. vi. 56, 2, ἐἰ καὶ τολμήσειαν (equiv. to τολμηροὶ εἶναι), and v. 76. This latter mode of interpreting is, perhaps, to be preferred, because it seems to be more called for by the deprecating insertion ἐν ἀφροσύνῃ λέγω, 'I am speaking in [the character of] foolish boasting.'

22. Ἑβραῖοις—Ἰσραηλῖταις—σπέρμα Ἀβραάμ.] 'The three honourable appellations with which the adversaries magnified themselves—resting on their pure Jewish descent (comp. Phil. iiii. 5, Ἑβραῖος ἐξ Ἑβρ., where see note); where the designations are so arranged as to form a climax,—so that 'Ἑβρ.' refers to the nationality; 'Ἰσρ.' to the theocracy (Rom. ix. 4, seqq.); and σπέρμα Ἀβρ. to a claim to a part in the Messiah (Rom. xi. 1. ix. 7, al.).' (Meyer.) However, I am inclined to think, with Billr., that we must not too narrowly scrutinize these different shades of meaning, but suppose that the Apostle merely adduces the three illustrious names by which a genuine Jew delighted to call himself, and thus appropriates them to himself, as being as truly his as his opponents'.

23. διάκονοι Χριστοῦ εἰσι:] meaning, 'do they call themselves [inasmuch as they refer to the authority of Peter] in an especial manner ministers of Christ? So do I; may much more am I so' (Billr.). In accordance with the above view of the sense, I would take διάκονοι in a somewhat peculiar acceptation; for it may be supposed (as Emmerling suggests) that the persons in question used the term with an especial reference to their being such κατ' ἐξοχὴν, by their having been Christ's disciples when on earth; or, at least, alleged that they were appointed to preach Christ by those who were his relatives, or most intimate friends,—namely, James, Peter, and John. Now Paul affirms that he is more than this (ὥτις here standing for πλείον, seemingly a provincialism), by which, we may suppose, he means, not (as Est. thought) that the name is more due to him than to them; but (what is a sense required by the softening deprecation de παραφρονῶν λέγω, 'I speak as a very fool,' i. e. an absolute boaster; so Aristoph. Plut. v. 2, uses παραφρονεῖν) that he is something far higher than a minister by appointment of men, namely, no other than an Apostle set apart to the work from his mother's womb (see Gal. i. 15), and called to it by the personal interposition of our Lord Himself, God vouchsafing (as he says Gal. i. 16) to reveal his Son by him, that he should preach Him to the Gentiles;—so that his apostleship was, in some sense, superior to that of any of the other Apostles. However, to show how much he exceeds them even in the lowest measure of διάκονοι, he then refers to his labours and sufferings in the ministry, wherein (as he says, 1 Cor. xv. 10) he accomplished more than they all. Of the subsequent terms:—as to φυλακαῖς, one only imprisonment is mentioned before the date of this Epistle,—that at Philippi, Acts xvi. 23. But Clement, in his Epistle, says that Paul was seven times put in chains;—the strongest is brought in last,—θανάτοις, meaning, 'extreme perils of death.' So Plutarch, Romul. § 24, λοιμὸς θανάτου μιν αἰφνιδίους ἀδρόντοι ἀνὰ νότον ἐπιφύρω: see supra i. 9, 10. These general terms of suffering and peril are, in the next two verses, exemplified.

24. τίσος παρὰ μίαν] Those were all that they could inflict; see Deut. xxv. 3. And as the whip was formed of three cords, and every stroke was allowed to count for three stripes, the number of strokes never exceeded thirteen, which made 39 stripes.

25. τρίς ἐρραβδ.] viz. by the Gentiles; for it was a Roman punishment. One instance only is recorded, that at Philippi, Acts xvi. 22.—Ἀπαξ ἐλιθ. viz. at Lystra, Acts xiv. 19.—τρίς ἐνανάγ. None of these shipwrecks are recorded in the ἡμέρον ἐν τῷ βυθῷ πεποίηκα) <sup>26</sup> ὁδοιπορίαις πολλάκις κιν- Acts 9. 24.

S. 17. 5.
S. 19. 22.
S. 20. 2.
δύνους ποταμῶν, κινδύνους ληστῶν κινδύνους ἐκ γένους, κινδύνους ἐξ ἐθνῶν κινδύνους ἐν πόλει, κινδύνους ἐν ἐρημίᾳ, κινδύνους ἐν θαλάσσῃ, κινδύνους ἐν ψευδοδέλφοις <sup>27</sup> ἐν κότῳ καὶ μόχθῳ, a 2 Thess. 2.
ch. 6. 5.
1 Cor. 4. 11.
ἐν ἀγρυπνίαις πολλάκις, ἐν λιμῷ καὶ δίψει, ἐν νηστείαις πολ-

Acts; for that at Acts xxvii. took place later, and must have been the fourth. On the idiom in πεποίηκα, occurring both in Hebr. and Lat., see my Lex.—ἐν τῷ βυθῷ, scil. τῆς θαλάσσης, 'in the deep sea,' the deep. So Isa. xlv. 27. Menand. Incert. vii. 10, εἰμι—ἐν βυθῷ. Hippocr. p. 27, 16, and Æt. H. An. viii. 8, 7. Not unimportant is it to determine what the Apostle here meant to express by the words ἐν τῷ βυθῷ πεποίηκα. Est. follows Th. Aquinas and Anselm in regarding this as a miraculous occurrence like that recorded by the prophet Jonah. But, as Dr. Paley remarks (Hor. Paul. i. 71, ed. Tate), the Apostle is here recounting sufferings undergone, not miracles wrought, whether by or in him. And this would, as Chrys. observes, be introducing the idea of miraculous agency without any necessity; for we have only to suppose, in conjunction with the ancient Commentators generally—who have been followed by the best modern ones—that St. Paul was, though 'in the deep for a night and a day,' yet supported by some fragment of the wreck; a supposition far more probable than that of Theophyl., Theodoret, and the framer of the Æthiopic Version,—namely, that he was kept up all this time by swimming; which, though not a matter of impossibility or without some precedent, is very unlikely to have occurred in the present instance. Least of all, however, is to be said in favour of the view taken by Dr. Paley, who explains the Apostle's words to import that he was on this occasion obliged to have recourse to an open boat, upon the loss of his ship, and that therein he continued a night and a day. A view which has nothing to countenance it in the expression itself, and which is open to the serious objection, that it presupposes nothing in this occurrence beyond the ordinary. In the passage of Lycoph. Œm. 753, which I have adduced in my note, there exists a corruption in the reading, though unperceived by the Editors. I doubt not that, for πόντου δ' ἄνθρωποι ἑναρούμενοι μυχοί, the poet wrote: Πόντου δ' ἄνθρωποι (for ἄνθρωποι) ἑναρούμενοι βυθοί (for μυχοί) θαλάσσης, where ἄνθρωποι is to be understood, not of persons sleeping, but as said of things that hinder sleep; as, for instance, noises that will not let one sleep, as in Eurip. Iph. Taur. 423, φινείδαι ἄνθρωποι ἄκταί ἐκίρασαν (an occupation that forbids sleep). Soph. Aj. 866, τίς ἂν φιλοπτόνῃς ἀλιᾶδαν ('fishermen') ἔχων ἄνθρωποι ἄγρας ('catchings of fish'). Eurip. Iph. T. 1137, ἄπῃτα ὀμμάτων τέλη, 'insomnia officia oculorum.' Answering to ἑναρούμενοι βυθοί θαλάσσης in the above passage ('swept or hurried along in [what the sailors call] the trough of the sea') is the similar expression in Antiph. ap. Athen. p. 625, κόλοις ἐν βυθοῖσι. In short, the above passage of Lycoph. represents the case of one very much in the same condition as that which seems meant to be expressed by the Apostle, namely, one who has been tossed into the surge, and, being entangled with the cordage and loose planks from the vessel, gets hold of some fragments, by the aid of which (and partly by swimming) he is hurried onwards over the surgy waves, which, by their strepitus, will not let any one sleep. At what period this shipwreck and peril of life, by such exposure, took place, is far from certain. I agree with Dr. Paley in thinking that it was probably in the course of the three or four years previous to A.D. 42, the date of Barnabas's bringing Paul to Antioch as his coadjutor in evangelizing the Gentiles, that he visited and evangelized many cities in Cilicia, in the passage to which, to and fro, one or more of those shipwrecks to which he here alludes may have befallen him.

26. ὁδοίαις—ἀγρυπνίαις] Here the Ap. I apprehend, added the second and third terms to exemplify what is expressed in the first. For to the great hardships which he would have to undergo in his long journeyings, were to be added the dangers to which he was thereby exposed, both in crossing, and sometimes making his passage along, broad and deep rivers, in petty boats; and also the perils from robbers,—with whom, at that time, even the most thickly inhabited and civilized parts of the world swarmed.—Ἐκ γένους, scil. ἐμοῦ (see Acts ix. 23. Gal. i. 14). Jewish blind bigotry every where persecuted him with unrelenting malice.—Ἐν πόλει is to be taken generically for ἐν πόλεσι. It is meant that dangers met him wherever he turned himself, whether in the busy haunts of men, or in the solitudes of the desert, or on the bosom of the mighty deep. Those in the cities would be from the bigots, both Jewish and Gentile; see Acts xvii. 5, xix. 28. By perils in the deserts may be understood those from the excessive heat or drought (which sometimes has destroyed great multitudes at once), wild beasts, or from the ambushes of the brigands, or from the attacks of robbers. And as κινδ. ἐν θαλάσσῃ comes immediately after the words denoting the attacks of cutthroats or robbers, we may suppose it to advert to the dangers there of assassins (see Acts xx. 3) or of pirates.—By ψευδοδ. are chiefly meant 'pretended Christians,' whether Jews or Gentiles; generally, perhaps, the former, who feigned to be converted, in order to act as spies; but partly Judaizing Christians may be meant. See Gal. ii. 4.

27. ἐν κότῳ, &c.] After perils of life, and plots against his personal safety, the Apostle now adverts to those less formidable, but scarcely more endurable, because continual, inflictions to be endured in the course of his almost perpetual and most wearisome journeyings, nay even in his more settled sojournings. Comp. supra vi. 4, 5. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the ἐν, from B, D, E, F, G, but no cursorive, and I can only add one, Lamb. 1194. But that authority is insufficient, since it is more likely to have been left out accidentally in such a few MSS., than to have been interpolated in all the rest. It is, moreover, found in all the ancient Versions, and, indeed, seems almost indispensable.

b Acts 20.
18, &c.
Rom. 1. 14.

c 1 Cor. 9.
22. d ch. 12. 5.
& 9. 10.

λάκις, ἐν ψυχῇ καὶ γυμνότητι· <sup>28</sup> ἡ χωρὶς τῶν παρεκτὸς, ἡ ἐπισύστασις μου ἢ καθ' ἡμέραν, ἡ μέριμνα πασῶν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν. <sup>29</sup> Τίς ἀσθενεῖ, καὶ οὐκ ἀσθενῶ; τίς σκανδαλίζεται, καὶ οὐκ ἐγὼ πυροῦμαι; <sup>30</sup> Ἐὶ καυχᾶσθαι δεῖ, τὰ τῆς ἀσθενείας

28. χωρὶς τῶν παρ.] Some eminent Commentators, ancient and modern, take this to mean, 'besides other things, which I have omitted'; while others, scarcely less so (as Calvin, Beza, Erasmus, Piscator, Schmid, and some recent Expositors), explain, 'things out of the regular routine of my office and labours.' Others, again (as E. V., Wakef., and Abp. Newcome), understand it of 'the external troubles already mentioned'; q. d. 'besides such external inconveniences as I have recounted.' This Wetst. seeks to confirm from a passage of an anonymous philosopher; but unsuccessfully, since the expression there is not παρεκτὸς, but ἐκτός. As to the first-mentioned interpretation, it is open to the objection, that there is scarcely any thing that might not be supposed to be included in the foregoing particulars. And, indeed, the sense arising is frigid, and little agreeable to the context; not to say that this signification of παρεκτὸς is destitute of proof. Moreover, it would require the words to be taken, with the preceding, thus: καὶ γυμνότητι, χωρὶς τῶν παρεκτὸς,—which would make it very difficult to assign to the words following any tolerable sense. The second interpretation is, on all accounts, entitled to the preference; it being founded on the usual sense of παρεκτὸς, and enabling us to assign a satisfactory meaning to the difficult and disputed words following, ἡ ἐπισύστασις—ἡμέραν, which are explained by Est., Schleusn., Matth., Emmerl., and Bretschn., 'the concourse of persons coming to Paul for audience.' That, however, is a sense requiring proof (the passage of Acts xxiv. 12, and of Jos. c. Apion. 20, not being quite to the point), not to say that it would be too limited, and may be included in that of the Syr. Vers., causæ quotidianæ, and the Vulg., 'instantia quotidiana,' E. V., and the Arab. Version, 'congeries quotidiana mea,' meaning, as Menoch., Tiren., Sclater, and Beza explain (from Anselm.) 'concourse of cares and anxieties which continually pressed on him;' a sense confirmed by the use of this term σύστασις in Sext. Emp. adv. Eth., p. 127, πλείονον κακῶν ἐπισύστασις. There is, however, a not unimportant question as to the construction of ἐπισύστασις. It is, I think, best considered as the subject, with an ellipsis of a verb, = 'there comes upon me,' μου being for κατ' ἐμοῦ = εἰς ἐμέ: espec. since it is rather called for by the next words, where ἡ μέριμ. is in some measure exegetical of the foregoing; and the words should be rendered, not 'the care of all the Churches,' but 'the anxiety that I feel in the anxious care which I take for all the Churches.' Thus the Genit. is consecutive, 'on account of'; as in Eurip. Hec. 343, εἰσὶν γὰρ οἱ σου μέριμναι Ἰφονοῦ. James iv. 4, ἡ φιλία τοῦ κόσμου—ἡ χρεὶς τοῦ Θεοῦ. Eccles. xxxi. 1, ἀγρυπνία πλούτου ἐκτίθει σάρκα, καὶ ἡ μέριμνα αὐτοῦ ἀφιστά Ἰννον, and oft. in Josephus. And thus is defended the common reading in Æschyl. Eum. 131, μέριμναν οὐ ποτ' ἐκλιπὼν πόνου, where Schutz rashly conjectured ἀγραν, the sense being, 'anxious care about his business' (his daily labour). I must not omit to notice the question as to the reading connected with ἐπισύστασις. Lachm., and Tisch., ed. 1, for ἐπισύστ. read ἐπιστάσις, from B, D, E, F, G, and 3 cursive; to which I can only add Cov. 2, omitted by Mill. But in his 2nd ed. Tisch. restored ἐπισύστ., which had been retained, with entire preference, by Griesb. and Scholz. But, while Tisch. chose no longer to err with Lachm., but to use his own better judgment, Alf. chose, suo judicio, to reject Tisch.'s ἀντίρροπος φροντίδας, usually σοφωτίρας, and brings in ἐπιστάσις, notwithstanding that internal evidence is against it. It has not the least countenance from Versions or Fathers; and the authority of 9 MSS. is insufficient, espec. since ἐπιστάσις may easily be accounted for; (1) by supposing it an error of scribes, who were ignorant of the very rare word ἐπισύστασις, and (2) by regarding it as an error of Critics, who were not satisfied with the sense yielded by the other reading. Now although ἐπιστάσις in the sense 'care,' 'attention,' is not unsuitable to the context, yet, considering that μέριμνα comes just after, it involves a pleonasm, and introduces a feeble, for a nervous, and truly Pauline expression; not to say that the word occurs nowhere in the New Test. nor in the Sept., and in this signification is confined to one writer—Polybius, and thereby not likely to have been used by Paul. That ἐπισύστ. should have been brought in, as Alf. supposes, from Acts xxiv. 12, in all the copies but nine, and all the Versions, is incredible. Alford's supposition, that ἐπιστάσις is a general term, and that μέριμνα particularizes it, is far fetched and sophistical. The same remark as above holds good of the reading μοι for μου, adopted by Lachm., and by Tisch., ed. 1, from only B, F, G, but rejected, and the other restored by Tisch. in his 2nd ed. But Alf. chooses rather to err with Lachm., however lightly he sets by him. It is quite plain that μου was merely a gloss, or false correction of Critics, who did not know that μου is oft. used for μοι = εἰς ἐμέ.

29. τίς ἀσθενεῖ, &c.] This is, I conceive, meant to illustrate the μέριμνα preceding, and show the interest he took in all the Churches he had planted.—Ἀσθ. may, with most Commentators, be understood of weakness in the faith, or of purpose; comp. 2 Tim. 10, τῇ προθίσει, τῇ πίστει, and see my note; and τυρ., of zealous anxiety to recover a sinning brother. Thus the sense will be, 'Who among my converts is weak in faith and purpose of heart, and I am not also weak?' i. e. as compliant to his weakness, as if I myself were weak (see Rom. xii. 15, and 1 Cor. ix. 22); 'who is perverted in his Christian principles, or erring in Christian practice, and I burn not with indignation and zeal to recover him?' The expression σκανδαλ. is meant to designate the effect of the preceding ἀσθενεῖ, to which it corresponds. Thus the two terms are united in Rom. xiv. 21.

